"Ze rain, eet has not come," says Madame, throwing the blinds of our chamber open next morning.

"But the flood has. It is at the hedge!" Cousin David's strong, hearty tones come up from the garden. "Tell Cousin Ruth! Come down and see!"

On every side is water—too deep for wading, too shallow for boating, in the front of the house. At the side of the garden along the hedge it is very deep, and here the boats ply between the house and town.

A troop of colored servants, under direction of the "caterer," come after breakfast and begin preparation for the wedding feast.

At the window in my lady's chamber sits my lady, white and beauteous as the ivory lilies I hold in my hand. All the long, breathless summer day she sits there; and if her mother goes near or speaks to her, I do not see or hear.

The caterer having completed the preparations for the supper to his provincial satisfaction, departs.

It is growing late, and Madame and I, too, rest from our labors. In the hall, as usual, it seems scarcely possible to breathe; elsewhere the faint, unsteady breeze which precedes a storm comes and goes, leaving us to gasp and fan. Cousin David, who sits in the door fanning with his big straw hat, takes a parcel from a messenger and calls Marguerite twice before she appears at the head of the stairs.

"Here is the wedding dress," he says; "try it on and let's see what a magnificent young woman you mean to be to-night!"

She stands looking at him, without making a movement to descend, when an unprecedented fit of energy seizes her mother.

"I will be tire-woman to the bride," she says grandiloquently, starting up stairs. But she is arrested by a cry from Madame.

"Le malheur! eet vill ze bad luck!"

Mrs. Easten is above vulgar superstition, and, after some gay bandinage, goes her way up stairs.

Madame expresses further trepidation over the threatened storm. The clouds, which have been lowering for two days, are settling down in lurid, appalling masses on the Illinois shore. Rain upon a wedding—that, too, will bring ill luck!

"Get thee gone, bird of evil!" I misquote softly under my breath. Cousin David laughs, and Madame gives a quick glance about.

"Where eez ze bird at?"

This Kentucky idiom is a recent acquisition to Madame's vocabulary.

A soft rustle of silk, the sound of trailing garments—Marguerite is coming!

The exquisite silvery brocade has been ruined, and is as hideous a failure as rustic incapacity can compass. But it is beyond the power of an illy-made gown to conceal the lithe perfection of the beautiful young body, or dim the ineffable loveliness of the pallid face.

Mrs. Easten, with partially-closed, critical eyes, regards her with a sort of disinterested approbation. Cousin David looks at her with a sudden, proud light in his eyes; then hurriedly turns his face toward the river.

"La dame blanche," inspired by the occasion, Madame quavers out a few words of the old song in an antiquated treble. Not even in beloved Paris has she ever seen a more beautiful bride.

I say nothing. I can only gaze at the girl in wonder; not more at her beauty than her strange insensibility. No statue could be colder or more indifferent to the admiration which would make another girl's cheeks glow and heart beat with natural, girlish pleasure.

Without a word or a glance she turns and leaves us. I am chilled and vaguely uneasy. But the idle talk ripples easily along. Things are never awkward when Mrs. Easten is by.

The storm has set in in real earnest now, yet the guests come, and are much splashed and spattered, with rain above and water beneath. Dampest, most spattered of all, is the minister. The sight of him seems to remind Mrs. Easten of Marguerite. She beckons me to her, and as I draw near I notice, inadvertently, that the unwonted application of soap to her countenance has given it a gloss, as if freshly varnished for the occasion.

She peers into my face with her short-sighted eyes, and says in a bland undertone:

"My dear cousin, will you be so kind, so obliging as to step up stairs and see if Marguerite is ready? A thousand thanks," as I turn to go.

Not having seven-league boots, and, being very tired, I toil again up to my lady's chamber. Marguerite has refused all offers of assistance at the bridal toilet, not relishing probably her mother's afternoon attempt as tire-woman. The sound of swift, hurrying footsteps inside ceases as I knock, but there is no answer. I knock again, and, when still no answer comes, I push the door open and enter. The wind swings it to behind me with a crash. The flickering lamp lights the room but dimly. The window is wide open, and the storm beats in.

"My dear child," I commence, in alarmed remonstrance; but the words die upon my lips as I look at her.

She still wears the muslin she has worn all day. The silver brocade lies in a heap upon the floor, just as it must have fallen that afternoon. She stands close to the open window, heedless of the rain, a dark shawl about her and over her head. She turns and faces me with deathly white, rigid face.

"Marguerite," I begin again, "what can you be thinking of? The guests and the bridegroom already come, and you not dressed! Let me help you," gently attempting to draw away the shawl.

"Get away! I will kill you if you touch me!" breaks out this silent white creature, with such passionate violence I recoil aghast, trembling.

The girl, with a shudder, gathers the shawl more closely about her, and turns again to the window. It is all so incomprehensible. I am at first almost stunned: then the thought flashes through me that the girl is insane, and I spring toward the door. I am not quick enough; she glides before me, and stands against it.

"You needn't try to stop me! It's too late! I thought I could get away before any of you came. None of you should have come in if there had been a lock on the door!"

This is said in a vehement, rapid voice, which I scarcely recognize as hers.

"Marguerite! Marguerite!" I cry, "are you out of your mind? Where are you going?"

"Where?" with a wild laugh, which makes me shrink away from her, "where? I don't know—I don't care. . . . What does it matter? . . . What does anything matter any more? . . . I am going away with Millard Reeve. . . . What does it matter about his whining wife? He don't love her—he loves me!—me! And I love him . . . with all my heart and my soul . . . and my mind and . . . my strength!"

The passionate fervor of the girl's voice thrills me through all the paralyzing terror of the moment. I do not speak—I have scarcely power to think. Presently she speaks again—more gently now:

"I know what you are thinking, and you can say nothing I have not said to myself . . . over and over again . . . even last night, I wouldn't go. . . . But it is ended now, and I would go just the same . . . if I knew we should both be lying at the bottom of the river . . . roaring out there, when the sun rose in the morning . . .!"

Her dark eyes, which have so unflinchingly met my blurred ones, at a slight sound, turn eagerly toward the window. My own gaze instinctively follows. Nothing there, only the wind, the rain and the distant thunder.

Motionless she stands with strained, agonized eyes upon the dark casement. I seize one of the quivering hands at her side. The dumb horror which has numbed tongue and senses passes away. I doubt if she hears. I do not know what I say, but I plead with all the power which lies within me.

At Judge Granger's name she hears. She tears her hand from my grasp, and flies to the window with a shuddering cry.

"That is it—what is driving me. . . . I hate him! . . . I loathe him! . . . No one noticed . . . no one cared!"

She sinks down upon her knees beside the window, lays her head upon the sill, moaning and sighing. Afraid to leave her alone, I make no further effort, but lean, nerveless and helpless, against the casement beside her, weeping bitterly now. There are no tears in the beautiful eyes lifted suddenly to mine.

"Why does he not come?" piteously. "He is to throw a pebble to me! I wish I had gone last night! . . . I wish I had gone!" And the fair head drops down again, and the rain beats unheeded upon it.

A heavy step comes along the hall. I make a despairing dash for the door and fling it open. Cousin David stands upon the threshold, gazing in with silent surprise. There is no time for preparation, and I pour out the terrible truth with a cruel bluntness that makes this big, careless man totter and put out a hand blindly to steady himself. He comes in, closing the door. The white face, lifted from the sill, meets his gaze with steady, mute defiance. Then a perfect silence falls save for the storm and the roaring river.

"Tell my wife to come," he says, after a time, almost in a whisper.

Only too gladly I go; but with swollen eyes and disordered dress cannot enter the parlor. Annette is loitering on the stairs, and I send her. I wait to see her deliver her father's message, and see Mrs. Easten come leisurely toward the stairs; then I pass swiftly through the outer door and run toward the hedge, floundering and plunging through the storm and darkness.

I have no distinct purpose in mind. The one thought which fills my brain is the tragedy hanging over this strange household—a sickening realization of what will surely happen if Millard Reeves' signal strike Marguerite's window now. I reach the hedge. The wet thorny branches strike my face. I push them aside and listen. For a moment the wild throbbing of my own heart fills my ears; then the splash of oars. A wave runs across my feet. By a continuous flash of lightning I see a man spring from a skiff, and recognize him—then utter darkness.

"Who is there?" My voice is loud and harsh. There is no answer except the roar of the elements and the rattle of the chain as the skiff is made fast.

"Who is there?" I call again. "Is it Millard Reeve?"

It seems a long time before a man's voice replies from the impenetrable blackness beyond the hedge.

"Yes!" it says.

"I am Miss Lawrence," I begin, making an effort for calmness, "Miss Easten's cousin. Her father is with her, and knows of your plan."

This much is said with tolerable composure; then I fly into a hysterical, womanish rage with this invisible presence which terrifies me so, and say many foolish, threatening things. The man does not stir, while I rage like a feeble old fiend. I am sure he does not stir, for my senses are so abnormally sharpened I must hear the lightest leaf floating downward from the hedge to the water. When I stop, for sheer lack of words and breath, he is still silent and motionless, as if undecided. Then the chain rattles—a splash of oars—he is gone!

Slowly I creep back to the house. A few idlers in the hall look wonderingly at the wet, forlorn figure which passes them so shrinkingly on the stairs. I lie down upon my bed. Spent, exhausted, I doze a little, perhaps, when I am startled by the opening of Marguerite's door. My own door is open, and the room in darkness. It is Mrs. Easten who comes from Marguerite's room. I can hear her clump! clump! all down the stairs, and clump! clump! up again, with a firm, manly step beside hers.

Starting up, expecting I know not what, I see Judge Granger go with her into Marguerite's room. What passes therein only those four ever know!

After a long time they come out, but a rush of blinding tears hides from me the face under the bridal veil. I hear the soft, silken rustle of Marguerite's gown on the stair, and can tell by the hush which follows that they have entered the parlor . . . then the measured cadence of the marriage service . . . too distant to distinguish the words, which memory mechanically supplies . . . "love, honor, and obey . . . keep to him only so long as you both shall live." . . . I turn my tear-wet face to the wall, and laugh!

A clock somewhere strikes nine. Nine! It seems an eternity since all unsuspecting I went into the opposite room!

The gay murmur of voices begins again, and I hear Madame coming. I know her pattering little feet. She peeps into the darkened room, but I lie quite still, and she patters away.

At last the guests depart. The storm is over, the rain has ceased, and the wind comes only in sobbing gusts.

"Good night, Marguerite, my pearl!" Mrs. Easten's smooth, sweet tones float up to me, and I suddenly recollect that it has been decided that Marguerite shall go at once to her husband's home. I do not hear the reply. I never see Marguerite again!

Presently Madame comes, lamp in hand.

"I am glad to find you. I haf been most unhappy about you! What eez eet, mal à la tête?" compassionately.

"No!" I say sullenly, face to the wall.

The quick-witted little *Parisienn*e's eyes run over my wet garments, and the muddy, ruined, black silk; but she says nothing, and sets about disrobing in discreet silence.

There is an amazed, dismayed pause in the disrobing when I suddenly ask if she will be willing to return to Tennessee to-morrow morning. But she consents. Madame is never difficult.

The feverish, sleepless night passes, and the dreaded morning has come which is to bring me face to face with Cousin David. When I have delayed as long as possible, I go down stairs, and find, with infinite relief, that he is not there. Mrs. Easten explains, with graceful ease, that he has been called away upon business. There is no more uneasy consciousness or embarrassment in her prominent eyes than in a couple of poached eggs. But beyond a few polite generalities she makes no objection to our immediate departure, and when the skiff comes to take us to the packet, she accompanies us to the hedge.

I look back. She stands bowing, smiling, waving adieu, and about her are lilies yellow and white.

A FANCY FOR THE MONTH OF MARCH.

ÆOLUS' jail-birds—out they fly,
To chop up the sea and darken the sky!
In a leathern bag they were sealed up fast,
And into the hold of the good ship cast.
All had gone well, but Ulysses slept,
When the covetous mariners cautiously crept
Into the hold, and forth did drag
That double-sealed mysterious bag.

Ah ha! small treasure they find within;
With a mighty rush and a soundful din
Of the trumpets and fifes and reeds they blow,
With hissing lashes of hail and snow,
With many a hoot and taunting cry,
Æolus' jail-birds—out they fly!

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE FREEMASONRY OF THE OPPRESSED.

MISS HUNNIWELL was for a moment half-bewildered at the sight which she beheld on entering Hilda's room. She had pictured to herself when she heard the shriek, and as she flew along the hall and up the stairway, a crowd of curious, chattering girls, whose witless tongues had brought to Hilda's ears the knowledge of calamity. She expected to find them standing about their fainting companion, themselves pale and tearful over the result of their own thoughtlessness. But they were not there. The room was still and empty save for Hilda, lying insensible upon the floor, still clad in her riding-habit. The little jaunty cap she wore with it, which had become familiar to every wayfarer on the mountain roads for miles around, had fallen off, and her wealth of dark hair, released from its coil, was trailing on the carpet by her side. In falling she had caught the coverlet, and had dragged it half off the bed. It was the last unconscious effort at self-protection. Her arm now lay relaxed and motionless. Her white face was upturned, and the fitful, stertorous sobbing which shook her frame was the only sign of life about her. Kindly nature had given way, and the over-strained heart was for a time unconscious of its agony. But she was entirely alone. Could it be that her tormentors had fled? The teacher did not deem it possible. She had come at once on hearing her cry. There was no time for any one to have escaped from the room. After a moment she became aware of something unusual in the appearance of the room. She could not at first determine what it was. She glanced quickly about to make sure of the change she felt rather than saw. The wardrobe, bureau, bed—all were in their accustomed places. The table in front of the fireplace and the little desk of bird's-eye maple, with trimmings of wild cherry, at which Hilda always wrote her letters, was in its accustomed place beside the window that looked out upon the mountain. Yet there was something strange and unexpected—something that disquieted and surprised her. What could it be? It was not the pale face and relaxed form upon the floor. She had anticipated that. All at once she noted with surprise that the door that opened into Amy's room was closed. She had not seen it shut for years—not since the two girls had become intimates. She had not looked for this, but in an instant she comprehended what had occurred. She had not been for a score of years teacher and confidant of all the girls that thronged the halls of Beechwood without knowing the innermost nature of every one of them. The clew to the situation was in her hand. She divined instinctively the scene that had taken place. She saw, as it were, the cowering, hateful presence beyond the close-shut door, as well as the white-faced form upon the floor. A smile of sorrowful contempt parted her thin, soft lips as she thought what hand had struck the blow, and realized how doubly harsh her arrogance and pride must have made it.

"Poor child," she murmured, "she has had a bitter foretaste of what is in store for her."

Then she tucked the gray curls behind her ears, a quick, instinctive gesture of preparation, and addressed herself to the task of restoring the prostrate figure to consciousness. A fainting girl was no new thing to her. She had seen scores of them, and knew exactly what was to be done. In an amazingly short time Hilda was sitting upright by the bedside, her teeth chattering, the dripping locks thrust back from her brow, her riding-cap hanging upon one side, and the long coil hanging down her back, and slowly untwisting itself, while her great wondering eyes sought those of the teacher, full of fear and full of questioning. But no questions were permitted. The nurse who had her in charge was both skillful and tender. Silence was imposed before she could open her lips to frame an inquiry. Very soon her habit was removed, a light wrapper substituted, and Hilda was lying on the bed watching the teacher as, with housewifely instinct, she shook out and hung up the clothing that had been cast aside. Then Miss Hunniwell went out into the hall. She knew the advantage of leaving the dazed brain to work its way out of the mists of unconsciousness alone. She closed the door behind her, and stood upon the landing at the head of the stairway, gazing down into the sunlit hall below. Several of the pupils took occasion to leave their rooms, cross the hall, or descend the stairs as she waited. All of them stole quick, curious glances as they passed. Miss Hunniwell did not heed them, though with the teacher's instinct she saw them all. Then she pulled a cord that rang a bell in some distant part of the house, and, after a moment's waiting, gave an order to the servant who answered her summons. When she returned Miss Hunniwell took from her hands the tray she brought and re-entered Hilda's room. She saw at once that reason had resumed her sway. She judged that memory had, in part at least, come back to her. The teacher wondered how much she remembered—how much she knew. She feared the effect upon her reason if all the sad truth were told at once. She knew that it was a case demanding all her care and pity. Love and duty were all enlisted in behalf of the fair victim of untoward fate. Hilda looked at her with surprise as she locked the door and came toward the bed with the tray in her hand. She seemed struggling to recall the events of the day. When she was bidden to partake of the simple fare set before her, she looked up and said:

"Oh, Miss Hunniwell, please tell me what has happened!"

"Hush, my dear, hush!" said the teacher, as she lifted a warning finger. "You must keep still now. By-and-by I will answer all your questions."

The calm voice and composed look soothed the excited girl at once. So she ate and drank obedient to the teacher's behest, somewhat languidly, it is true, but not without relish; for, despite the rebellion of her overstrained nerves, Hilda was young and healthy, and such natures not only quickly recuperate, but feel the demands of appetite all the more keenly for the burden they have borne. So she ate the toast and drank the tea, and wondered what had happened that she should be thus attended as an invalid. The teacher said nothing, but her manner was so tender and caressing that Hilda even found herself wondering at it, and the tears that filled her eyes were tears of gratitude. She knew that some evil impended over her. She remembered dimly the curious glances she had encountered in the village. She half recalled some terrible words that Amy had spoken. She had scarcely comprehended them at the time. She had only vaguely felt that she had become—she knew not what—a something terrible—so terrible that even her best friend regarded her with aversion. She was conscious that she was not as she had been the day before. The world was now her enemy. Henceforth she was to be an outcast. She could not state the reason, but she felt the fact. All the world would stare at her hereafter as the men in the village had done that morning.

The pity in the teacher's eyes confirmed all this. She knew that her unwonted tenderness meant that she had no other friends. She thought dimly of Martin as lost—separated from her forever. She did not blame him. Why, she knew not, but she felt that she had become a leper, and that even her teacher waited on her thus at the risk of mortal contagion. She was very grateful to her. She wished that she might die then and there, and not live to know the agony she felt was in store for her. It would be so sweet to die with the knowledge that some one still loved her. She remembered that when the darkness came on she had felt herself all alone in the universe. The world had seemed to be slipping away from her, and she herself falling away down into darkness—unfathomable, boundless. She had come back—back into the world. No, not into the world—into the light—into life—her world—her narrow life, into which no one else might ever come. Even this gentle-hearted teacher might only approach its dim, intangible border. No loving presence could share with the desolation in which she must hereafter dwell. The best could but give her sympathy and pity, where everybody had given love and honor hitherto. She did not understand it, but she accepted it as a doom of which she had somehow become conscious. It seemed like a terrible dream, but she knew it was a more terrible reality. She could not define it. The words that Amy had used had slipped away from her; but they were terrible words, and her look of hate and disgust had been still more terrible. She wondered if the teacher loved her. That good lady had taken away the tray, and now stood by the window gazing out upon the mountain. She was trying to decide what she would say to Hilda—what she would tell her of all that she had learned. Hilda raised herself on her elbow and looked at her. Would she—would anybody love her hereafter? Would Martin?—Ah! how her brain reeled. She remembered now. That was the question she had asked herself when the darkness fell upon her. It was of him she had thought in that moment ere she fell into the abyss of silence. She must give him up. Love could only be to her a name. It had been a matter of course hitherto. She had not known how bright the sunshine was until the eclipse had come. Could it have been only a terrible dream?

She glanced at the door that led into Amy's room. It was shut close. Her eyes swept about the room. All that had been Amy's was removed. Ah! how terrible must be the contagion with which she was smitten so suddenly. Her eye fell upon the heap of trinkets Amy had cast in reckless disorder upon the bed. Everything confirmed her fear. It was—it must be—all too true. Only her father was left her now. Her father! What was this horrible fear? What had she heard? What had Amy said about her father?

Hilda uttered a moan, and the teacher sprang to her side. She saw that memory had now fully returned, and her cheek blanched at the thought of all that this fair child must face. She threw her arms about her and kissed her again and again—not without a thrill of terror at what she did. Could it be? Was this fair thing—a groan came from her lips. Even the guard which years of discipline had set upon them could not repress her anguish. Hilda heard—saw—felt the truth. Her very lips grew white. Her nostrils quivered and her eyes glared with terror, but not for herself. She had forgotten her own woe. Her father alone filled her consciousness. He was in peril—perhaps suffering, dying.

She caught the teacher by the shoulders; held her fast at arm's length, and gazing into her frightened face cried in tones of fierce, threatening agony:

"My father! My father! What about my father?"

There was a moment's silence. The teacher could not answer. She could only wonder dimly, how much the girl knew—how much she guessed. Hilda's fingers buried themselves in the soft white shoulders of the slender, gray-haired lady. She even shook her like a child as she said in hoarse, terrible tones:

"Speak quick—my father!"

The teacher recovered her self-control with an effort. She looked calmly into her questioner's eyes and answered:

"He is dead!"

The glaring eyeballs grew glassy in their fixed stare. The strained muscles relaxed—

"Dead! Dead!"

A dazed, incredulous expression succeeded to the strained glare in her eyes. "Dead! Dead!" she repeated dully and vacantly, as if she could not comprehend the meaning of the words.

Then the teacher with gentle force bore her back upon the pillow and kindly and tenderly told her all that she knew of her father's death—carefully avoiding all allusion to what she had learned in regard to Hilda herself. Tears came to her relief very soon. Sorrow succeeded to terror. She turned her face to the pillow and wept in an agony of grief. After a time the teacher left her, hoping that her overwrought system might find relief in sleep. She was not mistaken; after an hour of silent weeping Hilda slept. The teacher had locked the door as she passed out, to secure her from interruption. Once the door of Amy's room opened, and she peered in with a sinister look upon her thin, pinched face. Close beside the bed she saw a letter.

With stealthy steps she crept forward, seized it, and retreated to her own room. A half-hour afterward she came again. There was a glow of malignant triumph on her face as she crept forward and deposited the letter where she had found it. Then she closed and locked the door, and threw the key as far as she could out of the window. The letter was that which Mr. Gilman had written to the mistress of Beechwood.

Two hours had passed when Hilda awoke. The terror of the morning had all departed. Sorrow for her father's death had swallowed up all other thought. She had forgotten Amy's words. She remembered dimly that something had separated them, but she cared little for it. The world was nothing to her if her father was not to be in it. She thought of Martin, and wondered dimly why he had not come to her. She did not care very much. It would hardly have been a consolation, yet she wished he had come. Then her thoughts wandered away to the scene of her father's death. She felt an unconquerable desire to see the place where he had fought and died in defense of his honor. She knew that he had not engaged in the removal of the slaves from any especial regard for their well being. Indeed, she knew his almost savage aversion to the victims of slavery, as well as the institution itself. He had done this simply to redeem his pledge to his dead brother. She could not help exulting, even in her sorrow, over his steadfast devotion to the pledge he had given. She must see the scene of his sacrifice. She must go and weep upon his grave. She had given him up. She knew he was dead. Of that she had not a doubt. Yet his presence seemed still to fill the world. She rose to bring his portrait from a frame on which it rested on the little bureau. As she did so her foot crushed a paper lying at the bedside. She stooped and picked it up. Without looking at it she went to the bureau, and resting her arms upon it, gazed long and lovingly at her father's face. Then she pressed the picture to her heart—kissed it again and again—dimmed it with her tears—wiped the cold, bright surface of the daguerreotype with her handkerchief, and watched the beloved features as they emerged again from the misty film that overspread the plate.

By-and-by she noted the letter which she still held. She saw her father's name. She did not stop to ask to whom it belonged, but read on, line after line, until her cheek blanched with terror. The old horror of the morning had come back—no longer vague and indistinct, but clear and tangible. The terrible truth was here revealed without the shadow of concealment. She was not only bereaved, but debased. The father she had adored was not her father. Could it be? She would not believe it. And yet it seemed as if there could be no mistake. It had been learned from documents found on his person. Had his own lips bidden her to disbelieve his life? She could not. She would not. And then, what was that about herself? It mattered very little now that she was doubly fatherless. Yet it was terrible to contemplate. Could it be? She pushed back her hair, and gazed long and anxiously at her reflection in the mirror. She noted the clear white of the eye—pearly to the very edge of the dark iris. Then she thrust back her sleeve and noted the texture of the soft white skin—traced the course of the blue veins through its transparent whiteness—the nails pink and pearly to the very base—caught the mass of hair that trailed down her back, and held it betwixt her eye and the light, noting its soft, silken texture and the rich brown tinge that it gave forth. Was it possible? Had her father deceived her when he told of her mother—of the orchards of Italy and the russet-coated pears of Piedmont, for which she moaned so piteously when the touch of death was on her wasted frame? Was the ivory miniature that hung in her bosom a lie? She drew it forth and gazed upon it—held it up beside her face and scanned the reflection in the glass—placed it beside the little frame, and asked herself, could he have dealt falsely with any one—least of all with the memory of the fair wife whose love never lost its potency? "Never! never!" she said to herself, and her dark eye flashed with pride. Falsehood could not inhabit that citadel of honor. Then she was his daughter—the daughter of that fair woman whom he loved—and this foul taint—it was all a lie—a terrible nightmare—a horrible mistake! Yet it was he that said it. It was his cold, dead lips that had sent to her the message of dishonor. It was he who had left as his sole heritage, perhaps, the knowledge of illegitimacy—the curse of servile parentage—the horror of a tainted blood! How she loathed herself as she thought of it! She tore open her robe and gazed upon her palpitating bosom. She wished that she might tear out the heart that throbbed beneath it. She would willingly pour out her very life if the one drop that corrupted its red tide—the one drop of darker, baser blood—might only flow forth and leave her dead body undefiled. Oh, it was terrible! At once bereaved and debased forever? Even the fair white breast seemed foul and loathsome as the tettered leper's skin. But if there should be a mistake—a doubt? Ah, that were more terrible still! A doubt! With the suggestion came the thought of Martin. A doubt—only a doubt, perhaps, but a doubt so terrible that it stabs love to death! She walked back and forth across the room. Her stocking feet gave forth no sound. The moan of her unsyllabled agony dies upon her lips. She must give him up, too! Father, mother, lover—even her own identity—gone at one fell swoop of fate! Ah, she can never come to his arms now! All the bright visions of love-crowned life are swept away. Doubt is as bad as certainty. Even if she could hide it fate might reveal the hideous fact. The brand she had escaped a child might bear! No! no! no! Love was not for her! Midnight had fallen on her morning.

A knock at the door startled her. She stood and listened in silence. A strange terror seized upon her. Then the knock was repeated, and a note was thrust under the door. She gazed at the white missive in affright. After a time, half smiling at her fears, she picked it up and read:

"DEAR MISS HARGROVE: You are in great peril, but you have friends who will help you. The bloodhounds are on your track. Meet me at the back gate of the seminary at the time of evening prayers. Do not leave your room on any account during the day. You are surrounded by enemies. Trust no one. Prepare for a long journey, but take as little as possible. Dress warmly, plainly. Remember, you promised to trust me. God bless and strengthen you. Yours hastily,

"G. AMORY."

The letter was scrawled hastily in pencil. It was from the minister in the village. Thank God, she had one friend—yes, two. Yet, stop; they were friends only from pity. It were better she had none. What did it mean? In danger? What peril could threaten her? At once it flashed upon her. She caught up the lawyer's letter and read its woful sentences again. Ah, it was plain now! The administrator had arrived. He had come for her. She was a slave. The law would give her to him. What mattered her past life—her present surroundings! They only served as a background to make the future more terrible. The law knew her only as a slave—a chattel—a thing. The law was her enemy henceforth.

And now a new, overmastering terror got hold upon her—the terror of the hunted fugitive. Bereavement, debasement, the loss of love, friends, everything was forgotten in one idea—how the terrible doom of the future might be avoided. Strange enough, she did not once think of death as a refuge. Flight, escape, was all that filled her mind. She ran to the window and gazed out upon the mountain. The dark evergreens seemed to offer shelter. If she could only get among them she would be safe. “Surrounded by enemies.” Whom did he mean? Who could be her enemy? Not Miss Hunniwell, certainly. A slight noise in the next room caused her to start. Ah, he was right! She had enemies—one at least, and if that one, why not many? She threw up the window and leaned far out to see if she could not discover anything that betokened peril. Was the house guarded? How would the law lay its hand on her. Would all her pretty little keepsakes be torn from her. Would they put shackles on her wrists? Would she be sold in the market-place? Would her charms be bartered for gold? Of course. She was a slave, and a slave can have no right. All that she had—aye, all that she was—the law would give to a master! She felt as if she could not wait until the night. She must leap out and fly at once. She remembered how she had climbed down from the roof that lay just below her window. She clambered unconsciously upon the window-sill. A quick, shrill whistle startled her. It was from the copse upon the hill-side, hardly a bow-shot away, but above the level of the casement. She glanced hurriedly along the dark belt of evergreen. Nothing. Another whistle—soft, quick, furtive. It fastens her glance upon one spot—the darkest covert on the hill-side. Out of the thick verdure flashes a gleam of white—a token, a signal—quickly withdrawn. She gazes where it was in sickening terror. There is a motion of the branches. Fear keeps her still. She watches the opening, paralyzed with horror. While she looks a face appears, framed in the green foliage. It looks into her eyes, but she is not afraid. The freemasonry of slavery has already taught her its signals of distress and succor. The hailing-sign of universal brotherhood catches her eye. She knows that the face is that of a friend. It beckons to her. She shakes her head. It importunes with eager eyes. She still refuses. It gesticulates wildly, it pleads, it begs. She slips off the window seat, writes a hasty note, ties it about a bit of stone she has brought in from one of her rambles, and throws it as far out upon the mountain-side as she can. She sees the Face run toward it cautiously; pick it up; read it; nod assent, and then suddenly steal away. She wonders at its strange caution, but she trusts the Face implicitly. Degradation had begun its work. To her the Face meant fellowship, fraternity. Between them was a tie the sword could not cut asunder. The fire could not burn nor many waters quench her trust. The face was black!

BY RHODA BROUGHTON,

Author of “Good-by, Sweetheart!” “Red as a Rose is She,” etc., etc.

PERIOD II—CHAPTER V.

THE morrow has come. Mrs. Churchill has risen, refreshed and healthful, from pleasing dreams of sunshine and lansquenets. Sarah has tossed between vexed visions and unwonted wakefulness. And Belinda? Belinda makes no complaint of her night. She looks older than when she went to bed, but the cold is pinching, and for the last year and a half she has been perceptibly ageing. The morrow has come, and the Professor. To-day he is not ushered into the little dark back-room, but is led by a full-buttoned, pompous Tommy into the drawing-room, where his grandmother-elect sits ready and alone to receive him.

Perhaps they have not a great deal to say to each other. At all events the interval is short before the bell is rung and a message given to request Miss Churchill to come down. She is sitting in her little chilly bed-room, her cheek pressed against the window-pane, and her eyes idly following the dirty sparrows on the leads.

Without a moment's lingering, she obeys. As she enters the room her betrothed advances to meet her.

“I am happy to be able to inform you,” he says, in his stiff Donnish voice, “that your grandmother is good enough to say that she has no obstacle to oppose to our union.”

“I told you that she would not,” replies Belinda calmly; “I knew that she could spare me.”

The words are simple and simply spoken, with no special stress or significant accent laid upon them; and yet under them the old lady winces.

“It is no case of ‘sparing,’” she says sharply. “Of course it is a break-up to our little circle; but I have no right to allow personal feeling to influence me. You are old enough to decide for yourself; you are of age; you came of age six months ago. In a case of this kind, a third person has no business to interfere; and of course if you are sincerely fond of each other—”

Belinda shivers.

“Fond! it is no question of fondness!” she says, breathing quick and short, and in a concentrated low voice; “you entirely misapprehend. I thought that Mr. Forth had explained to you; it is a mariage de raison; we marry one another because we can be useful to each other. Is it not so?” appealing to him with abrupt and uncompromising directness.

“Mrs. Churchill must be as well aware as yourself,” he replies pettishly, “that I have no reason to wish for exaggerated profession of affection.”

“Well, I will leave you to settle it between yourselves,” cries Mrs. Churchill rather hastily, gathering up her work and making for the door; eluding, as she has made a golden rule of doing through life, any scene that threatened to be disagreeable. "You will stay to luncheon, of course, Mr. Forth?"

Nodding and smiling, she withdraws; and the dogs, with their usual fine tact, follow her—all but Jane. As soon as she is gone:

"I hope," says Belinda, fixing her joyless, unbashful eyes full upon him—eyes with enough coldness in them to freeze a volcano—"that there is no misapprehension, that you understand our relative positions as I do."

"I believe that there is no necessity to go over the same ground again!" he answers snappishly.

His snappishness does not infect her.

"It is better to go over it now while it is yet time, than afterwards, when it would be too late," she answers earnestly.

He has drawn near his usual magnet, the fire, and is chafing his bloodless hands over it. Perhaps this is the reason why he expresses neither assent nor dissent.

"I want to make it quite clear to you," she says, still in that same deeply earnest voice, "so that you may not have cause to reproach me afterward, or think that I have dealt unjustly with you: I have not one grain of love to give you, nor ever shall have!" letting fall each slow word with a weight of heavy emphasis. "Many men—most men—would refuse a woman upon such terms. It is open to you still to refuse me."

The person she is addressing moves uneasily in his chair.

"I imagined," he says fretfully, "that we had treated this subject exhaustively yesterday."

"We cannot treat it too exhaustively," she answers persistently; "though I cannot love you—happily for you, you have no wish that I should—I will do my best by you; I will be as useful to you as I can. From what I gather of your circumstances I imagine that I can be very useful to you. You are not young; you have not good health; you are lonely."

A certain sound of fidgeting from the chair so chillily drawn close to the hearth betrays that there is something in this catalogue of his infirmities not altogether agreeable to its occupant.

"I am lonely too, in my way," continues Belinda, with an unconscious accent of self-pity; "we can help each other; you will teach me," appealing to him with that hopeless, cold gentleness of hers. "I shall be a dull scholar, and never do you credit; but you will teach me; we will do our best by each other."

As she finishes speaking she draws nearer to him, and holds out her young soft hand, as if to seal with it this frosty bargain. He takes it formally, but does not press it any more than he had pressed her grandmother's. Perhaps he has no inclination. Perhaps he dares not.

Belinda sits down opposite to him; the light from the window, such as it is, falling full on her face; her hands folded in her lap, and her eyes looking straight before her. There is something so odd and strained in her attitude that Jane, well-meaning but injudicious, goes up to her and rubs her long nose and her pink-rimmed eyes against her knees to cheer her.

"Had your grandmother been able to spare me a few more minutes," says Mr. Forth, in a key in which a slight tinge of umbrage is perceptible, "I could have wished to enter with her into some details, upon which, as things now are, I have been unable to touch; with regard to the date, for instance, I should be unwilling to hurry you unduly, but—"

During the whole of his last sentence she has felt him watching her narrowly. Is this the touchstone that he is applying to her sincerity? Does he expect her to turn as dishonestly restive as Sarah had obviously done whenever any suggestion of a like nature had been made to her? The idea crosses her mind with a sort of thin fugitive amusement.

"You need not consult granny," she answers coldly; "you had better arrange it so as best to suit your own convenience."

There is such an evident good faith, such an entire absence of all desire of evasion in her look and tone, that his scrutiny relaxes.

"It is all one to me," she says; "there is nothing to wait for."

In her tone is such a flat, tame hopelessness that Jane redoubles her rubbing against her knees, and accompanies it with an acute, short bark. If that will not put her in spirits, nothing will.

"I should, of course," pursues Mr. Forth, "be anxious to leave you sufficient time for such preparations as you may wish to make."

"What preparations?" she asks brusquely; "I need none. You are past the age, I suppose, when marriage festivities would give you much pleasure; and they would be entirely out of place here."

"It is however usual, I believe," he answers, in an annoyed tone, "to make some slight sacrifices to conventionality on an occasion of this kind; it is usual—"

"It is usual to love one another!" breaks in she with a bitter laugh. "What is usual with others does not apply to us; you need not take my preparations into your calculations."

He is silent, but his face expresses vexation.

"It had better be soon," continues Belinda coolly; "I shall be in the way here if it is not. They want to be rid of me; they want to go to the south of France; it had better be soon."

But even now Professor Forth does not immediately answer. Perhaps this mode of treating the question of an approaching marriage seems to him even more baffling than Sarah's. At last:

"It is extremely fortunate for me," he says slowly, and without any perceptible exhilaration of tone, "to find you so ready to meet my views."

"There is nothing to wait for," repeats she flatly. It seems as if in this phrase there were a dismal charm for her.

Again there is a pause, during which Belinda's eyes rest upon her betrothed's face with a look of cold expectancy.

"Were I not reassured," he begins at length, "by the indifference you express as to the date, I should hesitate to name one so early as the tenth of next month."

"Could it not be sooner?" asks Belinda curtly.

He looks at her in unfeigned astonishment. In this family is he to experience no medium between disingenuous procrastination and unmaidenly haste?

Belinda sees and interprets his look, but her eyes do not fall; her cheeks do not color beneath it.

"When a thing has to be done," she says, with a sort of restlessness for a moment ruffling her hitherto deathly calm, "it is well that it should be done at once; I hate dawdling!"

"I fear," he says, in a perplexed and not particularly pleased voice, "that my engagements will not allow of my suggesting an earlier date. I had thought that the tenth would have left a clear fortnight, before the commencement of term, for whatever journey—"

"Journey!" she interrupts almost rudely, breathing quick. "What journey? do you mean a wedding tour?" with an accent of indescribable shrinking. "Why should we make one at all? why should we not go straight to Oxbridge?"

"I am sorry," he answers stiffly, "to disoblige you; but, quite independently of present arrangements, I have been advised by my medical man to try the effect of a more bracing air, as a corrective to the extreme relaxingness of Oxbridge!"

She is silent for a moment; then:

"Of course," she says grudgingly, "if it is a matter of health, I can say nothing; but, as far as I am concerned, I would far rather go straight to Oxbridge."

"He is not going to stay to luncheon, then?" cries Sarah, in an exhilarated voice, running into the drawing-room; after having been hanging perilously far over the upper banisters unseen, to speed the parting guest. "Thank God for that! There are sweetbreads for luncheon, and I should have been sorry to miss them, as I certainly should, for nothing would have induced me to sit down with him!"

"I think you will have to get over that little difficulty in time!" replies Belinda dryly.

She had risen to bid her betrothed good-by, and yet stands. She is holding her cold right hand, which still seems to feel the chill impress of his frosty hand-shake, to the fire.

"He is gone for good, is he not?" continues Sarah, hurrying up; "you have thought better of it? it was only a joke? As a joke, it was not a bad one. I am not sure," with a glance of indignant admiration at her sister, "that, in that point of view, it was not an improvement even upon mine in the same line; but one may have too much of it. It was a joke, was it not?"

"On the contrary," replies Belinda, with as icy a composure as if her lover's bloodless eld were infectious, and she had caught it; "the day is fixed!"

In her hasty entrance Sarah had left the door ajar, and through it her grandmother now enters; having apparently overheard the last words.

"The day fixed!" repeats she, with her eyes dancing; "my dear Belinda, you take us by storm! we are in a whirl! But fixed for when?"

"For the tenth of next month," replies Belinda curtly, turning away her dull face from her beaming questioner, and speaking in a key, if possible, yet more frozen than before.

"The tenth!" repeats Mrs. Churchill, in a tone into which she honestly, if not very successfully, tries to infuse a tinge of regret; "that is soon! You are in a hurry to leave us!"

"There is nothing to wait for," replies Belinda, mechanically repeating her dreary formula.

"I cannot think how we shall manage about your clothes!" continues Mrs. Churchill, growing pink with pleasure, and her old dimple reappearing. "We shall be shockingly hurried! we must go about your underclothes and lingerie this afternoon. Mary Smith in Sloane Street is excellent, is she not, Sarah? but she has already half a dozen wedding orders."

"She may be spared a seventh," replies Belinda, with a bitter small smile. "I will have no new clothes!"

"That means, of course, that you are not in earnest," says Mrs. Churchill, with a disappointed refrigeration of tone; "that the whole thing is a fiction; you might as well have said so at first!"

A flash of hope has come into Sarah's sunny eyes as she looks eagerly at her sister; but at the expression of that sister's face, it at once dies down again.

"Do not be afraid," says Belinda quietly, "it is no fiction; but I will have no new clothes: you will have the more money to spend at Monaco."

"Monaco! Monaco!" repeats Mrs. Churchill, hiding a look of conscious guilt under a fretful air; "you have Monaco on the brain; it is your idée fixe! but as to your clothes—"

"As to my clothes—simply I will not have any," replies Belinda, with a look of imperative decision.

"I should have thought them the one Goschen in your desert," says Sarah, with an annoyed laugh; "them and the presents."

"Presents!" echoes Belinda impatiently; "I will have no presents!"

"In short," says Mrs. Churchill sarcastically, "you and the Professor will crawl in a four-wheeled cab to a registry-office at eight o'clock in the morning."

"If you substitute a church for a registry-office, you have exactly expressed my intention."

There is an aghast silence. Sarah and Mrs. Churchill look at one another. Something in their interchange of glances grates upon Belinda.

"You will never understand," she says, exchanging her icy calm voice for one of excessive irritability; such irritability as of late her family had been too well acquainted with, "and it is no use explaining to you. I am tired of explaining to you that this is not an ordinary marriage; what is there to make a gala of, and buy new clothes for, in a mere matter of business? I tell you it is a mere matter of business; I keep dinning it into your ears, but you will not understand! it is a mere matter of business!"

She repeats it over and over again, as if to reassure herself by the strength and number of her own repetitions, and looks round at her two auditors, as if daring them to oppose any contradiction to her assertion. Neither of them does. It is, indeed, some moments before either of them finds anything to say. Then—

"Have you made this quite clear to Professor Forth?" asks Mrs. Churchill dryly.

"Quite!" replies Belinda excitedly; "quite! I made it as clear as the sun in heaven; he quite understands; he fully agrees with me; he is quite of my way of thinking."

"He must be a very odd bridegroom," says Mrs. Churchill sarcastically.

"It is a marriage of the mind!" replies Belinda, still more excitedly, looking round with angry suspicion in search of the ridicule which she dimly feels may attach to her last utterance. "I do not suppose that there is anything very odd in two people hoping to draw a certain amount of rational happiness from such."

Mrs. Churchill turns away to conceal an ungovernable smile.

"A marriage of the mind!" repeats Sarah, with a disgusted accent; "well, I have heard of them before, but this is the first time that I ever had the pleasure of meeting one; and I humbly hope it may be the last."

THE sweetest songs are never sung;
The fairest pictures never hung;
The fondest hopes are never told;—
They are the heart's most cherished gold.

For in the country of the heart,
There is a realm from this apart,
Whose pictures are too pure for earth;
Whose language is of heavenly birth.

HENRY A. LAVELY.

SOMETHING was recently said in these columns in relation to an alleged plan for a great Roman Catholic University, and it was suggested that opposition to such a scheme came with but poor grace from Protestants, whose claim has always been that the spread of intelligence must strengthen the cause of Christianity. It is curious that close upon this proposition there follows a striking instance of intellectual independence on the part of a Roman Catholic scholar. This is nothing less than a declaration which would have meant the rack and thumb-screw for its author not so very many years ago. Francis Lenormant, author of "Beginnings of History," is Professor of Archæology in the National Library of France, and his learning and research have placed him among the leaders in that line of investigation. His studies, it appears, have convinced him that the Mosaic Narrative, as it is called, is the result of investigation and compilation rather than of direct inspiration or revelation. This conclusion was reached after a careful comparison of the biblical account with records which long antedate the books of Moses. The account of the creation he finds to be a somewhat emended version of "a tradition whose origin is lost in the night of the remotest ages," and which all the great tribal divisions of Western Asia possessed in common. He finds these narratives, however, inspired under Moses' hand with an entirely new spirit. One God is enthroned in the place of the many worshipped by the Chaldees and the Babylonians; moral truths take the place of gross realisms, and, while the form of the tradition is preserved, the difference between the biblical and Chaldaic narratives is so striking as to constitute, in Professor Lenormant's opinion, one of the most extraordinary of religious revolutions. "I do not hesitate," he says, "to find in it the effect of a supernatural intervention of divine Providence; and I bow before the God who inspired the law and the prophets." These be bold words coming from an avowed Catholic, and the theological situation is further complicated by the fact that the American edition of his book is brought out under the sanction of the Union Theological Seminary of New York, perhaps the most prominent of the orthodox Protestant schools. Does this mean that the doctrine of direct divine revelation is no longer held in its old-time plenary force? Such has been the tendency outside of the ecclesiastical schools for a long time, and if a Romanist can write and Presbyterians publish such a work as Professor Lenormant's, we may be sure that Herbert Spencer and Professor Tyndall will not be so severely dealt with at the hands of the orthodox as they have been heretofore. Both these authors have repeatedly asserted their belief in a Supreme Being, manifest to consciousness though hidden from science, and they, as well as their pupils, have protested against being classified as atheists because of their qualified unbelief in revealed religion.

THE two volumes of poetry from which we are permitted to select illustrations for the opening article in this week's CONTINENT, are respectively among the oldest and the youngest of those fascinating collections of English verse which are now found in every household where a taste for literature is cultivated. "Bryant's Family Library of Poetry and Song" made its appearance when its venerable editor was in the full maturity of his literary powers, and successive editions, each better than its predecessors, were prepared under his personal supervision, and the superb memorial edition, embodying his latest and most thorough revision, was issued shortly after his death. "The Cambridge Book of Poetry and Song" is the latest aspirant for popular favor. Edited by Charlotte Fiske Bates, it combines in a manner peculiar to itself the most attractive features of its class.

WHAT the inward reasons may be, for the book-covers of the season of 1882-83 only the publishers are competent to tell us. The favorite tint appears to be a livid gray, unpleasant to the eye, showing every spot or trace of wear, and giving the utmost melancholy to every foot of space occupied on book-shelves. The other extreme occurs in unexpected places, and a book deserving substantial and elegant binding comes in a showy and over-decorated form, prejudicing the prudent buyer at the first glance.

Unfortunately this must be said in the present case; but, passing beyond the cover, a very beautiful specimen of book-making is before us, and even slight examination shows the unusual value of the work done. Mr. Woodberry, while somewhat lacking in practical experience, is a trained writer, a careful searcher after facts, and the master of a clear and pleasing style. His special advantage lies in having had the advice and direction of Professor Charles Eliot Norton, and access to his valuable collection; and while his work is less full of detail than some may wish, it is one of the utmost practical use to the general reader. The opening chapter discusses the origin of wood engraving, and differs in some of its conclusions from Otley and other authorities, ignoring some rather traditional early work, and fixing the period in the first quarter of the fifteenth century, giving an interesting reproduction of one of the prints of the Formachneider—a "St. Christopher carrying the Infant Jesus over the Sea." He glances at phases of progress, and sums up the chief points of this first period, and of its passage to wider influence, in a few telling words. "At first," he says, "the art served mediæval religion; afterward it took a wider range, and by both its serious and satirical works afforded valuable aid in the progress of the Reformation, while it rendered the earliest printed books more attractive. . . . Finally, in the hands of the great engravers—of Dürer, who, still mastered by the mediæval spirit, employed it to embody the German Renaissance; of Maximilian's artists, who recorded in it the dying picturesqueness and chivalric spirit of the Middle Ages; of Holbein, who first heralded by means of it the intelligence and sentiment of modern times—it produced its chief monuments, which, for the most part, will here be dealt with in order to illustrate its value as a fine art practiced for its own sake, as a trustworthy record of popular customs, ideas and taste."

The chapter on "The Block Books," with its profuse illustrations; the succeeding one on "Early Printed Books in the North," which contains some very vivid examples of the uncouth yet powerful Northern imagination, both hold a presentation of facts that will fix the attention of even the casual reader. The chapter on "Early Italian Wood Engraving" is also of singular interest, the writer having evidently written with an enthusiasm his public will share. With Albert Dürer and his successors he is on more familiar ground; but his summary of the causes through which the art declined is of real value. The modern school in England, France and America is condensed into one chapter, and his conclusions as to American art will undoubtedly stir up discussion among the partisans of the various schools. He takes ground decidedly that "white-line work is the peculiar province of the wood engraver," and deprecates the fancy for misty and uncertain effects, giving well-chosen illustrations of every point made. It is difficult to see how his conclusions can be escaped, and those who regret the abandonment of line will rejoice in this telling argument for a return to it, ending in a page or two which we quote in part:

"The capacity of any new school should be judged by the best it has produced; but, even in the best work, it is not difficult to discern at times the same tendencies that have been the main cause of failure in the less good work. The obscuration of leading outlines, the disregard of substance, shape and material in leaf, cloud and stuffs; the neglect of relief and perspective; the crowding of the ground with meaningless lines, either undirected or misdirected, or uselessly refined; the aim at an effect by an arrangement of color almost independent of form; the attempt to make a momentary impression on the eye, instead of to give lasting pleasure to the mind through the artistic sense; and, especially in the best work, the lack of perfect and masterly finish in all portions of the design, however insignificant by comparison with the leading parts—these must be counted as defects. How much of such failure is due to the designer it is impossible to determine without sight of the original drawings; a considerable portion of the fault may rest with him; in wood engravings as art works the union of designer and craftsman is inseparable—the two stand or fall together. But when all deductions have been made the best engravers may rightly be very proud of their work, confident of their future and hopeful of great things. With such perfect technical skill as they possess, with such form and texture as they have represented with care, truth and beauty; with such softness of tone and power of both delicate and strong line as some of their number have earned the mastery of, the value of future work depends only on the wisdom of their aims."

A carefully-prepared index gives the greater value to a book which deserves all the appreciation it will undoubtedly secure.

No better illustration and corroboration of certain points made in Mr. Woodberry's final pages can be found than in the superb volume made up from the selections from Herrick's poems,¹ with drawings by Mr. Edwin A. Abbey, whose work in this direction has hardly an equal on either side of the Atlantic. The readers of Harpers' Magazine had the first opportunity of studying these drawings, most of which appeared month by month in the pages of this favorite periodical, which, in its good-humored rivalry with the Century, has developed the resources of American art as no other method could have done. They have clung to old methods more tenaciously than their neighbor, and the end has justified their action. The quality of work has gained every year, and while delicacy of finish has characterized it all, enough of the boldness and broad effects of the new school have been added to give them a leading rank in this field. The dainty and exquisite songs of Herrick, full of a charm as potent to-day as at their first writing, find an interpretation in lines the power and grace of which are as subtle as the verse, the whole being one of the most distinctive and beautiful pieces of work ever given to an American public.

THE little musical and esthetic novel, "The Benefit of the Doubt," written by Mrs. Mary Clare Spenser, and published recently by G. P. Putnam's Sons, has passed into a second edition and is still selling rapidly.

HERBERT SPENCER is indignant at the charge brought against him by the Edinburg Review, of sympathy with Communism, and repudiates also any interest in Henry George's remarkable book entitled "Progress and Poverty."

MR. E. C. STEDMAN, one of our most fascinating as well as trustworthy critics, is to write a preface or commentary for the beautiful edition of Poe's "Raven," illustrated by Gustave Doré, and soon to be brought out by the Harpers.

THE Scribners, who have published so much valuable historical material in their series, "Campaigns of the Civil War," have now turned their attention to the Navy, and announce three volumes, the first, now ready, being "The Blockade and the Cruisers," by Professor Soley.

THE internal economy in the office of the London Times is said to be at present in the worst possible state—parsimony here and wastefulness there; and its editorial arrangements are equally chaotic, the editor of the "Thunderer" being now Mr. Buckle, a brilliant but untrained Oxford Radical, who has just succeeded Mr. Clifford.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE for February has an especially interesting article on "Dr. John Brown of Edinburg," by Professor David Masson, who knew him well, and gives many details of his gentle life, some familiar, and others that have never before found their way into print. With the May number Mr. John Morley becomes the editor of this old favorite among magazines, which is to be slightly enlarged as to pages, but with no increase in price.

FOR several years the little poems of the Rev. Minot J. Savage have floated about in periodicals, often, from their real beauty and charm, finding place in scrap-books; and the many who have watched his progress will welcome the pretty volume lately issued by George H. Ellis & Co., Boston. The portrait which prefaces the book is of a strong New England type, clear-cut and confident; and though this latter quality may be a little in excess, and perhaps account for the presence of some inferior work, on the whole there is good reason for its existence. The verses are often didactic, but they are manly and hearty, often tender, and always full of religious feeling, with no tinge of morbidness or unnecessary analysis. Typographically it is all that need be desired. (18mo, pp. 247, $1.50).

IF Mr. Vernon S. Morwood, "Lecturer to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals," infuses into spoken words half the dreariness he has added to written ones, he is an unfortunate addition to the corps of laborers in that field. Why an Englishman must "talk down" to an audience, whether old or young, is one of the things yet to be found out. So far as children are concerned, "Mr. Barlow" began it, and it is Mr. Barlow who speaks again in "Facts and Phases of Animal Life, Interspersed with Amusing and Original Anecdotes." The plan of the book is good, all the facts well arranged and accurate, and the "Amusing Anecdotes" as interesting as could be expected; but the priggish tone prevails, and to shut the book seems its most desirable use. Possibly children may not feel this as strongly as their elders, and the illustrations and make-up are in any case attractive and satisfactory. (12mo, pp. 286, seventy-five illustrations, $1.50; D. Appleton & Co.).

A REVIEWER in the Athenæum declares that style is merely an expression of temper. "If the temper is small," he adds, "the style is small. If the temper of America, since, at least, she has come to the very first rank of great nations, is more peevish than it was in the days of Washington Irving or in the days of the colonial writers, it is but natural, perhaps, yet it renders her literature more provincial. The noble urbanity of Washington Irving allies him to the classic writers of Europe. But much rarer and much finer as is the genius of Hawthorne (and it is doubtful whether any prose writer of our century was more richly endowed) it is this petty fretfulness and 'consciousness of province' which keeps him down. And inasmuch as Emerson was entirely free from this he takes a place among the great writers of our time, though in the mere material part of style he, like every one else, must give place to Hawthorne."

"UNCLE REMUS" has given every reader of his drolleries an appetite for other Southern provision in this direction, and thus "Oddities in Southern Life and Character," edited by Mr. Henry Watterson, has an especial interest. It is of a by-gone day, even more than "Uncle Remus," and it is all broad farce rather than humor; but, after making all allowance for the flavor of whisky and tobacco that pervades the pages, there is enough distinctive material to afford matter not only for amusement but for some serious reflection on the development of Southern character. The types are as extreme as anything in the remote West, and there is the strong brutal element of all frontier life or imperfect civilization. But the West has outgrown this phase far more thoroughly than the South, and while nominally a humorous book, there is much between the lines that the student of life sees repeating itself to-day. (12mo, pp. 485, $1.50, illustrated; Houghton, Mifflin & Co.).

It is somewhat questionable if it be worth while to introduce Ariosto to the acquaintance of children particularly if it be Ariosto shorn of his chief characteristics, and made sufficiently inoffensive for such unaccustomed society. That the work has been very charmingly done by H. C. Holloway-Calthrop in "Paladin and Saracen," and that Mrs. Arthur Lemon's illustrations are an added attraction does not convince one that it is altogether advisable; but, having entered this protest, one finds that the old tales of Roland and Hipogrif and Bradamante have lost none of their power, and that, at their worst, they hold infinitely less harm than a single number of many of the periodicals placed in the children's way. The book is beautifully made up, and quite as attractive to older as to younger readers. (12mo, pp. 353, $2.00; Macmillan & Co., London and New York).

MR. W. C. BARTLETT has chosen a title wisely for his little book, "A Breeze from the Woods," giving exactly the quality to be found in its pages. He has certain characteristics in common with John Burroughs, and while lacking his power of minute observation, has all of his love of nature and much of his poetic insight, "Under a Madrano," for instance, running over with humor as well as tenderness. Many of the chapters first appeared in the Oterland Monthly, whose resurrection has been welcomed by many old friends, and their appearance in this form is fully warranted by the genuine value of the papers. (16mo, pp. 255, $1.25; The California Publishing Company, San Francisco). From the same publishers comes a pretty volume, "College Verses," compiled by the Berkeleyan Stock Company, the contents of which have appeared in various periodicals. Most of the poems were written before the graduation of the authors, and cover a period of some nine years. They are all graceful, and many of them have real poetic beauty, the power of making pleasant verses seeming to be more and more an American possession. (18mo, pp. 112, $1.00).

THE forthcoming biography of Lord Lawrence will be one of the most fascinating of the year. Among many anecdotes there is one eminently characteristic of the man, who was as strong in his affection as in his will. He was one evening sitting in his drawing-room at Southgate with his sister and other members of the family; all were engaged in reading. Looking up from his book in which he had been engrossed, he discovered that his wife had left the room. "Where's mother?" said he to one of his daughters. "She's up stairs," replied the girl. He returned to his book, and looking up again a few minutes later, put the same question to his daughter and received the same answer. Once more he returned to his reading, and once more he looked up with the same question on his lips. His sister broke in: "Why, really, John, it would seem as if you could not get on for five minutes without your wife." "That's why I married her," he replied.

THERE is an atmosphere of well-bred leisure, a sense of repose and ease about the little novel, "Mrs. Lorimer, a Sketch in Black and White," by Lucas Molet, ostensibly a masculine, but most undoubtedly a feminine pseudonym. Only a woman could have given the innumerable details of the village and rectory life, the setting and background against which the figure of Elizabeth Lorimer is sharply outlined. It is as a young widow whose husband has just died abroad, that she returns to Claybrooke Rectory and the protection of the rector and his wife, the uncle and aunt who have brought her up, in the quiet repression that makes the life of the well-bred English country girl. A broader experience with a brilliant young husband has shown Elizabeth its limitations, and before her first year of crape and widow's caps is over, she revolts and returns to the little house in London which had been fitted up for her as a bride. Here her brother-in-law and his family and friends make a cultivated and delightful circle, and under such influences Elizabeth expands like a flower and is living a life so eminently what it really ought to be that every reader will protest at the fate that overtakes her. She learns to love with a depth of feeling the first tie had never awakened, and though the man is selfish and vacillating he is also fine enough to have changed under her influence. But a morbid and wretched self-analysis begins. Elizabeth at last takes the ground that happiness is immoral, and self-sacrifice the only thing pleasing to God. She returns to the rectory, solaces herself with visiting the poor, who do not particularly need her; nearly ruins the man who does, and dies of typhus fever contracted in one of the cottages, a martyr to a false principle. The book is too delicate and sweet in tone—the whole feeling too high, to be marred by what is most certainly an utterly false and immoral putting of what real life demands, the pain and indignation one feels at the last being a tribute to the writer's skill, which we trust will be used in healthier ways hereafter. (16mo, pp. 342, $1.25; D. Appleton & Co., New York).

MR. A. J. HADCOCK recently related the following: A kettle filled with boiling water was hung with the lid on in the hottest room of a Turkish bath. The temperature of the surrounding air was 262° F. After about an hour the temperature of the water was taken, and indicated, as was expected, 212° . The kettle was then re-hung with the lid off. The temperature of the room was now 252° . In twenty minutes the temperature of the water had fallen to 185° ; in thirty minutes to 178° ; in forty-five minutes to 170° , and was evidently still falling. The manager stated that it generally fell finally to about 140° , when a point of equilibrium seemed to be established, and the water neither got hotter nor colder. Mr. Hadcock supposes the loss of heat was due to rapid vaporization and conversion of the sensible heat of the water into the latent heat of steam, and as dry air is a very bad conductor of heat, the heat required to convert a portion of the water into steam had to be abstracted from the remainder of the water, thus lowering its temperature. In substantiation of this explanation it is well known that if water is placed in a vessel over a large bulk of strong sulphuric acid in the receiver of an air-pump, and the air is exhausted, the rapid evaporation of one portion of the water will actually cause the rest to freeze.

THE famous spectre of the Brocken, which frequently appears in the Hartz Mountains, seldom visits this country, but it was seen not long ago from the Toujabe range in Nevada by Mr. R. A. Marr, of the coast and geodetic survey, who gives this account of the atmospheric phenomenon: "Suddenly, as I stood looking over the vast expanse beneath me, I saw myself confronted by a monster figure of a man, standing in mid-air before me, upon the top of a clearly-defined mountain-peak, which had but the thin air of the valley below for a resting-place. The figure was only a short distance from me. Around it were two circles of rainbow light and color, the outer one faintly defined as compared with the inner one, which was bright and clear and distinctly iridescent. Around the head of the figure was a beautiful halo of light, and from the figure itself shot rays of colors normal to the body. The sight startled me more than I can now tell. I threw up my hands in astonishment and, perhaps, some little fear, and at this moment the spectre seemed to move toward me. In a few moments I got over my fright, and then, after the figure had faded away, I recognized the fact that I had enjoyed one of the most wonderful phenomena of nature. Since then we have seen it once or twice from Jeff Davis' Peak, but it has never created such an impression upon me as it did that evening when I was doing service as a heliotrope all alone on the Arc Dome."

THE practice of heating railway coaches by stoves is but seldom employed on the continent of Europe. Danger from fire in case of derailment is one of the objections commonly urged against this mode of heating, and it must be confessed that the fearful loss of life in this country resulting from the use of stoves has given much force to the objection. On many continental railways metallic cases of convenient shape and size, filled with hot water, have long been employed. The inconvenience of this plan consists in the fact that these vessels rapidly lose their heat, and every two or three hours the coach must be invaded by a gang of employés, who remove the cold vessels and bring in hot ones. On long journeys, especially at night, this disturbance becomes very annoying to passengers. Again, the temperature constantly fluctuates, now too high and again too low for comfort. As water is known to possess a greater capacity for heat than any other substance, it seemed vain to hope for anything better. It had happened to a French chemist, M. Camille Vincent, to observe that, in the process of manufacturing acetate of soda, this salt when once fused, required a surprisingly long time in cooling down to the ordinary temperature. This observation suggested the new substitute for water in the railway heater. A very large quantity of heat is required not only to warm the acetate of soda, but in addition, to convert the crystalline solid into a liquid, a case quite different from the heating of water. This large quantity of heat is slowly given off, the liquefied salt gradually crystallizing, and the whole mass cooling down to the common temperature. Critical tests made with vessels of the same capacity, show that those charged with the soda salt furnish about four times as much heat as those filled with water. One of the latter heated to 81° C. cooled to 40° in five hours, while a similar heater charged with acetate of soda and heated to 64° C. cooled to 40° in sixteen hours. The principal objection to this method is the cost of the soda salt. But this expenditure is of the nature of a permanent investment, as there is no consumption or waste of the material. The chief advantages arise from the less frequent changes of heaters required. Fewer heating stations and fewer employés are required, and passengers are much less frequently disturbed. Last year the trains between Paris and Havre were warmed by this system. The London and Northwestern Railway is using this winter about six thousand of these new heaters. In most of the countries of Southern Europe this plan is rapidly extending. These heaters are simply cases made of sheet metal in the form of a box or cylinder, or any other convenient shape, and of any desired capacity. This is filled with fused acetate of soda and then hermetically sealed, like a can of fruit. It is only necessary then to place this vessel in boiling water from five to fifty minutes, according to its size, when the contents are liquefied and charged with heat, which it is ready to yield up gradually during a space of many hours. The case is analogous to that of supplying to the mainspring of a watch in a few moments, by winding, enough motor force to occupy twenty-four hours in returning to its relaxed condition. A multitude of uses will be found for this simple contrivance where a gentle but continuous heat is required. In the dining-room, in the kitchen, in the carriage, in the bed-room, it will find its place.

THE DRAMA.

Mr. W. J. FLORENCE did not deem the honor of a political appointment abroad sufficient inducement to give up his profession, so he is making people laugh this season as of old. He and Mrs. Florence enter upon a week's engagement March 12 at the Walnut Street Theatre, Philadelphia.

MISS CARRIE SWAIN, who played the rollicking soubrette in the "Tourists in a Pullman Car" very successfully some seasons since, started out last fall in a play called "Cad, the Tomboy," made to order for her by Mr. Leonard Grover, but misunderstandings and legal troubles ensued, and the play reverted to the author. "Mab, the Miner's Daughter," is the title of the medium in which the lady is now afforded an opportunity of displaying her abilities—abilities resembling those of Lotta, somewhat exaggerated, perhaps. During the week ending March 17 she may be seen at the Arch Street Theatre, Philadelphia.

SINCE Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan showed us the delights of comic opera several theatres devoted exclusively to its use have been established in the principal cities. In New York the Standard Theatre, the Bijou Opera House, and the new Casino present it as their only bill of fare; the Bijou is its home in Boston, and in Philadelphia the managers of the Lyceum have demonstrated that tuneful music, bright libretti and beautiful stage settings have an army of appreciators. The "Queen's Lace Handkerchief" had a profitable run of five weeks; "Iolanthe" about a month, and "Donna Juanita," with Miss Jeannie Winston in the title rôle, ran a number of weeks.

ON September 14 last Mr. Lawrence Barrett produced the Hon. George H. Boker's blank-verse tragedy of "Francesca di Rimini" at Haverly's Theatre, Philadelphia. Elaborate and important alterations had been made since the play was originally presented, some twenty years ago, by the late E. L. Davenport, so that its production last autumn was practically a premiere. The warm words of approval accorded to the tragedy and its interpreters on this occasion have since been echoed in the leading cities, and the return visit at the Chestnut Street Opera House on March 12 is looked forward to with great interest in literary and theatre-going circles. Entirely new scenery has been prepared for the play by the resident managers of the Opera House, Messrs. Zimmerman and Nixon, and as great scenic opportunities are offered, a most elaborate staging of the play may be looked for. We are informed that the cost of the scenery alone exceeds fifteen hundred dollars. The conditions of success are present: A classic and highly-dramatic theme; treated poetically and ably; interpreted by scholarly and eminently efficient artists; with perfect stage accessories. The leading characters will be in the same hands as heretofore. Mr. Barrett as the hunchback prince, Miss Marie Wainwright as "Francesca," and Mr. Louis James as the revengeful jester.

IN LIGHTER VEIN.

A. S. Camp in Luck.

THE CONTINENT published on Valentine's Day
The following lines in a casual way:—

THE undersigned—a bachelor of fifty—
Rich, handsome, reasonably thrifty,
Has read the above by Mr. Oscar Max,
And fain would test the logic by the facts.
"Wanted a wife!" Address, enclosing stamp
And full particulars, to—

A. S. CAMP.

Here are two answers which would seem to show
That e'en A. S.-camp need not a begging go:

I

Mr. A. S. Camp.

Enclosed you'll find your answer
—and a canceled stamp.

A nice old-maid—yet not so very old,
Not thirty yet (and surely not a scold),
Would like to answer the advertisement
On page 256 of a late "CONTINENT."
The bachelor who wrote it knew his mind;
The next thing is the proper maid to find.
He asks for "full particulars;" he'd know much better
By seeing her—not trusting to a letter.
However, she will do the best she can
In giving her description to the gentleman—
She's fair;—dark eyes and hair;—able to read and write.
(Her school diploma shows she's reasonably bright.)
Can get a dinner—cooks the meats
And desserts by "THE CONTINENT'S" receipts.
What more is wanted by the gentle "swell?"
Of course he only has to write and tell.
The only drawback is his name,
She's had her own so long, she'd like to keep the same.
(You know, an old friend is the best);
Still, she MIGHT change it, at the right request.
(St. Louis.)

MISS OURI.

II

"The Continent"—

Sir:

Would you please undertake
The office of Postman just once, for my sake?
Then deliver this letter to one in your camp
Who unblushingly owns the cognomen, A. S.-camp.
He resides at an inn called "In Lighter Vein,"
But he talked some of moving to Maiden Lane.
You'll find him, I think, without any trouble,
For he's publicly blowing a beautiful bubble.

STRANGER FRIEND—

It seems rude to call you A. S.-camp,
Though for aught I know you may merit the stamp.
I don't mean the postage-stamp named in your letter,
But the brand that distinguishes bad goods from better.
And so, after years of single-hand strife,
You challenge the Fates by asking a wife?

1—Hi-Ski, the Chinese washerman, thinks he can ride a Bronco "alle same Melican man."

3—And more elevated.

2—He mounts the animal and is somewhat astonished,

4—L'Envoi.

You wave all the possible danger to peace,
Unfurl as your banner the famed Golden Fleece—
The gaining of which might be fraught with more pain
Than the mystical treasure so hard to obtain.
And you recklessly venture rare, personal charms
In this conflict 'twixt reason and womanly arms.

Ah, my friend, have you carefully counted the cost?—
The freedom that thus may be fatally lost?
Are you willing to yield, if the right one appears,
The self-love you've cherished through fifty long years?
You see I'm inclined to play very fair,
And your heart I would scorn to allure with a snare;
You have had ample time to make up your mind,
To weigh all the pleasures you're leaving behind;
So, I take it, you've settled the question for aye,
And will earnestly welcome the true marriage day.

Won't it seem stranger than fancy or fiction,
To find your free self under wholesome restriction?
You will marvel, no doubt, how it happened that Fate
Should reserve this great boon till life's day grew so late;
But remember, my friend, that the blessing delayed,
Is often prized more than if earlier paid.
Had Isaac been born when his parents were young,
In their hearts common gratitude only had sprung:
But the long-deferred hope, the final despair,
Wakened holiest love toward this God-given heir.
And, mayhap, a kind Providence, merciful, true,
Has been teaching a lesson in patience to you.

From this moral digression I'll now hasten back,
And endeavor to keep the legitimate track.

If, indeed, you're resolved on the blind, fatal leap—
To follow your fellows, as sheep follow sheep—
And of all the five hundred who answer your plea,
Your well-seasoned heart should incline unto me—
It is well. For never, I venture, you'll find
A maiden more perfectly formed to your mind.

It would not be modest, and so I'll refrain
From vaunting my charms, until I obtain
A catalogue full of what you desire.
Then I'll straightway report myself all you admire.
Transformation of tastes—adaptation's the term—
Diplomatic discretion—which means, timely squirm
Out of unpleasant places and unsavory facts,
Into magical coverts where nothing reacts.—
Transformation of tastes, I was going to say,
Is the gift of the gods on man's wedding day;
For Cupid and Midas can soften the moods
Of the veriest vixen or primmest of prudes.

'Tis no difficult task for a versatile heart
To attain the joy-summit in love's pleasing art;
For to bound and flutter, and bend and sway,
To charm and be newly charmed each day,
Is all a man needs for his acme of bliss:
And I'm certain, my friend, I could do all of this.
(Yes, and on provocation could throw in a kiss—
A sweet little favor I never should miss.)

Now, surely, I've dealt with a frank, open hand,
And I'll leave future issues for you to command.
With truest of wishes that life may bring joy,
I sign myself, Faithfully, "HELEN OF TROY."

Easter Flowers.

BY J. ZITELLA COOKE.

GLAD bells rang in the Easter morn, and I
Was sad and weary of the things of time;
Nor would I list the Angel choir that sang,
In softest harmony, to their sweet chime;
And still their tuneful notes pealed on, until
The forests and the fields, and all the air,
Were filled with music of the Easter bells,
And Easter flowers were blooming everywhere.

And midst the joyous ringing of the bells
I caught the low, sweet voices of the flowers—
For God doth grant to them a tongue to soothe
The heart that aches in this sad world of ours—
And still they murmured, till mine ear did lose

The swelling psalm of the happy bells,
And I stooped low, that I might hear once more
The story that a simple flow'ret tells.

"I know that ye are bright and beautiful,"
I cried; "and your sweet breath doth wake again

The memories of yore, and bind anew
The golden links of thought's electric chain;

Ye mind me of the loved and lost, and joys

And hopes of days that were too bright to last;

But can ye give them back to me again?
One word from out the dead and silent Past?

"Alas, your whispers are but mockeries!
From earth's cold graves ye have returned, but where

The precious ones who went to sleep with you?
Do ye of them no sign, no tidings bear?"

And still with such a loving tenderness

They plead, that I could not refuse to hear:

And lo! close to my side a Passion Flower Proclaimed, in accents wondrous sweet and clear—

"I bear a sign and message from that Blessed One
 Who suffered eighteen hundred years ago;
 And through the rolling centuries of time
 I tell the story of His cross and woe!"
 And then a Lily fair, whose snowy cup
 Hung o'er the crystal stream, spoke, in a voice
 Of calm, assuring love, and bade my heart
 Forget its grief, and looking up, rejoice.

"I bear sweet tidings from Our Father's house;
 Look on my face; behold, I am His care!
 Upon His hand I live, from day to day,
 And spotless robes of radiant beauty wear."
 Half-hidden Violets then took the theme,
 And spoke the graces of humility;
 And Jasmines, from their leafy coronal,
 Told of a life from mortal sorrows free.

The shadows lengthened, and the day was spent,
 And ling'ring still, I listened to the flowers:
 "Fair teachers, ye have brought me peace," I cried,
 "And giv'n me strength for suffering's bitter hours."
 The night came on, and daylight sank to rest.
 The earth was still—the happy birds—the air;
 The Easter bells had hushed their joyous song,
 But Easter flowers were blooming everywhere!

EASTER BELLS.

RING, ye joyous Easter bells!
 Stir the heart! awake the nation!
 Thrill the world with glad pulsation!
 Christ, who brought us free salvation;
 Christ, the Saviour for us born—
 From the grave 'rose Easter morn.

Ring triumphant, Easter bells!
 Joy for sad hearts reunited!
 Joy for wrongs that have been righted!

Joy for noble lives indited
 On Time's page by History's pen,
 Lives of nations and of men.

Ring, O happy Easter bells—
 Ring the birth of spring-time vernal!
 Ring the birth of souls eternal!
 Ring the endless love supernal!
 Ring the dawn of better days,
 Hearts of truth and songs of praise!

ROSE HARTWICK THORPE.

EASTER SONG.

IF Easter rise
 With glad surprise,
 Charming the tear-drops from your eyes;
 'Tis God, All-wise,
 In Christ supplies
 That joyous life which never dies.
 If human ties
 Break oft, with sighs
 That desolate the heart! Despair

Not from the skies
 The one chief prize—
 Jesus—the Christ who never dies.
 From grief arise;
 Lift up thine eyes!
 'Tis Jesus calls; to thee He cries
 My sacrifice
 To faith describes
 The Life, the Hope that never dies.

THE FLYING LEAP.

A NATIONAL PASTIME.

El ancho circo se llena
De multitud clamorosa,
Que atiende á ver en su arena
La sangrienta lid dudosa,
Y todo en torno resuena.

Moratin—Fiesta de Toros en Madrid.

IN all ages and in all countries the disposition and genius of a people, as well as their state of civilization, have been almost infallibly indicated by the character of their amusements. The cold and sluggish nations of the North have devoted their leisure to exhibitions wherein were displayed mimic battles and feats of enormous strength; but among the fiery and impetuous races of Southern Europe, and particularly those of the Spanish peninsula, which have inherited, along with the untamed ferocity of Goth and Vandal, not a little of the refined cruelty of the Arab, diversions whose attractiveness is largely due to the risk of life and the shedding of blood have ever held the first place in the estimation of the multitude. This sanguinary taste for deeds of brutality, the atrocities of the Inquisition which with the sanction and authority of royalty burned and mutilated its victims in public, have carefully fostered and perpetuated. The universal and incredible popularity of the bull-fight with the masses, which at times degenerates into absolute frenzy, illustrates, far better than any commentary can do, the bent of the Spanish mind and the degradation of the Spanish character.

The bull-fight, suggested doubtless by the gladiatorial combats that once constituted an important feature of the amusements of every Roman city and colony, is a reminiscence of the Moors. In the prosperous days of the kingdom of Granada it was customary for the Moorish chivalry, skilled in all the manly exercises of the time, to fight bulls in the Plaza de la Bibarrambla, the scene of many a tilt of reeds, and of more than one friendly contest with their Christian rivals. The knights—for none of inferior rank were allowed to participate—were dressed in gala costume, and mounted upon swift Barbary horses trained in the tournament and the foray. The only weapon carried by the rider was a short spear about five feet long, and having a butt like that of a lance. With this he was expected to dispatch the bull with a blow delivered between the shoulder and the spine, the very place where the Spanish espada plants his death-dealing sword. It was accounted disgraceful to wound the bull in any other part of the body; and if the knight were so unfortunate as to lose his weapon, he was driven from the arena by the jeers and shouts of the spectators. Affording, as it did, a display of graceful and daring horsemanship, as well as of dexterity in the use of the jerrid, or spear, the original bull-fight was a very different affair from the cruel exhibition of to-day. There was none of the revolting butchery that disgraces the latter, for rarely, indeed, did it happen that a horse was sacrificed, and still more rarely that a man fell a victim to the rage of the infuriated beast, that, bewildered by the rapid movements of his enemies—whose sagacious horses, guided solely by the pressure of the rider's knees, advanced in turn to the attack, or retired to give place to others—was soon exhausted and killed.

We may imagine, if not describe, the splendors that, under the cloudless sky of Andalusia, invested these games in the quaint old Plaza de la Bibarrambla during the rule of the sultans of Granada. The endless arcades and galleries thronged with the bright-eyed ladies of the harem, whom enlightened custom, in defiance of the injunction of the Prophet, permitted to appear with unveiled faces; the many-colored robes sparkling with jewels; the brilliant court, and the grim monarch surrounded by his vigilant African guards; the sea of white turbans that, massed near the barrier, swayed to and fro with every motion of the excited crowd as they applauded some bold thrust or adroit maneuver of their favorite champion, all conspired to make the Moorish bull-fight wonderfully attractive to a people famed for their luxury, their love of pomp, and their magnificent games and festivals.

It was in the reign of Alfonso VI of Toledo that this sport, borrowed from their infidel neighbors, with whom they were often upon intimate terms, was adopted by the Castilian chivalry. The Cid, "El soberbio Castellano," and the idol of his romantic countrymen, who made him their model in all that related to knightly courtesy and warfare, was the first Spaniard to enter the arena, where he greatly distinguished himself, eliciting the hearty applause and admiration of the Moors, an event which has been celebrated by the graceful muse of Moratin. Once established, the bull-fight, well calculated to please the venturesome spirit of an age delighting in deeds of heroism and reckless daring, obtained too firm a foothold to be shaken even by the edicts of Queen Isabella, whose sense of humanity had been outraged by the death of two performers in the first and only fiesta she ever attended. That wise and gentle princess, having ever the interest of her subjects at heart, did not fail to see, and frequently deplore, in their increasing and passionate devotion to sports involving the loss of life and limb, a disposition that augured no good to their future advancement and happiness as a nation.

During the reign of Charles V, who was himself a skillful toreador, and his successors, the bull-fight became more and more popular, until it numbered in the ranks of its champions the most renowned soldiers of the kingdom, among whom not the least in reputation was Francisco Pizarro. The accession of the house of Bourbon, however, which introduced the effeminate manners and absurd etiquette of the Court of Versailles, put an end to this, as well as to other national amusements, by making them unfashionable. Exhibitions modeled after the original ones, wherein the superb horsemanship of the Spanish nobles is shown to great advantage, are now occasionally given at the celebration of a coronation, a royal marriage, or a christening. They are styled "Fiestas Reales de Toros," or "Royal Bull Feasts;" but, as the lance has fallen into disuse, and the mounted cavaliers are unable to kill the bull without assistance, a professional matador is always on hand to finish him after he has been tortured sufficiently to satisfy the audience. The last of these fiestas, a noteworthy part of the wedding festivities of Alfonso XII and Queen Mercedes, took place at Madrid on the twenty-third day of January, 1878, in the presence of eighteen thousand spectators.

The usual mode of fighting bulls on foot, known as "La Corrida de Toros," or "Bull Race," dates back to the middle of the eighteenth century, when the sport, hitherto the exclusive privilege of the nobility, became the business of professionals, who have always been recruited from the lowest classes of society.

The education of a bull-fighter lasts through many years. His first essays are made with the cape, with which he learns all the tricks of the chulo, to provoke and avoid the charge, and it is only after considerable experience with animals with padded horns—from which is expected nothing more serious than an abundance of bruises and an occasional toss in the air—that he ventures into the ring to play the part of capeador. If he is sufficiently dexterous, and aspires to banderillear, or handle the darts, he serves a tedious apprenticeship, which entails far more danger than the preceding one. And here he usually stops, for the espada, like the poet, "is born, not made," and no amount of experience or familiarity with the mere details of bull-fighting will produce a matador if the candidate is not naturally adapted to it. The intended espada must have taken, and be thoroughly skilled in, the various preliminary degrees of his art before he attempts the final and most difficult one, which, if attained, will bring him to the summit of his ambition. To accomplish this he betakes himself to the shambles and practices daily upon cattle the blows with which in time he expects to win the applause of the mighty concourse in the amphitheatre. Next, like the chulo, he tries his hand upon bulls with blunted horns, until he is declared ready for the real contest, the "lucha de muerte."

As for the picador, or spearman, his part requires little more than brute strength; for, besides the armor in which his legs are encased, his horse protects him, and receives the brunt of the attack. Any one with powerful arms and shoulders, who is a good rider—and there are few Spaniards who are not—can become a picador. His rôle is much less esteemed than that of his comrades, because he does not run as great a risk of a cojida, or "catch," as the misfortune of getting too near the horns of the bull is termed in the technical jargon of the profession.

A bull-fight is a very expensive affair from beginning to end. The animals destined for the arena are bred expressly for that purpose, and when a year old are collected from the pastures and charged, one by one, by the herdsman armed with his goad. Those only that endure this test—and the proportion is small—are deemed suitable for the ring, and are valued at from seven hundred to a thousand dollars apiece. The salaries allowed the performers are enormous, and the best of them receives more than a captain-general. An ordinary espada demands six hundred dollars, while the "stars" never think of entering the plaza for less than eight hundred dollars in gold. Out of this the espada pays his cuadrilla, or "squad;" the picadores, banderilleros and chulos that compose his following. The municipal authorities exact from him a license of twenty-five dollars for each entertainment, and should a bull be crippled in any way so that he is unfitted for the final bloody scene, custom requires the espada to provide another at his own expense. Notwithstanding these heavy drains upon his purse, the income of the successful espada is immense. From the middle of May to the first of November a corrida is held on Sunday afternoon in every large city in Spain, and all of the prominent saints' days and holidays—which, though not so faithfully observed now as formerly, are still surprisingly numerous—are celebrated in this manner. A bull-fight on the Christian festival of Easter sounds strangely to Anglo-Saxon ears, but to a Spaniard it does not by any means seem utterly out of place. The bull-fighter lives in great luxury, drives magnificent horses, dresses in the showy Majo costume, maintains the finest establishment his abundant means will allow, and indulges to the utmost his passion for gaming. The fact that his social status is below that of a pugilist with us does not prevent him from having numerous admirers even among the haughty Castilian nobility; and numerous are the tender glances bestowed from the aristocratic region of the balconies upon the young and daring matador. A few years ago a famous espada, whose exploits in the plaza had long been the envy of his comrades, received his coup de grace from an Andalusian bull, and was carried out dead. When his trunks came to be examined they were found filled with locks of hair, ribbons, piles of faded bouquets, and a great quantity of billets-doux, many of them sealed with coronets and bearing the signatures of some of the proudest beauties of Old Castile. Discretion is not one of the cardinal virtues of the Spaniard, who is as fond of scandal as the veriest village gossip; and there was soon considerable excitement in the higher circles of the Court, which resulted in the sudden and permanent disappearance of certain ladies of the bluest blood, and the enforced retirement of others to the penitential seclusion of the convent. This severe example seems, however, to have been productive of little effect upon the conduct of some of the survivors, judging from the astonishing tales of their escapades whispered in every club and restaurant of the Spanish capital.

With his own class the torero is a kind of divinity, who receives the respectful homage of his male associates and the adoration of his female acquaintances. He is liberal to prodigality, and a veritable epicurean, knowing well that a false step or the miscalculation of an inch will probably some day exact the extreme penalty attached to the slightest neglect of the rules of his perilous calling. With that possible end in view he is as regular in his attendance at the confessional as can be expected in the case of so gay a cabalero; and if the reverend padres succeed in extorting full confessions from these penitents, they must be the repository of tales which would make their fortunes in any Spanish circle of society gossips. There is something fascinating to the sterner as well as to the weaker sex in a man who deliberately takes his life in his hand, even in an ignoble cause, and trusts to his own steady nerves and strong arm for the victory. In his costumes, which cost from five hundred to a thousand dollars each, he takes especial pride, and his wardrobe frequently contains a dozen or more of different colors. They are made of the finest silk, heavily embroidered with gold and silver, the jacket—which does not reach the waist by several inches, and is open under the arms to secure the greatest possible freedom of movement—being usually so covered with glittering cords and tassels that the color of the material cannot be distinguished. Tightly-fitting knee-breeches, a silken sash, whose ends fall negligently over the left hip, white stockings, low shoes, and a triangular montera or cap of black plush complete this elaborate dress, unsurpassed in richness by any ever displayed upon the stage. The espada, like the Majo, wears his hair in a tiny cue, eked out with a false braid, and coiled in a net at the back of the head. His sword is a ponderous rapier of Toledo steel, its hilt wrapped in buckskin, dyed crimson, and affording for the hand the firmest possible grip.

The outfit of the picador is not nearly as gaudy as those of his professional brethren. His jacket is less profusely ornamented, his hat is of gray felt, and his trousers of leather, concealing the iron armor that protects his legs, but impedes his movements when on foot, so that he has a slender chance of escape if, when dismounted, he should attract the attention of the infuriated bull. This armor serves also to save the limbs in case the horse falls upon his rider, an accident of almost daily occurrence. The spear of the picador is sixteen feet in length, but the blade is wrapped with tow till only an inch of the point is visible. The weapons of the banderillero are a pair of barbed darts adorned with paper streamer. When the bull shows a want of spirit, banderillas de fuego, or fire arrows, furnished with some detonating substance, are employed, instead of the ordinary ones, to madden him, and which, exploding in the flesh as soon as they are planted, drive the creature wild with rage and pain.

The lowest in rank of the cuadrilla is the cachetero, whose duty it is to kill the bull after he has fallen from exhaustion and the ill-aimed thrusts of the espada. This he does by driving his dagger into the cervical vertebrae of the animal, causing instantaneous death.

The dramatis personæ having now been duly introduced, let us proceed to the ceremonies of the corrida. It is a lovely Sunday afternoon in May, the opening day of the great fair of Seville. Surrounded by a sky of spotless blue, the sun beams brightly down upon the whitewashed houses, and the fragrance of an atmosphere freighted with the mingled scents of honeysuckle, rose, jasmine and the hundreds of odoriferous shrubs lining the public walks, finds its way into every street and byway of the quaint old city. The people, in holiday attire, and but lately released from the sombre vaults of the cathedral, are, with one accord, slowly wending their way toward the bank of the Guadalquivir, where, in the vicinity of a vast stone building, with tiers upon tiers of arches and balconies without end, a gay and noisy multitude is already assembled. As we saunter around the plaza, glancing in through a passage at the rear there rise upon the air the notes of a monotonous and solemn chant. Drawing near and peeping into a half-open door, the eye is attracted by the glitter of spangles, and amid the gloom which a pair of tapers, faintly visible through a cloud of incense, seem rather to heighten than dispel, can be perceived a score of men in gorgeous dresses kneeling devoutly before a little altar. These are the bull-fighters, hearing mass before engaging in a conflict that may cost more than one of them his life. A bell tinkles, the worshippers rise, and, bowing before the host, pass out and mingle with the giddy throng that is impatiently waiting for the gates to open.

Just opposite the chapel is another room of the same dimensions, but better lighted, and without furniture, excepting a long table standing in the middle of the tile-paved floor. Fastened to the wall within easy reach is a shelf containing a row of bottles, strips of linen and a case of surgical instruments. Upon the table, reclining at full length, his head supported by his hand, lies a man of forty years of age, fat, bearded and swarthy, with a cigarette stuck behind each ear and a lighted one in his mouth, who is entertaining a couple of friends with some amusing story, related in the animated and demonstrative manner of his countrymen. His surroundings have already disclosed his calling. He is the surgeon appointed by the City Council to attend to the wounded, and who, with commendable promptitude, has completed his arrangements with all the sang-froid of his profession. And now the strains of martial music are heard outside, as a battalion of soldiers, headed by a band, file into the plaza by the rear entrance, for the presence of the military is considered indispensable at a bull-fight, to preserve order and check any revolutionary demonstration that might be prompted by the occasion. At length the doors are opened, and the boisterous but good-humored crowds pour in and take their seats.

The impression that a stranger receives when he gazes for the first time upon that tremendous audience of fifteen thousand people, packing the grand amphitheatre from the barrier to the balconies, is one that he will never forget while he lives. The spectacle is unique, and of a magnificence the like of which no other country can display, vying as it does with the gladiatorial exhibitions of Imperial Rome. No other possesses a tithe of the thrilling interest investing every act of this drama—a drama always a tragedy—and not infrequently closing with the loss of human life, in the fierce struggle between brute force and consummate skill. As the performance usually begins at four o'clock, to avoid the heat, the plaza at that hour is half in sun and half in shadow. Upon the sunny side, where the prices are the lowest, the poorer classes are congregated, happy in having saved, begged, borrowed or stolen the few reals required for admission.

To obtain these, many have for months denied themselves the necessities of life; others have pawned their clothes and diminished their scanty stock of household utensils, all forgetful of the past and careless for the morrow, provided the present dominating passion is gratified. There is no age or sex for which the national pastime has not an irresistible fascination. Women make up at least half the audience; some of these bring children in their arms, perhaps because there is no one to care for them at home, but with the effect, certainly, of familiarizing them with these horrible scenes of blood and butchery. The soldiers are distributed in companies among the peasantry, and scattered here and there where the garlands and gay parasols are thickest one sees a civil guard, or jaunty officer, or a group of hussars in showy uniforms. In the lowest row lounges the oficionado, or devotee of the cruel sport, in dandy costume, his purple jacket and scarlet sash contrasting with the shovel hat and flowing robes of the priest who sits beside him. Above, in the pacos, or private boxes, the ladies muster in force and in their best attire, "Maja" toilettes and white mantillas, rustling silks and embroidered shawls; and the arcades are bright with the sheen of jewels, the sparkle of black eyes and the flutter of innumerable fans. Under the gallery, and facing the principal entrance, is the balcony of the president of the day, who is generally an officer of the city government, except when the King consents to attend, and then he assumes the office. Sometimes, upon state occasions, a number of titled ladies are chosen to preside over the arena, and magnificently dressed in the style of the seventeenth century, grace the box of the president with their charming presence, and direct the ceremonies, an honor much coveted, especially in Andalusia. In the neighborhood of the plaza every roof from which a glimpse, however limited, can be obtained of its interior is fairly black with people, and one enterprising individual has built a tower overtopping the walls of the amphitheatre, whence, for the moderate sum of three reals (fifteen cents), about one-fourth the admittance fee, an excellent view can be had of all that takes place inside.

Opposite the president's balcony is the toril, or bull-pen, closed by a ponderous gate. The six bulls destined for the afternoon's sport are shut up here, having been decoyed by trained oxen and driven by mounted spearmen the night before to this their final destination. The lateness of the hour does not deter thousands of spectators from witnessing this furious race, and to prevent accidents the streets are barricaded with poles lashed together, and soldiers and policemen are detailed to keep back the crowd; but even these precautions are sometimes insufficient, so uncontrollable is the excitement of the mob. The bulls are forced out of the toril one by one as they are wanted, by means of goads. To the shoulder of each, attached by a tiny barb, hangs a silken rosette, whose colors, familiar to every frequenter of the ring, indicate the pedigree of the animal, as well as the district from whence he comes.

The arena is an oval of about a hundred and eighty feet in its largest diameter, and packed with sand as smooth and hard as a floor. It is inclosed by three concentric fences; one higher than the others bounds the lowest range of seats; the second and third, only two feet apart, overlap and are contrived to shelter the hard-pressed torero when compelled to retreat. A number of men with buckets of water, which they distribute with their hands, are deliberately sprinkling the ground, interfering with the fruit peddlers, of whom more than a dozen with baskets of oranges are in the ring. "Naranjas! Naranjas! buenas y maduras!" cries one of these itinerant merchants, holding up his hands filled with the golden globes. His quick eye catches a signal, perhaps, from the highest balcony, and in a moment he pitches into the lap of the purchaser, with unerring aim, the amount of the order; then, bowing his thanks for the coin tossed him in return, he moves on in search of another customer. In the meantime the water-sellers, with their porous jugs and tinkling glasses, are climbing about, stumbling over feet and rumpling ladies' dresses, but always apologizing with a polite "Perden de V caballero!" that at once disarms all hostility. Before the sprinklers have finished their task the band strikes up a lively air, announcing the arrival of the president, who raises his hat in acknowledgment of the cheers of the audience. The notes of the band have scarcely died away when a trumpet sounds, the gate at the opposite side of the plaza opens, and the bull-fighters, in splendid array, appear, marshaled in the order of their rank. In front come the espadas, then the chulos, next the picadores, and lastly the mule teams, harnessed three abreast, and covered with scarlet trappings and jingling bells, followed by the various supernumeraries of the ring. Approaching the balcony of the president they salute that official, then the mules are driven out, the picadores range themselves in line near the fence, and the other performers, laying aside their gold-embroidered cloaks, take from the hands of their attendants plainer ones of red and yellow silk, whose stains and rents give evidence of many a bloody fray. Another trumpet sounds, the gate again swings open, and a solitary horseman rides in. His black doublet and short velvet cloak, the badge of his profession, as well as his sinister expression and suspicious carriage, betray him, and even the foreigner familiar with the inimitable pages of Gil Blas and Don Quixote can hardly fail to recognize at a glance the alguazil, or magistrate's officer, whose rapacious and unprincipled character has been the object of the sarcastic wit of writers on Spanish manners from the earliest times. He halts under the royal box, bows to the president, and catches in his hat a gilded key decorated with ribbons which the latter tosses to him. This key unlocks the stable of the bulls, and with it the alguazil canters slowly across the ring. A few seconds afterward a huge bull, with horns as sharp as daggers, bounds into the arena. There is a breathless silence as, pausing, he glares upon the assembled multitude, and then, selecting the nearest horse, charges headlong. The picador, by a vigorous use of the spur, manages to turn his steed to meet his adversary, and tries, by planting the point of the spear in his shoulder, to ward off his attack; but his strength is powerless before the onslaught of the furious beast, who, burying his horns in the body of the defenseless horse, and literally disemboweling him, hurls him and his rider to the ground.

To the Anglo-Saxon, whose sympathies are stirred by the sight of anguish, whether suffered by the higher or lower orders of the animal kingdom, the utter indifference evinced by the audience at a Spanish bull-fight is well nigh incomprehensible. That sentiment of pity which often causes the foreigner to turn away from the arena with a sickening shudder, seems totally wanting in the Spaniard: and as one leans against a barrier to recover his equanimity, he may often catch the amused and sneering glances of his less sensitive neighbors.

THE CHULOS AT WORK.

The active chulos instantly rush forward and lure the bull away with their scarlet cloaks, until their comrade is rescued. And now comes in the most horrible and disgusting feature of the corrida de toros. The picador having been raised up and attended to, the condition of the horse is ascertained. In the eyes of a Spaniard, who only looks at the present utility of anything, and is never in the least influenced by considerations of humanity, a horse is not disabled so long as he can stand. Those used in the bull-fight are the oldest and cheapest that can be procured—true Rosinantes, whose lease of life can be, at best, but short, and so destitute of spirit that they have to be wholly or partially blinded with bandages to prevent them from running away. If the wound does not show signs of being immediately fatal, the picador remounts and sustains another charge, but if the condition of the poor animal is such that he cannot move without difficulty, he is led out and the gaping hole in the side is sewed up and plastered with clay, when he is again introduced and spurred on to further torture!

Once in a great while the picador succeeds in turning the bull, and escapes without injury, the brute then devoting his attention to the next horseman in line. It is astonishing how much pounding these fellows can stand. Owing to the depth of their saddles they are rarely unseated, yet I have seen more than one projected a distance of ten feet, striking the barrier with a thud that could be heard across the ring, and immediately afterward pick himself up and walk away apparently unhurt. Sometimes the bull lifts horse and rider bodily, and throws them back upon his haunches, showing his immense strength. The picador is not a favorite with the audience, as, wearing armor, and being able to use his horse as a shield, he is less exposed to danger. When the bull becomes enraged, and charges right and left, as the savage ones often do, the picadores grow wary, and, manifesting a disinclination to advance, are greeted with a storm of hisses and opprobrious epithets and pelted with pieces of orange peel, canes, cushions, and whatever in the way of a projectile can be laid hands on at the moment. "Fuera! Fuera!" "Put him out!" "Forward, coward!" "Good bull!" "Well gored!" "Cofio, see how angry the rascal is!" "Fuego! Bring the fire arrows!" "Bravo, toro! bravissimo!" shout the oficionados, seconded by the spectators, who, rising to their feet en masse and yelling, hissing and gesticulating with all their might, transform the amphitheatre into a perfect bedlam. In the midst of the hubbub the shrill notes of the trumpet are again heard, and the chulos, fluttering their cloaks, spin around the bull, who chases them, now and then pressing one so closely that he is forced to drop all and run for his life. The tricks of the chulo to baffle the designs of his terrible antagonist, and at the same time display his own agility and skill, are numerous and thrilling. One borrows a lance from a picador, and brandishes it in sight of the brute, who accepts the challenge, and, lowering his horns, rushes forward. As he approaches, the chulo rests the butt of the lance on the ground, and springs over the back of the animal, dropping the weapon as the head of the latter touches it. Another places his foot upon the bull's forehead, and just as he is about to be impaled is raised high in the air; others maneuver backward and forward with the cape, so rapidly that the sharp horns, following its gaudy folds, seem to graze their bodies. For the third time the signal for the trumpet is given by the president, the chulos retire, and the banderilleros, each armed with a pair of darts adorned with paper streamers, step forward and confront the bull. While the brute is moving to the attack the banderillero meets him half way and sticks the arrows in his neck, one on either side. After eight banderillos have been used and the bull begins to exhibit signs of weariness, the trumpet announces the final scene of the drama. At the signal a young man of swarthy, almost black complexion, dressed in green and gold, carrying in one hand a cane and a square of scarlet cloth, and in the other a long rapier, leaves the barrier and presents himself to the view of the audience. A shout, increasing to a deafening roar of applause, welcomes him, as in the lithe and graceful figure is recognized the most famous of espadas.* "Frascuelo! Viva Frascuelo!" they cry, as hats and handkerchiefs are waved on every side in honor of the champion, who stands without a rival in dexterity and daring. Bowing low in acknowledgment of the compliment, the espada, uncovering his head and addressing the president, craves permission to kill the bull, promising to discharge his duty in compliance with the requirements of the ring; then, with a sudden jerk of his arm sending his hat far up among the spectators, and holding out the cloth like a banner, he proceeds to tempt and irritate the bull, springing nimbly right and left as the brute charges. After a few repetitions of this exercise he prepares for the thrust which is to end the struggle. Poising the sword aloft and waving the "muleta" with his left hand as the bull again encounters him, he buries the keen blade in his body between the left shoulder and the spine. When it is remembered the animal is moving at the top of his speed, and that the espada is compelled to reach far over his horns, preserve his own footing, and retreat, it is evident that extraordinary presence of mind, steadiness of hand and nerve are necessary for the successful performance of this perilous feat. When the bull, instead of being attracted by the cloth, obstinately charges the espada, the result is "otra cosa"—quite another thing—as the Spaniards say, for there are not many quick enough to avoid a "catch" under these circumstances. It is also essential that the bull should be more or less exhausted by his previous exertions, otherwise the attempt of the espada to finish would be almost certain death. The stab should pierce the heart and kill the beast instantly, but this rarely occurs. Notwithstanding the sword is ordinarily driven to the hilt, the bull has much vitality remaining, and is then more dangerous than ever. I have seen as many as four swords used upon one animal without reaching a vital part, and of thirty bulls which I saw dispatched in the plazas of Madrid and Seville, only one fell dead from a single stroke at the feet of the matador.

* Salvador Sanchez, of Granada. Though only twenty-seven years old, he has gained, through his hardihood and contempt of danger, a greater reputation in his bloody calling than any living torero. He has been wounded more than a dozen times—one gash, that extended from hip to breast-bone, having kept him in bed six months. He is better known by the nickname of "Frascuelo," which the ladies have softened into the more endearing "Frascuelito."

Finally the bull, weak with loss of blood, lies down, and the cachetero, slipping up from behind, pierces the spinal cord with his dagger. The teams of mules are now led in, and the horses and the bull—the former long since stripped of saddle and bridle—are dragged out as rapidly as possible. As soon as the blood stains in the ring have been covered with sand, and all traces of the former combat obliterated, another bull is admitted, and the same scenes, with little or no variation, are re-enacted.

The charm of the bull-fight in the eyes of the natives depends entirely upon the amount of blood that is shed.

sympathetic tear or two, but the more experienced dames look complacently on; and in five minutes the unfortunate, painfully gasping his last in the little hospital outside, is forgotten. The character of the Spanish woman is a curious anomaly. In her home or among her friends, there is no one more affectionate, more devoted, more kind than she, or any one more anxious to relieve the necessities of the poor, or alleviate by generous self-denial the misery of the suffering. Gifted with much natural refinement, she shrinks from inflicting pain even upon an insect, and the unexpected presence of a mouse is sure to cause her to retreat to the top of the nearest chair or table; but she will sit quietly for hours and witness the torture of horses and bulls with a coolness and apparent delight quite incomprehensible to a foreigner.

Some bulls, when confronted with the picador, refuse to fight, or even to run at the cloaks of the chulos. As soon as this cowardly disposition is discovered, they are baited with mastiffs, and afterward hamstrung by means of a knife fastened to the end of a pole. The heartless butchery of the horses hardly equals in cold-blooded brutality this revolting feature of the corrida.

The return from the plaza, especially at Madrid, where the streets are wide and well adapted to display, is well worth seeing. For a distance of nearly two miles the sidewalks are crowded with people, while a line of military police in the centre of the street sees that order is

THE ESPADA.

The more horses mangled and killed the better the sport is relished, and the enjoyment never reaches its climax until at least one human life has been sacrificed. One would suppose that the death of a torero would evoke some expression of pity among his fellow-creatures, or would, at least, be allowed to pass in respectful silence; but this is far from being the case. Even while the unhappy man is being gored and trampled into a shapeless and bloody mass, and his companions are trying in vain to rescue him, his cries are drowned in the tumultuous applause with which the furious efforts of the bull are received. A few of the younger ladies may put up their fans and rid themselves of a preserved among the flying vehicles and horsemen. Huge omnibuses, carrying forty passengers, and drawn by gayly-decked mules, are rushing by at a gallop; along with the splendid carriages of the nobility with footmen and outriders, and beautiful women reclining upon the cushions; gorgeous four-in-hands, Valencian tartanas, gigs, coaches, and all kinds of obsolete conveyances that have been resurrected for the occasion, with donkeys and Rosinantes innumerable.

There are several other methods of baiting and torturing bulls in Spain than the one above described. During the winter months occasional performances are given to train the toreros who are taking their preliminary lessons in the art. They are called Corridas de Novillos, and, though the bulls' horns are padded, these encounters are very dangerous. Women take part in them, dressed in the style of their masculine models. They wear, in addition, an osier shield like a headless barrel, protecting the body from the bosom to the knees, and covered with canvas decorated with scenes from the ring. More curious still than these female exhibitions are the games that form the taste and foster the talent of the rising generation, wherein mere boys are the actors and a half-grown but pugnacious calf is substituted for the more formidable animal. The juveniles often acquit themselves with credit, to the unbounded delight of their parents, who see in each spirited attack or agile movement a certain indication of future distinction in their profession.

The profits of the bull-fight, like those of the cocking-main, lotteries and similar moral diversions of the Spaniards, are set apart for the benefit of charitable institutions. It is one way "Don Diego" has of compromising with his conscience, and of excusing his predilection for what would otherwise be wholly indefensible. As the receipts of a single corrida often amount to thousands of dollars, the annual income from this source would be important did the funds not have to pass through the fingers of several sets of greedy officials, so that they are considerably diminished by the time they are ready to be distributed.

S. P. SCOTT.

BULL RING.

A LOOKER-ON IN PARIS.

PARIS has two sides. It is a gay, charming, joyous city for its own sons and daughters—so gay and so charming that to be compelled to live elsewhere seems to them like being exiled from Paradise. I think, too, that it is a sincere city enough—to its own children. Brother does not eat brother, even there. The true Parisian can live delightfully at small cost—can buy silks or roses at reasonable prices, is not preyed upon by dressmakers or deceived by jewelers; but it is another place for the foreigner, and its delights are dear. Commercial Paris subsists largely off the stranger; while it plays that it lives, moves and has its being for his welfare.

"You my flowers buy?" said to me the dirtiest little gamin on the Rue de Rivoli, stretching up a grimy little hand holding some violets and a bunch of mignonette. He had learned his two or three words of English painfully, and he had a touching faith in them; for when I shook my head at him, he said: "You me give a penny—poor leetle Eenglish boy!" He amused me, and I confess with shame that I rewarded his barefaced attempt to pass himself off as a compatriot with two pennies. The shops beguile you with promises in their windows of English spoken and of Spanish spoken; but, as regards the smaller shops, the English-speaking person has an unfortunate habit of being gone to breakfast, or if he be, by some happy accident en evidence, his English is usually that of the phrase-book, and equal only to inquiring if you have the glove of your brother. It is odd how little English is known in Paris. Well-educated Russians speak English as a rule; Germans, Swedes and Norwegians speak English; but Frenchmen seem to cultivate a profound indifference to the language of the dear little island across the Channel. When I passed a winter in Paris, I was offered by a London poet—who was himself half a Frenchman in his knowledge of and love for French life and language and literature—letters to a large group of the French poets and novelists of the day.

"But," said my friend, "only one of them speaks English; somehow they never seem to think it worth their while to learn. Monsieur M., you will find, speaks very good English. In fact, he is professor of English in a French college."

Monsieur M. was a great comfort and pleasure to me that winter, and his English was such, at least, as I could readily understand; but he always made three syllables of themselves—"themsel-vés," he called it—and he used to say "lov-éd" and "wish-éd." He always talked of things as unuseful, instead of useless, and he usually put his objects before his verbs, instead of after them. And he spoke better English than I have heard from any other Frenchman above the rank of a valet or a courier.

In going to Paris this year I betook myself to a very grand hotel, the resort of millionaires and of princes. The German Baroness Rothschild was living there; the Princess Dolgorouki had dwelt there for some months with her dogs and her children. Lord This and Lady That made it their headquarters; and I saw their stately carriages, with strong, sleek horses, and coachmen in sumptuous liveries, rolling in and out of the solemn old courtyard. This sounds as if I were very extravagant, but I really was not. My pleasantly-furnished bed-room—to which I mounted by what the French call an "ascenseur," the English a "lift," and we an "elevator"—was in the sixth story, and for it I paid six francs ($1.20) a day. My early breakfast of café au lait and rolls and butter was brought to me there, and cost me forty cents a day; service was thirty cents more, so that for a dollar and ninety cents a day I abode and breakfasted over the heads of the princes.

My other meals I procured outside, at one restaurant and another. Usually I was accompanied by a friend—so charming a woman that a dinner of herbs graced by her presence would have seemed a banquet. We tried all sorts of experiments in dining, and when two people dine together in Paris it can really be managed, very economically, even at a grand restaurant. You call for one portion of each of the dishes you desire, and one portion is always quite enough for two. Then there are cozy little places where they give you dejeuners and diners at a fixed price, fifty cents for the breakfast and sixty for 'the dinner being the ordinary charge. Your breakfast, for fifty cents, consists of sardines, or radishes and bread and butter, to begin with; then you have nicely-cooked fish; then steak or chop or cutlet, with a little dessert of fruit and a half bottle of simple red wine for drink. Your dinner, for sixty cents, will begin with soup; then you will have fish, some kind of meat, roast chicken and salad, concluding with fruit, and accompanied by the little bottle of red wine. These dinners are perfectly well cooked, and suited to the requirements of a slender purse, and from them you can go on and up to any extent of luxury. At the table d'hôte of the Grand Hotel you dine sumptuously for one dollar and sixty cents, including vin ordinaire; while at some of the best restaurants you can easily spend from ten to twenty dollars for your dinner.

One night I had to go out for my six-o'clock dinner without my friend, and it occurred to me to seek out a new place, and try a little experiment of my own. I walked up the Rue St Honoré till I came to a quiet looking café. It seemed a very simple place, so homely as to commend itself to my investigations. I went in. The carte du jour was handed to me, with no prices affixed to the viands. I gave my orders with unsuspicious and tranquil mind, and while I waited for my soup I chanced to open a book in which the price list was given, and I found that the soupe à la bisque I had ordered in this modest place was sixty cents, and other things in proportion. I went away a poorer and a wiser woman.

The very streets of Paris are full of interest, the interest of a life as unlike as possible to that of either England or America. You meet a French funeral, and you see a modest hearse, and perhaps a carriage or two, with a band of mourners following on foot and bareheaded, however cold may be the weather. As the procession passes every man lifts his hat and waits, uncovered and reverently, until it passes. In England you meet a funeral cortège, and the external trappings of its woe are overwhelming. From the corners of the great, cumbrous hearse nod lofty sable plumes. The horses look as if they had come out of some strange world of night and darkness. They are great creatures "of the blackest black our eyes endure," without a white hair anywhere; and they move with preternatural gravity, as horses should whose daily work it is to make "Funeral marches to the grave."

The drivers and the men sitting beside them are clad in the deepest mourning. Their hats are swathed round with bombazine, which falls down their backs like a woman's mourning veil. But here their solemnity ends; They wear a cheerful air, as if rejoicing that business is prosperous; and I have seen them joke and laugh with each other, as if they might have been telling good stories of the dead they were carrying to his long home. As to the English crowd through which this gloomy-looking procession passes, not a hat is lifted, no notice is taken of it whatever.

There is another imposing vehicle which dominates the French streets besides the hearse. I refer to the omnibus, which attracts the attention of fear and dismay, rather than of sympathy. French omnibuses are drawn by three strong horses, harnessed abreast, and they tear on through the streets at an incredible pace, like an army bent on destruction and charging at double quick. I do not think a French omnibus ever yet halted on its fatal course for man, woman or child. All you can do is to get out of its way, and that you must do very hurriedly. I never see one without fancying that it is the European revival of the Car of Juggernaut.

But the French people seem, in spite of the omnibuses, to live and prosper and grow fat—oh, how fat they do grow when they pass middle life, especially the women! They are a light-hearted people, as a whole, though in the faces of some of the men there is a solemn gloom, as if they were longing for the red days of the revolution to return. But this very sullenness is unlike the brutal, hopeless sullenness of the English lowest class—those hideous, bleared, sodden wretches who stand leaning up against the walls of the big-windowed "Publics." These English have no hope—save for more gin—no intention to struggle, no longing to rise, no vestige of self-respect. The sullenest French bore respects himself, even unduly, and believes that he is good enough to adorn a palace. These men in blouses crowd before the windows of picture shops when any good thing is on exhibition with as eager an interest as you feel yourself. They appreciate art, these French roturiers, as the Germans do music. They have one supreme love, however, and that is Paris.

And after awhile you begin to understand this passion. You walk through the Garden of the Tuileries, populous with Coustons's statues; you hear the gay out-of-door music; you see the sunset on the Seine; the evening lights flash out in arches and in clusters on the Champs Élysées, and the little bird begins to sing in your brain that sings forever and forever, "How beautiful is Paris!" and, however far away you go, his song will lure you back, and each time your pretty, perilous Paris will hold you in her toils more firmly than before.

PERIOD II—CHAPTER VI.

THE winter advances; Christmas comes; comes, as it not infrequently now comes to the world's greatest city, in an almost total darkness; a choking yellow darkness. The gas has to be lit at ten o'clock in the morning. Drearly it flares, from the imperceptible dawn until the indiscriminated night. Under its and the fog's pestilent breaths the flowers in the stands wither; the carefully-cherished puny ferns shrink away into death. Through the suffocating obscurity the church-bells ring muffled; the cabs crawl cautiously at a foot's pace, and the omnibuses cease to run. None of the Churchill family have been able to get to church; and either by that fact or by the fog, their spirits and tempers are sensibly worsened.

Mrs. Churchill likes to go to church on Christmas Day; it is a sort of fetish, the loss of which may entail disadvantage upon her, either in this world or in the next.

"How anything short of absolute necessity can keep any one in England during the winter months, passes my comprehension!" cries she, taking up her old cry, and pettishly clicking together the clasps of the prayer-book, in which she has been reading the lessons for the day.

Sarah, her only companion, makes no reply; not that she is absorbed in any occupation, but because the remark appears to her to be both old and worthless.

"And I am far from feeling sure that we shall ever get away after all," continues the elder woman, seeing that she may wait in vain for a sympathetic response.

"I feel no sort of confidence in Belinda," in an exasperated voice; "she is quite capable of throwing him over at the last moment. What do you think? do you not hear that I am speaking to you? do you not think that she is quite capable of throwing him over at the last moment?"

"It shall not be for want of asking if she does not," replies Sarah surlily.

"I really do not see that you have any right to put pressure upon her," rejoins Mrs. Churchill crossly; "I cannot see that it is any business of yours; because you behaved extremely ill to him, is no reason why you should incite your sister to do the same. In fairness to him, I must insist upon your not attempting to influence her one way or the other!"

"You may insist," replies Sarah undutifully, her soft round face growing dogged and hard; "but as long as I have one breath left, I shall spend it in trying to hinder her from such a monstrous suicide."

"Suicide!" repeats Mrs. Churchill angrily; "pooh! you may be very thankful if you ever get any one to make as good a settlement upon you as he has done upon her! Suicide indeed!"

"Why do you not marry him yourself, if you are so pleased with him?" asks Sarah cynically; "it seems all one to him which of us he marries, so as he gets one of the family; it seems to be the breed, not the individual, that he admires. Marry him yourself, and carry him off to Cannes; I assure you that I will not move a finger to prevent you!"

"He is a man not without distinction in his own line," pursues Mrs. Churchill, affecting not to have heard her granddaughter's last ironical suggestion; "though it happens to be a line which you are quite incapable of appreciating. He is not handsome, certainly, but there is a good deal of—of," hesitating for an encomium—"of character in his face. He has made an excellent settlement upon her; it quite took me by surprise. She is twenty-one, and it is her first bond-fide offer; I think you will not be acting at all a friend's part in making her quarrel with her bread-and-butter."

"Whether I am acting the part of a friend or not," retorts Sarah obstinately, marching towards the door, "I promise you that I shall carry my remonstrances to the altar-foot; and so would you if you did your duty. You may like to know," firing a defiant parting shot from the doorway, "that I am going straight to her now to resume the subject."

She is as good as her word. She finds Belinda where she knew that she would find her, in her little back sitting-room, but not employed as she had expected. She had thought to come upon her stooping over her eternal copy-books; but for once they are laid aside. She is sitting on the hearthrug, the gas glaring above her and casting its ugly shadows upon her cheeks, making them look lined and hollow. Strewn about her is a small litter of old writing-desks, old work-boxes, childish relics. On her lap lies open a morocco pocket-book, over which, on Sarah's entrance, she hastily puts her hands, as if to conceal it.

"I am setting my house in order," she says, looking up with a rather guilty smile. "Did you ever see such a squirrel's nest? Here is the case of court-plaster that you gave me on my eighth birthday. Do you remember how fond we were of giving each other court-plaster? Here is the lady's companion that granny brought me from Bath; I remember crying because she brought you a much better one. Even as long ago as then," looking pensively at the little rusty old pair of scissors and the dim bodkin, "it began."

"What were you looking at when I came in?" asks Sarah brusquely, and dropping on her knees beside her sister.

Belinda starts. Her first impulse is to clasp her hands in still closer guardianship over her hid treasure; but her next corrects it.

"You are quite welcome to see them once more, before they go into the fire," she says quietly, though in the yellow gaslight her cheeks crimson. "I do not know why I should hide them; they are relics of an affection almost as warm and as steady as granny's. There!" picking up and holding scornfully between her finger and thumb for Sarah's inspection one withered flower after another. "That was once a gardenia; that was a Cape jessamine; that was a tuberose. How pretty they look! how sweetly they smell now! Have you looked enough at them? Off with them then!"

As she speaks, and despite Sarah's hand stretched out with involuntary eagerness to check her, she tosses the little dry skeletons into the fire, where, with a hardly perceptible shrivel and crackle, they for ever disappear.

Belinda watches them with a hard, dry eye.

"Are you satisfied?" she says, turning to her sister and exhibiting the pocket-book extended, empty from cover to cover. "There is nothing else in it except my love-letter; it is humiliating to have but one, is it not? Would you like to read it again before it follows those pretty flowers, or may it go at once?"

"Give it me!" cries Sarah, snatching the little sheet, which looks older than it really is from obvious hard wear, continual unfolding, blistering tears. "I will read it again. Perhaps reading it in cold blood like this, the meaning may strike one differently!"

"If you wish I can spare you the trouble," says Belinda bitterly. "I can say it to you if you wish."

The fire burns low and dull; and Sarah rises and stands right beneath the gas, so that no lack of light may hinder her examination of the document in her hand. But the rays of a June sun would be in this case of no use.

"I can make nothing of it," she says dispiritedly, giving it back to its owner; "but do not—do not burn it!"

For a moment Belinda hesitates, considering with quivering eyelids and trembling lip the small and faded paper. Then in a moment it has followed the flowers.

At first it gives a curling writhe, as if it hurt it to be burnt; then one or two sentences come out very clear before flying in black film up the chimney. The one that lasts longest and disappears latest is, "Oh, forgive me!"

After that there is silence. Sarah has dropped sulkily into an arm-chair; and Belinda has turned again to her childish treasures, and is beginning to sort and part them. But her hands move mechanically of their own accord, and with that want of purpose which shows that they are not directed by the brain.

When a quarter of an hour has gone dumbly by, Belinda speaks, in that flat and spiritless voice which is now habitual to her:

"I wanted to ask your advice; I want you to give me your opinion. Is it necessary—am I bound in honor to tell Professor Forth?"

She stops with a sudden sobbing catch in her breath.

"If you think that your confidence will be in the least likely to make him break his engagement, tell him by all means!" replies Sarah surlily. "Not only tell him what there is to tell, but invent a great deal more besides. I promise you that I will aid you with all the powers of my imagination!"

"Must I really tell him?" groans Belinda, with an accent of such acute pain that Sarah's heart smites her.

"Tell him!" she cries compassionately. "My poor child, what is there to tell?"

"What indeed!" acquiesces Belinda, in bitter humility. But she looks relieved. "Even if there were anything to tell," she goes on a moment later—"but, as you justly say, there is nothing, for one is not answerable to any one for the freaks of one's own imagination—but even if there were, he has no concern with my past, has he? It is only from the tenth of next month onwards that I am accountable to him for my actions!"

"The tenth of next month!" repeats Sarah fiercely, "What, is that still the day on which the gallows is to be erected?"

"If you think that by wording it so offensively, you will induce me to put it off, you are mistaken," answers Belinda, with an access of miserable, sore ill-humor; "and you know the sooner I am 'out of the way'—I am always in the way now—the sooner you can be off to the South!"

"Save your sneers for granny, who deserves them," answers Sarah, genuinely hurt. "I do not."

"I know you do not!" cries the other remorsefully; "but you were the nearest thing to me. It seems, nowadays, as if I must put my sting into whatever is nearest to me!"

"That is the right frame of mind in which to be led to the gal—to the altar, is it not?" retorts Sarah sarcastically; and again they are silent.

"I now wish to heaven," resumes Sarah devoutly, at the expiration of a heavy interval, "that I had married him myself. Intensely as I should have disliked it, he could not have made me as unhappy as he will you. A wineglass holds less than a hogshead; and the pious hope of an early widowhood, which you will be too conscientious to indulge, would have buoyed me up!"

Belinda's only answer is a sickly smile.

"You would have gone on living with granny and the dogs," pursues Sarah, in earnest narrative; "she would have grown civil to you when she found that she had no one else to depend on, and she really is very good company when she chooses; and by-and-by, some fine day, Rivers might have come back. No, no!" resolutely catching and holding down with her small, strong wrists the hands that her sister is hurrying to her tortured face. "I do not care whether you wince or no! I do not care whether it hurts you or no; you must and shall hear. Some day—Rivers—might—have come back again! He may come back still; but it may be after the tenth of January.

She pauses dramatically, and fixes her eyes upon the poor quivering features, so barely exposed to her piercing scrutiny. There comes no answer but a moaning sigh.

"I can give you no reason for it," continues Sarah; "I know no more about him than you do; but I have a conviction—something tells me, that there has been some mistake, some hitch, some unavoidable delay!"

"An unavoidable delay of eighteen months!" says Belinda, with faltering irony. "How likely!"

"A letter has been lost."

"Letters are never lost," hopelessly.

"Well, have it as you like!" cries Sarah impatiently. "All the same, my conviction remains that some day he will come back again. How glad you will be to see him! How pleasant it will be for you to introduce him to your husband, Mr. Forth!"

By a great wrench, Belinda succeeds in loosing one hand; but it is a very insufficient shield, and she has failed in liberating the other, so sturdily held in Sarah's small but potent grasp.

"I see him coming into the room with those blazing eyes of his," goes on Sarah, in a sort of prophetic frenzy—"they were not much like Mr. Forth's eyes, were they?—and you introducing them to each other: 'My husband, Mr. Forth! Mr. Rivers!' I envy you that moment!"

But at this Belinda tears herself free.

"This is too much!" she says, in a suffocated voice, and struggling to reach the door. "Let me go! I must go! I can bear no more."

But Sarah falls on her knees, and catches her sister's gown.

"Do you think it is as bad as the reality will be?" she asks, in a thrilling clear voice. "And you will not be able to run away from it! Do you suppose that there will be a single corner in the whole earth in which you can take refuge from it?"

Something in Sarah's tone has, more than her detaining gesture, arrested Belinda's flight. Stock-still she stands, in a wretched irresolution, death-pale.

"It is too late!" she murmurs miserably.

"It is not too late!" cries Sarah in wild excitement, clasping her sister's knees; it will be too late after the tenth, but it is not too late now. Give it up! Throw him over! What will he care? What harm will it do him? How much the worse is he for having been thrown over by me?"

Belinda still stands, white and trembling, her eyes staring stonily out into vacancy. Before them, though they seem to see nothing, stands that dreadful vision conjured up by her sister; and the sight of it makes every limb shake.

"It is impossible!" she says feebly.

"It is not impossible!" asseverates Sarah, in passionate heat. "Give me a chance, and I will show you whether it is possible or no. Let me tell him. Give me that commission as my Christmas-box; it would be the best I ever had! I will tell him," laughing rather hysterically, "that it is a constitutional peculiarity of our family!"

Perhaps it is Sarah's laugh that recalls her sister to a more normal condition of feeling. With a long sigh she comes back to reality.

"Who would tell granny?" she asks, with a sarcastic smile. "Who would dare break to her that she was not to be robbed of her darling after all?"

"I would!" cries Sarah, with delighted eagerness. I know few things in the world that would give me a purer pleasure. Let me go now, at once! Strike while the iron is hot!" jumping up, and moving in her turn rapidly toward the door. But it is now Belinda who detains her.

"Pooh!" she says coldly; "it was only a flight of fancy on my part. It would be amusing to give her a fright; but she has no real cause for alarm. What change has happened that I should change?" in a lifeless tone. "Your word-painting was so vivid, that for one moment I thought he had come back; but it seems not. I think," with a bitter smile, "that if I waited for him to come back to me, I should wait my life long."

"I do not ask you to wait your life long," cries Sarah, redoubling that energy of persuasion which, as she disappointedly sees, has been hitherto exercised in vain. "I only ask you to wait one month! Surely," with a scathing sneer, "the joys that you expect are not so poignant but that you can afford to defer them for four weeks!"

"Why should I defer them?" asks Belinda, with a fierce restlessness in eye and gesture. "If I had had my will, I should have been married by now. It is this state of transition which is worst of all; one is unhinged; one is off one's balance."

Sarah has again fallen down on the floor before her sister, and is again suppliantly clasping her knees.

"One month! one month!" she cries beseechingly. "And before the month is out, you may be down on your knees as I am, thanking God and me for having saved you from perdition. One month! one month!"

She has pressed her head against her sister's gown, and through the woollen stuff her tears are soaking—Sarah's rare tears!

There is such a compelling ring in her voice that Belinda's cold, sick heart throbs beneath it. Again that vision rises before her, but changed and beautified. Rivers is coming into the room, but between him and her there thrusts itself no chill, pedant figure.

As she so stands hesitating, thrilling, in a waking dream, the door of the room does in effect fly open, and some one enters. Is it Rivers? Alas, no!

"A merry Christmas to you!" bawls Miss Watson, noisily entering, and throwing her greeting at them like a paving-stone. "I have just been up to wish granny a merry Christmas, but she does not seem very bright, eh? Do you think she is breaking at all? She did not seem up to her usual mark!"

Sarah has sprung to her feet, her habitual aplomb gone, and her one impulse to hide, at any price, her tear-stained face from the horny eyes of the intruder.

"Why, you do not look very bright either!" cries the latter, looking inquisitively from one to the other of the girls' dismal faces. What is it? Christmas bills? Colds? You look as if you had a cold!" concentrating her whole attention upon Sarah, whose face is so little used to being inundated with tears that it resents it, and shows the traces more plainly than does one that is frequently bewept.

"I have," she answers, snatching eagerly at the excuse, and violently resuming a part of her usual nonchalant self-command; "a terrific cold. I have had it for—for years! If I were you, I would not come near me, or I shall give it you as soon as look at you!"

"Pooh!" replies Miss Watson doughtily. "You should take a cold bath all the year round, and wear flannel next your skin. Look at me!"

"Are you the result of taking a cold bath all the year round, and wearing flannel next the skin?" asks Sarah innocently, stealing a covert glance at her own foggy image in the little Chippendale mirror over the mantel-piece, to see how far she is recovered.

But Miss Watson does not hear.

"I am sure I do not know how I ever got here!" continues she, drawing up a chair to the fire, and setting her large feet on the fender; "there is not a cab to be had. I felt my way all round Berkeley Square by the railings. Five or six times I was as nearly as possible run over!"

"Just heavens, why not quite?" murmurs Sarah under her breath.

"I never remember such a Christmas Day; do you ever remember such a Christmas Day? I have just been asking granny whether in all her long experience, she ever remembers such a Christmas Day."

"If you have been appealing to granny's long experience," rejoins Sarah sarcastically, "no wonder you did not find her very bright; there is nothing in the world that she hates so much."

"I told her how ill I thought her looking," goes on the visitor comfortably, rubbing her knees, advanced in close proximity to the fire; "she tells me that it is the climate; that it is killing her by inches. She seems to have her heart set upon going to the Riviera; why does she not go?" with another look of acute inquisitiveness darted at her two companions. "She spoke of there being some tiresome hitch—something in the way; what is it—eh?"

"We cannot bear to go so far away from you," replies Sarah impudently, but with a nervous laugh and look toward her sister; "that is it."

But a curiosity so robust as Miss Watson's is not to be blunted by a jest. That great Toledo blade is not to be turned aside by a light rapier.

"No question of £ s. d., eh?" says she persistently; "the Riviera grows dearer every year! No? Anything about either of you then?" trying to get a better idea of Belinda than the rather drooped nape of her white neck and one homespun shoulder afford; "any little—little entanglement, eh?"

"You have hit it!" cries Sarah jeeringly; "it is useless to try and conceal anything from you: we are endeavoring to arrange a marriage between me and the Archbishop of Canterbury; and as he cannot conveniently leave his see, we think it as well that I should remain in the neighborhood."

It is obvious that nothing is to be made of Sarah; the visitor turns her attention toward the other sister.

"Any more Latin exercises, Belinda?" she asks in a rallying voice; "has Professor Forth been helping you to do any more Latin exercises? does he often come? do you see much of him? does he ever ask you to go down to Oxbridge, eh?"

To these questions Belinda's answer is so unready that her junior has again to come to her aid.

"Of course," she answers ironically; "but he says he will not have us, unless we bring you too."

"As to that," replies Miss Watson, her rhinoceros-hide quite unpunctured by the pricks of this angry persiflage, "I can tell you I have a very good mind to take a run down there. What do you say to our making up a party? we would make him give us luncheon and take us about; they are always delighted to give one luncheon and take one about; and if we can get hold of Rivers, we will make him come too."

She looks triumphantly round to collect the suffrages of her companions as to this project; but neither is equal to giving utterance to any opinion upon it.

"Apropos of Rivers," continues the other, too happy in the sound of her own voice to miss the lacking response, and addressing the observation more especially to Belinda, "a very odd thing happened to me. I had not gone five yards from your house the other day, before I met him. I asked him at once whether he was on his way to call upon you."

"And he said what?" asks Sarah, trying to speak lightly, but with a hurry in her voice that she cannot still.

"He said 'No.'"

"That answer had at least the merit of brevity," replies Sarah, laughing forcedly and changing her position so as to interpose the slight bulwark of her girlish figure between her sister and their guest.

"I asked him why not. I said 'Do go; they expect you.'"

"That did not show a rigorous attention to truth on your part," rejoins Sarah sharply: "we did not expect him. But what did he say to that? was his answer marked by the same courteous diffuseness as before?"

"He did not say anything; he walked on very fast and hailed a hansom; but I should not wonder if he did come after all," consolingly. "I called out to him just as he was driving off, to be sure not to forget. Is that the luncheon-bell? Dear me! how the morning has run away! I suppose," with her loud assured laugh, "that you will give me a slice of beef and plum pudding, will you not, eh?"

CHAPTER VII.

AFTER that Christmas morning Sarah spends her eloquence in vain. She may draw what pictures and practice what oratory and cry what tears she chooses. Of what use is it to draw pictures for, or address appeals to, or weep tears over a stone? And as far as any malleability or power of receiving impressions from without goes, Belinda is henceforth a stone. She accepts all her sister's appeals in a sullen dogged silence. Whether she ever even hears them, Sarah is ignorant. She gives no sign of having done so by any least emotion produced by them. She listens, or seems to listen, with phlegmatic indifference to the sarcasms, vituperations, witticisms, poured from Sarah's cornucopia upon her future husband. They awake in her neither anger nor pain. She makes no effort to check them. Apparently she would as soon hear them as not. But at the end of them, when Sarah, from pure loss of breath—not, heaven knows, from any lack of good-will!—has paused, things are at precisely the same point as they were when she began.

Beaten and discouraged, she desists at last. Not indeed that she ever constrains herself so far as to omit tacking on some abusive adjective to the name of her future brother-in-law whenever she has occasion to mention him. Nor is it until she has exhausted every possible expletive as far as she knows the English language, and applied them not only to him, but to his mother, that she desists at all. She relieves her feelings by putting all the dogs into mourning, tying a piece of black crape round each of their tails; a proceeding which fills Punch with fury, Pug with mauvaise honte, and Jane with pride. Jane has that love for finery which is implanted in many plain persons.

With a face set like a flint, Belinda marches to her doom. And neither dogs nor men can retard the approach of the date of that doom. There are no preparations to delay it. She has steadfastly adhered to her determination to have no new clothes.

"A willful woman will have her way!" Mrs. Churchill says, shaking that head whose eyes seem to grow brighter and her cheeks pinker and smoother as each day brings her nearer to the tenth of January and the South of France. "I suppose you know your own affairs best; and I fancy that you will not have much need for dress at Oxbridge; the only time that I was there I thought all the women shockingly fagotté."

She stops and shrugs her shoulders at the recollection; but even as she shrugs a smile hovers across her lips. She is thinking that her French tour will be none the worse for having her purse made heavier by the weight of Belinda's corbeille.

"I am too annoyed about Belinda," she says on another occasion to her younger granddaughter; "but you know how useless argument is! She is as obstinate as a mule; and since she has determined to be no expense to me, I was thinking," her eye lightening, "of getting one or two things for ourselves: I should not wonder if, after all, I might manage to let you have that plush cloak trimmed with fisher-tails that you asked me for at Cécile's the other day. Come! what do you say?" tapping her cheek with an air of fond friskiness.

"I say that I will not have it!" replies Sarah doggedly; "it is blood-money!"

The settlements are drawn up. Belinda's widowhood and her younger children are provided for. Bought are license and ring. The latter Professor Forth brought one day to be tried on; and Belinda, with white, shut lips, pallidly essayed it. There is no bustle of arriving parcels, no wedding presents to be displayed. Miss Churchill has sternly insisted upon an absolute secrecy being observed as regards her engagement. She can bear to be married, but gifts and congratulations upon her marriage she could not bear. So that the comers and goers to the little house in — Street still come and go, without suspicion that anything out of the ordinary course is brewing beneath its modest roof.

Mrs. Churchill would have preferred that the betrothal should be proclaimed from the housetops. It would give it a body and solidity that just at first she fears it lacks. An engagement known to all the world is much more difficult of rupture than one to which only the three or four persons most nearly concerned are privy.

"Belinda is so odd and crotchety," she says one afternoon, as she and Sarah are driving home through the Park together; "why, if she is in earnest, should she object to people being told? Do you think there would be any harm in my just giving a hint of it to the Crawfords, and Dalzells, and Lady Hunt, and—and just our own intimates? They will be so hurt at being left out in the cold; and I am sure that they would give her something handsome. Even if she does not care for personal ornaments, they might give her plate; I do not suppose," with an amused smile, "that there is likely to be much plate in the Forth family!"

"And you think," retorts Sarah, with a fiery eye and a curling lip, "that the more people you tell about it the more Belinda will be nailed to keeping it! Do you think that, after all these years, I do not understand you?"

The elder woman looks rather foolish, and does not repeat her suggestion.

And now, indeed, all necessity for it is at an end. There is obviously no need to tie Belinda with the cords of convention and public opinion to her fagot and stake. The tenth of January has come, and she has yet shown no sign of flinching. To insure the greater privacy the marriage is to take place at nine o'clock in the morning. Not a soul is bidden to it. There are no bridesmaids or groomsmen, no train of wedding guests.

Even Mrs. Churchill, on hearing of the earliness of the hour, has, like those wedding guests that Scripture speaks of, begged to be excused. Perhaps it is not only the raw winter morning from which she shrinks. Perhaps she is not particularly anxious to be an ocular witness of that ceremony which she has certainly speeded with her prayers.

"I hope you do not think it unkind of me, my child," she says, appearing at her dressing-room door in a pretty laced dressing-gown as she hears her granddaughter descending the stairs to the brougham; "but you know what a London church is, and you know what my neuralgia is. How nice you look!" smilingly surveying the dark, homespun suit, so dark and brown as in the shabby light to look quite black, and the rigidly plain close bonnet which her granddaughter has chosen for her wedding garments.

Belinda smiles too—a smile of which her grandmother is not particularly fond of thinking afterward.

"Yes, do I not?" she says—"so like a bride!"

"In point of fact," continues the old lady rather hurriedly, and not much relishing the tone of this acquiescence in her compliment, "I shall be far more useful at home; I shall insure the house being thoroughly well warmed for you when you come back; you shall find roaring fires in every room!"

"We shall not come back," replies Belinda quietly.

"Not come back?" (with an accent of extreme surprise). "You are going abroad then?"

"No; but there is nothing to come back for."

"And whose fault is that, pray?" asks her grandmother with an uncomfortable laugh. "If I had had my way, there would have been plenty to come back for: a good breakfast; a score of people; speeches!"

"But that was not my way," replies Belinda, again faintly smiling; "and as you say sometimes, tous les goûts sont respectables. I am afraid that I shall be late if I delay any longer; good-by, granny."

She speaks the two last words quite gently and friendly, and holds out her fair cold cheek to be kissed. Mrs. Churchill is afterwards not much fonder of thinking of the feel of that cheek, than of the look of that smile before spoken of—it was as of the dead.

And meanwhile, through the dismal morning streets, dirty with that worst of all dirtiness, dirty snow, and where the lamp-lighters have only just put out the lamps, and would have done better not to put them out at all, Belinda drives, her sister by her side. The angry tears are raining down Sarah's face, encouraged rather than checked by their owner. In her small warm hands (for even on a bitter January morning wrath is warming) lie tightly clasped Belinda's cold ones. The shop-boys are only just beginning to take down the shutters; in the haberdashers' undressed windows, instead of costly fabrics and dainty webs, are to be seen nothing but bare boards and skeleton stands. The blue-armed housemaids are scrubbing the door-steps; through the squares the milk-carts rush.

"I wish you would cry," says Sarah presently, from among her sobs.

"Why should I?" replies Belinda calmly; "it is my own doing."

"That is the worst of it!" cries Sarah passionately; "if you were doing it for some great cause—to save granny from the workhouse, or me from the scaffold—there would be some sense in it! there is no sense now!"

There is no sense in it! The words keep echoing, dancing—set to a teasing tune—in Belinda's head for the rest of the way. They reach the church-door. The carriage stops.

"We have got to the gallows, it seems!" says Sarah, with a fresh burst of sobs, then, vehemently wringing her sister's hands, she cries desperately: "Belinda! it is not too late yet! there is still time! it is not too late yet to go back!"

"I have no wish to go back," replies Belinda firmly, though her voice is low and weak, and her lips are white; "why should I wish to go back, when it is my own doing?"

So they get out. At the door they are received by a Churchill cousin, who, summoned as Belinda's nearest male relative to give her away, stands awaiting them, cross and shivering.

"Has he come? is he here? I do not see him!" says Sarah, with a last flare up of hope, peering eagerly into the church, where here and there (only here and there, for they are not nearly all lit) a gas-lamp displays its dreary yellow flicker on the background of thick morning fog. "Yes?"—then with a sudden collapse into disappointment—"then he has not had a paralytic stroke at the last moment, worse luck!"

They walk up the aisle; a snuffy old pew-opener in a black crape bonnet preceding them; Belinda on her cousin's arm; Sarah, in her ostentatiously paraded grief, bringing up the rear. They have arrived at the altar, the candles upon which are lit, their wavering light falling upon an impatient clergyman and two elderly men; for the bridegroom has brought with him a friend of his own age and calling, whom he has summoned from Oxbridge to support him. The Churchill cousin has never before seen the bridegroom, nor has the bridegroom's friend ever before seen the bride. The opposing parties now stare at each other in unaffected astonishment. All through the service, the young Churchill, who had once himself thrown out feelers in the direction of Belinda, and had them civilly and firmly at once returned to him, is setting himself angrily in imagination by the side of the bridegroom, and wondering what the devil Belinda can have seen in this ugly old curmudgeon to prefer to himself.

All through the service, the bridegroom's supporter is staring in gaping wonder at the beautiful broken-hearted-looking girl, who has mysteriously elected to unite her fate with that of his old friend; ruefully reflecting that she will bring certain death to the constitutional, and the pipes, and the discussions on the Enclitic de, and such-like light subjects, which they have been in the habit of sharing for the best part of the last forty years. All through the service the bridegroom is peevishly glancing over his shoulder to see whence comes the draught of raw air that, despite the black velvet skull-cap with which he has furnished himself, he feels at baleful play about his ears. Belinda alone, looks neither to the right nor to the left. If she were really the statue which her fair, still body so closely resembles, she could not be less conscious than she is of dank nipping air or curious look. She appears to listen with close attention, or is it indeed not attention, but the impassiveness of stone? Only once through all the service does her face come to life; and then it is stabbed into life, as one has heard in the grisly dissecting-room tale, of him who, thought dead, was brought back to agonizing momentary life by a knife-thrust! The knife-thrust that brings Belinda back to life lies in the words, "Forsaking all other, keep thee only unto him so long as ye both shall live."

"Forsaking all other!" She has been spared the trouble of forsaking that other. Has he not been beforehand with her? Has he not forsaken her?

Sarah, closely watching her, sees her ashy features contract in such a spasm of mortal pain, that she involuntarily starts forward. Is she going to faint? If she faint, and is carried out of church, may she not be saved even yet? She is not yet married! The service is not yet ended! But the next glance at her face dispels the momentary hope. Belinda is not going to faint; she has gained back her rigidity. She is dead again.

It is over now; over—even to the signing of names in the vestry. The clergyman offers his congratulations, but he does it hastily and abstractedly. He is thinking whether he will have time for a good warming and breakfasting before setting off for the funeral at Kensal Green, at which he has to assist. The bridegroom's friend and the Churchill cousin also offer theirs; but those of the first sound incredulous, and those of the latter ironical. Sarah alone keeps utter silence. The brougham stands at the door, the horse fidgety and stung by the cold. A crossing-sweeper and two pinched street children are watching the strange wedding party's exit. The bridegroom, great-coated and comfortered to the end of his long nose, is bidding adieu to his ally. The bride turns to her sister:

"It is done now!" she says pantingly; "there is no going back from it now!"

"None!" replies Sarah dully.

"Say something to me, Sarah; wish me something good!"

She has flung her arms round her sister in an épanchement most unusual with her. Her icy cheek is hard pressed against her sister's hot and tear-reddened one.

"I wish you—I wish you—" cries Sarah, stammering, what between her sobs, the almost ungovernable impulse to invoke upon her sister a speedy widowhood, and the hopelessness of finding any other wish that will not sound—mockery.

"You—you cannot find anything to wish me!" says Belinda tremulously. "You are right; there is nothing."

"I—I wish you," says Sarah, driven to desperation by this tone, and clinging convulsively to her sister as though ten bridegrooms should not force them apart—"I wish you many happy returns of the day!" breaking into an hysterical laugh. "That is ambiguous. I may attach what meaning I choose to it."

These are the last words Belinda Forth hears, before the brougham whirls her away. The Churchill cousin takes Sarah home in a hansom, and a very unpleasant drive he has, as she cries violently the whole way, in passionate self-reproach at having found nothing kinder to say.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

A CHANGE OF BASE.

THE time had come when he who should untie the Gordian knot of slavery was to appear. Thousands of the best and bravest had grappled with the problem in vain. Many a gallant knight had graven "Liberty" upon his helm only to find himself sooner or later doing battle for slavery. The high and the low had been baffled. What seemed at the beginning an insoluble enigma had grown daily more intricate and difficult. Slavery, which had grown from a little speck to cover half the political horizon, had from the first falsified all theories. Instead of dying it had flourished; instead of losing strength it had gained power; instead of yielding to the sentiment of the world it openly defied it. It ruled not only the states where it existed, but those which fattened on its results. The great industries of the North consumed its raw material and supplied its demand for manufactured articles and bowed to its behests. Cotton was king, and slavery was the suzerain of cotton. In pride, in power, in wealth, it had grown with every decade stronger and stronger, until now it seemed that the nation was under its absolute control. The sentiment of the North had grown year by year more pronounced, and the opposition to slavery more and more determined, yet the way to its extirpation seemed hourly to grow more difficult, and the desired end to be farther and farther away. Before the wave of sentiment uprose forever the barrier of the Constitution. The fundamental law of the nation's life stood between slavery and the onslaught of its foes. Amendment in the manner prescribed was hopeless. Around or behind this instrument there seemed to be no feasible method of going. To trample it under foot was to destroy the nation based upon it. The life of the Republic was pledged for the life of slavery. "The irrepressible conflict" still held on its triumphant way in the hearts of the American people, but none could see any way to victory. Some there were who demanded the forcible removal of the obstacle. One man who had not ceased to declare for many years that only blood could wash away the evil was preparing to make good his prophecy. He looked forward to a day when the slave should win his way to freedom by force. There were many who agreed with him that there was no other method. Some listened to his plans and vaguely indorsed his designs. To many they were partially disclosed, but none knew their details. He had one thought only: slavery must be destroyed. He cared little for the Constitution, or the nation builded thereon.

Laws, customs and institutions were nothing to him; only the men who were subject to them were sacred in his eyes. For him the universe held but two facts—God, who created all things, and man, made in His image. That slavery was an evil was all he needed to know. That it was doomed to destruction was, by the mere fact of its unholiness, rendered certain beyond question to his mind. How it should be destroyed he did not know—he did not care. That men should die in compassing its destruction he did not doubt; whether one or ten or millions it mattered not. He counted liberty as part of the revealed Word, which he devoutly believed, and to him it was of infinitely less moment that men should die than that its lightest syllable should fail. So, too, while he lived for humanity, he thought it far better that a nation or a race even should perish from the face of the earth than that they should live to suffer wrong. Righteousness and wrong were his two abstractions. To overcome the one was to do the other. He regarded the nation only as a means for achieving a specific end. If the end was not completely achieved he thought the instrument should be at once discarded. On the plains of Kansas, in the swamps of the South, among the snows of the Adirondacks, and in the mountains of Virginia, he thought of but one thing—how he might redeem the slave from the wrong of servitude. Without selfishness or malice or greed, hating with undying bitterness the sin of slavery, he could see no obstacle in the way of liberation of the slaves, except the insincerity and inertness of the people. John Brown represented one extreme of thought. Few even of those who agreed with him had the courage and self-denial to adopt the methods he espoused. He represented the sentiment of the most active and ultra portion of the anti-slavery element. The destruction of slavery at once and at all hazards was their controlling motive. These people had done the better portion of the work of awakening public sentiment upon this question. They were the pioneers without being the leaders of popular belief. There was little need, at the time of which we write, of laboring to convince the Northern masses of the desirability of the result they desired to accomplish. How to obtain it without overthrowing the national fabric was the sole question.

It is a strange fact, and shows a queer phase of our American character, that many of those who were willing to violate the statute law in aiding the fugitive slave, who would even imperil life and liberty in securing for the bondman the means to escape, and were ready to defend and protect him in such unlawful acts, no sooner perceived that a movement involved the subversion of the Constitution, or actual defiance of its authority, than they at once refused all connection therewith. They were willing to violate the law—to become felons, perhaps, but they could not contemplate with composure the abrogation of the great contract that constitutes the charter of our liberties. Of these there were very many. It mattered not how deep their conviction of the right of liberty and the evil of slavery, they were ready to endure the evil a while longer rather than antagonize the basis principles of our Constitution by assailing the citadel of the state's right, within which slavery was entrenched. This was the feeling of the great mass of the people. The fanatics, who were ready and willing to do and dare anything, were few, very few, in comparison. It was evident that only an absolute conviction of the direst necessity for such a course would induce the American people even to put itself on guard against the institution of slavery. To move against it openly was regarded as treason; to combine against it secretly was accounted sedition.

Besides all this, and after all that could be said, no matter how deep their abhorrence might be, there were very many people of the North who excused their inaction by the declaration:

"It is not a matter for us to consider. The sin of Slavery does not lie at our doors, nor the danger. The institution belongs to the South. Our hands are clean. If they desire to invite the curse it must entail, well and good. We cannot hinder them."

Many strove to overthrow this delusion and prove that every man of the North was, morally, at least, responsible for the act of his fellow-citizen of the South. But in this they made little progress, as it seemed, until there came one to whose homely sentences the people listened as if he spake by inspiration. So clear and cogent were his reasons that no one gave him credit for uttering any new truths. They seemed so plain and simple that the dullest listener conceived that he only heard a re-statement of his own thought. He was a man born of the people, as are all in whom the spirit of the Deliverer dwells. From Mary's son till now the Messianic spirit has ever appeared beneath the lowliest lintel. The Deliverer comes always from the plain. The middle class—above the abject poor, and below the soul-dwarfed rich—is that which gives the world the men that overturn its institutions, relieve its people from the bondage of their past and open the gateway of the future. The greatest of our mighty men was one who stood among us in such simple guise that even those who sat at meat with him dreamed not of his greatness.

By birthright he was of the South, and, as such, cursed by its destiny. Father and mother, smitten by poverty and ignorance, dwelt in the shadow of the Kentucky "knobs." The destiny of the "poor-white" brooded over their united lives. Slavery which made few rich and many poor counted them among its victims. The shame which passed by the slave because of his irresponsibility, lighted on the freeman, compelled, like him, to toil. So that labor became a badge of degradation; and need, which elsewhere was the spur to increased endeavor, there became only a whip to sting and to debase. Labor was degenerated into a badge of servitude—the mark of a subverted manhood. Only idleness was honorable. He whose hand was forced to toil for self-support was kindred to the slave and even less esteemed. Even the slave's contempt was visited on such. "Poor-white!" How the name stuck and stung and dragged downwards! What a world of humiliation in its two syllables! Commiseration, contempt—despair! "White trash!" Expressive synonym! The fringe of a race of princes! The débris of a people whose prerogative it was to rule, and whose distinctive privilege it was to be served by another. It was a sad estate, full of shame and self-abasement, and all the more degrading because their only pride lay in the fact that they were allied in blood to the class who ruled and condemned them. Such was the genesis of the Deliverer. The poor-white birthmark was his sole inheritance.

Yet not in his own person did he feel this degradation. Across the narrow river that skirts "the dark and bloody ground" upon the Northward, a younger sister state, with a happier destiny, had been established. His Bethlehem was on the Sangamon. Yet the brand of the "poor-white" was stamped upon his soul. Poverty and ignorance and hopelessness rocked his cradle. Laughter and tears were strangely mingled in his nature. Little by little he came to know himself. More than thirty years he served before he knew that he had a mission to perform. He was always a dreamer. He did not fast in the desert nor flee to the caverns for inspiration; but the forest and the stream and the prairie—silence and solitude and distance—nourished the dream of power, revealed to him himself. He had few books and no teachers. Man and nature were the volumes which he read most easily and studied most assiduously.

He was not profoundly versed in the lore of the past, but the facts of the present were indelibly stamped upon his mind. His philosophy was direct and simple. He did not waste time in elaborating systems for the future or reasons for the past. How things came to be as they were he was at no trouble to explain. What should be the ultimate outcome of the mixture of good and evil which we call life, he gave little thought to determining. The duty of the present and its relations to the nearer future he perceived with the utmost clearness.

The accident of stature first opened the way to leadership. The desire to be foremost spurred him to renewed exertion. Slowly he awoke to the knowledge of power. Uncultured of mind and uncouth of speech, none looked to him for a leadership in thought. Yet his words were like winged arrows. He used the simple dialect of the people, and spoke directly to their hearts.

The peril of the near future rested like a shadow upon his life. To him the nation was the sum of all excellence. Flaws in it were like spots in the sunshine. He revered the Constitution no less than its most devoted worshipper. To him it was the guarantee of all that made liberty desirable. He hated slavery as an enemy of the dominant race. He felt himself wronged through generations by its blight. It was not pity for the slave that moved him to oppose the system, so much as dread of the system itself and its paralyzing and debasing effects upon every grade of society exposed to its influence. He felt its injustice, not merely to those who served without reward, but also to those who, by its influence, were shut out of the struggle of life—the fair competition for its rewards.

He did not profess to be more profoundly versed in the philosophy and history of this question than others. On the contrary, in this respect he followed gladly where others led. He seconded rather than directed in any considerable degree the efforts to awaken interest in the character of slavery and to combine the people of the North in philanthropic movements in behalf of the slaves. Justice rather than pity marked his attitude toward them. By the most fanatical he was even regarded as lukewarm in the cause of which he was destined to become the one immortal leader and exemplar. He was no impassioned advocate of mercy. It was not his mission to deal with the philosophy of the primary cause or resultant effects of social movements. The function reserved to him was to perceive with unequalled clearness the consequence of admitted facts, to impress them upon the popular heart as no one else had ever done, and then to find a way to avoid the peril that impended. Sprung from the people, his reverence for their will and belief in their ultimate decision were so great that he was sometimes deemed a demagogue. He was not one, however, that bowed to the half-formed will of the masses, but one who sought to bring them up to his own conviction—not with reproaches and sneers, not with arrogance and scorn, but with unceasing humility, a never-failing good temper, and a familiarity and sincerity of statement that in the end always won his way to the popular heart. As a philanthropist he was inferior to thousands; as a student of the facts of history and politics he was easily distanced by scores of his contemporaries; as a fervid and impassioned orator he was excelled by many; but as one who realized the peril of the hour and had power to make the voice of the people in very truth the voice of God, he was easily foremost. In capacity to devise a way of escape from peril, and to lead the people willingly and gladly along the narrow path by which alone safety was possible, he was unapproached by any man of his day.

The party representing the anti-slavery idea, which had been based on the declaration that "the repression of slavery" was desirable, recoiled from its first conflict with the slave-power less demoralized by defeat than amazed at the near approach to victory which it had accomplished. Yet this result had been achieved, as we have already shown, more by the accidental co-operation of discordant elements than by the harmonious action of a consolidated and homogeneous party. No sooner had it demonstrated its power than incongruous elements began to develop within it. Not only the strife of ambitious leaders, but the radical divergence of factions animated by mutually antagonistic impulses, promised not merely to prevent a complete and stable organization, but also to render futile all hope of future victory. What was needed was a mordant that should cause all these factions to adhere to a common purpose—to remain faithful to a common end. This solvent of hostile ideas was first obtained when the uncouth backwoodsman was chosen by his party associates to represent them and uphold the principles of the yet inchoate party in an oratorical conflict with the subtlest, strongest, ablest of the champions of state sovereignty and the peculiar institution which flourished under its protection. All unconscious that his words were the master-key of the situation, Abraham Lincoln rose at once from an obscurity which is all the more remarkable because it contained no appreciable hint of the eminence that awaited him, to the very front rank of his age, when he put forth as the basis of the momentous struggle in which he was about to engage this proposition:

"A house divided against itself cannot stand . . . The American nation must be all free or all slave."

On that issue the battle was joined anew. From that hour the conflict was waged on no other ground. The most fanatical and the most conservative elements of the free state civilization met here upon a common level. Thenceforward Abraham Lincoln was the unquestioned leader of the movement for the overthrow of slavery—the generalissimo of all the forces mustering for its destruction. For the first time a means had been found to harmonize all differences of sentiment and secure the utmost unity of purpose and action on the part of all who were opposed to the "peculiar institution," which held in its degrading touch one half the land, and threatened with its demoralizing influences the other moiety. The great dilemma—"all free or all slave"—stared the American people in the face as the unavoidable fact of the near future. To the people of the North it came like a revelation sustained by irrefragable proofs. The disruption of the treaty which the slave-power had itself proposed; the seizure of Kansas through the co-operation of the established government; the Fugitive Slave law, and the aggressions upon personal liberty thereunder, all pointed to the dilemma which this clear-sighted child of the people placed before them for consideration. It needed no argument and admitted of no hesitation. There was but one question: If free or slave, which? In every man's consciousness it became a ceaseless refrain. To the objection that nothing could be done except through a violation of the Constitution, there was but one answer: "Free or slave?" There was in this no attack upon the "compact made between the states," or "the sacred pledge which the fathers gave." It was no appeal to a "higher law," and yet there was no farther room for the excuse: "It is no concern of ours." "Mason and Dixon's line" was no longer the boundary of evil consequences resulting from slavery. "All free or all slave" stood at the threshold of every Northern home, and compelled father, brother and son to decide upon the dread alternative before they crossed the lintel. All who regarded slavery as an evil, an injustice or a sin were by this one thought marshaled under the banner of this new leader. From this text he never swerved.

Undoubtedly the contest between Lincoln and Douglas was the most momentous oratorical struggle that ever occurred. Both men were firm believers in the views they advocated, and each represented a new idea. The one idea was a subtle evasion, a specious makeshift, designed to avoid apparent objection to the extension of slavery, and, under the guise of absolute impartiality to all parties, sections and ideas, to render possible its peaceful establishment on the plains of the West. It was a measure which no Southern champion of slavery could ever have devised. It was noteworthy for its subtle appreciation of the spirit and genius of the North. As a piece of mere political shrewdness it is almost without a parallel in history. Those in whose behalf it was conceived and put forth could only half appreciate its specious strength. Against argument it stood well-nigh impregnable. The distinctions on which it was based were so subtle, its discriminations were so keen, that it was hardly susceptible of popular refutation, except from the standpoint of its consequences. But the proposition which Mr. Lincoln put forth, while offering the most perfect possible reply to the theory of "squatter sovereignty," was also one which put not only the expounder of that doctrine but even the man who was merely tolerant of slavery, on his defense. It was at once a parry and a thrust. It was like a turn of the wrist of the expert swordsman. It seemed so easy that we forgot the power, the skill, the intellect that lay behind its elucidation and its application. It set over against the perils of slavery the blessings of liberty. Through the dread of slavery it impelled, and by the love of liberty it induced co-operation in any movement that should most readily and easily destroy the one and establish the other. It was a trumpet-call that mustered at once all the forces of liberty against the life of slavery.

From that moment all else in the struggle of parties was forgotten. Whether the whole land should be free or slave was the only question worthy of consideration—an issue that overbore all minor differences. The South recognized it as the summons to the last great battle. They perceived the power of the new leader even before his own associates became aware of it. To the latter he was known simply as a valiant soldier who had met the champion of slavery on his chosen field, and in the face of assured defeat had planted deeply and securely the seeds of ultimate victory. They thought of him only as one who, single-handed and alone, had won from the enemy an important stronghold. The chiefs in the anti-slavery movement had no thought of acknowledging him as their leader. Seward and Sumner and Wæde and Greeley and Chase and Giddings and Gerrit Smith and Wendell Phillips, and a hundred more almost, would have laughed at the idea of this uncouth child of the prairie stepping up before them and occupying, before all the world and for all time, unquestioned pre-eminence as "the great Emancipator." Even now the especial admirers of each are fond of putting their names before that of the unpretentious giant of the Sangamon country as leaders in the great anti-slavery conflict. But the force of a blow must be judged by its results, and the power of the man who gives it by the ease with which it is delivered. Judged by this rule, Abraham Lincoln established an unquestioned right to the foremost place as a leader when by a single sentence he made victory not only possible but inevitable—fused a thousand discordant motives into one, and brought the anti-slavery struggle down from the domain of humanitarian theory to the level of tangible universal interest. He discovered nothing, but he transmuted weakness into power.

The South, with surer prescience, saw its enemy afar off. It recognized the master-stroke aimed at the corner-stone instead of the outworks of the citadel. It perceived in him the leader of the grand assault upon the position which slavery occupied, and stubbornly refused to credit any denial that was made of the purpose of those who stood with him; when, shortly afterward, he was made the head of the party organization, they did not hesitate to consider it a declaration of war against their pet institution. And they were right thus far at least. Abraham Lincoln was chosen to be President because the Republican party had determined to do all that might be done, without actual violation of the Constitution, to destroy slavery. To deny that fact is to re-echo a quibble which, while it might not be reprehensible in a heated controversy, is unworthy the attention of the student of a mighty revolution. It was from an impulse of self-defense therefore, that the press and politicians of the South leveled their batteries of invective, of ridicule, of infamy against him, in the vain hope of destroying him before his power was understood and appreciated by his friends. So the great, kindly, pure-hearted Saul became a "monster," a "baboon," a "clown," a "beast"—all that was infamous and foul, and remains such to this day to many thousands to whom his life was a most beneficent providence. In nothing did his greatness show more clearly than in the fact that nothing provoked him to anger, and he made answer to no aspersion. Unflinching in his devotion to the principle that liberty and slavery could not co-exist, unswerving in his faith in the wisdom and fidelity of the people, he trod alone the pathway which his genius first discerned, along dizzy heights, through fateful fens, in the darkness and in the light; never going too fast to enable the whole people to follow his course, and never moving too slow when once assured of the support which was necessary to success; undaunted by fear and unblinded by ambition, until the end was reached and his work was accomplished. Slavery avenged itself through him. The child of the "poor-white" of the Kentucky knobs liberated not the slave only, but those whom the slave had been made the instrument to degrade. Not Emancipator only, but Liberator, will he be hailed when the centuries look back upon him.

It has become the fashion in these later days to look upon Lincoln as the accident of an accident rather than as the man of the age—the greatest of all who have borne the name American. Little souls who came near his great life—who viewed his nature as the insect scans the bark of the oak along the rugate surface of which he creeps, with a self-satisfied contempt of the rude strength and solid core that lies within—have been winning for themselves a sort of immortality and an infinitude of contempt by trying to paint the man whose perfections they could never apprehend. Our literature has been overrun with a horde of puny drivellers made purblind by the glory of a life whose light was so serene and steady that they counted it but a reflection of the lurid conflict amid which he lived. It was not because one man schemed or another paltered that Abraham Lincoln came to the leadership of the hosts of freedom. Neither was it through the merit of any or all of his advisers that he succeeded in accomplishing the task set before him, but chiefly through his own consummate genius and unmatched power. It was not luck but intellect that brought him from obscurity to the forefront of the greatest movement in history. The men who stood beside him were pigmies in practical power when compared with him. He was so great that he needed no padding, and was careless of his fame. As he came from the people so he left himself fearlessly in their hands. It has been customary, while admitting his prudence, sagacity and self-control, to depreciate his intellectual power. The change of position which he effected by a single phrase, was so easily done and seemed so evident when once put forth, that few have stopped to think that the intellect of Sumner, the prophetic grasp of Seward, the foresight of Chase and the brain of a thousand others who seemed his compeers, had been hitherto utterly unable to formulate a common ground of opposition to slavery, which should commend itself to the mind and conscience of the people. He alone, of all the men of that time, had the sagacity to discover the key of the position, to unite all the discordant elements in the attack upon it, and to hold them up to the conflict until the victory was won. By that thought he fused all the discordant elements into one. It was one of those strokes of power which mark the highest genius. By this alone he would have established his claim to rank as much above his associates in intellect as he is admitted to have stood, in sagacity, devotion and self-forgetfulness. Standing on a level with the lowliest, he towered conspicuous above the greatest. Those who saw the apparent ease with which he achieved these results only half realized his greatness. Their regard was dissipated by a thousand insignificant details. Only the future can properly estimate the brain that consolidated the opposition to slavery, held the nation to the work of putting down rebellion, and called his cabinet together only to consider the wording of a proclamation that was to change the status of a race forever. He bestrode our land like a Colossus, all unconscious of his own power, frankly esteeming others at their just value—incapable of detraction or envy, and trusting his fame, with a magnificent unconcern as to the result, to the future. Pure, simple, unassuming, kindly, touched with sadness and relieved with mirth, but never stained with falsehood or treachery, or any hint of shameful act; his heart as tender as his life was grand; a little child in simplicity, a saint in purity, a king in power. Child of the sadly smitten South; nursling of the favored North; giant of the great West—his life was the richest fruitage of the liberty he loved! His name is the topmost which a continent has given unto fame!

GENERAL FEATHERSTONHAUGH AND HIS MASK.

BY WILLIAM M. BAKER

GENERAL ADOLPHUS MACPHERSON FEATHERSTONHAUGH would have been fully justified had his name been thrice as long and as loud. He was over six feet high, and was broad of shoulders, far-reaching of arms, of symmetrical expanse and vigor in every sense. Not merely was his head of the largest dimensions; his sandy red hair was of a luxuriant growth, which was the despair of every bald-headed man who saw him, and he would have rejoiced in a beard of the most patriarchal downpour if it had not been almost an article of his creed to shave himself as closely as might be every morning of his thoroughly regulated life. It was his use to shake hands if he met you a dozen times a day, and it was almost as good as a fur-lined glove to have him take your diminutive hand in his of a cold day, so large it was and so warm. There was always a rich, almost purple health in his magnificent breadth of countenance, and nothing was in more perfect keeping with his sumptuousness of size than were the deep organ tones of his voice, whose every depth, height, modulation, inflection, had been most affectionately cultivated.

For the General was an orator. Early in life he had published a volume on elocution, and it was his delight to revise and improve it as, year after year, it passed through successive editions, a yet larger and fuller lengthed likeness of himself as the frontispiece of each. I cannot truthfully say that there was much originality or suggestiveness of thought in any of the many discourses delivered by him. As to his words, you might as well try to quote Niagara; and it was yet harder to try, after, let us say, a Fourth of July oration, to recall any thought therefrom. "It is very stupid of me," you were apt to say, "for it was a splendid effort; but I cannot remember a thing he said."

The truth is, there are differences among public speakers, and when an orator gives himself so sedulously and successfully to the curve of his gestures, the expansion of his palms in persuasion, the rhythmic periods, the diversified peals of a voice such as his, one can have no time or care for anything else.

"Upon this most eventful recurrence of the natal day, ever glorious, of our national independence, what spirit so deteriorated, so abjectly bent toward the nadir of all that we appreciate as coming within the boundaries of the sublimest verities of our Western Hemisphere, but must bid the advent hail of that most epochal hour in the roll of centuries, the lapse of Æons." How often have I looked up at the majestic speaker, and striven to seize and hold the nebulous meaning of what he was so earnestly endeavoring to say. It was the best part of a temperance occasion, of the coming to our city of a distinguished Kossuth of one kind or another, of a political assembly, of the laying of the foundation-stone of a public building, to see the General rise, as he always did, to make the address. A committee would as soon have done without the Stars and Stripes, without the brass band, as without General Adolphus Macpherson Featherstonhaugh.

"I think he looks best in black broadcloth and with a white tie," was the remark of the old people.

"You do? We," the young ladies would cry, "like him best in his regalia as a Free Mason. Oh, but isn't he grand then! What a pity it is not usual for a Knight Templar to speak with his hat on—the gorgeous feathers would go so well with the General's way of saying things!"

But he had this advantage over other public men. It is but now and then that they can make a speech, whereas I never saw the General that he did not have on the robes and wig, so to speak, of an advocate. It was great good luck if you met him coming up street when you had a country cousin by your side, some stranger from elsewhere. "Who is that?" was always demanded of you on the first sight of your distinguished fellow-citizen as he drew near, carefully dressed, as was his wont, with kid gloves, well-blackened boots, snowy linen, plentiful watch-chain across his white vest, his gold-headed cane in his hand. Except that your companion was apt to be a little nervous under the ordeal, it was the event of his stay in town—the introduction and subsequent conversation; it gave one an idea of how it feels to be presented to an emperor.

But it was not conversation, if the interview lasted not over five minutes—it was that much of an oration. Lounging in the hall of a hotel; coming upon him in the throng of a store; listening to him during the stay at table of a dinner party, and when he stood in the parlor afterward, with his back to the fire, whatever he said was that much of a discourse. He laid down the law to patient, physician, nurses, during his ten minutes in a sick chamber, and the modulation of his thunder to the hour and the area was as good as a scrap of oratorio. I have come upon him when he was buying a paper of a newsboy of a bitterly cold morning on a windy street corner; I have heard him directing his man to carry a message; once I chanced on him as he was arguing the proper pay for cleaning the snow from his sidewalk with a red-nosed and ragged tramp; on another occasion I passed by when he was remonstrating at his back-gate in mid-summer with the driver of an odoriferous swill-wagon—the General was, in every instance, delivering rounded periods, with suitable gesture, ore-rotund accents, and all that belongs to an oration. His habitual language was as different from common talk as is classic Chinese from the vernacular, as was the Euphuistic jargon of the days of the Stuarts from Anglo-Saxon, as is the delicacy of an esthetic conversazione from the slang of the Bowery.

"I have read of the Man with the Iron Mask," one of the General's friends said to me one day; "but I really know as little about him, although I have known him all my life, as I do about that mysterious state prisoner. He has so draped himself from head to foot in the voluminous silk gown of an advocate. He eats in it, is sick and well, sits still or goes abroad, sleeps in it. It reminds me of Thackeray's cruel picture of Louis Le Grand, which was so folded that the mere lifting of a leaf from off this most majestic monarch Europe ever knew revealed, you remember, beneath flowing wig and royal robes, the pitiful scarecrow of an infirm granddaddy, weazen and tottering. Strip the General of his mannerism, and what is left?"

"We have all of us laughed," I replied, "at Hawthorne's story of the old witch who made an effigy of a man out of a pumpkin, a few sticks and an old suit of clothes stuffed with straw, breathed into him the breath of life, and sent him forth upon the tour of the world as a millionaire, a scientist, a successful lover. So of the General—"

But I was silenced by a universal outcry, which I stilled with uplifted hand to add, "You are right to object, but I did not mean to say that Hawthorne's heartless, soulless manikin was a correct representation of our excellent friend. That he is merely a moving mannerism is not the whole story; we are all agreed that a more generous, honorable, high-spirited, pure-minded, chivalrous gentleman, and in every best sense, does not exist. With all his affectation he is sterling gold; if he is the grandest humbug alive, he is also the most innocent, a very child at heart, and there is not a man of us but highly esteems even while we see through him. People smile at each other furtively as he goes by, with a bow and a wave of his hand, even while they acknowledge that, for the life of them, they cannot say why he is the person of distinction he so evidently believes himself to be. When you turn away from listening to him for half an hour or so, the man who has witnessed the interview is sure to greet you with a broad grin upon his face. All the time we are as proud of him as can be—for his essential goodness, but no human being can point to anything of value he has ever said or done. If no man is more laughed at than General Adolphus Macpherson Featherstonhaugh, no one is so loved."

The General was a lawyer in tolerable practice; was often defeated for Legislature and Congress by some sharp, smart, alert man who bore the same likeness to his opponent during the canvass that one of Drake's little vessels did to the four-storied Spanish galleons which it first annoyed and then demolished.

But no one could tell how he managed to live, so small was his income, so fine was his linen and broadcloth, so ever fresh were his hat, boots, gloves and the bit of a bouquet he invariably wore in season upon the lapel of his well-brushed coat. He drank with strict moderation, never gambled, never raced or traded in horseflesh, bought and sold no mining shares, and was such an irrevocable old bachelor as delights the souls of the scores of necessitous nephews and nieces which such an old bachelor is sure to have. Chancing to own a modest little red brick house in the suburbs of the city, he made it his home, a peculiarly homely old lady acting as his housekeeper. Who could be so genial, in his way, as the General, when, that is, you met him on the streets or in society? Yet no visitor could ever induce his door-bell to ring; or, if it did, no one ever heard it within; certainly it was never answered.

"There is a frightful story running the rounds," it was remarked in a knot of the General's lady friends one afternoon, "about his domestic affairs. A prying Mr. Smith, who passes the General's house to and from business every morning and evening, has fallen into the habit of peeping in at the basement windows as he goes by. Sometimes he walks of nights on the other side of the street, on purpose to see what he can of what is going on in the upper rooms. He says that he distinctly saw his neighbor seated on the side of his bed—just to think of such a thing in such a man!—actually darning his socks! What a pity he has not got a wife!"

The ladies laughed, but Mrs. Van Dorn, the lady who made the sad announcement, did not, and looked at her friends with surprise, not to say rebuke. She was a widow under forty, rich, plump, very charitable. Had she been more beautiful she too might have been as frivolous as those who could see only matter of amusement in such a man as the General being constrained to do such a thing.

"Why don't you marry him?" came now in chorus upon her ears. She was not so wealthy for nothing.

"There are some things," she said, "upon which I do not wish to be joked," and soon after she left, the ladies opening eyes of wonder behind her; and oh, the comparison of views which followed!

General Featherstonhaugh had long been aware of the admiration in which he was held by the lady—was a frequent visitor at her handsome house. Now, as an orator, he was equally eloquent upon any and every theme—politics, patriotism, masonry, temperance, art; because, having no definite conviction in regard to any of them, an address from him was of the nature of a purple haze, which could be interpreted in any way you pleased. That was how it came about when, in Mrs. Van Dorn's parlor after this, he went off into that memorable disquisition of his upon the general topic of woman, home, mutual affection. It never occurred to him that the widow was his only hearer, or that it was a dangerous thing for him to indulge just then and there in what he had laid down in his book on elocution and in practice as the most effective form of rhetoric, especially when one has reached his peroration—the placing himself in the centre of all he describes, though it be in centuries long past, yet to come, wholly foreign to him in every way. It was so now. Dwelling at dangerous length upon the wretchedness of man apart from woman, he exclaimed at last, and without a thought beyond his eloquence, standing before her as she sat lost in admiration:

"And is it thus with me—ah, woful me! Excluded, alas! from the one Eden left us, the Eden of home"—hands clasped together, eyes fixed upon emptiness—"I behold myself doomed, doomed"—deep and sorrowful bass—"to wander abroad solitary, abandoned, alone, sighing, Speed thee, wretch"—both hands thrown out—"among the arid absences of her whose smile illumines the world! Now, now, alas! unto whom can I turn in my unalleviated anguish? Is there a woman—?"

Of course I cannot give the exact words. What I do know is that, lost in his purely rhetorical fervors, his eyes moistened, his tones thrilling himself as well as his single hearer, his voice sinking in a measured cadence as he proceeded, he was suddenly interrupted by Mrs. Van Dorn:

"General," she said, standing before him, her tearful eyes upon the carpet, "you have said enough—more than enough! If you will take me, here I am with all I have—" and much more. So smitten was the orator in the midst of his lofty rhetoric that for a moment he lost his voice; but his ghastly pallor and the first recovery of his breath in the words, "Great heavens! madam—" might have disenchanted her, but that a visitor coming in at the instant prevented it. And, in a word, the General was too much of a gentleman to undeceive the delighted widow.

They are married. The conundrum thereafter among the General's friends was twofold: Will she, after the honeymoon, undeceive her husband, herself undeceived, and so send away his oratorical drapery? If so, what—good heavens!—will be left of him? Never! General Adolphus Macpherson Featherstonhaugh has such confirmation in his wife that he is, if possible, more magnificent than before. The mask is upon soul as well as upon body; and in whatever world he may hereafter abide he must forever and ever be as we have known him here. But those who people that blessed world will like him none the less.

Even to his lawful wife the General still remains a hero.

THE HOUSEHOLD—AN OPEN LETTER FROM MRS. BLOSSOM.

"A DISGUSTING subject? I know it; but it isn't half as disgusting to talk it over and find if there be any way of escape. There isn't I know, unless the American nation can be reconstructed; and there is where the anguish comes in, for, of course, it began with the grandfathers, or with their grandfathers even; and equally of course, like the other things one doesn't like, is unconscious cerebration, or something as powerful and unaccountable and generally disagreeable. I wonder if the Pilgrim Fathers did it? They must have done, for one of their direct descendants lives next door, and has a sugar-bowl and cream-jug that drive one wild, they are so authentic and delightful, and make all the modern silver seem so unmeaning. But then when I look away from them, and see at the corner of their carved oak mantelpiece the inevitable horror, and not only there, but all over the house, there is nothing to do but feel sure that he isn't altogether to blame, and that heredity must be at the bottom of it.

"It just occurs to me that you may wonder a little what I am talking about, but I have thought it all over so long that it seems as if you must know by instinct. And it puzzled me so, that at last I went into Dr. Underhill's when I knew he was out, and asked Mrs. Underhill what was the best and in-every-way-most-to-be-trusted anatomy. And she said I could take Gray or a big French in three volumes, with the finest plates ever made; but what did I want them for? And so I told her how I had worried over it, and how it seemed to me there must be a difference, and I never should know till I had seen with my own eyes into both kinds of mouths—that is, a man's mouth and a woman's mouth. I should want letters two inches high to express the astonishment she put into her 'Why?'

"And so I told her that I had been a week in Washington, which really is so beautiful that it does seem just frightfully incongruous to see these great boxes wherever you go, and to feel so ashamed when the foreigners look disgusted or just smile in that abominably tolerant and forgiving way that makes one enraged for one's country and countrymen and everything else, and yet not a word to say, because it's all true and more. And then, as it happened, every seat in the parlor-cars was taken, and I rode half-way from Washington to Philadelphia in the everyday one, which had very few passengers. But three seats ahead was a man, so magnificent to look at that it was really difficult not to look too much, simply because he had the head and shoulders of—I won't say an Apollo—but of a man not only handsome, but strong and fine and noble-looking—a man anybody would turn to who wanted help or was in trouble. On the other side was a lady with a little boy, ten years old perhaps, and a delicate, fragile-looking child. I watched him, as I do all children, and he was watching this big, splendid man, who was doing something, I couldn't exactly tell what, that gave his head a constrained position. I found out sooner than I wished, for he turned slightly, and then—imagine the abomination of it!—I saw that he was spitting at a mark!! He was near the coal-box! He took aim! He fired at an ornament in the middle, and he hit it every time! I shut my eyes, but they would open. There was a horrible fascination in watching. The awful pool grew, and ran out toward the aisle. Ladies coming it at way-stations walked over or in it as it happened. And then the child began and labored with his small might to make his contribution, till I grew sick and half-frantic. His mother was reading, but at last she looked up, after an unusual effort on the child's part, and said:

"'I wish you didn't love to spit so, Ernest dear.'

"'He does it. Gentlemen always do it,' the child said.

"'I know it, dear, but I don't think it's pretty,' the mother said, and was lost again in her novel. It seemed to me something ought to be said; and at last, as the child went for some water, there was a real opportunity, for the mother looked up and saw me looking at him, and half smiled. It was easy then to say, 'What a delicate little fellow he is,' and at once she began to tell me what he had suffered from indigestion, though they had studied all about foods, and tried to do the wise thing for him. So I told her about 'The Spitters' Dyspepsia,' and how any one might spit till there was an abnormal secretion, and all the force that ought to go in helping digestion was just spit away. She was astonished, and I told her my authorities; and then she said, of course, there must be some difference in the mouths of men and women, and did I know what? I didn't. One never does know little common things that ought to be plain as A B C, but I said I could find out and let her know for the child's sake.

"And that is the reason I wanted the anatomy, and Mrs. Underhill told the doctor, and he came in to talk it over, and said it was a very serious question that every mother ought to understand fully, for every confirmed spitter, if he did not have dyspepsia, did have weakened vitality and other troubles, and that there was neither sense nor reason nor decency in the habit. Cuspidores are very ornamental, but it's a shame to any one to have to own them; and, as for Washington and the horrible sawdust boxes in all the beautiful places, it is simply frightful to think that they must be, because the only use of a floor to the average North American, particularly the North American politician, is something to spit on! Write about it! Talk about it! Do anything that will help to make people think; and, above all, tell everybody that mouths are all alike, and that if a man spits there is no reason why a woman should not, at home and abroad."

This voice from one thinking woman is really the voice of all, but we are ready for other words from other quarters.

HELEN CAMPBELL.

ARE political associations constitutional which call themselves "German-Republican" clubs or "Irish-Democratic" ward associations, or anything, in short, that recognizes alien ties of an un-American origin? A decision from the Supreme Court on this question would not be at all beneath the dignity of that august body. It does not seem to occur to the average immigrant that on assuming allegiance to the United States he ceases to be a citizen of the fatherland. As soon as he can count a respectable number of compatriots he demands representation in the councils of the town, city, county, state or nation; and, if he does not get satisfaction in that way, he organizes, so that the combined votes of himself and his countrymen may be cast in favor of that party which promises the most substantial political prizes. This is all wrong, but it is not very often that a public man has the courage to say so. The recently-elected mayor of New York, however, deserves credit for having given some very wholesome advice to a German delegation which waited upon him and asked for a share in the patronage of his office. The mayor told his visitors, in substance, that they need only look for recognition from him as Americans. As Germans they were entitled to no consideration whatever. In a city which, like New York, is largely governed by the foreign population—meaning Irishmen—the public officer who takes such a stand may count safely upon a deal of unpopularity among those whose un-American combinations for political purposes he refuses to recognize. That such exalted sentiments should come within the comprehension of Patrick or Hans is more than any public functionary ought to expect. This particular officer, moreover, Democrat as he is, has recently appointed to a confidential position a very "stalwart" Republican, and this fact will not be altogether acceptable in the eyes of his constituents. The position taken by the mayor is sound, however, and if all politicians would follow his example the word "naturalization" would soon mean far more than it does at present.

SEVENTH sons of seventh sons, and seventh daughters "in the same ratio likewise," seem to have the way to fortune made easy for them, provided they are capable of inspiring faith. Perhaps this power is one of the characteristics of these gifted persons, unless, indeed, there are seventh children of seventh children who, so to speak, hide their respective lights under convenient bushels. At all events enough of them are extant to justify a very considerable amount of liberal advertising, and no one need search far without learning of alleged miraculous cures effected by these natural astrologers or whatever they may be called. Strange to say, the medical faculty does not seem disposed to recognize the healing powers of such irregular practitioners; but their failure to do so has small effect, so long as a paying constituency exists which thinks otherwise, and persists in getting rid of its bodily ailments through an interview with a seventh child. Simple faith is a wonderful curative agent, and the medical faculty aforesaid is somewhat blameworthy in that it does not more honestly follow the plain indications of nature in this regard. Most physicians will admit in weak moments of confidence that they occasionally prescribe "bread pills" or other equally harmless remedies, and with good effect; and it is well known how, early in the present century, "Perkins' tractors" cured thousands of patients, as there is ample evidence to show. Does not all this point most emphatically to the imagination as a remedial agent? and why should the faculty so persistently ignore it? They all admit that faith on the part of the patient is an essential element of successful treatment; but beyond such paltry concessions as bread pills or distilled water with a dash of bitterness in it, they all refuse to go. In the remarkable case of Perkins' tractors just referred to, it was a regular physician who made a pair of imitation wooden tractors, and effected cures by their aid just as the original Perkins did with his metallic instrument. What need was there that he should thereupon expose the whole business as a fraud? Why could he not have let the cures go on as long as they would? Within a few years past so many thousand cripples have been cured by a pilgrimage to "Our Lady of Lourdes," that their discarded crutches make a lofty monument before the altar of the church which their gratefully-contributed mites have combined to raise. What cured them, if they were cured? Why, faith, of course—otherwise termed imagination; and if it was really effective, blessed be such faith say we! No doubt seventh sons and most patent medicines are, in themselves humbugs; but somehow people are brought to believe in them, and, if they are not really cured, at least think that they are. Perhaps the time will come when an enlightened professional standard will permit more than it now does a resort to nature's own remedy—the imagination—a dose of which is surely far easier to take than are prescriptions duly compounded by our unimaginative friends, the druggists.

STATISTICS regarding the influence of forests on the rainfall and on floods are as yet in a somewhat inchoate and unsatisfactory condition. The great freshets which a month ago were devastating the Ohio watershed are not altogether unprecedented. Nearly two generations ago there was a flood which almost or quite reached the high-water mark registered the present season. At that time, of course, the area of forest was largely in excess of that which exists at present, and it is held by those who are indifferent to preservative forestry that the occurrence of a tremendous flood at that early day proves that the forests are not trustworthy preventives of such disasters. The argument, of course, fails for lack of proof that the floods of 1832 would not have been far greater had the forests been cleared off then as they are now. Whatever may eventually turn out to be the truth regarding the great valleys of the West, the influence of forest growth on the water supply of comparatively limited tracts in the East is well established. The State of New York, through its Legislature, has recently taken steps looking to the preservation of the wooded mountain ranges about the headwaters of the Mohawk and Hudson Rivers—the Adirondack region, that is—which speaks well for the energy and wisdom of the gentlemen who have interested themselves in the matter. It is not generally known that land which has for centuries been covered by forests of fir and spruce becomes covered to a depth of several feet with a spongy substance, composed of the resinous twigs and leaves of the forest. This becomes saturated with water during the autumnal rains and freezes during the winter. Its non-conducting character acts as does the sawdust packing of an ice-house, and during the drought of the dog-days the streams flowing out of the spruce woods are often nearly as full and cold as in early spring. Whatever may be thought of the expediency of preserving sanitariums and hunting-grounds for the use of those who have the leisure and means to enjoy them, there can be no question about the policy of preserving the water-supply. There may be two sides to the Niagara question; but there is no room for doubt as to the natural reservoirs of fresh water. The Creator planted His paradise of evergreens on land which is for the most part unfit for cultivation, and at the same time invaluable as the source of the whole fluvial system of the continent. Any legislation looking to the preservation of these vast storehouses will entitle its originator to the gratitude of "millions yet to be." We are advancing slowly, but it is hoped surely, toward a wise system of forestry, state and national, and it may be reasonably hoped that before many years the present wholesale destruction of our wood-lands will be under reasonable control.

WE are indebted to a subscriber for calling attention to one of our advertisements, which was of a matter entirely undeserving of confidence or approval. Of course, THE CONTINENT is likely to be deceived in regard to an advertiser's merits as well as any one else. In this instance, our business manager, in accordance with our general rule, obtained a report from a source on which we supposed we could rely as to the character of the concern. By this report we were misled, and so accepted the advertisement. Though, perhaps, not worse than many things which are advertised in nearly all our leading journals, it is not such as we care to lay before the readers of THE CONTINENT. The advertisement was therefore promptly discontinued. We do not specify it more particularly, because we do not wish to call any attention to it. We assure our readers that we shall use all possible care to exclude everything of the sort from our columns.

THE two bulky volumes¹ in which Mr. Williams gives the result of a labor far beyond his original conception or plan, are the most notable addition not only to the literature of his subject, but to real history, that the year has afforded. The extraordinary calmness and dispassionateness with which facts are presented sets it above any mere history of the negro from the slavery point of view. It is not the story of the slave that he seeks to tell, but of the race; and though it is as slaves that they must be first considered, their steady progress and share in the evolution of our republican system is his chief consideration. The work began in 1876, with a Fourth of July oration on "The American Negro," in the preparation of which he discovered so much valuable historical material that he determined at once to shape it into some comprehensive form. His plans were made with excellent judgment, and carried out with vigor and real literary skill. The first part of the opening volume is in some points the weakest portion of the work, so far as his explanation of the curse of Canaan is concerned, and it may be said here that the religious aspect of the question forms the least agreeable portion of the book. But his argument against those who put the negro outside of the human family is a powerful and unanswerable one, and the demonstration of his susceptibility to civilization and Christianity equally so.

The colonial history of the race is given in thirteen chapters, and as one reads the bare and simple statements of injustice, outrage and cruelty, it is well nigh incredible that such acts came from men who were themselves sacrificing everything for liberty. North and South went hand-in-hand, and Massachusetts was as guilty as Virginia. The "almost infinite labor" which Mr. Williams affirms has been spent in preparing this portion is by no means wasted, for he is able to back every statement with citations from colonial records, and presents an array of appalling facts that would seem incredible save for just such authorities. But he tells the truth with no bitterness. The whole is accepted as inevitable, and described with a pathetic and simple dignity that wins him profound respect and sympathy. His descriptions of the negro as a soldier in all our wars is full of interest. We are familiar with their Rebellion record, and accounted for their unexpected bravery and trustworthiness by the fact that they had everything to stimulate; but the same spirit ruled in earlier days, when no prospect save that of continuous slavery lay before them.

The legal status of the negro, his intellectual capacity as witnessed in Derham the physician, Banneker the astronomer, and Fuller, the mathematician, and the present and future of the race, are all discussed at length with intense and vehement yet always restrained feeling. The book demands the careful attention of every thoughtful man and woman. Its faults are too insignificant for more than the lightest mention, and it takes rank at once with the best historical work the century has known.

CRITICS seem divided in their estimate of Mr. Clark's attempt² to solve certain theological problems, many of the religious papers asserting that whatever his intentions may have been, the real effect of his work is to undermine the authority of Scripture. The author certainly had no such thought. He is one of the many men filling active pastorates, and watching with painful interest the increase of rationalistic and materialistic tendencies. He considers his book merely tentative. "Investigation," he writes, "has not finished its work, the realm of truth is as yet but half explored, and I am quite aware that the views and conclusions here presented can be, at the best, but an approximation to the truth." Fifteen chapters sum up these approximations, most of them devoted to problems connected with the Hebrew Scriptures; and he argues at length, for instance, to prove that the builders of the Tower of Babel were innocent of wrong intent. As a rule his points have more vital interest. He is sometimes a little obscure, as in his chapter on "The Unity of Life," wherein one cannot be quite certain what his own conclusions really are, though as a whole he seems to accept the doctrine of evolution, with "a supernatural intervention of the Creator, imparting to man superior moral and intellectual powers." Most of his points will be questioned, and here is the chief value of the book—its power to stimulate thought and discussion and insure a better understanding of what is vital truth, and what mere husk, to be cast aside once for all.

OF our subscribers for the first year an amazingly small percentage have failed to renew, while of those who have renewed their subscriptions, more than one-half have sent us another subscription with their own. For this evidence of appreciation the staff of THE CONTINENT, one and all, desire to render hearty thanks. We shall endeavor by renewed diligence to repay the favor we have received.

A NEW edition of Keats, in four volumes, edited by Mr. H. Buxton Forman, is to appear in the early autumn, the last two volumes being made up chiefly of letters.

MR. J. A. SYMONDS finds relaxation after the completion of his great work on the Italian Renaissance in lighter descriptive sketches; soon to be published under the title of "Italian Byways."

THE magnificent library of Lord Ashburnham will probably be bought by the British Museum, to which it has been offered by the present Lord Ashburnham for $800,000. Even at this price, the collection is a bargain, which is likely not to fail of consummation.

"GOOD LITERATURE," though one of the most unobtrusive of our weekly literary journals, is proving itself one of the most valuable, its selections being made with excellent judgment, and its criticisms of current literature being crisp and satisfactory. It has lately passed into the hands of Taintor Brothers, of New York, who will alter and improve it in some respects.

M. H. CATHERWOOD, whose excellent work in "Stephen Guthrie," which formed one of the pleasantest features in Lippincott's Magazine in 1882, and which has never met the recognition it deserved, has a short story in the number for March, which is an especially attractive one. An article on "The Civilized Indian," by Alfred M. Williams, is of unusual value in its full and clear account of the Cherokee "Nation," and what it has accomplished since this title was taken.

THE beautiful and carefully-edited edition of "Socrates, a translation of the Apology, Crito, and parts of the Phædo of Plato," issued some years ago by Charles Scribner's Sons, is now given in a cheaper form, which places it within the reach of all. After Jowett's edition of Plato there is nothing comparable to the fidelity and purity of the work given here, the selections made being those of most interest to the general reader, who is often daunted at any attempt to read Plato by the formidable aspect of the large editions, though it may be added that whoever reads the little given here will surely find it involving the necessity for more. (Paper, pp. 159, 50 cents).

THE latest work of the lamented Dr. George M. Beard is in a pamphlet entitled "Herbert Spencer on American Nervousness: A Scientific Coincidence," which shows a most extraordinary coincidence between the thoughts and even words of Mr. Spencer in his speech on "American Nervousness" and a work by Dr. Beard published some two years ago. Passages are compared in two parallel columns, and while there is no hint or suggestion of plagiarism on Mr. Spencer's part, it is a very singular presentation of facts, which will undoubtedly be welcomed by the various clergymen who have insisted that their reproduction of other men's sermons was simply instances of unconscious cerebration. (pp. 17, 50 cents; G. P. Putnam's Sons).

IN "The Princess and Curdie," George Macdonald gives the adventures of the boy introduced to us in "The Princess and the Goblin." Like all his later books, it is unreasonably diffuse, and the moral always aggressively uppermost; but, accepting these defects, which are inseparable from the work of a man who gives himself no time to take in and pours out from a steadily-lowering reservoir, there is much to enjoy. There are lovely fancies, tender and suggestive thoughts, and sufficient adventure to interest the child, who will often fail to see the meaning plain to older readers. (12mo, pp. 255, $1.25; J. B. Lippincott & Co.).

ONE of the most interesting and valuable books of the year will be found among the spring announcements of G. P. Putnam's Sons. Mr. E. V. Smalley has long been known as one of the most accurate and brilliant writers on the staff of the New York Tribune, and his "History of the Northern Pacific Railroad" is the result of much labor and careful observation, the story being told from its first suggestion of beginning, in 1834, up to the present date. The firm have also become publishing agents for the "Johns Hopkins University Studies" in Historical and Political Science, the latest number of which is "Local Government in Illinois," by Albert Shaw, A. B., and "Local Government in Pennsylvania," by E. R. L. Gould, A. B.

"THE HOME NEEDLE," by Ella Rodman Church, the latest number in "Appleton's Home Books," is also one of the most valuable of the series. Mrs. Louise Kirkwood, in her "Sewing Primer," has done invaluable service to mission sewing-schools, where her system lightens the labors of both teacher and pupil, but this is on a larger plan, and covers the needs of all home-workers. It takes up no space with ornamental work, which has already innumerable manuals of all grades, but is devoted solely to dressmaking, the mending-basket and every stage of home sewing, the directions being plain and easily followed. The only weak point in the book is the cuts, which, in dressmaking especially, have small application to the needs of to-day, and betray their English origin at once. (12mo, pp. 128, 50 cents).

A VERY charming piece of work for young people will be found in the pages of "Page, Squire and Knight: A Romance of the Days of Chivalry," which is not so much translation as a very free adaptation of the "Franchise" of Madame Colomb by Mr. W. H. Davenport Adams, who has done excellent original work for boys. The scene is laid in Southern France in the very height of the feudal system, the period being the later years of Henry II of England and his wife, Eleanor of Aquitaine. "Franchise" is the name of a sword made by the father of the child, who by the chances of war is thrown under Queen Eleanor's protection, and passes through the various grades of the title. There is all the adventure the most exacting boy could ask, yet no sensationalism, and the thick book with its hundred and more illustrations is one of the best recent additions to literature for the young. (12mo, pp. 326, $2.25; Estes & Lauriat, Boston).

MR. JENNINGS' demolition of American novelists and American novels, in his much-quoted article in the Quarterly Review, has an offset in one which, curiously enough, appeared almost simultaneously in the Revue des Deux Mondes, and which proves to be as reassuring as the former was discouraging. The author writes: "We have before us a large number of little volumes which, originally published in Boston—the favored dwelling-place of the Longfellows and Emersons, the Wendell Holmeses and Whittiers, the Agassizes and Lowells—now appear almost simultaneously in London and Edinburgh. They justify us in saying that the novel, which was declining in England, has emigrated to the United States, where it is born again with new qualities derived from the observation of different manners and characters, or due to the temperament itself of a race which still possesses the fresh and vigorous traits of youth. It is to America, beyond all dispute, that we are indebted to-day for the best novels written in English." What will Mr. Jennings say to this?

THE present interest in the Jewish question gives value to every contribution to the subject, and thus "The Jews of Barnow," from the German of Karl Emil Franzos, translated by M. W. Macdowell, is of special importance as shedding light on certain conditions still existing in Eastern Galicia. Franzos may or may not be a Jew—this point being still actively disputed and still unsettled—but he knows every phase of Jewish life, its superstitions, its bigotry, its incredible ignorance and intolerance. He knows, also, its capacity for self-immolation, its faithfulness and deep affection, and can give the inward pathos and power of these hampered and clouded lives as no one has yet done. The horribly degraded position of the women, and the impossibility of real development for any one born to such surroundings, is one of the most penetrating impressions left by the book, which is a collection of sketches, all based on fact, and all powerful and dramatic. "The Child of Atonement" is perhaps one of the most pathetic, but all have this quality, the book being of a thoroughly depressing character, and one that requires well-grounded and even obstinate cheerfulness in the reader who would not be made temporarily wretched. (16mo, pp. 334, $1.25; D. Appleton & Co., New York).

THE lovers of biography who may chance upon the "M memoir of Annie Keary," by her sister, have a great pleasure in store, for nothing tenderer or more delicate in tone and execution has been done in many a day. Miss Keary's novel of "Oldbury," published some years since, is perhaps best known by American readers, though "Castle Daly" and "A Doubting Heart" are almost equal favorites. Miss Keary's life was so secluded, and her nature so shrinking and gentle, that she never became public property; and very few writers have succeeded in keeping their own personality so thoroughly out of their books. Irish by birth, her father, who began life as an Irish officer, gay and light-hearted, ended it as a rector of Bilton, a secluded and quiet little parish, where the children were all rigidly and carefully trained, though Annie was always her father's companion, and took her first lessons in story-telling at his knee. Her imagination was intensely active, and as she listened to his stories of campaigning life she lived it all with him, and reproduced the whole in her plays. It was a household of not only deep but demonstrative affections, and it is a lovely family group given in the opening chapters. Death came and many sorrows, chief and most enduring a broken engagement; but all seemed necessary to the development of the nature which grew richer and sweeter with every year. Her literary career is full of interest, but her personal life even more so. She went through many phases of belief, but held always to central truths, and reached middle life, living at last as much in heaven as on earth, her passing from it being a quiet and joyful "good night to men—good morning to the angels." (12mo, pp. 250, $1.75; Macmillan & Co., London and New York).

THE remarkable discovery of fluid-bearing quartz crystals, mentioned in No. 56 of THE CONTINENT, was made by Wm. E. Hidden, mineralogist, who recently read a paper on the subject of his "find" before the New York Academy of Sciences. Through an inadvertency, his name was not published with the paragraph referred to.

PROFESSOR BESSEY, of Iowa, writes to the New York Tribune the following interesting account of the smut of wheat: "The term smut is popularly applied to two quite different diseases of the wheat-plant. In this country it generally means a disease which leaves the grain nearly its normal size and shape, but filled with a black dust of very disagreeable odor. It is a true disease, and like many of the diseases of animals and man, is the result of the growth of a parasitic plant. This wheat parasite consists of slender threads of microscopic size, which insinuate themselves between the cells and tissues of the young wheat-plant, drawing therefrom the nutrient matters, and thereby reducing considerably the general vitality of the affected plant. As is well known, an ordinary plant consists of a great number of cells, each resembling a microscopic bladder, filled with protoplasm, water and some other substances. Were our eyes stronger the interior of a young wheat-plant would appear not much unlike a barrel of potatoes, the potatoes representing the cells. The cells in the plant, much as the potatoes in the barrel, have empty or vacant spaces between one another. If we can imagine some slender plant growing up between the potatoes in the barrel and drawing nourishment from them, we will have a crude illustration of the manner in which the smut parasite attacks the wheat-plant. When the wheat begins to head the parasitic threads push their way into the young kernels, and there find an abundance of food. Here the parasite reaches its highest development, and produces an abundant crop of its minor black spores, to serve as seed for the next year's crop. A wheat kernel thus filled with spores is generally a little shorter and thicker than a healthy grain, and is always of a dark-greenish color. Upon crushing it, a most offensive odor is given off by the black, dusty mass of the interior. If we put some of this black dust under a good microscope we shall see that it is made up of round bodies, the individual spores, which in these low plants answers the same purpose as the seeds of the higher ones. When the smutted grains are broken, as many are in thrashing, the spores adhere to the tuft of hairs on the normal grains, and are thus sown with the latter. It has been demonstrated repeatedly that the disease is propagated by the spores, and that the sowing of seed containing smut pores is followed, under favorable conditions, by a new crop of smut. When we come to the question of prevention it is at once evident that whatever will destroy the spores or eliminate them from the seed-wheat will, in so far, lessen the liability to the disease. As the smutted grains are lighter than the normal ones they can be floated out by throwing the seed-wheat into water and violently agitating it. The common "smut mills" of the miller may also be used, although in this case there is considerable danger of mechanical injury to the normal grains. In whatever manner the smutted grains are removed it must be borne in mind that many spores adhere to those which are not smutted, and these spores must be removed or destroyed, or but little good will come from the operation. This last may be accomplished by the use of caustic lime, which may be applied in the dry state to the wetted wheat after the washing spoken of above. A solution of blue-stone (copper sulphate) is also much used by English farmers for the purpose, and appears to destroy the life of the spores without injuring the wheat."

"SCIENCE" publishes the following report, given by Captain George E. Belknap, commander of the U. S. steamer Alaska, of a singular meteoric phenomenon witnessed in the western horizon while at sea in the North Pacific: "The sun had set clear, leaving the lower sky streaked with gorgeous tints of green and red, while the new moon, three days old, gave out a peculiar red light of singular brilliancy. Suddenly, at three minutes before five o'clock, a loud rushing noise was heard, like that of a large rocket descending from the zenith with immense force and velocity. It was a meteor, of course, and when within some ten degrees of the horizon it exploded with great noise and flame, the glowing fragments streaming down into the sea like huge sparks and sprays of fire. Then came the most wonderful part of the phenomenon, for, at the point in the heavens where the meteor burst, there appeared a figure, like the shape of an immense distaff, all aglow with a bluish-white light of the most intense brilliancy. It kept that form for perhaps two minutes, when it began to lengthen upward, and grow wavy and zigzag in outline from the action of the wind, and gradually diminishing in breadth, until it became a fine, faint spiral line, at its upper end dissolving into the fast gathering clouds the meteor seemed to have evoked. It so remained, a gorgeous scroll of light, emblazoning an arc of some fifteen or twenty degrees in the heavens, and with all its vividness and brilliancy of coloring, for ten minutes longer, when it began to fade, and finally disappeared at eleven minutes past five o'clock, apparent time. So grand and startling had been the effect produced, that it might have been likened to a thunderbolt and its trail indelibly engraved upon the sky. All on board gathered on deck to look at the wonderful phenomenon, and all said they had never seen so marvelous a sight before. Had the meteor struck the ship, it would doubtless have been the last of the Alaska, and no vestige would have been left to tell the tale of her loss. And to those who witnessed this strange and unwonted manifestation of the forces of the universe comes the suggestion of possible unthought-of cause of sometime disasters at sea."

THE DRAMA.

MR. RAYMOND presents his new play, "In Paradise," in Philadelphia for the first time on March 19, at the Walnut Street Theatre.

At the close of Mr. Booth's performance in Berlin, the supporting cast surfeited him with praise, and the principal members kissed him on both cheeks, a mark of appreciation decidedly startling to the American temperament.

MRS. LANGTRY, it appears, contemplates remaining here another season. She lately stated that she was negotiating with Mr. Boucicault to write a play suited to her, and if later developments proved auspicious she would stay. Her present tour will probably terminate in April by a two weeks' engagement at the Fifth Avenue Theatre, New York.

"HEART AND HAND," Lecocq's latest comic opera, has lately been done in New York at two theatres, the Bijou Opera House and the Standard Theatre. The theme is an old one, and lacks humor. The music is dull, and falls far short of that sprightliness and melody which is such a pronounced characteristic of the composer's former work.

WHETHER we are to have a new opera next fall from Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan hinges upon the lasting-power of "Iolanthe" in London. Should the enormous audiences which have attended thus far show signs of diminishing, they will immediately set about preparing something new. Mr. Gilbert is said to have accumulated a fortune of nearly half a million of dollars from his writings, and is about to build a magnificent dwelling in the West End of London.

THE greatest personal success this season has undoubtedly been that of Mr. Richard Mansfield at the Union Square Theatre, New York, in "A Parisian Romance." The part, that of an unprincipled roué, who dies in the midst of his dissipation, was refused by Mr. Stoddart, of the company. It was then entrusted to Mr. Mansfield's hands, who had been known before as a comedian of marked ability in comic opera. His performance the first night amazed everybody, and to his acting, the great success the play has attained is mainly attributed.

"MY PARTNER," which made its author, Mr. Bartley Campbell, famous in a night, still retains a secure position in public favor, and has gained for Messrs. Aldrich and Parsloe in the four years since its initial production a fortune apiece. The one thousandth performance was lately commemorated at the Windsor Theatre, New York, by tasteful souvenirs. Mr. Parsloe's performance of the Chinaman has elicited the warmest words of approval. His peculiar talent is apparently inherited, as it is recorded that, in 1828, at the Covent Garden Theatre, London, his father appeared in a Chinese dance. The play will soon be produced, for the second time this season in Philadelphia, at the Arch Street Theatre.

How Tom Saved the Train.

AROUND the stove, at the village inn,
The usual company were seated,
To drink and smoke and chaff and grin
At tales too broad to be repeated.

A moment silence held her reign,
And then a voice her realms invaded :
“Tom, tell us how you saved the train !”
Tom was not loth to be persuaded.

But first a horn of applejack
He “put away” preparatory ;
Then ‘gainst the wall he braced his back,
And thus began his startling story :

“Upon the track, and on the ties,
One clear night I was homeward hieing,
When, ‘cross the rails, before my eyes,
I saw, O Heavens ! a great beam lying.

“It shone, a ghastly body there—
All ways at once my feelings drifted.
Although it seem’d so light, I swear
I hadn’t then the power to lift it.

“A sudden rumble and a roar
Struck frightfully upon my hearing—
Louder and louder than before—
I knew the night express was nearing.

“With helplessness I weaker grew,
And, fainting, on my knees was falling.
What should I do—what could I do—
To avert disaster so appalling?

“On me it came ! As in a dream
I thought I saw the dead and dying.
I sprang between the track and beam—
And on, unharmed, the train went flying !”

A moment’s hush. You might have heard

A dew drop. One said : “I can’t see,
sir,
Just how that blamed old beam was stirred.”

“I didn’t touch it; it touch’d me,
sir.”

“But,” he persisted, “tell this much ;
I want the answer that I go for :
You couldn’t lift, you didn’t touch,
Pray, how then did the train get over?”

Said Tom, as toward the door he went :
“Why, don’t you see? Now don’t get mad. Oh !

It was a moon-beam that I meant :
I sprang between and left my shadow !”

A dozen glasses flew in air,
And ‘gainst the closing door were shatter’d ;

But wily Tom, no longer there,
Stood outside ; so it little matter’d.

After Many Years.

ONLY a lock of hair—
Of soft brown hair—
With faintest trace of gray ;

Foot-prints of time and care
Uniting there
Yesterday and to-day.

When life was young and fair,
A tress of hair—
Brown hair—you gave me there ;
A tiny braid to wear—
Ken you not where ?
’Twas yesterday—Brown hair !

Some reap where others sow !
Cruel ? Ah, no !
That precious lock of hair,
Untouched by winter’s snow,
Long, long ago
Was lost—misaid somewhere.

Whence comes this brown and gray
To me to-day ?
Dear ghosts of years long fled,
Why will ye haunting stay ?
Begone, I pray !
All but “to-day” is dead !

Ah ! whether false or true ?
The old or new ?
I often wonder which .
Ah, if I only knew !
It makes me blue
Not to know—which was switch !

GRANDMOTHER'S PORTRAIT.

BY JESSIE McDERMOTT.

Oh, many, many years ago,
They tell me she was fair—
They say the yellow buttercups
Were jealous of her hair;
That all the peach-blooms blushed to see
The soft pink on her cheeks—
That blue-bells looking at her eyes
Would hang their heads for weeks.
But she—she only laughs and says,
“Ah, that was long ago!
My hair nothing need envy now
Except the drifted snow.
The peach-blooms and the blue-bells
Have long since smiled away

The silly fear they may have had
In some past summer day.”

And I—I think her lovelier
Than any flower that grows;
And when I look into her eyes
I fancy that she knows
Her sweet age is more beautiful
Than fairest youth could be,
Though when I tell her what I think,
She only laughs at me.

THE PIPE OF PEACE.

TOWARD the close of a beautiful day in the dreamy Indian summer of the Rocky Mountains, I strolled into the Ute encampment at White River Agency, Colorado, and, entering the lodge of one of the chief men, sat down for an hour's rest and chat.

I found my host engaged in painting on the canvas of his tent the history of a recent skirmish with the Arapahoes, in which the Ute party had been victorious. On one side of the panoramic view a band of Indians were represented in the act of killing buffalo. To the right the successful hunters were depicted on their homeward journey with the trophies of the chase, while a band of Arapahoes loitered in the rear. Farther on the fight was pictured, and finally the scene showed the triumphant warriors approaching their village with the spoils of battle. Among ponies and saddles and captured weapons a number of tobacco-pipes, carved from a deep-red stone and artistically inlaid with white metal, were faithfully represented, and as the artist entertained me with a description of the scene, he filled one of these prized souvenirs with tobacco as an evidence of his good will, and bade me join him in a smoke. He told me that the Utes had used such pipes for many generations; that they had first been brought from the East by other tribes, and that formerly the calumet had figured in all of their councils and treaties; but that since Washington (the Government) had confined the tribes to reservations, the peace-pipe had lost much of the importance attached to it, and that now it was valued only as a relic of past glories—was smoked merely as a means of gratifying the appetite or as a pledge of friendship between individuals.

FROM THE COLLECTION OF DR. GABRIEL MIESSE, OHIO.

ANCIENT CLAY PIPES FROM VARIOUS LOCALITIES.

This incident occurred many years ago, but served to awaken in me a desire to learn more of the history of the pipe of peace. The results of subsequent investigations to which it led are partially set forth in these pages.

Far back in pre-historic times, long before the birth of Columbus, or the visits of the Norsemen to the shores of the Western World, the mound-builders of the Mississippi Valley were familiar with the narcotic and medicinal properties of certain herbs, and, aside from the sensual gratification that smoking afforded them, the usage had become firmly ingrafted into their religious ceremonies. They were wont to solace themselves with the fumes of burning leaves, or to offer the precious incense as a propitiation to the Great Spirit. They expended an enormous amount of time and labor and exercised a surprising degree of skill in the production of curious receptacles for the smoking material, which have descended to us in their burial and sacrificial mounds after the lapse of perhaps thousands of years. These relics, which are the oldest pipes known, were fashioned from the hardest stones, and were frequently carved to represent certain animals and birds. They were made in one piece, the bowl rising from the centre of a curved base or platform, one end of which answered the purpose of a handle, whilst the other formed the stem.

At a somewhat more recent period a branch of the same ancient people, farther to the southward, carved great clumsy "idol-pipes" in the semblance of the human form or head, or of monstrous birds and quadrupeds. Many of these manufactures, which were simply bowls with an orifice for the insertion of an additional stem, were of great weight, and must have been placed on the ground when in use, the smoke being conveyed to the smoker through a long reed, which was attached to the sculpture.

At the time of the Mexican conquest smoking was almost universal in North America. The Spanish discoverers were struck with astonishment by the singularity of the practice, and many quaint allusions were made to it by the early historians. One of them wrote that the Floridian "salvages" possessed "a kinde of herbe dried, which, with a cane and an earthen cup in the end, with fire and the dried herbes put together, do sucke thorow the cane the smoke thereof, which smoke satisfieth their hunger, and therewith they live foure or five dayes without meate or drinke." This "cornet of claië," which was a common accessory to the accoutrements of every Indian, is described by another as "a little pan, hollowed at the one side, and within whose hole there is a long quill or pipe, out of which they suck up the smoak which is within the said pan, after they put fire to it with a coal that they lay upon it."

The legendary lore of the American Indians is rich in allusions to the pipe of peace. The Winnebagoes of the Northwest have a tradition which runs in this wise:

More than fifty generations (fifteen hundred years) ago, the Winnebagoes, or men with sweet voices, lived on the shores of a large lake into which numerous streams emptied their waters.

Here the great chief Ro-chun-ka (the upright), when asked by visiting braves from other tribes the number of his warriors and beautiful maidens, replied by likening them to the prints made by the feet of a pony in a day's ride among wild plum trees. One day a medicine-man of the Sioux tribe (from whom the Winnebagoes sprung many snows before) came to Ro-chun-ka, and requested that the chiefs and warriors be called together, as he had received a message from Wa-kon-ton-ka (the Great Spirit) which he wished to communicate to them. The multitude was very great, and more than a hundred men were stationed the sound of a strong man's voice apart to carry to the assembly the words of the Great Spirit as they were spoken by the medicine man. He said: "Let the Sioux and Winnebagoes hereafter be friends. Let their blood mingle, not with the soil, but in the veins of brave offspring. The great Spirit, angry at the sight of bleaching bones in every cañon and on every plain, says let no more blood be shed."

Suddenly a warrior, taller than a great hemlock growing on hot sandy soil, appeared to the multitude, and, approaching Ro-chun-ka, announced a new pleasure for the "sweet-voiced" and their descendants: "When the hunter comes wearied from the chase; when the warrior returns from battle with the bleeding scalps of enemies at his side; when the lover leaves the tent of his sweetheart—let him enjoy this, the gift of the Great Spirit to those who obey him." From its covering of plucked mink skin he unwrapped a pipe, fashioned from the shinbone of an elk, into which bands of yellow metal (gold) and bright stones were sunken and blended into beautiful figures. Filling the pipe (che-no-pu) with red willow bark (sha-sha), he breathed into the bowl and an odor, as of many flowers, filled the nostrils of the great assembly; the pipe was passed to Ro-chun-ka, who, finding a new-born pleasure in the fragrant perfume, greater than any before known to him, perceived at once that the gift must be divine, and a treaty of peace was straightway sealed, by the inviolable pledge of the pipe, between the two great nations.

According to another wide-spread superstition, Gitche-Manito, the Mighty, ages ago, assembled all of the hostile tribes together at the Great Red Pipestone Quarry in Minnesota. Breaking off a fragment of the beautiful wine-colored stone, he fashioned it into a pipe which he smoked in their presence, telling them that the rock was part of their flesh, and that henceforth the locality was to be neutral ground, where all nations should meet in peace to provide themselves with material for their calumets. As the smoke of the sacred pipe rolled upward and concealed him from the view of the multitude, the Great Spirit disappeared in the clouds.

For many centuries the Indian tribes of the Northwest have fashioned their pipes from the red catlinite taken from this celebrated spot, which has been made still more famous by the lamented poet, Longfellow, in his "Song of Hiawatha." From the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean the red rock still forms an important item in aboriginal traffic, and annual visits are paid to the quarry by the neighboring tribes for a stock of material sufficient to supply their needs during the coming year.

As a rule, each Indian makes his own pipes, but there are certain artists who excel in pipe-sculpture. Philip Western, a Flandreau Sioux, is acknowledged to be the best among the Indians of the present day. His carvings, often beautifully inlaid with metal, are known far and near, and few are the visitors at the Pipestone Quarry who fail to carry away with them curious examples of his handiwork.

A quarter of a mile east of the quarry the Pipestone Creek falls gracefully over the rocks, and forms an additional attraction to this romantic spot, made hallowed by the legends of many generations.

PRE-HISTORIC STONE IDOL PIPE (OHIO).

DEER ANTLER PIPE, LAST CENTURY (FROM SKETCH BY REV. W. M. BEAUCHAMP), NEW YORK.

The natives of the Isthmus of Darien seem to have been the inventors of the cigar. In 1681 Dr. Lionel Wafer found them using rolls of tobacco as thick as the signs representing an infinity of grotesque and monstrous creatures.

A century or so ago native American pipes had lost most of their tribal characteristics, and were made of every available material and in a countless variety of forms, to suit the fancy of the individual smoker. It is a singular fact that earthenware pipes were not made by the American aborigines until a comparatively recent period. Amongst other tribes, the Seneca, Mohawk and Onondaga Indians of New York usually moulded their pipes in clay at the time of the discovery of America, as did also the Lenni-Lenapes of the Delaware Valley.

Occasionally the archæologist is delighted by the discovery of examples of remarkably curious or elaborate workmanship. A specimen from New York State, belonging to the last century and now owned by Rev. W. M. Beauchamp, is made from a portion of a deer's antler, with a wooden stem held in place by a buckskin thong. A large trumpet-shaped stone pipe, found in the vicinity of Santa Fé, New Mexico, and at present in the collection of Mr. William S. Beebe, of Brooklyn, N. Y. (page 419), is believed to be amongst the finest American pipes extant. The bowl is carved to represent an eagle's head, on the back and sides of which lilliputian figures of men appear in relief, whilst along the stem four rattlesnakes are stretched in life-like attitudes.

wrist and two or three feet long. "When assembled together, and they want to smoke," he writes in his journal, "a boy lights one end of this roll, wetting the tobacco above its lighted end so that it will not burn too fast. He then takes the end of this roll in his mouth, and blows the smoke in the nose of each one in the assembly, even when two or three hundred in number. The Indians, sitting on benches, as is their wont, hold their hands around their noses like a tube to receive the perfume." Truly a method of enjoying the "weed" which might be adopted to advantage by their civilized brethren on the score of economy and sociability.

The ancient inhabitants of the Pacific Coast smoked through straight tubular pipes of serpentine, in the smaller ends of which were inserted the wing-bones of birds, which served as mouthpieces. These pipes varied in length from two to twelve inches, and were doubtless used in the intervals of labor, when the owners reclined at ease or lay in a prostrate position.

On Vancouver's Island and the Northwest Coast the natives still use a soft, fine-grained black slate for their pipes, which are most elaborately carved in imitation of men, animals, reptiles and intricate de-cut characteristic pipes from a dark-colored pipe-stone which they find in the neighborhood. An old Indian who is known by the name of Pwahguneka, is said to be one of the most noted artisans in that section, and his productions are generally conventionalized by the introduction of a row of miniature men or animals carved on the upper surface of the stem-socket or platform. An example of recent Chippewa pipe sculpture has been introduced in the group of old Indian stone-pipes, here figured, which will give a general idea of the majority of examples produced by this tribe. In this specimen the artist has evidently intended to convey the idea of a boat—two figures being represented in the attitude of rowing, whilst a third is steering at the helm. The bowl of the pipe represents the head of a Caucasian with short hair and stubby mustache. Indian pipe-makers have recently displayed much ingenuity in copying objects of European introduction, such as steel tomahawks and spear-points, "stove-pipe" hats, horses' heads and the like; and an extraordinary example found in Missouri, which may be seen in the illustration to which allusion has just been made, is fashioned in the shape of an inverted glass bottle-stopper, ornamented with etchings of hearts and crosses. A fine example of a Missouri pipe is shown with the initial letter beginning this paper.

In some form or other, tobacco was universally used by the tribes of North America previous to the fifteenth century. The Indians of Hispaniola inhaled the smoke of burning leaves through a forked tube, the ends of which they inserted in their nostrils. Montezuma regaled himself, after his epicurean dinner, with a pipe of tobacco perfumed with the dried leaves, or dried and powdered juice of the liquidambar or sweet-gum tree, and in some portions of the country the inhabitants enjoyed the "weed" in the form of snuff. The peace pipe, however, with its highly decorated stem, was peculiarly an institution of the nomads of the Northwest. It was invested with sacred attributes, and figured in all the mysteries of the medicine-man's art; no treaty could be sealed without it; it was the aboriginal flag of truce, an inviolable pledge of honor and immunity from attack. In the words of the artist-traveler Catlin, who spent much time with the wild tribes, "the pipe is the Indian's constant companion through life. He pledges his friends through its stem and its bowl, and when its care-drowning fumes cease to flow it takes a place with him in his solitary grave with his tomahawk and war-club, companions to his long-fancied 'wild and beautiful hunting-grounds.'"

BESIDE THE ANTE.

BY OSCAR FAY ADAMS.

EVERY one at Falaise knows the story of the mother of William the Conqueror by heart. They trouble themselves very little about the results of modern investigation in regard to the real facts in the case, these good folk of Falaise. They see no reason for doubting any part of the story they have always known. They will show you with pride the beautiful old Church of Saint Gervais, and its not distant neighbor in the Grande Place, La Sainte Trinité; but they will bid you look longest at the great bronze statue of the Conqueror in the centre of the Grand Place. And it is well worth looking at. The Norman hero is mounted on a spirited horse, represented as plunging impetuously forward, and the king, in suit of mail, and with visor up and grasping a lifted lance and pennon in his hand, is turning, as if to beckon on an army to victory.

"It is most wonderful," the folk of Falaise will say to you, as you and they gaze at the warrior figure of whose history they are so proud.

But they have more to show you than this; for then they will take you on up the hill and through the arched gateway of the castle. On the ramparts is a quiet, grassy walk, well shaded by trees; and there is a school up here above the town, and an old twelfth-century chapel. But you have not been brought to look at these. You go, instead, into the castle-keep, and there you will be shown a double-arched window with a stone pillar in the centre, and looking out of this you will gaze into a deep, narrow valley very far below, through which winds the River Ante, its surface visible only here and there among the trees. On the other side frowns a steep range of hills, the steepest of all being known as Mont Mirat.

"From this window," says your companion, "Count Robert first saw Arlette;" and then you are told how the youth of eighteen, looking down into the valley of the Ante, saw the women and girls washing clothes in the stream, just as you see them doing now, eight centuries later, and among them saw the beautiful Arlette, the tanner's daughter, and seeing, fell in love. You look down at the women below. You can just catch the sound of their voices, but you cannot distinguish one from the other. If the story you have heard is true, love, in Robert's case at least, was not blind, but most extraordinarily sharp-sighted. Be that as it may, he afterward made her Duchess of Normandy, and you are shown a little cell in the castle where their son, the Conqueror, was born, unless the historians are right who say that William was not born in this castle at all. Afterward you will be taken to the top of Talbot's tower, a hundred feet higher, from which a most magnificent view can be had; but since this tower, built by the English King Henry the Fifth, can in no way be associated with William, it has but little interest for your Falaise companion.

Another day you go to the washing-place beside the Ante, and watch the women and girls chattering and laughing at their work, and you think of the young Robert catching sight of his beautiful Arlette in just such another group of workers eight centuries before. Here the river runs through a sluiceway, made for the use of the washers, and here are great square tanks heaped high with soaking garments, the whole protected from the weather by sheds. Each one pays three sous a day for the privilege of washing here, but must furnish her own soap and carrosse for beating the clothes, so one of the white-capped women will perhaps inform you. Beyond are open-air tanks, where those who have no three sous to spare may wash for nothing. You wonder if there is an Arlette among any of these women. They are not very beautiful, you think. But as you stand at the arched entrance of the washing-place you do not see all the women, and, even if you could, you would not know which was named Arlette, if there were one of that name there. Yet there is an Arlette there, and if you had been told of it, I think it would not have been difficult to discover her. Arlette must be beautiful to bear out her right to the name, you imagine; and you, within the archway, are not much impressed with the faces you see. But this modern Arlette is among the poorer women beside the Ante, and too far off for you to see her. There has always been an Arlette among the women at the river, for it is a favorite name at Falaise, and sometimes there have been several; but at present there is but one—Arlette Lechasseur, the daughter of a shoemaker in the Faubourg St. Laurent. Well she knows the story of Arlette, the tanner's daughter, and very proud she is of her name. We have only tradition to assure us that the first Arlette was beautiful, but it needs no second glance to convince us that Arlette Lechasseur is so. If only there were another Count Robert to see. But she has too much sense to expect a count or any other noble personage to come and make love to her there beside the Ante, even if she is pretty.

"Where is thy Count Robert, Arlette?" the other women sometimes say to her at the tanks, but her only response is a good-natured laugh.

Yet she has dreams of her own, nevertheless. Not exalted ones, to be sure, but they sweeten existence to her. Last year, at the fair in the Faubourg of Guibray, she met some one that, perhaps—Alas, poor Arlette never gets beyond the "perhaps" in her thoughts! The thrifty Norman does not often marry a girl who can bring him nothing, and the Lechasseurs are very poor. So Arlette's musings do not stray beyond a "perhaps," as I said before; but people learn to be content with a very little, and it is pleasant to have one's dreams.

From her washing-place she looks up at the great cliff on which the castle stands. Except for a few patches of furze and heather, the gray rock is almost bare, and which is cliff and which is castle wall is hard to tell, for the wall is at the edge of the cliff, and seems as if it might be a part of it, so worn and gray is its surface. And, high above all, the Talbot tower appears almost to touch the sky. Arlette has often been to the very top, but she does not like looking down into the valley so well as gazing up at the castle-crowned cliff. From where she is plying her carrosse she can see Count Robert's window and the vine sprays hanging down from the opening. Then she thinks of the tanner's daughter and Count Robert. Now and then she can see some one leaning from the window and looking down into the valley, as that handsome stripling may have leaned and looked eight centuries before. But she does not imagine that any one can distinguish her from the other women beside the Ante. She knows very well that the distance is too great for that now. Perhaps eyesight was better in Count Robert's time she thinks. But the day comes when some one looking down from Count Robert's window does see her. It is a young American, finishing a year of travel in Europe by a walking tour through Normandy, burdened only by knapsack and field-glass. Some one at Caen has told him that he must surely visit Falaise, and so he has come to the castle, and now, looking through his glass, at one object after another, his gaze has at last rested on Arlette at her washing-tank beside the Ante. The glass is a powerful one, so that he can see her very distinctly as she beats the soaped linen with her carrosse, and afterwards rinses the garments in the clear running water; and he watches her a long time. At last, however, he puts down the glass, and, after giving his guide a fee, he comes down from the castle alone.

But it is no youth of eighteen who sees this modern Arlette, but a man at least eight years older, who has looked upon many beautiful faces before this. Why should this one attract him especially? But it does interest him, and he means to see more of it, as Count Robert likewise resolved long before. But the American is quite as handsome as any mediæval count can possibly have been, though, as his figure is rather under the middle size, Count Robert was probably the taller of the two, on the generally accepted principle that mediæval heroes were men of commanding height. But the clear olive complexion, dark hair and eyes and delicate mustache, sweeping upward at the ends in long curves, Count Robert probably did not boast. More than one woman had looked at this young American with admiring eyes, and he knew very well that he was handsome—perhaps had at one time been a little vain of the fact—but now, at twenty-six, he merely accepts it as a piece of good fortune. Any one looking at the firm curves of the mouth would see evidences of abundant strength of purpose. Whether it would be exercised with any higher aims than obtaining his own way was the question. He had always had it without much trouble, and he was not more selfish than most men.

As he goes down the hill his mind is full of this pretty face he has just seen. And why not? He is taking life easily this summer. When he returns to America his work awaits him, into which he means to plunge in sober earnest; but at present he is enjoying life, and has plenty of room for vagrant fancies in his mind. But it is a long distance down the hill to the washing-sheds beside the Ante, and he is not familiar enough with the town to find the nearest way; so that, by the time he reaches the arched entrance, many of the women have gone, and among them Arlette. Those who remain glance shyly at him, but he sees only that Arlette is not there, and he goes to his rooms at the Hôtel de Normandie vexed at the disappointment. He meant to have gone back to Caen the next day, but now he decides to remain in Falaise another day in the hope of getting a nearer view of the pretty face he has seen from the castle window. And chance is favorable to him that very day, for, strolling just at sunset through the Faubourg St. Laurent, he sees Arlette standing at her father's door. The young fellow, mentally noting the nature of her father's business, for Guy Lechasseur can be seen through the entrance busy at his work, takes his resolution at once, and, approaching the doorway, lifts his hat courteously to Arlette.

"He is very handsome," thinks Arlette. "There is no one like him in Falaise."

"Good evening, my pretty one," says the stranger. "Can I see M. Lechasseur, the cordonnier?"

Hearing the sound of his name, old Guy comes forward, and the American explains that he would like to be measured for a pair of easy walking-shoes.

"They must be very easy and comfortable," he says, "for I walk a great deal."

"But yes, Monsieur," responds the father of Arlette, "I know what you would have. Come in, and it shall be done at once. Arlette, my child, thou wilt have the goodness to measure Monsieur's foot immediately."

The honest shoemaker is a little excited at this sudden order from a foreigner, and speaks hurriedly.

"Arlette, my daughter, is more precise than I can be with the measurements," he explains to his visitor. "Her eyes are much younger than mine, thou must know."

The other smiles at this. He is very well suited with this arrangement, and so Arlette, blushing a little—for it is a new experience for her to have dark eyes bent on her so earnestly as now—does as her father desires.

"Remember, I am very particular," says the young man when she has nearly completed her task. "I should not like to be badly fitted. Will it not be best to repeat the measure so as to be sure?"

"But yes, Monsieur," responds Guy, "it is best to be sure."

It is very pleasant, this unlooked-for little incident, and the young man determines to enjoy it. Arlette, kneeling before him the better to do what she is about, ventures one shy glance at his face, but finding him looking tenderly at her, bends down her head. Yet on no pretext can he prolong the situation further, but after Arlette is through he remains to talk with the girl and her father.

"Falaise is very beautiful," he says to Arlette, after Guy has returned to his work, and the girl, at her father's request, goes with him a few steps to point out a nearer way to the Hôtel de Normandie than the route by which he came.

"Does Monsieur really think so?" is her response. "I am very glad, for Monsieur must know that I love Falaise."

"Yes, it is very beautiful," he repeats; "but I know what is much more beautiful still," he adds; and there is no mistaking his meaning, even if the little pressure he gives her hand had been omitted.

"Monsieur must not say such things," she says slowly after a pause.

"But I shall say such things, because they are true, my pretty one. Look at me, Arlette."

They are in a narrow lane by this time, where there is no one but themselves.

"Look at me, Arlette," he says again.

She does look at him with her sweet, wondering face. In the gathering twilight he can yet see the soft curves of her lips and cheeks. He cannot help it that he puts his arm about her; and it is all so new, so strange to her, that she does not resist him.

"Does Arlette know that she is very beautiful?" he says gently, and then he draws her closer to him.

"I must go back now," she says simply, and so he releases her. "Monsieur will find the way now, doubtless, if he will remember to take the next turn to the right," she continues when he has taken away his arm.

"Yes," he replies, "it will be very easy, and now this is for showing me the way," and he puts a silver coin in her hand, and then, moved by a sudden impulse, kisses her once, twice, and turns away.

She is not angry with him when she is once more alone. Something new and sweet has come into her life, and it has all been so sudden that she is bewildered for a little. But she does not try to analyze her feelings. She knows only that this foreigner, who looks so handsome and speaks so tenderly, has told her that she is beautiful, and has kissed her. And that is quite enough for Arlette now. She wonders, as she goes homeward, if Count Robert could have looked like this stranger. She thinks of him all that night, and on the morrow, as she stands at her washing-tank beside the Ante, she is thinking of him still. Foolish little Arlette! But what should one do when one is but eighteen, and has been kissed by the handsomest man one has ever seen? Surely one need not be very angry or try to forget.

The morning is half gone when she sees him entering the archway to the washing-sheds, but he does not see her. She hears his voice in good-humored passing chat with the women there. What if he should not see her! At last he comes out from the sheds toward the free tanks. Surely he must see her now. But he stops for a word with Babette and Susette, with Dorothee and with Gertrude before he comes to her.

"Ah, my pretty one," he says carelessly, as if this were the first time he has seen her; but a look in his face tells her that he remembers, and she understands now why he spoke to all the women on the way.

He has a sketch-book with him, and now, as he leans against a post near her, he takes a pencil and sketches rapidly. Now and then he says a word to her, and the women near by look at him in the pauses of their work with shy, admiring glances. At last he holds up a paper.

"Would you like to see, my good friends?" he says to the women; and then Babette, Susette, Dorothee and Gertrude crowd about him and examine his drawing with voluble exclamations of delight.

"There thou art, Dorothee, to the life," says one.

"And there is Susette," says another; "and Monsieur has drawn me, too," she adds in great glee.

"Would you like to show this to your friends under the shed?" suggests the artist; and this appearing to be exactly what they do wish, off go the four girls, not observing that Arlette does not accompany them.

"See here, Arlette," says the American when they are alone. He holds up another paper on which he has sketched Arlette just as she looked when he saw her at her father's door.

"Am I like that?" she says timidly, and blushing a little.

"Only a thousand times prettier," he says impulsively; and then, while no one is observing them, he showers a dozen kisses on her face and neck.

And what should Arlette do?

Soon the women come back with the drawing.

"They say," says Dorothee, nodding her head in the direction of the sheds, "that Monsieur must make a picture of them."

"Very well," says the young man; and he goes back to the sheds.

He is gone some time, but at last Arlette hears murmurs of delight from the sheds, and she knows that the drawing is finished. Soon afterward he returns.

"Bon jour," he says to Susette and the others. "Bon jour, ma petite," he says to Arlette in a low tone, as he takes up his cane, which had been left on the ground beside her. "Arlette will see me again;" and then he goes on his way beside the Ante.

"Bon jour, Monsieur," scream the women after him, when he is almost out of sight; and at this he turns and waves his hat. They will talk about the handsome foreigner beside the Ante for many a long day.

By mid-afternoon Arlette goes home, and soon afterward an errand for her father takes her away from the house for an hour.

"Monsieur has been here," says Guy when she returns, "and he would have liked to say adieu to thee, for he was going away."

"Going away?" repeats Arlette faintly.

"But yes, my daughter. There was news from America that caused him to go at once, he said to me. And he could not wait for the shoes, but paid me the money and told me to give them to some one who needed them. I wish him a good journey, for he has done well by me, and not every one would think to remember that he owed an old shoemaker like thy father, Arlette. America is over the sea, they tell me, and he cannot yet be half-way to Caen," concludes the old man, drawing out his waxed thread slowly.

Is it really true that she shall see him no more? This is the one thought that fills Arlette's mind. It is this that sends her supperless to bed. It is this that causes her to rise in the morning with eyes that are red with weeping, and that have not been closed in sleep the night through. Foolish little Arlette, to weep for one who will soon forget her! She does not go to her work that day, but a day later sees her back with the others, a little pale, but that is all the difference.

The summer goes and the autumn comes, and the red leaves float along the winding Ante. The women are still talking of the foreigner who came and sketched them all so wonderfully one day.

The summer goes and the autumn comes, and the young American is back in his law office deep in his work and his future plans. He has not thought of Arlette since he returned. His sketch-book lies on an upper shelf, where he tossed it when first unpacking, and he has not thought to look at it since. A privileged friend comes into his office one morning, and, turning over one thing after another, lights upon the sketch-book, and taking it down, begins to examine its contents.

"By Jove!" he exclaims, "that is a lovely face. Where did you come across so much beauty, old fellow?"

It is Arlette's picture that the visitor is gazing at. The other turns to see what his friend has, and suddenly there flashes over him the memory of those two days at Falaise. How sweet she was, that little girl beside the Ante!

"It is just a study," he replies carelessly.

"A study?" repeats his friend incredulously, and then the drawing is laid away with the others.

But in replacing the volume the drawing falls unnoticed to the floor, face downward, and the office boy that evening seeing it lie there like a bit of waste paper, tosses it into the waste-basket, and later it goes to the ragman with the other paper.

And Arlette is still beside the Ante. She never thinks now of the one she met at the fair in the Faubourg of Guibray, but always of him who came so suddenly into her life, with his handsome face and his tender words, and who went out of her life as suddenly. Only two days; but the sweet pain of those two days will linger a whole life-time in one tender little heart beside the Ante. What if she should once more see him there by the archway! And she looks often that way with a vague hope.

The Arlette of eight centuries ago was happy in her Count Robert, who loved her. There are no Counts Robert now, and Arlette is still at her work beside the Ante, and the slow seasons come and go, and life is long, and remembered kisses are sweet.

Foolish little Arlette!

BELINDA.

BY RHODA BROUGHTON,

Author of "Good-by, Sweetheart!" "Red as a Rose is She," etc., etc.

PERIOD II—CHAPTER VIII.

BELINDA has been married three days. We are creatures of habit, as every one knows; and it is surprising with what quick pliability we find ourselves cutting off and tucking in whatever angles prevent our fitting into any new niche that it may be our fate to occupy. But this process, though rapid, is usually of somewhat longer accomplishment than three days. At all events, Belinda has not yet got into the habit of being married. There still seems to her something improbable—nay, monstrous—in the fact of herself sitting opposite to Professor Forth at breakfast in their Folkestone lodgings, pouring weak tea for him out of a Britannia metal teapot, and sedulously recollecting how many lumps of sugar he likes, as she has already discovered that he has an objection to repeating the information. Nor is it less monstrous to be warming his overcoat, and cutting his newspapers, and ordering his dinners with that nice attention to digestibility and economy which she finds to be expected of her. They have been enormously long, these three days. It seems to her as if for months she has been looking at those hideous ornaments on the drawing-room chimney-piece, and trying to draw the skimp summer curtains that will not draw across the shutterless windows, rattled by the wind. For months she has been listening to the eternal sighing, sobbing, whistling, howling of that same wind, and to the sea banging on the cold shore. For months she has been walking with Professor Forth up and down, up and down the Leas, six turns this way, six turns that way. For months she has been writing his letters till her hand ached, and reading aloud to him till her voice cracked. As for the reading and writing, she cannot have too much of them—the more the better! There is nothing like occupation—a continuous, settled occupation—nothing like occupation for keeping out of one's head those words of Sarah's that ring so foolishly dinning in her ears. "There is no sense in it! there is no sense in it!" She will not listen to them. Even if they are true, of what profit to hearken to them now? And reading and writing render conversation, too, less necessary. It is certain that, however determinately any one may have confined his or her contemplation of another person's character to the intellectual side of it, it is impossible to live with that person without discovering that he or she has another side. Belinda has already discovered that her Professor has another. It is surprising how much less of his conversation has turned during the last three days upon the problems of the mind and the sayings of the mighty dead, than upon the price of coals and the wickedness of lodging-house servants. The first of these topics has led to the proposal that he and his bride shall henceforth content themselves with one fire, to be fed with (if possible) not more than two coal-boxes per day; and the second is at present employing his tongue, his eyes, his thoughts. They are at breakfast, Belinda seated behind the Britannia metal teapot, her husband facing her, a dish of fried bacon before him, which latter object is monopolizing the whole of his attention.

"It is beyond the range of possibility," he is saying slowly, "that you and I can have eaten a pound and a half of bacon in three days, and I think I noticed that you did not take any yesterday."

"Did I not?" replies Belinda indifferently; "I am sure I forget."

"And if," pursues Mr. Forth, his eyes ranging with severe scanning from the bacon-dish to the sugar-basin, "if, as Maria just now told us, those few lumps are all that remain of the pound of sugar purchased by me yesterday, it is obvious that there must be wholesale theft somewhere!"

"It is very dishonest of them," replies Belinda carelessly, putting up her hand to her hair, which, no longer tended by a maid, feels oddly loose and uncomfortable; "if you had allowed me to bring Jennings, she would have looked after everything."

"I discouraged the idea of your bringing a maid," replies he, nettled, "because I considered, and still consider, that it would have been a most unnecessary addition to our expenses. And as to our provisions," looking carefully round the room, "I see that there are several cupboards; there is no reason why they should not be kept—"

"Bacon kept in a cupboard in one's only sitting-room!" cries Belinda, breaking into an indignant laugh; "you cannot be serious!"

"If you are able to suggest any better way of preventing their depredations, I shall be happy to hear it," he answers tartly.

"If they ate a fitch a day," replies Belinda hotly, and lifting her disdainful fine nose contumaciously into the air, "I should say that it was a small evil compared to our living in the atmosphere of a chandler's shop."

She rises precipitately as she speaks—to her, at least, Folkestone has not given an appetite—and walks to the window, where, for the rest of the breakfast hour, she presents a sociable homespun back to the economist at the breakfast-table. It is not the first time during these three days that she has discovered that his standpoint with regard to little social possibilities or impossibilities is different from her own. She had known that she did not love him, but she had not known that he wore carpet slippers in the drawing-room. A tendency toward slippers in the drawing-room, a passion for high tea, accompanied by no change of dress, are not these sufficient to wreck a bride's happiness upon? But worst of all, perhaps because latest of all, has jarred upon her this final instance of how widely asunder are their points of view. It jars upon her still as she stands by the window after breakfast, sullenly drumming on the pane.

In the night snow has fallen, a thin sprinkling meeting even the sea's lip, advancing even to where the dull little gray waves set their chill feet; a shabby sprinkling everywhere: not a good thick cloak of snow, deep and pure, but a scanty rag, through which every footstep shows the hard dark ground. It jars upon her still, as she walks to church alone—it is Sunday morning—trying to persuade herself that she had not felt a movement of gladness on discovering that he had no intention of accompanied her. She walks along the windy cliff to where the church and the red vicarage look out seaward, falling in, as she goes, with a stream of people bound to the same goal. It is a well-fed, comfortable-looking stream flowing prosperously to God's house; smart furry mothers holding the hands of smart furry little children, fathers and tall young daughters, husbands and wives. There is scarcely one, as young as Belinda, who is companionless. But she does not think of this.

Her eyes are turned toward the ocean, that ocean for the most part hugged by a close mist, with only one patch of faintish glory—a pale dazzle of dim gold—on which a small fishing-boat is sailing, its homely sails transfigured as it goes. She is saying to herself, with a heart sinking so deep that she dare not gauge its profundity:

"Is this the man whose mind I have married? Is this the man who is to teach me to live by the intellect? Is this the scholar and the sage, whose teaching was to lift me out of the circle of my narrow interests into the sphere of the Universal?" she asks with contemptuous misgivings; "this, whose whole soul is occupied by mean parsimonies, and economies of cheese-rinds and candle-ends?"

She has reached the church, but even inside the consecrated door she finds that it is still with her. It comes between her and the Christmas decorations; between her and the bowing, "congéing" clergy; between her and the prayers. A poor starling has found its way into the building. All through the service it is flying from side to side, above the heads of the congregation, under the arched roof from window to window. Children turn their heads and their eyes, idly curious to look after it. All through the sermon she hears the agonized pecking of its poor beak against the pane, in its efforts to escape. She says to herself that it is in the same plight as she. It, too, entered prison of its own accord. When the service is ended, Belinda loiters behind the rest of the congregation, in order to press half-a-crown into the pew-opener's hand—(what would Professor Forth say to such extravagance?)—and to pour into his ear an eager prayer that he will set all the church doors and windows open, to give her starling a chance of escape. But alas! what pew-opener can ever let her out?

As she passes homeward, she finds that the day has bettered. The sun has swallowed up the mist, and now shines steadily bright, and even sensibly warm. The little waves are small and mild as summer ones, though the air is still full of penknives. Perhaps it is the increased brightness upon Nature's face; perhaps it is the two quiet hours of her own society, that have braced her to face with a greater courage the lot she has chosen, and the fried bacon that typifies it.

"I would do it!" she says to herself sternly; "and now it is done; now there is nothing for it but to put the best face upon it, and never to own to any one that I would have it undone. There can never again be so bad a piece of my life as this!" (shuddering); "it is well to have the worst over first—it will be more endurable when we get to Oxbridge. I must try to learn how to look at things from his point of view—to count the grains of rice for a pudding, and save the old tea-leaves!" with a curling lip; "but I will not have the bacon kept in the drawing-room!"

Her resolutions in both respects outlast the day. That to make the best of things has body enough to withstand even the close examination to which her husband subjects the Sunday roast beef, in order to discover whether it has been robbed of any of its native suet. He has a slow, munching way of eating, which fidgets her inexpressibly; but she bears that, too. She even resists the temptation to look away from him. Since he is to munch opposite to her till death do them part, would it not be wiser to accustom herself to the sight? Her resolution withstands also stoutly all the little trials attendant on their afternoon constitutional. When they emerge upon the Leas, they see a broad highway of molten copper stretching across the sea to the lowering sun. Belinda asks leave to run down the many steps on the cliff's face to the water's edge, to set her feet in the foam fringe, and watch the long swell heaving ocean's sullen breast; but the Professor will not hear of it. A certain number of brisk turns on the Leas—always the same number—is the kind of walk to which alone he gives his approbation. No stopping to look at the copper sunset, or the fair ships riding past; nothing more likely to arrest the circulation and chill the liver. They meet the same people as they met yesterday, and the day before, and as they will meet tomorrow, and the day after; the same bath-chairs, the same dogs. The sick, white woman with her attentive burly husband; the deformed child; the frolicsome colley dogs; the frivolous Spitzes, the little blithe Scotch terriers.

Her resolution outlasts even the twilight hour, to her the most trying of the day. If she were to consult her own wishes, there would be no such hour; no space interposed between the fading of the daylight and the lighting of the gas. But it is in Professor Forth's programme that there shall be such an interval when he leans back in his arm-chair, with his eyes closed, and does not wish to be spoken to; whether in meditation or in sleep she cannot tell. There is nothing for her but to sit opposite to him, with his idleness, but without his repose. The lowered blinds prevent her looking out upon the first sunset-reddened and by-and-by moon-silvered sea. She cannot even distinguish the lustres and the vulgar vases on the chimney-piece. She cannot even stir the fire into such a blaze as to enable her strong young eyes to read by it; for to stir the fire makes the coals burn quicker. It is the hour when the happy young build love-arbors out of, and see brave sweethearts in, the red coals. What love-arbor dare she build? What sweetheart dare she see? Then come the long hours of reading aloud. They are the most bearable of the day. It does her resolution the less credit to hold out through them. However, it does hold out. But will it endure through the next day? If it does, it must indeed be of a stout fibre. For no sooner has the next day risen, than it is clear that there has come one of those rare scourge-days with which God sometimes lashes His world; one of those days whose date is remembered, which is held up as a standard in after years for other fell days to measure themselves by; a day that wrecks ships by fleets; that strikes down centenary oaks by scores; that whelms trains in its snowdrifts; that stiffens into frozen death the sheep on the mountain-side, and the traveler fate-overtaken in the snow-choked country lane.

Snow often comes stilly; but to-day it is blowing—blowing mercilessly: not a bluff west wind, good-humoredly roistering, but an inhuman northeaster, the furious sleet driven, raging and sweeping by its hellish lash.

When Belinda comes down to breakfast, there is not a soul on the Leas, but the luckless baker's boy butting with bent head against the razor-edged blast. It is scarcely the day which one would have chosen to spend in a flimsily-built seaside summer lodging-house. The Forths' lodgings are no better and no worse than most others of the class; with walls about as puny, with woodwork about as warped, with gaps between door and carpet about as wide, with curtains as miserably insufficient as most of their kind. Though every door and window is religiously closed, there is the feeling of being seated out of doors, only more draughty. Even in a warm, stoutly-built house one would shiver; but here! Well, here the cold is so marrow-piercing that it usurps to itself the whole attention of the mind. It is not a subordinate governable cold that by an effort of the will one may forget. It can never be out of the thoughts for one moment; from the hour of rising until that of shuddering back to bed again.

The Professor, always a chill-blooded creature, sits all day with his knees within the fender, piled with every article of his own, and several of Belinda's wardrobe. Throwing economy to the winds, he has lit the gas and piled the fire half way up the chimney; though whenever fresh coals are put on, a great gust of greenish smoke, furiously beaten back by the blast, comes pouring down the chimney, and suffocatingly flooding the room.

Belinda, cold as she undoubtedly is, is not near the fire. She is standing by the window, with a pot of paste and some strips of paper in her numbed hands, pasting up the apertures in the ill-seasoned shrunk window-frames, through which the wind comes icily whistling and piping. Now and again she appeals for directions to the heap of wraps beside the hearth, trying to still her chattering teeth as she does so, to keep out of her tone the intense dispiritedness which has invaded her whole being; not to listen to the ironical demon voice that whispers in her ear:

"This is the honeymoon; that is the bridegroom of your own choosing!"

All day—all day the snow swirls past. All day the sea—dimly seen, sometimes seen not at all—through the white hurricane booms and thunders on the shore. The snow cleaves to the window-panes, freezes there, darkens yet more the dismal room. Not a soul puts nose out of doors from the dark dawn to the soon-falling night. When at length Belinda has finished her painstaking pasting-up of the windows, she asks in a voice of would-be cheerfulness whether the blast is not sensibly lessened; but receives for answer a melancholy negative. The whirlwind from under the door is such as to laugh to scorn all remedies applied elsewhere. And one cannot paste up the door.

"But one may put sand-bags beneath it," suggests Belinda, still with that same desperate cheerfulness. "They may have sand-bags in the house! she will ring and ask!"

But there are no sand-bags, and the landlady, embittered like every one else by the weather, tartly replies that such a thing has never before been asked for in her house! However, Belinda is not yet at the end of her resources.

"I think," she says, "if you would allow me to fold up all the newspapers in a tight roll, it might keep out some of the wind; can you spare them all?—Pall Mall, Spectator, Academy, Times?"

Having received permission, she begins to turn them over, in order to select those most suitable for her purpose; her careless eye unintentionally alighting on a word here and there. The first two that she catches are her own late and present surnames. "Forth—Churchill." It is the announcement of her marriage in the Daily News. She drops it as if it had bitten her.

The roll of newspapers is about as effective a bulwark against the wind as a child's sand-rampart is against the sea. But since she has at least done her best, Belinda considers that she has earned the right to sit down by the fire, with her fur-coat hoisted to her ears. She offers to read aloud.

"I am obliged to you," replies the Professor morosely, "but in the present condition of my temperature, it would be perfectly impossible for me to concentrate my attention."

He even looks rather injured when she herself takes up a book. But neither can she concentrate her attention. Her mind strays from the dreary wonder as to whether this enormous day will ever end, to the still more dreary wonder why she should wish it to end, seeing that it will only lead to another like it. There has been no break since breakfast-time, with the exception of the laying and removing of their early dinner, and the altercation about the sand-bags. No one has been near them, not even the postman! Doubtless every line is blocked, and all traffic suspended. The dark has long fallen; if that indeed can be said to have fallen which has reigned more or less all day. The gas has been turned up higher; the thin curtains drawn, with many futile jerks to the rings that will not run; the fire is new-built, and a sort of air of pseudo-evening comfort diffuses itself. Belinda's slow pulse begins to beat, and her blood to circulate a little more briskly. It quickens its pace perceptibly, when—oh, blessed sight!—the lodging-house servant enters with a pile of letters in her chappy hand. Thank God! the line is not blocked after all! These are the London morning letters that should have come at eight a.m. She snatches at them eagerly. They can bring her no great good news, but they make an unspeakably welcome interruption to the uniform dismalness of the long day. They remove the terrible feeling of isolation from all human-kind, which hour by hour has been gaining ground upon her. There is a pile for the Professor; and for her a large fat envelope, bulging with enclosures, and directed in Sarah's hand. She draws her chair more closely to the hearth, and folds her soft furs warmer about her. She will enjoy her letters at luxurious leisure. She unfastens the cover, and the enclosures fall out, six in number; a note from Sarah herself, four letters addressed in well-known, and on this occasion warmly-welcomed female handwritings, and one in an unknown male hand. Is it unknown?

CHAPTER IX.

"Es ist eine alte Geschichte
Doch bleibt sie immer neu,
Und wem sie just passiret
Dem bricht das Herz entzwei."

At first it seems so; but as she looks there rises in her memory. from which indeed it is never long absent, the image of another letter, to whose superscription this one, though less ill-written, has surely a strange likeness.

She continues to look at it; a fear too terrible for words rising in her heart, and depriving her of the power of opening it. The fire crackles comfortably. The Professor turns the page of his letter. It is his third; and she has not yet opened her first.

"I hope you have good news from home?" he says politely.

"I—I believe so," she answers stammering. "I am not quite sure yet."

She must conquer this ridiculous hesitation. Probably, certainly, she is the victim of hallucination—of an accidental resemblance. The likeness is no doubt confined to the address. As soon as she sees the letter itself, she will laugh at her own foolish fancies. She tears it open, and tremblingly turns to the signature.

There was no hallucination—no accidental resemblance! She was right, "David Rivers." For the first moment she is drowned in a rush of insensate joy, followed in one instant by such an anguish of horror as makes her for awhile unconscious of everything around her—everything but that rending, burning, searing pain.

He has written to her at last! What has he to say to her now? To congratulate her upon her marriage? He might have spared her that thrust! She will not read it! She will burn it unread!—by-and-by—not now!—when she can do it unobserved.

Her shaking fingers refold the paper, hide it on her lap beneath the fur, and take up another letter—Sarah's. She goes straight through it, nor till reaching the last sentence does she discover that not one word of its contents has found entry to her brain. It is no use! That letter must be read. It burns her knee as it lies on it. It is burning, burning all through her. It is better to know the worst! But to read it here under her husband's eyes—her husband's!

She casts at him one desperate look, and then, suddenly rising, flies out of the room. He may call after her—she thinks that he does so—but she makes no kind of answer. Up the draughty stairs she flies into her bedroom; turning the key in the lock, as she shuts the door behind her. The Professor, relenting, has given her leave to have a fire there; but the chimney smokes so furiously that it has had to be long ago let out. The room is piercingly, savagely, truculently cold; but though she has been thinking of the cold all day, she is now not aware of it. How can one be cold with a red-hot iron in one's heart?

In a moment she has turned up the gas and lit the candles. It is well to have plenty of light by which to read one's death-warrant. But she cannot spare time to sit down. A frantic haste to possess the contents of that letter which, five minutes ago, she had thought herself capable of burning unread, has laid hold of all her trembling being.

Standing, she reads it; and this is what she reads:

"5, Paradise Row, Milnthorpe, Yorkshire, }
January 10th. }

January 10th! Why, that was her wedding-day! It is not to congratulate her upon her marriage, then; he could not have known it!

"Thank God! I may write to you at last, though I do not suppose that it will be much good even now, as I am so mad with joy that I doubt whether I shall be able to make any sense of it. You will have understood—you always understand everything—what has kept me from you hitherto. Of course you heard, as everybody did, of the bankruptcy that preceded and caused my poor father's death. Whatever you may have heard, do not for a moment believe that he was to blame for it. I am such a bad hand at writing, that I can explain to you better when we meet; but I cannot bear you to remain in such an error for a moment longer than I can help. His ruin was caused by a sudden and most unexpected rise in iron, just after he had undertaken an enormous contract to deliver many thousand tons of iron railings in America at a low price. It was a misfortune that might have happened to any one, however long-sighted and cautious. You know what he was to me: I have often thought since of how I must have bored you bragging about him. You may think what that home-coming was to me! Well, if there had been time for it, I think I should have given in altogether then. Happily for me there was not. If I broke down, where would mother and the young ones be? No sooner was the funeral over, than we discovered that the smash was so complete that, at all events until the affairs could be wound up—a matter probably of several years—there would be scarcely enough for mother to keep body and soul together. The boys must be educated; three of them quite little chaps. There was nothing for it but to give up whatever hopes one had of one's own! God alone knows whether or not that was a wrench. We took a little house in a dirty back street in Milnthorpe—I am writing in it now; but to-day it looks to me like a palace. I was fortunate enough to obtain a clerkship in a house, one of the partners in which had been an early friend of my father's; a clerkship which, as I was always very bad at quill-driving, and the confinement to which I had not been used, knocked me up, I soon exchanged for a place in the works. We got on as well as we could; mother has infinite pluck, and the young ones did their best. Sometimes I thought of writing to you. If you had ever answered a note I scrawled to you just before I left Dresden, I think I should have done so; but you did not: of course you were right. For eighteen months I worked without a holiday. Not having been brought up to it, I was at such a disadvantage with the other men. I scraped along from day to day, not daring to look much ahead, until, two posts ago, we received a letter from the lawyer of an old and distant connection of ours, of whom we knew little, and expected less, to say that he was dead, and had left £30,000 by will, to be divided amongst us. This of course makes a very fair provision for mother and the children, and leaves my arms free to work for myself. You must decide whether they are to work for you too. Is it any wonder that I cannot write sense? May I come? When may I come? Do not keep me waiting long, or I shall come without leave. Darling! darling! darling! I suppose that I have no right to call you that, but do not be angry; I did not write it! it wrote itself, and I cannot scratch it out, it looks so pretty written! After twenty months, one might be afraid that many women had forgotten one; but you are not of those that forget! Love! have you forgotten Wesenstein?

"DAVID RIVERS."

She has read it through, without a break or a pause, to the signature. There is no more, but yet she still stands looking at it. For one all-happy moment the present is dead to her; only the past wholly lives. Has she forgotten Wesenstein? She smiles rosiely; such a smile as has scarcely been seen to visit her face since that very Wesenstein day. "Darling! darling! darling!" She counts them. There are three. He says that they look pretty written. He is right: they have a pretty look.

A slight noise breaks her trance. It is only the Professor poking the fire in the sitting-room below; a sound plainly audible through the thin flooring. But if it had been the great Trump of Doom, it could not have more effectually bleared and shivered away her visions. There is a growing wildness in her eyes, as they retrace the sentences of the just-read letter. It is a good letter. No woman need wish to have an honest or a fonder one from her own true love. It has only the one trifling drawback of having come just three days too late. It is scarcely tactful to have thrust itself thus untimely between her and the husband of her choice!

"It is my own choice," she says; "there lies the point of the joke!" and she laughs aloud. Something in the sound of her own laugh frightens her. "Am I going mad?" she asks herself.

As she speaks she staggers to the window and throws up the sash; whether—even in this icehouse atmosphere—gasping for yet more air, or driven by some darker impulse. For the moment the hurricane has lulled. Outside it is all white with snow and moonshine: the moon herself not absolutely visible, too low to cut even her accustomed track upon the silvered sea, betrayed only by the sudden pale flash that each loud wave gives in turning over on the strand. Ceaselessly, as it has been snowing all day, the devilish wind has swept the pavement clean and bare. She can see the flagstones' fierce wet shine immediately beneath her. How hard they look! and at what a distance below her! One step from that easily accessible sill and she will be for ever healed of that pain, than which none worse ever made dying man in deadly straits call upon Death to set him free. But Death, the gentle genius with the reversed torch, laying his soft hand, coolly liberating, on the over-weary heart, is not akin to the grisly, gory, murderous phantom that she in her misery invokes. For that dread step even her perfect woe has not yet ripened her. She shivers moaning back from the razor-edged outer air, and shuts the window. She sits down by the table, and spreading out the letter before her, reads it deliberately through again. Not a tear dims her dry eye. They say that the worst of a thunderstorm is past when the rain comes. The worst of a human sorrow is past when the tear-rain comes. But Belinda's grief is far indeed from having reached that better stage. What would she not give for a few tears, or that this hideous keenness of consciousness might melt away, blurred into a merciful swoon! But she is as far from the one relief as the other. If it had been written one day earlier! If she had yielded to Sarah's passionate persuasions to delay her marriage for one month! If—if! There are a hundred ifs, any one of which might have opened heaven to her! But not one of them did.

"It is my own choice!" she keeps repeating, half aloud, and then comes again that terrible impulse to laugh loudly at the ghastly irony of it! the mirth of it! Her own choice to be sitting here alone and marrow-chilled—chilled, yet with a red-hot sword slowly turning and turning in her heart; afraid even to groan aloud, lest she should be overheard, instead of—

But the reverse of that picture she dare not face. That is the road that lies straight to madness. Her eye wanders wildly yet again over the page. Even it, in cruelty, seems always to fasten on the fondest phrases:

"I am so mad with joy!" "Is it any wonder that I cannot write sense?"

As she looks at the words, written in such pure, glad, good faith, but that seem to stare back at her now in grinning mockery, a great dry sob rocks her whole body to and fro. The pity, lavished hitherto on herself alone, now changes its current, and pours in bitterest flood over him. "Mad with joy!" until when? Until casually taking up the newspaper, he reads that on the tenth of January, James Forth, Professor of Etruscan in the University of Oxbridge, took to wife at St. Jude's Church, — Street, Mayfair, Belinda, elder daughter of the late John Churchill, Esq., of Churchill Park, Loamshire. He will not believe it! He will think that some one has inserted it as a joke. In humiliating torrent, and with a retentiveness of memory, of which she had not believed herself capable, there rushes back into her mind the stream of hold-cheap jests and jeers and quips, in which they had united the forces of their joint wits at the expense of him who is now her husband; whom at this moment she hears shoveling coal on the fire in the room beneath her. Upon no one's testimony but her own will Rivers believe it. And what words can she find in which to tell him? Again that fierce sobbing shakes her from head to foot; but she masters it. For a few moments she sits in motionless miserable thinking. Then apparently an idea strikes her, for she rises, and, taking the candle in her hand, drags herself to the looking-glass. For a moment she peers haggardly into it. At all events her face is not disfigured by tears; and the only person to whose scrutiny it will be subjected is no very nice observer of its variations.

Apparently she is satisfied with the result of her consultation, for she moves to the door, and, opening and unlocking it, passes down stairs and re-enters the sitting-room.

Mr. Forth is in exactly the same posture as that in which she had left him, except that, having finished his letters, he has been able again completely to entomb himself—hands and all—in his wraps; out of which only an elderly face—its wrinkles plowed deeper by cold and crabbedness—now peeps.

"Where have you been? What have you been doing all this time?" he inquires captiously.

"I have been in my room."

She had dreaded lest there may be something so unusual in the sound of her voice that he may turn round and look at her. But no! he keeps his attitude of peevish crouching over the hearth.

"I hope that the fire was burning well," he says anxiously. "If the grate is of the same construction as this one, it will require constant attention."

"I—I—do not think that it was burning at all," replies Belinda uncertainly.

Till this moment it has never struck her how many degrees of frost have been adding physical to her mental suffering.

"Not burning? Not lit?"

In a moment he has leapt to the bell and violently rung it; but as Maria's movements in responding to it are marked by no greater celerity than usual, there is time for the whole of the following little dialogue before her arrival:

"Have you been pasting up the windows? If not, I am at a loss to conceive what can have induced you to spend the best part of an hour in such an atmosphere."

"I—I—have not pasted them up. I will if you like."

"You have left the door open."

"I am very sorry. I will shut it."

"What are you doing over there? Why do you not come and sit down?"

"I—I—am looking for the Daily News!"

"The Daily News! What do you want with the Daily News? Is it possible that you have already forgotten that you made a roll out of all the newspapers to fill the aperture under the door? not"—ungratefully—"that it has been of any use."

"I did not take the Daily News; I laid it aside."

She does not explain why she laid it aside.

"What do you want with the Daily News?" fretfully, fidgeted by her movements.

She is on her knees before the cupboard to which her husband had planned to confide the custody of his bacon, and from which she has been unable wholly to exclude jam-pots and pickle-jars. She had forgotten that they were there, and the sight of them—unlikely as it would seem that such poor trifles could either add to or take aught from the sum of so great a grief—the sight of them seems to be the last drop that brims her cup. In after life it seems to her as if nothing had brought her so near self-destruction as those pickle-pots! What does she want with the Daily News? A desperate impulse seizes her. She will tell him.

"I want it in order to cut out the advertisement of our marriage, to send to—"

She pauses. The name sticks in her throat. With the best will in the world, she cannot pronounce it.

"To my mother?" suggests the Professor, filling up the blank conjecturally. "I have already done so."

Belinda laughs a laugh like the one that had made her question her own sanity up-stairs.

"No, not to your mother; to—to—an—acquaintance of my own!"

She has found the journal now—found it in the very spot to which she herself had—as one does—unconsciously tidied it away. In an instant, as if it were printed in her own red blood, her eye has flashed upon the announcement; picked it out from the long list. Her work-basket, in which lie the scissors with which she must cut it out, lies on the table at her husband's elbow. She stands quietly beside him, snipping, snipping delicately, in the gaslight. There must be no jagged edges; nothing that tells of emotion—nothing that will betray to him to whom it is to be sent that each cut of those fine, sharp scissors was into her own heart.

"I cannot think what is the use of occupying yourself about it to-night!" says her husband, venting the ill-humor engendered by Maria's tardiness in replying to his spells, upon the nearest object—as many better men than he have done before him. "The country post is long gone. Probably all the lines are blocked—"

"I know! I know!" interrupts she harshly; "but I had rather get it done to-night! to-morrow I—I—may have forgotten!"

She is back in her own room again, having taken the opportunity to slip out unquestioned, afforded by Maria's appearance at last—Maria, in that reluctant grudging humor with which she usually offers services, cheered by no hope of final largess; a hope that the Professor has seen fit, immediately upon his arrival, to extirpate. Belinda is in her room again alone; but, alone and undisturbed, she knows that she cannot long remain, but that she will be speedily followed by Maria with coal-box and shavings to re-light the extinct fire. What she has to do, must be done quickly. She opens her writing-case; takes out envelope and paper; directs the first, and then writes on the latter, in a large, painstaking legible hand, "From Belinda Forth." It has not taken one minute in the doing: Maria's pursuing foot is not yet heard: happily she will be as slow as she can. Belinda blots it carefully; then, after steadfastly and with perfect tearlessness considering her own handiwork for the space of a moment, she lifts the paper to her dry lips, and lays a solemn good-by kiss upon her own name; upon the "Belinda," that is, carefully avoiding the "Forth." She has no manner of doubt that he will find it there: and who can grudge them such a parting embrace?

Then, without any further delay, she folds the paper, inserts in it the advertisement, closes and stamps the envelope. It is done! accomplished! and now that it is so, an intense restless craving seizes her, that it should be on its journey. In any case it cannot leave Folkestone to-night; but at least she might do her part. It might be committed to the post. The thought of it lying here all night; meeting her again in the morning—God above her! what will that morning waking be!—is more than she can face. But to whom can she confide it? To Maria? That high-spirited person would flatly refuse to brave the elements on such a night; and neither man nor mouse could blame her. To that grimy Gibeonite—the boot and shoe boy? He would infallibly commit it to his breeches-pocket, and dismiss it from his mind. Why should she not take it herself? There is a pillar-post not twenty yards from their door. The thought has no sooner crossed her mind than it is half way toward accomplishment.

In a moment she has taken hat and additional furs from the wardrobe; has fastened them on as quickly as her trembling fingers will let her, and has stolen down stairs, creeping on tiptoe past the sitting-room door; a needless caution, for the Professor, though not at all deaf, has no longer that fineness of hearing which is spared to few of us after forty. Neither does she, as she feared she would, meet Maria and the coal-box. The hall-door is not locked, and opens easily; rather too easily indeed, for no sooner is it unlatched than a force as of ten thousand Titans violently pushing, dashes it back. It is all that she can do, after repeated efforts, and putting forth her whole strength, to shut it behind her. When she at length succeeds, it closes with a bang that—as she is aware by former experience—makes every floor leap.

Again she laughs out loud. The temporary moonlit lull is over; the cloud-rack has sponged out moon and sea. The great hurricane is awake and in wrath again. There seems to be nothing in all creation but himself and his terrible snow-sister. The air is so full of the white flurry—close and fine as flour—that it makes breathing difficult. Belinda gasps. She has to stand still for a moment, that her feet may grasp firm hold of the ground, else will the northeaster, in one of its furious freaks, take her bodily off them. Then she staggers resolutely on again; a lonely fighter through the raging winter night. Of every slightest lull she takes advantage to quicken her pace. Now and again she turns her back upon the suffocating snow in order to breathe. But not for one moment does she repent of having come. She feels no hostility toward, no fear of, the dreadful elements. Is she not as desperate as they? The hand-to-hand fight with them does her good. It seems to lift some of the lead from her brain; to set farther away from her that madness that had loomed so near. But the twenty yards seem more like twenty miles.

She has reached the pillar-post at last—an opportune momentary lifting of the storm revealing to her its snow-whitened red—has found the aperture, and has dropped into it the letter so carefully, painstakingly kept dry beneath her cloak. Yes! it is gone! gone past recall! as past recall as the wood at Wesenstein; as the friend on whose coffin we have seen fall the first cruel spadeful of earth. But of this she has no time to think. A fresh frenzy of the tornado obliges her to cling half stunned to the pillar; and the moment that she looses her hold, the snow-wind takes her in its fearful hands and hurls her back along the Leas.

For one dread moment it seem to her that it is about to hurl her far away over the cliff into the awful lap of the bellowing waves that, even now, she can hear in the darkness savagely tearing at the great hewn stones of the quay. That one instant reveals to her that the life she had thought herself capable of throwing away, is still sweet.

By a great effort her feet recover their hold of the ground which has fled from beneath them; but not until she has been swept far past the house to which she is struggling to return. Battling, blinded and dizzy; bewildered by the darkness, and by the hopeless uniformity of the row of buildings, it is long before, groping for the door that continually eludes her, she at length finds it; at length she finds herself within its shelter.

Maria does not recognize her at first, so battered and snow-covered is she; but Belinda pays no heed to her expressions of incredulous astonishment. It is possible that she may be so deafened by the elemental roar as not to hear them.

Without much consciousness of how the intervening stair-flights were climbed, she finds herself again in her room. The gas is still turned high up, as she had left it. Maria has at length relit the fire; there is plenty of light for her to see her bridal chamber by. Plenty of light, too, to see the blotting-pad on which she had so lately blotted the three words of her bille de faire part.

She takes it up, and holds it to the looking-glass. How plainly the three words come out; not a letter, not a stroke missed!

"From Belinda Forth." She mutters them over and over under her breath. "From Belinda Forth!" "From Belinda Forth!"

She is roused by a voice calling from below:

"Belinda! Belinda!"

It is her husband. Let him call! The summons is repeated with more stress and urgency:

"Belinda! Belinda!"

Is it not the voice which will go on calling "Belinda!" through life? Is it not the voice to which she herself has given the right to call Belinda; to command Belinda, to chide Belinda; immeasurably worst of all, to caress Belinda? Of what use, then, to break out thus early into senseless, bootless revolt? She hastily shakes the powdery snow from her clothes, drags off her soaked shoes, twists afresh her wet and streaming hair, and goes decently and orderly down again; decently and orderly to all appearance, for who can see the wheels that are whirling in her head, and the flashes of uneasy light before her eyes?

She finds her bridegroom in his former attitude: it seems to her as if she could have better borne him and it, if he had changed his position ever so little. But no! he is still mumping, round-backed, over the fire.

"I called repeatedly," he says, with a not altogether blamable irritation; "is it possible that you did not hear me?"

There is no answer, the wheels in her head are going so fast.

"Where have you been? what have you been doing?"

"I have been out."

"Out! You must be a madwoman!"

"So I sometimes say to myself," replies she very distinctly, and looking straight at him as she speaks.

"And may I ask," continues he sarcastically, "what induced you to choose this peculiarly tempting evening for a stroll?"

I went to post my letter."

"Pshaw!"

She has taken her former seat opposite to him. The northeaster's lash has whipped up a royal red into her cheeks, usually so far too pale.

"There is no accounting for taste," she says slowly; "mine has often been blamed. You, at least, Professor Forth, have no right to complain of it; shall I read to you?"

As she speaks, she takes up the book laid down overnight, and without further permission launches into the first paragraph she sees. She has been conscious, on coming into the now really warm room out of the frozen stinging air, of an odd sensation in her head. It feels light and swimming, but she reads on. Now and then the types wave up and down before her like the furrows of a ploughed field; but she reads on. The matter of the book and the matter of her thoughts are woven hopelessly together like warp and woof, but she reads on:

"If it could be demonstrated that any complex organ existed which could not possibly have been formed by numerous successive slight modifications' (in how many years am I likely to die?) 'my theory would absolutely break down. But I can find out no such case. No doubt many organs exist of which' (can the worm that never dies sting more sharply than this?) 'we do not know the transitional grades.'"

How the print is jiggling and bowing; but it will come straight and still again just now. She reads on.

"Pray repeat that last paragraph; I am unable to follow you; you are making nonsense of it!"

But instead of complying, Belinda tumbles the volume noisily down into the fender, and falls off her chair after it. Her wish is fulfilled: she has fainted!

GRAVES.

A mound, a stone and violets;
A bird-song in the air;
A child that gathers flowers and lets
The wind play with its hair;
A field of wheat across the hedge
Rippled by fairy hands;
A silver stream that downward runs
To cheer the lower lands.

No mound, no stone, no violets—
A blue sea overhead;
A sobbing wind, that ne'er forgets
Its chanting for the dead.
Beneath the stars on summer nights,
That deep blue grave how fair!
The while upon the shore the waves
Beat low, as if in prayer.

No mound, no stone, no violets;
No bird, nor wave, nor star;
A spot where Memory forgets
What spring and summer are;
Deeper it lies than deep-sea graves,
From land and sea apart—
O grave, so sad and desolate!
O grave, within the heart!

CHAPTER XXXVIII.
OUT OF THE TOILS.

As Hilda turned from the window a new view of the situation flashed upon her. The hour of passive suffering had gone by; the time for active resistance had come. She walked across the room and tried the door. It was fastened from the outside. She was a prisoner. At first she rebelled at the thought. It occurred to her to burst it open and defy the world. She was not afraid to do so. The blood of the Hargroves surged into her face, and as she caught sight of the reflection in the mirror she knew that the look of fierce determination painted on it had come from the brave man she had been wont to call her father. It was all a base lie, and she would yet crowd it down the throats that uttered it. But how?

That was the question. She was in danger. They would take her for a slave. She must escape from her pursuers. Not only her own future but her father's honor demanded that. Her father's honor! He had given his life for it, and she would give hers to save it from taint. All else was naught to her. All? Her hand pressed her heart as the thought of Martin swept through her brain. Then there came for the first time a terrible, sickening fear. Could it be that he had heard this story of unutterable shame, and had cast her out of his heart? She tried to spurn the thought, but it would return. Why was he not here? He must have heard—he must have known. And yet, why should she blame him? If he were at her feet begging for her consent, she would not unite her destiny with his—no, not for worlds. The dread shadow that hung over her should not rest upon another life by any act of hers. And yet she would have been glad to know that "in evil as well as good report" he loved her still. She did believe—she would believe that he did. Some terrible calamity must have kept him away—some accident—ah! there were a thousand things that would account for it.

She caught a daguerreotype case from the table, gazed upon it eagerly, kissed it and hid it in her bosom. She would keep it forever—the shadow of a love that might never be renewed, but yet full of bliss in its memory. She went and opened the little desk at which she had spent so many happy hours in writing to this playmate—friend—this brother-lover of hers. She would write one more—the last. She brushed the dust from the purple baize cover; touched her pens and paper tenderly; thought again of the refined and delicate surroundings which she had always enjoyed, and wondered vaguely what her life would be like thereafter. It did not matter. She would do what honor dictated, and no cowardly thought should make her weak. Across her memory flashed the picture she had seen in her dream—her father standing at the tiller, and the moonlit track that led to death. She could die or live, she said to herself; but, dying or living, she would be worthy of that memory.

Then she drew forth the paper and wrote. It was the thin tinted paper, which was accounted the very finest in that day. It was made in the old mill in the village beyond, the rumble of whose wheel she could almost hear. The genial owner was very proud of his best "laid paper," and had presented her with a generous store of it one day when she went to visit his daughter, in that happy past that was already so far away that it seemed to have belonged to some one else. She put away these soft memories and wrote:

"MY DEAR, DEAR MARTIN."

She had never doubled this tender epithet before. She paused a moment and looked at it. Then she drew her pen through one of them. A moment after she obliterated the possessive. "Not mine," she said to herself. "Only the Martin that I thought was mine, but still dear." Then she tore the sheet into little fragments and began again. Her pen did not rest until the sheet was finished:

"DEAR MARTIN: You of course know what has happened, or soon will know. True or false, it must separate us; unless, indeed, its falsity can be clearly shown. Even then it may well be that you would shrink from uniting your life with one on whom such a cloud had rested. I do not believe you would. I do not think you would hesitate to stand beside me and brave even the worst that fate may have in store for me. I know you are noble and brave. If you had not been I could not have loved you, and my father would not have trusted you. But because you are all that I love and honor, I must not bring you shame—no, nor even the shadow of it. Strong as is my love, I could not endure the possibility of distrust; and you would not ask me to do violence to my own sense of honor even at the dictate of affection. Besides, I will not hide from you my fear that what I believe, will never be proved. You know the mystery my father always preserved in regard to Alida and her children. I even shudder at the fear that my trust in him may itself be broken. Ah, poor crazed Alida! If it should be that she is in truth my mother, then indeed—but it cannot be! Yet, now that I am bidding you good-by, Martin dear, let me ask you to be kind to her, to shield and protect her, as if, indeed, she were my mother. You know I cannot do it. I must even fly for my own safety. The law—they say so, at least—the law claims me as a slave. Ah! how often we have thought of such things, little dreaming they would ever come near us. I remember now all the stories I heard when that strange Mr. Brown was here. How long ago it seems, and I wondered then if they could all be true. And now I am one of those strange things myself—a slave—a soulless mortal, an irresponsible immortal. I am another's property to have and to hold, fast bound and fast held by the riveted chains of the law. This hand that writes to you is not mine. You have called it yours, but it can only be yours by purchase now. These lips that you have kissed—I suppose their beauty only adds to my value in dollars and cents.

"But do not fear, Martin. I shall never be a slave. Death is a bridegroom who is always ready. No fear and no force can keep me from his arms if I must go to them to save myself from dishonor. Do not be afraid. She who has loved you—who always will love you—has not a drop of blood in her veins that would not run gladly out to save her from such a fate.

"Yet, Martin, I would almost as soon live or die a slave, as to remain even in luxury and ease knowing that he whom I have worshipped as my father had deceived me—was not my father—and that the shame they seek to fix upon me now, was mine to bear forever and to give with my life, unto my offspring! No, not that! Sooner than that, I would bury shame and suffering in a shameful grave. No other life shall take such blight from mine.

"But I must say farewell, Marty. The dear old days come back as I write—when we were boy and girl—brother and sister—soul-wedded lovers from the first. God bless you, Marty. We shall never meet again I fear—we dare not meet—unless—unless a hopeless hope prove true.

"I am going away. How or where I do not know, and you must not seek to know. Do not follow me—do not try to find me. If the sunshine ever falls upon my life again, I will come to you. Till then—or forever, as it may be—as it must be unless—ah, why will I hope! Farewell, Marty! Say farewell when you read this, as if, indeed, you kissed my dead lips—to know me forever after, only as a sweet memory. I cannot tell you, dear love, how I suffer; yet, even now, it is more for you than for myself. Again, and always, let me say—adieu. HILDA."

She bowed her head upon the desk, and drowned her dead love in tears. Her frame shook with sobs; and love that knows not laws, nor customs, nor constitutions, nor the sacred "rights of things" for a time took tribute of her fair young life. Then she started suddenly and dried her tears unconsciously. Fear came upon her once more. The sun was wearing westwardly. She sealed her letter hurriedly. Hardly had she done so when there was a knock at the door. She tried to say come in, but the words died on her white lips. The key turned in the lock, and the teacher entered. She bore a waiter on which was a bountiful repast. She closed and locked the door, set the waiter on the table, and came and stood beside Hilda, gazing at her searchingly. She stooped to kiss her, but Hilda drew away from her, while a hot tide surged over cheek and brow. The teacher read the address of the letter on the desk, and then glanced quickly around the room. Her eye fell on the lawyer's letter. She tried to seize it, but Hilda was too quick for her and snatched it away.

"You have read that?" asked Miss Hunniwell, her voice shaking in spite of her boasted self-control.

"Yes," said Hilda sullenly. She had risen, and was standing defiantly in the corner by the window.

As she spoke, she saw a man wearing a broad-brimmed slouch hat pass along the carriage-way to the rear of the house. She saw, too, the black face watching him from the thicket above.

"You know then?" said the teacher inquiringly, with her hands clasped tremblingly before her.

"I know it is a lie!" said Hilda vehemently.

"Oh, no doubt, no doubt," said the teacher reassuringly; "but you know that—that you are in danger?"

For answer Hilda pointed to the figure approaching the carriage-house. Miss Hunniwell uttered an exclamation of indignant surprise.

"The wicked wretch!" she exclaimed. "Does he think that he can prevent your escape by prowling around the premises in that style? If he thinks he is going to take you away from Beechwood and into—into—Oh! I beg your pardon, dear."

Hilda had cast herself into her arms, and was weeping on her shoulder.

"Hush! What is that?" exclaimed the teacher.

Hilda looked up in surprise, but followed her gaze as well as tears would permit.

The stranger stood in the driveway scanning curiously the rear of the seminary. As Miss Hunniwell spoke a small white packet fell at his feet. He glanced around in surprise; then picked it up, unfolded it, and seemed to be reading. He looked toward the window near which they stood, nodded his head in that direction, and then walked quickly away. The teacher stood for a moment thoroughly amazed. Then her face lighted with intelligence and scorn, as she nodded toward Amy's room and said:

"Enemies without and spies within. Poor girl! poor girl! But they shall not get you. That man has been here twice to-day. He is the man referred to in that letter—the administrator of somebody, who wants to get hold of you. But he shall not. He has no warrant, and cannot get any before morning, and you will be far enough away before then or I shall miss my guess."

"What will you do?" asked Hilda.

"Never mind, dear. Eat your dinner while I send away the spy," said the teacher, shaking her head wisely.

She left the room. Hilda heard her knock at Amy's door, and a moment after heard them both leave the room and pass along the hall. Soon the teacher returned, smiling at her own shrewdness.

"I have informed one of the teachers that she is to keep Miss Amy Hargrove in her room until after prayers," she said. "Now we can lay our plans, and there is no time to lose. I have already telegraphed for a lawyer and Mr. Jared Clarkson; also to Mr. Kortright."

"Martin?" asked Hilda, turning pale.

"Yes, certainly. He will be here by to-morrow night at the farthest."

"Oh, Miss Hunniwell, why did you do it?"

"Why, I thought you would want him here, above all," answered the teacher in surprise.

"Oh no, no! I cannot see him! He must not come! Do you not see?" she continued, and a deep flush had taken the place of pallor in her face; "if—if—it should be—as they say?"

"Ah, poor child! but it is not," said the teacher positively.

"But—but can we prove it is not so?" asked Hilda plaintively.

"True, true," said the teacher, walking back and forth and wringing her hands distractedly. "Oh, what an infamous thing! What a horrible, wicked law for a Christian people to obey! But we will not obey!" she exclaimed hotly, as she stopped suddenly before her pupil. "We will take you away from them; we will defy the law. Did not Mr. Clarkson do it last year?"

We will do it here! I will do it. I will appeal to the people. I will go myself. I will help tear down the jails. We will defy the world if need be; we will rescue you. You shall go to Canada, where people are free. Thank God, there is one place they may be!"

The delicate woman was transformed into a fury by the sense of injustice and wrong. Her hands were clinched, and the blue veins showed through her soft, fair skin, while her eyes burned with a strange, wild light that no one had ever dreamed could slumber in their blue depths.

"Thank you a thousand times," said Hilda, as she clasped the teacher in her arms and kissed her, while her tears fell on the hot, red cheeks. "You are very kind and good, but I must not risk such chances."

"What can you do?"

"I must go away."

"But how? You saw how the house is watched?"

"It must be done," said Hilda. Then she showed the note from Amory and told how she had received it.

"Aye," said the teacher bitterly. "He distrusts me. They thought I would give you up. Even the servants are truer than I have been to the right and liberty."

Hilda soothed her self-reproaches, and after a little the woman's wit coupled with the teacher's experience perfected a plan very much more feasible than the one the minister had devised. Hilda donned her most serviceable garments. Her bank account was turned into bank-bills by the teacher; a valise was hastily packed, and she was ready. Miss Hunniwell stood at the door of the dining-room and noted that all the pupils entered. Then she closed the door and a muffled figure stole down to the side entrance. The principal's carriage happened to be waiting there. The driver stood carelessly by. While the pupils sang the usual hymn that preceded the evening repast at Beechwood the muffled figure came out of the door and entered the carriage. The driver closed the carriage door and strolled carelessly along, leading his horses by the bit to the front entrance. After a short time Miss Hunniwell, equipped for a drive, came down the wide steps with a market-basket in her hand. She entered the carriage; the driver took his place on the front seat, and just as the daylight faded from the sky, drove leisurely through the streets of the little village, turned northward at the end, and with a chuckle brought the snug roadsters down to their work as if they had a long trip before them.

Ten miles away there was a busy town, at which two trains met at ten o'clock that night—the one going eastward and the other westward. A young girl left a carriage which was standing by the platform and entered one of them just as it moved away. The driver was busy with his horses. A gray-headed woman watched her anxiously from the carriage-door as she went along the platform, passed the dimly-lighted station and was then lost to view.

Evening prayers at Beechwood came at eight o'clock. Then all met in the chapel, the organ pealed forth its notes, and soft, young voices uttered songs of praise. The day's record was made up, announcements for the morrow made, and then the day at the seminary was at an end. Each pupil retired to her room; an hour was allowed for preparation for repose, and then silence settled on the throng of white young souls beneath its roof. Until evening prayers, Amy Hargrove was kept a close prisoner in the teacher's room to which she had been sent by Miss Hunniwell; returning then to her own room she found all still in the adjoining apartment. She applied eye and ear to the key-hole. She could only see the flicker of the fading firelight; she could hear nothing. She tried to open the door, and then first remembered that she had locked it. Then she took the key from her own door, and after some trouble turned the bolt. She opened the door and entered cautiously. The firelight showed that the room was empty. Hilda's things were scattered about. The door was locked. So was the wardrobe and the trunk. So, too, the little desk. Amy moved carefully about, examining everything. Then she sat down upon the rug by the hearth and thought. It was evident that Hilda had fled, but where? How? She could not understand. Of course Miss Hunniwell would not like to have her arrested there. No doubt she pitied her. Indeed, she pitied her herself, or would have done so, but for the fraud that had been practiced on her. She could almost forgive that and pity her still but for the envy in her heart. Why was it that everybody loved Hilda, and seemed only to distrust and avoid her? Even the Southern girls in the school were all sorry for Hilda now, and were angry at the man who had come to assert his right and do his duty as an officer of the law. Of course it was a pity that Hilda had been brought up to think herself free and white; but it was silly to make such a fuss about her now that they knew that she was neither. While she thought of these things Amy was startled by a slight noise at the window. Some one was quietly forcing an entrance. The sash was pried up; a hand was thrust in. Her heart stood still with terror. She understood it all in an instant. She had never dreamed when she wrote the note she had thrown to the man in pursuit of his slave, informing him that "the person he was seeking was in the room adjoining," and, in answer to his look of inquiry, had motioned toward that window, that any one would try to enter except by the door and with lawful warrant. She had been instigated by envy, and a meddlesome desire to have her own ingratitude justified after a fashion by the capture of this slave-girl, who had outstripped her in the regard of her fellows, as well as in the studies they had pursued together. Now she feared that her interference would be revealed. What if the kidnappers should be discovered and themselves arrested? Then she would be exposed, covered with infamy—perhaps held guilty with them. She would warn them now, and have them go away as quietly as possible. She was terribly frightened. The sweat stood in drops on her forehead and her limbs refused to move. The window was raised now, and a man stepped lightly within. She noticed that he wore coarse woolen socks over his boots to lessen the sound. She looked up at his face, and saw that it was strangely muffled. At length she found strength to rise. She must warn them at once. Suppose Miss Hunniwell were to return. She ran quickly across the room, and laid her hand on the man's arm. She had no fear of him. It was her information that had brought him there.

"Hush!" she said in a low whisper.

She started, however, when an arm was thrown about her waist, but before she could cry out something soft was pressed against her face; there was a pungent, choking odor; a strange sweetish taste in her mouth; the world seemed suddenly to grow dark and close about her; then as quickly to grow light and expand to infinite distance. She felt herself slipping away from existence, and then—she knew no more.

THE SOUTHERN "GATOR."

Six thousand baby alligators are sold in Florida every year, and the amount of ivory, number of skins, and quantity of oil obtained from the older members of the Saurian family are sufficient to entitle them to a high place among the products of the state.

The hunters sell young "gators" at twenty-five dollars per hundred, and the dealer from seventy-five cents to one dollar each. Live alligators two years old represent to the captor fifty cents each, and to the dealer from two to five dollars, as the season of travel is at its height or far advanced. A ten-foot alligator is worth ten dollars, and one fourteen feet long twenty-five dollars to the hunter, while the dealer charges twice or three times that price. The eggs are worth to the hunter fifty cents per dozen, and to the dealer twenty-five cents each.

The dead alligator is quite as valuable as the live one, for a specimen nine feet long and reasonably fat will net both branches of the trade as follows:

THE HUNTER.		THE DEALER.
Oil,	$5.50	Oil,	$7.50
Skin,	1.00	Skin,	4.00
Head,	10.00	Head,	25.00
	$16.50		$36.50

The value of the head is ascertained by the number and size of the teeth. Dealers mount especially fine specimens of the skull, but the greater number have no other value than that of the ivory they contain.

The wages of the hunter depend, of course, upon his good fortune in finding the game. One of the most expert of these gives as instances of successful hunts the items of three days' work which yielded thirty-nine dollars and seventy-five cents; of six days with a yield of twenty dollars and ten cents, and of eight days' hunting which netted forty dollars and twenty-five cents.

Without speaking of those enemies of the "gator" who hunt him for sport, there are about two hundred men in the State of Florida who make a business and try to make a living by capturing or killing him. Very many have eaten alligator-steaks from simple curiosity to learn its flavor; but many more eat it because it is the cheapest and, oftentimes, the only meat they can afford. The flavor when it is fried or broiled is that of beefsteak plentifully supplied with fish gravy, while the fore-legs roasted taste like a mixture of chicken and fish, and have a delicate fibre.

Very methodical in his habits is the alligator, and very suspicious of anything new around his home. When he starts out in search of food it is invariably an hour after the tide has begun to ebb, and he returns about four hours after low water. If he has a land journey to perform, he goes and comes by the same route, never deviating from it until he sees evidence that strangers have trespassed upon his domain. He lives on the banks of some stream, for he has decided objections to stagnant water, and to make his home he digs a hole at least twelve inches below the lowest level of the water. This hole is perfectly straight, although on an incline, and from twenty to thirty feet in length, terminating in a chamber sufficiently large to admit of his turning in it. There he or she dwells alone, save when the female is caring for a very young brood, in which case the one room is converted into a nursery.

Full-grown alligators not only do not occupy the same hole, but they will not live near each other.

The alligator usually lays her eggs about the first of July, and during the month of June she is busily engaged in preparing the cradle for her young. Selecting a place on the bank of some stream or creek, she begins work by beating hard and level with her tail an earth platform about six feet square. She scrapes together with her fore-feet, oftentimes from a distance of fifty yards from the proposed nest, dried grass, sticks and mud until fifteen or twenty cubic feet of the material is in a place convenient for her purpose. On the day following the completion of these preparations she lays from thirty to fifty eggs on the prepared ground, and piles over them dried grass and mud deftly worked in with sticks until a mound six feet in diameter and three feet high has been raised. The surface of this is quickly hardened by the sun, and, in order that it may be as nearly air-tight as possible, the female visits it each day, covering with mud any crevices that may have appeared, as well as remodeling such portions as do not satisfy her sense of beauty.

The ordinary time of incubation is about two months, and then the newly-hatched brood may be heard yelping and snarling for their mother to continue her work by releasing them from their prison-nest. On the second or third day after the first noise has been heard, the female bites a hole in the side of the mound, out of which the young ones, barely more than eleven inches long, come tumbling in the most vigorous manner, crawling directly toward the water. Until the young are three years old the mother exercises a parental care over them, always remaining within sound of their voices, not so much to protect them from their natural enemy, man, as from their unnatural enemy their father, who has an especial fondness for his own children in the way of food.

When then the hunter finds a nest, he carries the eggs home to hatch them, where he can easily capture the brood if the eggs are fresh or if the young in them are not more than five inches long; at any other stage they will not hatch if removed, and are of no value except for the shell. The captured eggs are then packed in straw as nearly as possible in the natural way, and the young may be thus hatched out very successfully. One farmer reared sixteen hundred and another a thousand last season. The young will eat immediately after coming out of the shell, but they thrive best if given no food for at least three months.

The cry of a full-grown 'gator is not unlike the bel-lowing of a bull, except that it is of more volume, since the voice of a male can, on a calm day, be heard a distance of five miles; and they may be said to be sun-worshippers, since they seldom "resolve themselves into song," save at the rising of the sun; in fact, the only exception to this morning melody is when a storm is approaching. The average Florida "cracker" needs no other barometer than the alligator in the neighboring creek or swamp.

One ceases to be astonished at the volume of sound which comes from these monsters when he sees a full-grown one put forth all his strength to produce the effect. He stretches his body to its full length, inhaling sufficient air to puff him up nearly twice his natural size; then, holding his breath, as it were for an instant, he raises both head and tail until he forms the segment of a circle. When all is thus complete, the "roar" comes with sufficient force to startle one, even though he be prepared for it.

Since, in order to guard his head, the alligator is obliged to turn his body somewhat, and since, when his jaws are once closed he is unable to open them if only a moderate amount of strength on the part of man be used, the hunter selects this point for attack when it is possible for him to steal upon his game unawares. If the intending captor gets a firm hold upon the jaws of his game in this way, the monster becomes reasonably easy prey; one rope soon secures his jaws, another is tied around his neck and fastened to a tree, while a third secures his tail in the same way, thus stretching the captive in a straight line; his fore paws are tied over his back, a stout pole is lashed from the end of his snout to the tip of his tail, and the 'gator is helpless.

It is seldom, however, that the hunter gets his game at a disadvantage, and to secure him alive he must set about the work much as boys do when they snare rabbits. A tall, stout sapling near the water's edge is the first requisite, and directly in front of that, in the water, a narrow lane or pen is made with stakes, the two outer ones being notched, as is the spindle of a box-trap. At the end of this pen, and nearer the shore, a stake is driven into the mud, and on the top of it is fastened a piece of tainted beef. A stout rope, at one end of which is a large noose, is fastened to the top of the sapling, and to the upper part of the noose is attached a cross-bar, or trigger, which, when the tree is bent, catches in the notches on the outer stakes just below the surface of the water, the noose hanging around the entire opening. To get at the meat the alligator attempts to swim under the bar, but his back displaces the trigger, and he is a captive, with the rope fastened just back of his fore legs.

It is necessary to bind the captive while he is in the water, and then to carry him to the shore in a boat; for, amphibious as he is, he can be drowned if dragged even a short distance through the water. When once properly secured and on land, the alligator can do nothing in the hope of effecting a release, save to roll over, and this he does by a mighty effort with his shoulders, frequently working himself over a quarter of a mile in distance in a single night.

Those who are most familiar with the habits of the alligator, as seen in the Southern States, believe his partiality for decayed food does not arise from any particular flavor it may possess, but simply because in a putrid state any large amount of flesh is more easily torn apart and masticated than when fresh. Although the possessor of so much ivory in the shape of teeth, and able to use his jaws with so much power, it is an extremely difficult matter for an alligator to dismember a pig, even after the flesh is decayed. While the meat is yet firm and the muscles intact, it is an impossibility for him to do other than swallow it nearly whole, as he sometimes does when interrupted shortly after he has killed his prey. That alligators do like fresh food when it is possible for them to eat it is shown by the fact that fresh fish and small turtles are their favorite diet. In the stomach of a twelve-foot alligator there have been found six catfish, none of them mutilated, weighing altogether thirty-four pounds.

If one believes implicitly the positive assertion of the alligator hunters, he must perforce say no man knows the span of life allotted these saurians. The native Floridian, as well as the hunter, will insist that the largest of the 'gators are more than a hundred years old, pointing to the fact of his slow growth in proof of the assertion. A newly-hatched alligator is eleven inches long; at the age of six years he is very slim and but three feet in length; at ten years of age he has gained considerably in breadth and but twelve inches in length, while during the next two years he has grown hardly more than one inch longer. An alligator fifteen feet in length, caught near the mouth of the St. John's River, was so covered with barnacles and other marine growth as to make it almost certain that he must have been in existence seventy-five years.

JAMES OTIS.

KALSTROM'S WIFE.

"The sun is bright, the sky is clear,
The wind blows soft and free;
For that the larder runneth low,
Go thou ashore," said she.

"Keep thou the watch, then, wife of mine;
Farewell, farewell!" he cried.
The lake was blue, away he flew,
Across the waters wide.

The shining hours ran on apace,
Till day was almost done;
Then, swift and dark, the angry clouds
Put out the sullen sun.

The fierce winds roared, the tempest beat;
Brave Kalstrom gave a moan;
Far up within the lighthouse tower
His young wife watched alone.

Three times his trusty boat he launched,
With strong, determined hands;
And thrice the rude waves hurled it back
Upon the treacherous sands.

But as with straining eyes he gazed,
Clear shining like a star,
The red rays from the lighthouse tower
Streamed steadily and far!

Day dawned, day waned, but o'er the lake
Still swept the furious blast.
All day, all night, young Kalstrom raged—
A lion caged at last.

"Now, by yon heavens!" he cried, "not here
Another night I'll tarry;
Come life or death, I'll risk the waves
And bread to Lisa carry!"

Up in the lonely lighthouse tower
Pale Lisa prayed and wept;
While round her, lashed by furious winds,
The mad white surges leapt.

O weary watch! O doleful days!
O pain of heart and limb!
O awful dread, when far away
Upon the world's wide rim

She saw a little dancing fleck !
 Was it a boat? A boat ?
 • Dear God, on those wild, howling waves,
 What keel might hope to float ?

Swiftly the darksome night came down,
 The world was blotted out,
 When from below her lofty tower
 She heard her husband's shout :

"Ho, Lisa ! ho ! a rope ! a rope !"
 The casement wide she flings ;
 The cold spray dashes in her face—
 The boat beneath her swings !

Swiftly the knotted noose she threw ;
 "Now pull, lass, pull !" cried he ;
 While up his costly freight she drew
 Safe from the hungry sea.

Back sped the coil. Beneath his arms
 Scarce had he drawn it tight,
 When great waves swamped the rocking boat,
 And swept it out of sight ;

While he clung quivering to the wall,
 All bruised and sore bestead,
 The raging surf beneath his feet,
 The blinding storm o'erhead !

Then cheerily rang Lisa's voice
 Through the tumultuous din :
 "Hold fast, hold fast, my husband brave,
 For thou and I will win !"

On the taut rope she tugged and strained ;
 Up, up he climbed and swung,
 While to each crevice in the wall
 With hands and feet he clung,

Till he could see her soft, dark eyes
 Above the window-sill.
 Then came a mighty sweeping wind,
 And wrought them grievous ill !

It tore his strong hands from the wall,
 It hurled him in the lake ;
 Drowning the shriek of wild dismay
 From Lisa's lips that brake.

But, swift as thought, her brave young arms
 Paid out the lengthening line ;
 It held him in the rushing surge—
 'Twas like a hand divine.

Then once once more that faithful wife
 Her heavy task essayed ;
 Up, up beside the lighthouse tower
 Once more the strong man swayed.

He grasped the window-sill at last—
 O Kalstrom, veil your eyes,
 For breathless on the oaken floor
 Your peerless Lisa lies.

Nay, ask me not ! My lips refuse
 To tell the direful tale,
 Lest woman's cheek should turn too white,
 And feeble hearts should quail.

But oh, ye high souls, who have borne
 All pangs for love's sweet sake,
 Nor shrank beside the cruel rack,
 The fagot or the stake ;

Ye faithful ones, who, undismayed,
 For love have yielded life,
 Open your ranks and give her room—
 Brave Kalstrom's braver wife !

JULIA C. R. DORR.

A FLOWER TALK—NEXT SUMMER'S GARDEN.

IF annuals are planted, no weeding should be attempted until the plants have attained sufficient size to enable one with certainty to distinguish flower from weed. In the early stages of their growth the two resemble each other so closely that very often one is mistaken for the other. But as soon as you can tell them apart, begin the work of weeding. A thorough cleaning of the beds at the start will do away with much future work of that sort which it would be necessary to do if the first weeding were not thorough. Very many seeds will fail to come up. In such cases it will be necessary to transplant from places where there are too many plants standing together. Never allow plants to stand thickly enough in the beds to crowd each other. If you do, some will be choked and starved, and none will be as fine as they ought to be. The small annuals, like the portulaccas and sweet alyssums, ought not to stand closer than within six inches of each other. If you have more plants than you know what to do with, don't throw them away. There are always poor persons somewhere about the neighborhood who would be glad to take the plants you have no use for.

If the season proves to be a dry one, you must see that your plants do not suffer from lack of moisture. Take a watering-pot with a rather large-holed nozzle on the end of the spout, and go over the beds every evening if water is plenty. In dry times it is necessary to do this if you would have good flowers. If water is scarce, you can clip grass from the lawn or the pasture and spread this over the beds and among the plants. This will help retain the moisture and prevent a too rapid evaporation from the soil. After it has become wilted and unsightly it can be worked into the bed, where it will rot and act as a fertilizer.

Very many kinds of plants have a tendency to "straggle." They put out a branch here and another there, and are far from presenting a symmetrical appearance. This can be prevented very easily if the proper action is taken in time. On observing any inclination, on the part of the plant, to eccentricities of this sort, pinch off the end of the straggling branch. This will induce other branches to start, and while they are starting the other branches will develop sufficiently, in most cases, to bring the plant into proper "balance."

If you would have the greatest possible amount of flowers from your plants, either annuals or bedders, as the greenhouse plants used in the garden in summer are called, you must be particular about one thing, and that is to remove all flowers as soon as they begin to fade. If this is done, new shoots will start, bearing buds, and thus the supply of bloom will be constant, and as profuse as it is in the nature of the plant to produce. If seed is allowed to form and mature, the energy and strength of the plant will be used up in the process, and you will have but few flowers after the first crop. This is one secret of success with many gardeners. They take care to cut off every flower when it is past its prime, and, in consequence, they have such constant supplies of flowers, and these in such profusion that a great many non-observant amateur florists get the idea into their heads that this successful person must have a peculiar method of growing flowers—a “knack” which they do not possess. Instead of being a “knack,” it is usually a knife or scissors, and the regular and persevering use of them.

If you care to cut many flowers for use in the house—and almost everybody who loves them wants flowers in every room during the season—it is a good plan to have a corner expressly for “odds and ends,” from which you can cut without feeling that you are taking away from the beauty of the garden-beds. In this corner you can sow such seeds as may be left after sowing in the beds. Here you can put out cuttings from the bedding plants, and “strike” the branches you cut off from your house plants in the spring when you put them out on the veranda for the summer. Nothing will come amiss. In a short time you will have a brilliant bed of miscellaneous plants, and the more flowers you cut the more there will seem to be. There is a peculiar charm about these out-of-the-way corner gardens that I fail to find in the more orderly beds in the garden or on the lawn. Perhaps it is because there is a total lack of formality and primness, and such a general fraternizing of all kinds of flowers that the very atmosphere of the place is redolent of good will and equality.

If you attempt to grow dahlias, you must take care to have them planted in a very rich, mellow soil. This flower is a great feeder, and if you have only an ordinary soil for it to grow in, it will probably give you a good deal of disappointment. But if you put out good strong plants in rich soil after the ground has become thoroughly warm, and not before, and are careful to give them all the water they need through the season, you need not fail of success. Every week save the soap-suds from the wash-room, and apply it about the dahlias. If the season is dry, mulch the ground about them with grass. In wet summers, if you have noticed it, you will see that our dahlias are very much finer in every way than in dry seasons. If you would have success in their culture, then imitate the conditions of the seasons in which they are most satisfactory. As the branches of the dahlia are brittle and easily broken, always stake your plants well and keep them tied. If this is not done, a wind may make sad havoc, and from its effect the plants will not recover during the season. If you give the dahlia a rich soil and plenty of water you will be delighted with the results.

One of our most beautiful flowers is the gladiolus. It combines the brilliancy of the rose with the delicacy of the lily, and it has the merit of being easily grown. It seldom fails to give complete satisfaction. The bulbs should be planted in groups of half a dozen. The soil should be light and rich. Put a stake by each bulb, and as soon as the flower-stalks appear tie them up. When planted in clumps, dark-colored twine can be stretched around the stakes, and the stalks will be supported by it, and by each other, and the effect is more pleasing than when each stalk is tied up by itself, on account of all lack of primness and stiffness. We have no flower more valuable for cutting and use in the house than this one. Buds on the end of the stalks will develop and expand after being placed in water. The gladiolus makes a most brilliant show, and the varieties of it offered for sale by the florists are almost innumerable.

The tuberose is another flower which deserves a place in every garden, but we do not often see it grown far from the cities. I suppose the reason of this is that persons who know but little about the characteristics or requirements of the plant have tried to grow it and failed, and from this cause the tuberose has the reputation of being unreliable. Now the facts are the tuberose requires quite a long season to mature in, and it is quite tender. If planted out in open ground too early in the season the cold earth weakens its vitality, and it does not recover from the shock during the summer. If not planted out until warm weather is an assured fact, it does not come into bloom before frost comes, and the least touch of frost is death to it. Therefore, to be successful with the plant, we must adopt such treatment as will prolong its season of growth. Start your tuberose in pots in the house in March. Put them out in the garden when the ground is warm, and give them a generous diet. With this treatment, in nine cases out of ten, you will have good success with them. You must be sure to stake the plants when the flower-stalks appear, for they will bear too heavy a load for their strength to support well when their flowers expand. The tuberose has a rich tropical fragrance, and is very beautiful in its waxy whiteness. The variety called pearl is the best, as it does not grow as tall as the others, and has as large flowers and more of them. In purchasing bulbs be sure to get those which have not bloomed before. The blossoming plant of this year is of no value next, save as a producer of new bulbs. It will not bloom again.

EBEN E. REXFORD.

WON.

At last I have thee safe—
Thou wilt no longer chafe
Against the chain.
Thou canst not, though thou would,
Be aught but true and good Ever again.

Yes, now thou art my wife:
The suit to win, the strife
To keep are o'er.
The weakness of the flesh,
The spirit's waywardness
Will vex no more.

No more will anger harm
Or jealousy alarm,
Now thou art mine.
Thy other lovers all,
Hearing that grim recall,
The chase resign.

They do not greatly care
If thou be foul or fair,
Single or wed.
To me they yield their claim
On body, soul and name—
Now thou art dead.

HENRY A. BEERS.

A SESTINA.*

[LEGEND.—In New Hampshire, near the banks of the Connecticut River, there is a small pond, very deep, and whose water is of a deep crimson color. The country adjacent, in the colonial days, was occupied by the Abenaki tribe of Indians, who were driven away by the English settlers. Associated with the pool is the following legend.]

BESIDE the rushing stream that vainly tries
To woo the banks away, and long has fought
With angry floods and unexpected rise
To kiss their mossy brows; as if it thought
To win its prize by passion. Then swift dies
And shuns the heights which it so madly sought.
Within a whispering wood undoubted sought,
You think, by fays and sprites; but when one tries
To picture it their home, the fancy dies;
For ghostly red, as if souls tortured fought
To hide beneath and lave their bleeding thought,
There lurks a pool whence mocking shadows rise.
From midnight shadows of the pool doth rise
An Indian girl, by peeping moonbeams sought,
And clad with silver light, as if they thought
To make the maid more beautiful. She tries
To still her heart, which bleeds as if it fought
With some great grief whose memory ne'er dies.
The maiden, fairer than the West where dies
The day, with plaintive song sings of Love's rise
And fall. How in the olden time there fought

Against her tribe a youth so fair, who sought
Her love. Now changed her song; a captive tries
To conquer conqueror with amorous thought.

A day he madly loves; but when she thought
Elysium was won, his passion dies.
Mad with hot love, to win a kiss she tries,
Low kneeling at his feet, where, ne'er to rise
He kills her; and her heart-blood streaming sought
This pool. Lost the fierce battle she had fought.

Her trait'rous lover sought the pool, and fought
With his mad dreams; to cool his fevered thought
He drank. Exultant, to the depths she sought
To tempt him. Lo! he falls, and struggling dies.

Her song is done, and as the sun doth rise
He seeth naught but shadows though he tries.

L'ENVOI.

And to this day, they say, a mortal dies,
If faithless to his love, and will ne'er rise
If stooping there to quench his thirst he tries.

* The sestina, or sestino-stave, is the most complicated of all the Provençal forms of verse. It is said to have been invented by Arnaut Daniel, a Troubadour. It is seen in the unrhymed form in one example by Edmund Gosse. Rhymed examples like the original one given herewith are very rare in English, and the present instance is one of the first from an American author.

THE HOUSEHOLD—SOME MANTEL LAMBREQUINS.

THERE is one before us which we contemplate with great satisfaction, the materials for which did not cost more than fifty cents. It is made as follows: Get one yard of crimson canton flannel, one and a quarter yards of crash toweling (if it is wide enough to be split into two lengths), and an ounce of Germantown wool or zephyr, as near the shade of the canton flannel as possible.

The best way to cover any mantel is to have a thin, smooth board, cut just the size of the marble, as the covering can be stretched much more smoothly over this and nailed securely on, and it can be lifted entirely off when any dust is being made, and thus preserved fresh much longer than if fastened at the back of the real mantel.

For a mantel of ordinary size, the canton flannel will be sufficiently wide to cut into two widths, beside two narrow strips, the use of which will be explained later. The two large pieces must be neatly joined with an overhand seam, which should then be pressed on the wrong side to make it perfectly flat. Turn down an edge all around, and baste it closely with red cotton, using very small stitches on the right side, as the basting is to remain. Then fold this canton flannel part and lay it aside while the crash border is taken in hand.

If the crash is sixteen inches wide, it may be split in two; but if less than this, a piece must be bought long enough to go across the front and sides of the canton flannel, allowing for corners and seams. The length given for the canton flannel was half the length, with an inch or two over for seams, of the mantel it adorns, and this rule should be followed for any other mantel. The two lengths of crash are neatly joined with an overhand seam on the wrong side, sewed with a raveling of the same, and the width is then divided into three parts by drawing threads. All the threads are then drawn out from the central third, with the exception of rather less than half an inch from the bottom. This is to separate it from the fringe. The selvage side of the crash is used for the top, as it is neater for joining, and the other side is nicer for the fringe.

Now thread a large needle with the ravelings, and, beginning at one end of the drawn part, fasten in the middle. Then take up six or eight of the threads and turn under the next six or eight. This is continued from end to end, and the uniting thread merely brought along as though the others were strung on it. A row of feather-stitching is next done on the crash with the worsted at each edge of the open work.

The plain upper third may now be taken in hand; and for this almost any simple pattern in chain-stitch with the same worsted will look well; or star-shaped flowers in long stitches may be preferred. Our pattern was traced with the help of a large spool, and is in rather upright waves chain-stitched.

The selvage edge of the crash is next to be carefully basted with the red cotton on the edge of the canton flannel, laying a plait at the corners, and sewing that part with the raveling. The canton flannel is lapped over the crash, and a row of feather-stitching makes the edge perfectly flat.

The lower third of the crash is now raveled out for the fringe, which is left perfectly plain, and the narrow strips of canton flannel are joined and basted at each edge beneath the open-work above. The effect of this bordering is very much like that of Macramé fringe, without half the trouble, and the mantel cover calls forth much enthusiastic admiration.

The color of the canton flannel and worsted may, of course, be varied to suit any apartment; and, with such numerous and exquisite hues in the former material, there need be no difficulty in matching furniture and curtains. A room has a more finished look when curtains and mantel-cover are of the same material; but this is not always practicable, and in winter thin fabrics are scarcely suitable for this purpose.

Another pretty cover may be made of very dark garnet or olive-green canton flannel, with a bordering of Japanese crepe pictures framed in narrow black velvet. This bordering should be lined with silesia, or undressed cambric; and the fringe may be made of worsted to match the canton flannel, mingled with bright silks.

Almost every one understands what ticking embroidery is, but few have seen it used for a mantel lambrequin. It is very effective, however, and may be done with a mingling of split zephyr and silk, that will make it comparatively inexpensive. A very narrow black velvet ribbon, to cover the blue stripes, is a great improvement in this work; and feather-stitch, herring-bone, point-russe and chain-stitch may all be used. When carefully done it has a very rich and Oriental effect; and it can be used as a bordering to almost any thick material. This mantel-cover should be finished with a fringe, of which the foundation may be a thin black silk fringe with strands of bright-colored silks crotched in on the front. This makes a very handsome edge.

For those who can paint, many beautiful things are possible; and, among them, mantel lambrequins quite out of the common order. Something very pretty may be made of enameled cloth, with the lambrequin cut straight and painted with designs similar to those found on tiles. The lambrequin should be fastened on with gilt-headed nails, and a little gilding used in the borders. A connected story is always desirable when a number of designs are used; but something of a very simple character only should be attempted by the amateur. A study of Minton's and other tiles will be found very useful; but the actual imitation of tiles is to be avoided rather than aimed at, since real tiles would be out of place on a lambrequin.

The enameled cloth is used with very good effect, particularly in a dining or sitting-room, with no other embellishment than brass-headed nails where it is joined, and worsted fringe on the edge of the lambrequin. In using brass-headed nails avoid the common failing of placing them too far apart, as this gives the article a very scant look. They should be separated only the breadth of the nail head.

Velvet and velveteen make very rich-looking mantel-covers, and are much more expensive than the two other materials. But where something really handsome is wanted for a parlor mantel, a very satisfactory result may be accomplished by covering the shelf with either fabric, attaching a lambrequin of white silk embroidered in outline work after tile-patterns, and paneled with old-gold-colored velvet to carry out the picture idea. Very little of the white ground would be visible, and that little would only enhance the beauty of the coloring. A fringe of gold-colored silk would complete a very elegant lambrequin. Where blue is the prevailing color of the furniture, dark blue might be used for the shelf-color, and vivid blue forget-me-nots worked on the white silk lambrequins, the whole finished with a fringe of blue silk and threads of gold.

Different colored velvet ribbons joined with feather-stitch, and embroidered with little dots or other devices in the centre, and edged with handsome fringe, will make a lambrequin of great richness, particularly suited to a room where the other furnishings are in dark, warm colors.

ELLA RODMAN CHURCH.

WORSHIP OF THE SUNFLOWER.

AN English church, not fifty miles from London, was a few days since decorated for a thanksgiving service for a bountiful harvest. The church is an ugly one, partially painted a dull red color, and on either side of the altar-table, against this red background, stood four sunflowers in pots. For sunflowers, with all the associations they possess, to be thus prominently used in such a place, to the exclusion of the many delicate, more beautiful and more fitting emblems of such a season, argues strange ignorance of what decoration is worthy the house of God, and is a strong plea in favor of a minister himself superintending such decoration, and not leaving it, as too many do, to the taste of ladies who make it "look pretty," as they would their ball-rooms. The expression, "worship of the sunflower," would hardly seem to be a senseless one, when we think of its occupying a place at our altars.

When will the craze of the day be superseded by a pure appreciation of the beautiful—a real love of art—art in its highest and best sense? In America, I believe, the "gaudy, smutty-faced" sunflower, and all of which it is a type, long since gave way to what is simpler and more artistic; but while it is used for decorative purposes, its glory in England must still be far from declining.

"WILL the Household Editor please inform a reader of the correct pronunciation of Judge Tourgée's name?—A. E. V., Auburn, Me."

Ans.—Judge Tourgée is of Huguenot descent, and gives the name its French sound, as if it ended zhay.

"NOTICING in the 'Household' page of THE CONTINENT of January 10 a bitter complaint from 'K,' in regard to mould on jellies, I am moved to go to her relief. She appeals to her 'sex.' I did a much wiser thing. I appealed to the other sex. In former years it was as much trouble to me to cover my jellies as it was to make them. My plan was to cut numerous circles of paper. The smaller ones were dipped in brandy and laid over the surface. Then a larger circle was immersed in white of egg and drawn tightly over the cup, bowl or tumbler. The egg produced an air-tight covering, and also served as paste. My husband is a chemist, and one day, upon observing my tedious proceeding, he asked me why I did not lay a lump of paraffine on the top of the hot jelly, and let it melt and spread over it. The success was perfect. No mould—no branded paper—no paper at all! If a little doubtful in regard to whether or not the jelly is sufficiently stiff at the time of placing it in the glasses, the paraffine can be melted and poured over the cold surface after any length of time. When the jelly is needed for use, a knife slipped under the edge will remove the whole cake, which can be laid away for service next year. I have followed this plan for several years, and neither mould nor sugary surface has molested me.—E. L. L."

"I AM an interested reader of your journal, particularly of the Household Department, and perhaps can help a little to make the labor of some of my sisters lighter if I send you a few hints which I have long used, but never seen in print. First, in sweeping carpets, use wet newspaper wrung nearly dry and torn into pieces. The paper collects the dust, but does not soil the carpet. Second, a carpet, particularly a dark carpet, often looks dusty when it does not need sweeping; wring out a sponge quite dry in water (a few drops of ammonia helps brighten the color) and wipe off the dust from the carpet. This saves much labor in sweeping.—F. C. S., Cambridge, Mass."

"CAN some of your readers give me a recipe for cleaning plaster of Paris medallions without destroying the lineaments, etc.; also one for permanently brightening old copper coins.—F. S. C."

A CORRESPONDENT who is indignant at the expensive nature of the bills of fare prepared for THE CONTINENT sends an excellent rule for corned or dried beef, which is given below. As to the objectionable menus, if our correspondent has followed the course of this department he may remember that they were announced in the beginning as for all purses. Some are very simple; some more elaborate, but the most complex one has never been allowed to equal the ordinary menu of fashionable society.

"PICKLE FOR TWO ROUNDS OF BEEF.—Cut the rounds in suitable shape for drying; mix together two pints of salt, one pound of brown sugar, and half a pound of saltpetre; rub them with this, and pack them in a tight vessel; make a pickle that will bear an egg, and pour it over; put a weight on the top and let it lay for ten days; then take it out and smoke it two days; if partial to smoked beef, hang it in a dry place, in drill bags, to keep out flies. In preparing pickle for any kind of meat, observe that one gallon of water will hold, in solution, a quart of salt and two ounces of saltpetre. This keeps beef the year round."

HELEN CAMPBELL.

HEREAFTER the two serial stories running in THE CONTINENT will be alternated so as to give a double installment of each serial every second week. We find that the installments which our space permits are not such as to allow of satisfactory portions of two serials being printed in each number, and the alternation not only enables us to present a greater variety, but to give such portions as will satisfy the reader.

THE enterprising manager of Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's operettas is announced—not on very good authority, to be sure—as having engaged Mr. Matthew Arnold for a lecture tour in this country next season. Is it not reasonable to draw an inference from this as to the possible character of the next play contemplated by these eminent composers? The Oscar Wilde side-show appears to have paid very well in the case of "Patience," and why should not Mr. Arnold prove an equally good card in connection with something notable in the way of contemporary criticism?

THE Harvard Annex has borne its share of chaff during the four years of its existence, its students having been the recipients of quite as many good-natured compliments as of ungallant sneers. Mrs. Louis Agassiz has just made an interesting report on its present status, which shows that the "Annex ladies" have thus far been for the most part either young women who intend to be teachers, or older ones who are already teachers, and contrive to pay the by no means moderate fees that they may become better teachers. Beside these professionals, there is a percentage of amateurs who have leisure and scholarly tastes, and who study because they wish to. The Annex seems to have outgrown the suspicions under which it rested at first, through the real earnestness of its members and their proven capacity to mind their own business.

"THERE'S millions in it," beyond a doubt—thirty-six millions, at the lowest estimate—that of a United States commission of professional engineers, while another moderate estimate, that of Captain Eads, of bridge and jetty fame, modestly suggests one hundred and fifty millions, to make a good beginning. Yes, "there's millions in it"—in this project of controlling the flow of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, that is—millions for construction, more millions for maintenance, and still other millions for repairs and improvements. River and Harbor bills, paltry Back Pay "grabs," Credits Mobilier and the rest, fade into insignificance when compared with the possibilities of Mississippi improvements. Just here some one who wants to convict us of hostility to the South will stop reading, and denounce THE CONTINENT as opposed to all broad schemes for the "regulation of commerce between the states," as the Constitution puts it. Of course it is of no use to explain to these people that there is reason in all things, even in the amount of money which the nation ought to spend in furthering these special and peculiar interests. Nevertheless, we venture to suggest that even if the project of regulating the flow of these mighty streams is possible to modern engineering—and the question is merely one of time, men and money—the strain on the national finances would be beyond all reason, and would favor a ring with opportunities and temptations of unprecedented magnificence. Let any one who doubts spend an hour in studying the habits of the tiniest brooklet, which are in miniature the habits of the Mississippi. Call the great river a mile wide between levees, and the brook a foot wide from bank to bank. A confining levee, or embankment, ten feet high along the river would be represented proportionately in the case of the brook by one less than half an inch high. How much, think you, would the brook be restrained by such a barrier after a sudden thunder shower in the summer or a prolonged rain? The United States Government can do it, of course! It can do anything! and the mere building of a continuous quadruple chain of mountains along the great rivers may be effected if the nation sets about it. Then there is that other pleasant little project which contemplates storage reservoirs, wherein the surplus waters of early spring shall be retained until they are wanted during the drought of summer! If the redoubtable Colonel Sellers had thought of the Mississippi he need never have wasted his time in providing eye-water at a dollar a bottle for the four hundred million of weak-eyed Asiatics. The whole country is interested in having the river made as useful and as harmless as possible, but the way to do this is to learn the habits of the river, and adapt ourselves and our necessities to its convenience. No strait-jacket can be made that will restrain this giant when he puts forth his strength.

AN exchange informs us that a student of Williams College has invented a new method of squaring numbers, and then tells us how it is done. It is no doubt a valuable discovery. The world has waited a long time for another way to perform this operation. Where a man makes a business of squaring all the numbers that come in his way it gets to be tedious, and it must rest him a good deal to change hands now and then. Besides that it makes a tremendous strain on the multiplication table. The new method has the advantage of variety. The dry process of multiplication is pleasantly interspersed with numerous other mental operations that must render its application as entertaining as a Chinese puzzle. A checker-board would be a good thing to practice on at first, or one might have a few reams of paper ruled especially so as to mark the special positions. We give it in the interest of science, and hope none of our readers will think that because we give it we have any notion of starting a puzzle-column. Perhaps it would be best for such of our readers as may be aware of insanity in their families to skip this interesting process, or get a professor of mathematics to hold their heads while they read it. The process is as follows: "Beginning at the left, multiply the double of each digit of the given number by the number represented by the preceding digits, and write each product under those already obtained, in such a way that its right-hand figure shall be two places to the right of the right-hand figure of the preceding product. Then square each digit successively, beginning at the right, and place the right-hand figure of the first result one place to the right of the right-hand figure of the last product before obtained, and the right-hand figure of each succeeding square two places to the left of the right-hand figure of the preceding square. Add the columns together, and the result will be the required square."

WITHIN a few months—July at the earliest and September at the latest—the American citizen will have the opportunity of trying a new method of transmitting small sums of money through the mails. He may, for instance, ask the local postmaster for a $2.50 postal note, and will hand him $2.53. In return he will receive a slip of paper about the size of a "greenback," at the left of which will be printed three columns of figures, one representing dollars, one dimes, and one cents. In other columns are years, months and days. The postmaster will punch out from this slip figures representing $2.50, and the year, month and day on which the note is purchased. The bearer of this note is entitled to receive the sum specified on presenting it, properly endorsed, at the office where it is made payable. The system is not so safe as the postal order or the registered letter, but it is cheaper, and involves a minimum of red-tape. No application is necessary, as the note is bought as easily as a postage-stamp, may be slipped into an envelope, and forwarded to its destination without the frequently tedious delay necessitated by waiting for forms to be filled out and numbers to be registered. It will, in short, almost take the place of the lost and lamented fractional currency, which was so convenient when one wished to send fractional parts of a dollar to a correspondent. A similar system has been in use in Great Britain for two years, and during the second of these years notes to the amount of over ten million dollars were sold at the different offices of the United Kingdom. The postal note will not do away with the money order system, which has been somewhat modified and cheapened, and which will no doubt be as largely used as ever in the transmission of larger sums.

A NEW species of young man has lately become sufficiently numerous in the streets of New York to demand classification as a type. The time-honored and now somewhat obsolete terms of "dandy," "swell," "cad," and so on, even when qualified and intensified by the adjective "howling," do not seem to meet his case; so the great slang-loving public invented a name for him, which quickly became current, and has now found its way into print. This young man seems first to have attracted notice by means of his banged hair, but the bang does not, or at least did not, constitute an individual of the species, though perhaps at the present time it may be regarded as typical. No satisfactory etymological derivation of the term "Dude" has as yet been suggested by the philologists, but it appeals to a subtle sense of harmony when used in reference to the live specimens whose chief habitat is the west sidewalk of Fifth Avenue during the late afternoon hours. The dude possesses in his outward appearance and bearing all the attributes of a gentleman, excepting, perhaps, that of manliness. His dress is unostentatious in its perfection, its only loud notes being a pair of white gaiters, which are believed to be going out already in obedience to the unwritten code of dudeism. Why the dude feels any interest in life is not clear—he does not look as if he enjoyed it. There is a certain introspective earnestness in his bearing that reminds one of the theological student, and perhaps the prevailing high collar strengthens the resemblance. To say that the dude is offensively supercilious would do him injustice, for superciliousness implies a certain conspicuity out of tone with the eternal verities of his creed. That he is intensely supercilious is probably true; but his superiority to the multitude lies in the fact that he holds all distinguishing marks of his rank strictly in abeyance. The dude is young now, and his advancing years will be watched with curiosity by an anxious public. It is now held by high authority that he must be under twenty-five years of age. What he will be after passing that limit time alone can show. Let us hope that he will be as harmless then as he apparently is now.

MIDDLE-AGED people, whose memories go back to the days when Abraham Lincoln was rising into public notice; when John Brown was preparing to capture Harper's Ferry "with his nineteen men so few;" when Grant and Sherman and Sheridan were known only on the Army Register—such people remember a little, feeble, keen-eyed Southerner who represented the State of Georgia in Congress, as long ago as 1843, and who, prior to that time, had served in the legislature of his own state. It must be at least forty years since the news-gatherer of the period began to prepare paragraphs to the effect that the Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, was confined to his room and was much reduced in strength. A few days or weeks later he would perhaps be reported as dying, and presently he would be back again in his seat in Congress. Paragraphs like these have gone the rounds of the press with irregular periodicity before, during, and since the war. A dozen times he has had his obituary written, and yet it is only yesterday, as it were, that the end came, and the strong spirit escaped from its frail body. What this man would have done had he been blessed with the average health and strength of men who reach the age of three score and ten, can only be conjectured. As it was, he worked his way upward from the cabin of a poor Southern white to the Vice Presidency of the Southern Confederacy; and when his tenure of that office was summarily cut short, he came back to Congress as naturally as if he had never seceded, and died at last the chief executive of his native state. What might he not have achieved had his intellect been sustained by the average physique of the American man? We hope shortly to give our readers an illustrated article on the life and home surroundings of this remarkable character.

MR. CONWAY has long been known, not only as a keen observer, but a graceful and telling narrator, and in the present case personal affection and admiration have formed part of the feeling with which his subject¹ has been approached. The story of Mr. Conway's own youth, very modestly told, is only one of countless similar incidents in the life of the elder man, who, while never seeking to influence, came to be a power in minds of every grade and calibre. The story of the home life of Emerson is necessarily also that of the transcendental movement in New England, and Mr. Conway is one of those who, under his influence, passed out from all the traditions of their youth, and accepted the seer's version of life. At this point come some interesting glimpses of Emerson's private spiritual beliefs. The first hint for all speculators comes in an answer to one who had asked what his own opinions were:

"I believe that most of the speculations and difficulties that infest us we must thank ourselves for—that each mind, if true to itself, will, by living for the right, and not imparting into itself the doubts of other men, dissolve all difficulties, as the sun at midsummer burns up the clouds."

Later, when talking with Mr. Conway of the fierce theological discussions at Trinity College, he said:

"I am not much interested in such discussions; it does seem deplorable that there should be a tendency in some people to creeds which would take man back to the chimpanzee." "I have very good grounds for being a Unitarian, and a Trinitarian too. I need not nibble forever at one loaf, but eat it and thank God for it, and earn another."

His dislike to mere theological discussion increased with years, and he held more and more to the optimistic theory that time would do far more than any antagonistic criticism ever could. When such argument was thrust upon him, he was fond of silencing it by a little story:

"Mary Ketch, a wise and saintly Quaker woman, told him that her little girl one day asked if she might do something. She replied, 'What does the voice in thee say?' The child went off, and after a time returned to say, 'Mother, the little voice says, no.' 'That,' said Emerson, 'calls the tears to one's eyes.'"

Emerson's opinion of Carlyle is a discriminating one, in spite of the strong friendship existing between them, or rather in one of them, since Carlyle seems to have had little but criticism to spare for even those nearest him, Miss Mitford's letters, lately published, giving a quotation which is only one more indication of how little value Carlyle ever placed upon affection, save when he had finally lost it. Mr. Conway writes:

"He often spoke of Carlyle with warm personal affection; but it was plain to me that the later works of his friend were regarded by Emerson as unhealthy. When the 'Life of Friedrich' was appearing, he derived great benefit from it, and wrote warm thanks to Carlyle for each volume; but there was some hesitation when it became a question whether any youth should re-enter the old atmosphere of enthusiasm which had surrounded Carlyle's writings. As much care was needed to get at the best in Carlyle's book as to get at the heart of the man. 'When I was in England,' he said, 'young men desired me to introduce them to Carlyle; but I said, Why will you have this vitriol thrown over you?'"

As a rule he preferred silence on his own work, and when his own poetry was praised interrupted with, "You forget—we are damned for poetry." He included his own poetry under his label for much American work of that kind—"versers." None could come up to his unyielding standard. Rufus Griswold he held an interesting person, as the one man who has discovered the existence of American Poetry. Not that he did not love and value his contemporaries and literary friends—he rejoiced in them; but he was remorseless in his demands about poetry. Poe was merely "the man who jingles." Of moderns, Carlyle most nearly approached his poetic standard. Of himself he said once, when forced to speak, "My reputation, such as it is, will be one day cited to prove the poverty of this time."

Bits of biography of the philosopher's famous neighbors, many of which have never before appeared in print, are given, one of the most interesting being of Hawthorne:

"One wintry day Hawthorne received at his office notification that his services would no longer be required. With heaviness of heart he repairs to his humble home. His young wife recognizes the change, and stands waiting for the silence to be broken. At length he falters, 'I am removed from office.' Then he leaves the room. Soon she returns with fuel and kindles a bright fire with her own hands; next she brings pen, paper, ink, and sets them beside him. Then she touches the sad man on the shoulder, and, as he turns to the beaming face, says, 'Now you can write your book!' The cloud cleared away. The lost office looked like a cage from which he had escaped. 'The Scarlet Letter' was written, and a marvelous success rewarded the author and his stout-hearted wife."

As a whole, Mr. Conway's book, while making no pretension to be more than a chatty record of memories and impressions, is thus far the truest picture of Emerson that we have had, and many traits of the man, which have been heretofore hidden behind the philosopher, are given with wonderful charm. That his last days were clouded and obscured does not mar a line, for sweetness and dignity remained to the last; and Mr. Conway's book is an interpretation that will stand even when more formal biography comes to give us more minute details of a life which is and will remain one of America's dearest possessions.

THE biography of Margaret Fuller, in the "American Men of Letters Series," will be written by Colonel Higginson.

D. LOTHROP & Co. are to reprint Dr. George Macdonald's essays, entitled "Orts," under the title of "Imagination and Other Essays."

"THE ACADEMY" pronounces Mr. Browning's new poem to be the best work he has done since the appearance of "The Ring and the Book."

THE autobiography of Frederick Douglass has been translated into French, under the title of "Mes-Années d'Esclavage et de Liberté," and has had a warm reception in Paris.

MISS FRANCES POWER COBBE's "Peak in Darien" has found as many readers in this country as her "Duties of Women," having gone into its seventh edition. Both books are issued by George H. Ellis & Co., Boston.

A CERTAIN light and frisky character, altogether incompatible with the impression thus far most popular, attaches itself to the latest appearance of "Daniel Deronda," which is as feuilleton in a French paper published at Cairo!

"THE WHEELMAN," the bicycle organ for this country, is as breezy and stimulating a magazine as the lover of out-door life could desire. Outing shares its honors, and both are necessary to one who would keep pace with the growing possibilities of enjoyment to be had in the open air.

"OUIDA" would hardly be expected to furnish much material for the ministerial profession, save in the way of denunciation, and her opponents will be surprised to hear that an English clergyman has made a selection from her works, soon to be published by Chatto & Windus, under the title of "Wisdom, Poetry and Pathos."

No book recently published has had such hearty abuse as the "Life of Bishop Wilberforce," whose reminiscences were edited by a son who seems to have thought as little of sparing people's feelings as Mr. Froude in his kindred work on Carlyle. An abridged edition is to be published in this country by E. P. Dutton & Co.

THE John W. Lovell Publishing Company have added to their list an extremely cheap and on the whole well-written little "Life of Washington," by Leonard Henly. Whether an hour with the Father of his Country is sufficient for the reader may be questioned, but whoever has only the hour, more or less, will find this a useful way of spending it. (16mo, pp. 207, 50 cents). From the same publishers comes "The Secret Dispatch," by James Grant, a Russian story of the time of Catherine II, in which intrigue and exciting adventure of every sort appear. (16mo, pp. 256, 50 cents).

THERE is no better writer of stories for boys than Mr. Ascott R. Hope, who began this work many years ago, and is now a veteran in the field, though his last volume, "Homespun Stories," shows no loss of vigor or spirit. The stories are homespun only in the sense that they are the personal reminiscences of the tellers. The humor is frank and careless, and the material mostly adventure in school and out, of harum-scarum boys. But there is no sensationalism, and there is a very honest and generous spirit at bottom, which makes the collection especially welcome. (12mo, pp. 346, $1.00; D. Appleton & Co.).

THE name of Roberts Brothers is so identified with a scholarly and fine form of literature that any book they issue will, it is taken for granted, find a place already made for it. Certainly this was the case with Mr. Edwin Arnold's "Pearls of the Faith." He completes in this volume his "Indian Trilogy," giving a poem to each of the "ninety-nine beautiful names of Allah." The charm found in the "Light of Asia" is not wanting here, but there are many evidences of haste and careless finish, and all will regret his numerous alterations in the favorite poem beginning, "He who died at Azan sends," and entitled now, "A Message from the Dead." As a whole, the volume will not add to Mr. Arnold's reputation. (16mo, pp. 319, $1.00).

In "The Colonel's Daughter; or, Winning His Spurs," Captain Charles King, U. S. A., has given the public an old-fashioned novel, in which analysis is replaced by description and adventure, and we have a story rather than a dissection of the characters who might have made a story. There is some exceedingly picturesque and vivid writing, notably in the Apache attack, and the Adjutant, Mr. Truscott, though rather unnecessarily mysterious, is very well drawn. Many features of garrison life are most admirably given—the gossip and pettiness as well as the finer side—and the reader is well pleased at last with the ending, wherein the Colonel's daughter becomes the adjutant's bride, as had, of course, been foreseen from the beginning, though the various obstacles had at times seemed insurmountable. (12mo, pp. 440, $1.50; J. B. Lippincott & Co.).

In her "Fairy-land of Science," Miss Arabella B. Buckley, known as a pupil of Professor Huxley's, took rank at once as not only a charming writer, but one who knew her ground thoroughly, and whose facts could always be relied upon. The same characteristics which have distinguished her in the past are found in quite as marked degree in "The Winners in Life's Race, or the Great Backboned Family," which, while really a sequel to a former book on invertebrate animals, entitled "Life and Her Children," can be read without reference to that. There are many carefully-drawn illustrations, some of the most interesting of which are the "geological restorations," necessarily rather conjectural, but all of value; and nothing could be better adapted to interest children in such study, or could hold a simpler or more delightful arrangement of every-day facts. (12mo, pp. 367, $1.50; D. Appleton & Co.).

IF another cook-book of any description can be needed it must be the latest one, entitled "Ice Cream and Cakes," for in it is to be found such a collection of practical and well-tested receipts as will delight the soul of every experimenter in such directions. The book is intended for the use of confectioners, as well as of private families, and there are many creams and ices quite unfamiliar to American palates. The rules for cakes are, as a whole, very satisfactory, though the inexperienced house-keeper will be likely to stumble over the rules which give "one quart of white of egg," with a question as to how many it takes to make a quart. But, for the purpose intended, as a whole, nothing could be better; and the book itself, with its gray and silver cover, is a charming addition to the literature of the kitchen. (12mo, pp. 384, $1.50; Charles Scribner's Sons, New York).

GAIL HAMILTON takes a remarkably sensible attitude toward her novel, "First Love is Best," which found fewer readers than it deserved. She is reported to have said to a friend, apropos of some discussion concerning heroines: "It will be news to the public that I ever had a heroine. But it is even so, and a very nice young woman she was, too; but nobody ever cared anything about her. The fact is, she was too good for this wicked world, and she never made the smallest sensation in it. Now the people are complaining of Mr. Howells and Mrs. Burnett that their heroines are ill-behaved and fall in love with other men than their husbands. I made up an excellent heroine to order—my own. She was a good, hearty, wholesome, honest girl, free and spontaneous, dutiful and simple. She walked along a difficult and dangerous path not only untainted but untempted—not by virtue of any high resolution, but of right instinct—into the region of perfect happiness which ought to lie like a lake of light around every world of man's creating, whatever man's Creator may find best. What was the result? She walked alone! When I am tired, or have an hour or two of leisure, I sit down, book in hand, and take sweet counsel with the charming creature, but nobody else ever heard of her."

It is a fashion of the day to make bulky books. Two or three volumes are compressed into one, and the reader who would do more than glance at an author finds that one hand is of small use, and that even two are speedily tired out with the burden. The book that one needs as constant companion should be of a size and weight that fit the hand and rather invite taking up, and such is the case with the "Little Classic" edition of Emerson's works, in nine volumes. The Riverside Press has seldom done daintier work, and though the narrowness of the type has occasionally been objected to by readers who claim that it is more likely to tire the eyes than the ordinary size, this is not sufficiently marked to be an argument against the form, its perfect clearness upon the creamy tint of the paper offsetting the slight disadvantage. The miscellanies, collected into one volume, and including "The American Scholar," an oration delivered at Cambridge in 1897, which gave him his first full recognition as a man destined to make profound impression on the time, hold also the address delivered before the senior class in Divinity College, Cambridge, in 1898. It is difficult to reproduce the state of mind which received this as the audacious word of an unbeliever and iconoclast, or to understand fully why such a cry of dismay arose even from those in sympathy with him. Emerson's calm faith that time would justify him proved itself sooner than he hoped; but each one of these miscellanies is a bit of biography, and many points in them are reproduced in the lately issued correspondence between Emerson and Carlyle. The edition has been carefully revised and edited, and is in all points a very satisfactory addition to the bookshelf. (9 vols. $13.50).

GEORGIA is probably the only place in the world where a railroad builds culverts of white marble and lays its ties on a bed of the same material. Yet this is true, and so far as truth goes it might have been stated that the road-bed was a gold mine. These statements may seem exaggerated, but as a matter of fact Gilmer and Pickens Counties, through which the Marietta and North Georgia Railroad runs, are bound together by white marble nearly as fine as that of Carrara, and it is through this marble that the road-bed has been cut.

IN a recent issue of Ward's Natural Science Bulletin, Mr. F. A. Lucas gives a very interesting description of the methods by which the skeletons of animals, birds and reptiles are sorted, cleaned, mounted and finally packed for transportation in fulfillment of orders from every part of the United States as well as to foreign countries. We give an extract which will show in some degree the vast amount of care required in the mere packing: "Large pieces are usually dismounted, the pedestal secured to the bottom of a box, and the body, skull and limbs lashed securely to numerous cross-bars. A box of small skeletons, however, presents a more difficult problem, and when finished is a perfect maze of cross-bars and strings. The skulls of the mammals are detached and fastened inside the chest cavity, and twine passed around the legs and tied to the standards. The skulls of birds are so secured that even if loosened they cannot fall, while the smallest pieces are usually enveloped in soft paper. All being thus prepared, the pedestals are secured to the sides of the box by screws from without, and a general view taken of the situation. Here a dog is weak in the knees and must be supported by bars at the neck and the pelvis. One of these bars runs under the back of a turtle, and a cord passed around his body prevents all vibration, while to the other is secured the neck and bill of a heron, whose long legs are sustained by still another brace. There a fish's skull has to be held up by cords passing diagonally to the sides of the box, and a duck's bill is 'guyed' in a similar manner. So one after another all are secured, an occasional shake of the box showing that all undue vibration of its contents has been guarded against."

MR. JOSEPH F. JAMES sends to the Botanical Gazette some notes on California plants, the result of a residence of a year and a half in Southern California, principally in the neighborhood of Los Angeles. One of the prettiest of trees, the pepper-tree, is used for its shade. The flowers are small, greenish-white, in long racemes. The fruit is globular, of a deep red color, and hangs in long bunches, contrasting beautifully with the pinnate leaves. It is hot and peppery to the taste, and in Mexico, where the tree is native, it is known as Chili pepper. From the broken leaves and branches exudes a white, gummy substance, which is also peppery. Generally not very tall, its branches some eight or ten feet from the ground. The bark is rough and scaly, but the long, pendulous branches and pinnate leaves are handsome. It blossoms twice a year, and is an evergreen, the branches never being bare of leaves. It is extensively planted in Southern California, but the climate of San Francisco is not very suitable for its full development. One of the commonest plants in some localities seems to be the California poppy. Where it grows in large patches, as it frequently does, the blossoms make the ground appear of a most intense golden color, and when the sun is shining brightly upon them, the eye is dazzled by the blaze. It does not seem to occur at all east of the Wasatch Mountains, but is very common in the neighborhood about Los Angeles. The well-known grease-wood forms nine-tenths of the vegetation in many parts of the mountains. It is a bushy shrub, with awl-shaped leaves and close clusters of white flowers. The roots are extensively used for fuel, and its presence on land is a sure indication of water at no great depth. Yucca Whipplei is very handsome. The flower-stem is often ten feet high, and is covered for about one-half its height with a dense mass of bell-shaped white flowers.

THE report that the brain of Gambetta, when examined by the experts, was found to weigh 1100 grammes, or less than 39 ounces, has led to the publication of an immense number of brain weights. The brain of the adult human male is said to average about 50 ounces, and that of the adult female about 45. The maximum weight of the healthy brain is about 64 ounces, and minimum about 31. In cases of idiocy it has been found weighing only 20 ounces. Broca places the lowest limit of brain weight compatible with human intelligence at 32 ounces in males and 30 in females, the average weight of the European male brain being 49 ounces. Dr. Bischoff, of Bonn, published two or three years ago perhaps the most exhaustive study of the subject ever undertaken. He had examined and weighed the brains of 559 men and 347 women. His figures were as follows:

	Highest.	Lowest.	Average.
Male,	67.9 oz.	35.9 oz.	48 oz.
Female,	55.2 oz.	28.9 oz.	43 oz.

Bischoff weighed the brains of ten cultivated and celebrated men, some of which he found to be below the average, while none reached the maximum. The brains of 119 ordinary offenders weighed 11 grammes more than the average, some having a weight of 1500 and even 1600 grammes. Broca, on comparing 115 skulls taken from a vault closed up not later than the twelfth century, with another series of 125 skulls taken from a cemetery belonging to the earlier years of the present century, found the average capacity to be 1426 and 1462, showing a considerable gain during seven centuries of progressive civilization. As to the actual weight of the brains of eminent men full statistics are not obtainable. Taking individual cases, some twenty-three in number, Cuvier, the naturalist, heads the list, according to one authority, with 64½ ounces, and according to another with 64.33 ounces. The brains of Abercromby, the physician, and of Schiller, the poet, weighed 63 ounces each; Sir James Simpson's weighed 54, and Chalmers's 53; the brains of Napoleon and Daniel Webster 57 ounces. The brain of a mulatto who died not long ago at Cincinnati was found to weigh 61 ounces. He was not considered bright intellectually. The heaviest brain on record, which weighed 67 ounces, according to Dr. Morris, was a bricklayer, who "had a good memory and was fond of politics, but could neither read nor write; so that whatever his potentialities, his actual acquirements were not great." It may surprise our readers to learn that the only statistics of Chinese brain-weights available show them to exceed all other nations in this respect. The average brain weight of the males reached 50½ ounces, and that of the females 45½ ounces. This is an average not attained, so far as yet known, by any other nation, it being fully 6 ounces above that of the average negro, and 1½ ounces above the European. The brain of Guitau weighed 49½ ounces, exceeding more than 10 ounces the reported weight of that of the great French Republican.

THE DRAMA.

THE youngest daughter of the late Charles Fechter was recently married in Paris to her cousin, M. Henri Poree.

M. SARDOU, the eminent French dramatist, is of medium stature, quite thin, and seems very delicate. His residence, built by Manard, is at Marley le Roi, where he remains continually, save a visit once a week to Paris. He is a martinet at rehearsals, insisting that his smallest instructions be implicitly obeyed by all his associates.

THE sensational melodrama of "Youth" was lately produced at the Walnut Street Theatre, in Philadelphia, in a most elaborate manner. The principal characters were in able hands, Mr. Charles Vandenhoff being admirable as the much-abused hero, and Madame Majeroni highly artistic in a very ungrateful part. The scenery and stage management was very satisfactory, particularly in the battle scene, "The Defense of Hawk's Point." Volley after volley of musketry and artillery were fired in sight of the audience, a Gatling gun being used; the savages were pressed back at the bayonet's point; the stage was strewn with the fallen, and the final victory of the English troops concluded a series of stage pictures that were realistic to a decidedly exciting degree.

SIGNOR SALVINI will bid farewell to the American stage in the latter part of April, at the Academy of Music, New York, prior to which he will appear at the Chestnut Street Opera House, Philadelphia, for a week. In these farewell performances he will be assisted by no less a celebrity than Miss Clara Morris. Two such notabilities appearing in consort is an especially interesting and important event, and in the contemporary drama could not be duplicated. In their respective lines there do not exist two greater (if as great) exponents of the art dramatic than the illustrious Italian and the brilliant American actress. As a portrayer of the elemental passions of man Signor Salvini stands alone; as an exemplar of the emotional in woman Miss Morris has no superior.

Aperire.

(THE name of the month of April is said to be derived from the Latin word Aperire, (to open), because its warmth opens everything which had been closed by the cold of winter.)

"To open" the ice-locked channels,
That the streams, uncurbed and free,
May rush from their mountain sources
Far down to the great deep sea.

"To open" and cleave a pathway
Aloft in the vaulted sky,
For the flutter of countless pinions
That up to the northward fly.

"To open" the bills of the warblers,
And fill them with lays of love,
Which float on the air around us,
And ring from the boughs above.

"To open" the windows of heaven
To the soft down-plashing rain,
That sinks in the fresh-plowed furrows,
And rises in mist again.

"To open" the earth's warm bosom,
To the green and tender blade,
As it starts from the swelling kernel
And steals to the sun or shade.

"To open" the hearts of the people,
And their lips with prayer and praise,
'Tis the name and the mission of April,
With her sweet and changeful ways!

Fullness of Joy.

HE will not slay me, though I here declare
In God is sense of humor. So the gust,
Prostrating pompousness in sudden dust;
Th' electric snap of repartee; the stare
Of moon-eyed owls; the monkey tribes—had He No hand in these?

That we like Him might be,
He gave us of His own our comic powers.

These transient tears upon His face and ours
With sin shall cease. Aye, then our gladness flowers
To humor sweet like His. In us is wrought
His wit as well as wisdom. We are brought From baby glee to joy so deep it is As laughterless upon our lips as His.

WILLIAM M. BAKER.

In the Waltz.

AT last in my arms I held my queen,
As, whirling and circling to and fro,
We heard, as we threaded the waltzers between,
The glorious music ebb and flow.

I could feel her heart, like a bird imprisoned,
Against my breast through her corsage beat,
As I held her close in the waltz and listened
To the maddening music and pattering feet.

As we whirled and circled about the room,
My senses swooned with the joy and bliss;
My soul seemed drunk with her breath's perfume,
And I pressed on a vagrant tress a kiss.

I saw a flash in my rival's eye
As I kissed the tress as it fanned my cheek,
And I said to myself, as I heard her sigh,
"Now or never—this moment speak."

THE EASTER HOLIDAYS.—Twelve o'clock at the Children's Party.—The Last Dance, "Sir Roger De Coverley."

I bent my head 'til it touched the glory
Of golden hair that encrowned her head,
And there in the waltz I told the story
That shall yet be new when the world is dead.

There in the waltz I won my treasure,
Full in the ball-room's glare and heat,
Whirling swift through the waltz's measure,
Keeping time to the music's beat.

As I looked in her eyes, brimming o'er like a river,
I clasped her close, for I knew I had won;
And then, with a blare and a crash and shiver,
The music ended—the waltz was done.

To a Slipper.

WHEN my great-great-great-grandmamma
Was but a maid of sweet sixteen,
This slipper, faded now and frayed,
Was hers in pride of satin sheen.

'T hath danced in stately minuet,
And as it twinkled in and out
Beneath her brocade petticoat
'T hath tortured many a heart, no doubt.

It hath a small, unsteady heel
And such a curious pointed toe,
That with a strangely mincing tread,
Must she have been constrained to go.

Yet I doubt not her powdered hair
And glancing eyes accorded well
With these same inarionette-like steps,
And made her lovers' bosoms swell.

My dear great-great-great-grandmamma
Long since was clothed in heavenly guise;
For, spite this slipper frivolous,
She walked this world in godly wise.

THE TAOS HARVEST—A STRAIGHT FURROW.

A HARVEST WITH THE TAOS INDIANS.

AROUND the Indians of the Pueblos is thrown that interest which attaches itself to any subject presenting an exceptional or anomalous character. Less an exception, perhaps, than an anomaly, these people seem to afford for North American ethnology the necessary link between savagery and civilization. Though strictly an Indian, the Pueblo is an Indian without those peculiarities of war paint, tomahawks and feathers which commonly clothe him in the popular mind; for long training in a complete system of domestic and tribal law has elevated him to a respectable status in morals, taught him to rear a permanent dwelling, and to cultivate his lands as a means of subsistence.

These Indians occupy a long, irregular belt, extending from the borders of Mexico into the southern extremity of Colorado, a belt containing twenty-three villages in one lengthened chain. A tour through the principal of these brought our party, after various not-to-be-forgotten experiences, to the Pueblo of Taos, the most northern of the New Mexican series.

Taos is generally held by archæologists to be one of the oldest inhabited pueblos, and in construction may be regarded as a type of its class—we say inhabited, for several of them are now without the vestige of an occupant.

Our party consisted of three persons—two Easterners in search of the picturesque, and a Western man, who knew mules and the Indo-Spanish dialects. It was in the twilight of a hot, tedious day that our ambulance wheeled slowly through the corrals and into the plaza of the village. Our approach was heralded by the screech of an eagle, which moved uneasily upon one of the loftiest pinnacles of the pueblo, and stretched out his ragged black wings against the sky. The announcement of this sentinel brought forth a score of blanket-clad figures, either rising from the traps in the roofs or issuing from the alleys of the town. In a moment we were surrounded. The governor was on hand, and easily recognized—a tall, spare man, well grayed with years. He picked away nervously at the short hairs of his beard as he listened to the labored interpretation of a letter from the Great Father at Washington; and then led the way in a rapid zigzag through the scattering crowds. We followed with difficulty, and found him waiting in front of a low mud lodge. An armful of dry corn-husks threw out a brilliant light from the fireplace in the corner, and our quick survey of the tenement was followed by a spontaneous outburst of commendation. The floor was of hard cement, and the walls at their intersection met in a curve. At the height of a foot a little variety was introduced by a broad line of yellow ochre, and from this to the top the walls were whitened. The ponderous timbers overlying the walls were barked and left clean, and allowed to protrude several feet on the outside—a feature characteristic of all pueblo buildings. As the chief withdrew, there came a sense of complete ownership in the little house, and it was not long before we had moved in our luggage and adjusted it to our liking.

On the following morning we were able to satisfy a hitherto restrained curiosity in regard to this, the finest of the pueblos. The town itself never appears more striking than at this early hour. Raising its pyramid in six irregular gradations, each tier turns toward the east a few ragged corners to catch the light, while the remainder, lost in shadow, hints of indefinite size. The silence of the housetops is impressive, as the members of each habitation offer up their mute tribute to the sun, the while drinking into full lungs a morning's refreshment of pure oxygen. Thin blue lines of smoke rise above a score of chimneys, as from acceptable offerings laid upon the altars of Ceres hidden below.

The town of Taos was formerly encompassed by a wall, the remains of which are still to be seen skirting an irregular space of a dozen acres or less. Within this, and on either side of the stream which intersects it, two piles of buildings have been reared, beside other smaller lodges which lie about these centres. There were originally no doors or means of ingress on the ground floor, but, instead, entrance was had through trap-doors in the roofs, reached by ladders from without, which in time of danger might easily be pulled up, so as to allow no opportunity to the invader. With their animals safely corraled behind the walls, and an abundance of water at hand, the inhabitants high out of reach, how perfect the whole arrangement for a siege! But "the piping times of peace" have spoiled this unique idea, punched holes into the basement, broken down the outer walls, and allowed the bridge to crumble and fall into the swift water below.

Thrift, however, is the mighty enemy of the picturesque; and now that easy neglect has laid her loose hand upon it, the subject presents, in its broken lines and half-buried accessories, also in the diversified tones of its color—the token of relative age—a rugged and barren grandeur that it probably never possessed when the sentries paced to and fro upon the housetops, and the wall was kept at the height and condition of a convent barricade.

In front of the North Pueblo stands a row of huge bake-ovens, conical in shape, each provided with a large door and a hole for the draft. Most of the year they are unused, save by the dogs, who find them snug kennels at night, or by the pet eagles for whom the dome-tops seem to have a peculiar fascination. Reaching the walls of the structure, twenty yards farther back, we mount one of the many ladders and gain the first platform. The door which first confronts us is about half a man's height, and, stooping, we enter. After a moment the eye becomes accustomed to the dim light of the apartment, and we glance about. The room probably measures fifteen feet by twenty feet, with a height of seven and a half feet. In one corner is the open fireplace, about which lie pots, large and small, used in cooking, a pile of piñon branches and mesquit roots for fuel, and a large olla with open mouth serving as a deposit for ashes. Along one side is the bed, with its cushion of skins and blankets, under which are concealed the few valuables of the occupant. From the rafters hangs the cradle, a stout wicker basket furnished with soft skins, and beside it are strung festoons of many-colored ears of corn, red peppers, jerked meat, bear grass, feathers, etc.

A multitude of ladders of all sizes, charred and cracked chimneys, surmounted by bulky caps; a bake-oven large enough for a night's lodging, trap-doors ad infinitum, poles of odd and unnecessary lengths, which serve, as occasion requires, for jerking meat and drying clothes, are what confront us on each exit from the dim dwellings into the intense sunlight. As we mount higher the walls become more delicate and the ceilings lower, the highest story of the North Pueblo barely accommodating a person in sitting posture. The owner sleeps inside, but lives, so to speak, on his front porch. Here and there, on a balcony by itself, is a large wooden cage, which indicates ownership in an eagle, though usually the bird, with wings clipped, is described enjoying his probatory freedom on an isolated clothes-pole, or in the lofty summit of a tree of the sacred grove.

Taos, though one of the few pueblos retaining its original form since the invasion of the Spaniards, in 1540, has been gradually going to decay for the want of owners to fill and care for its habitations. The two structures have a full capacity for a thousand souls, though less than half this number now occupies them.

Behind the town lies the grove, a sort of park for its denizens, which throws a shade over the stream, and hides it darkly until received into the steep sides of the cañon behind. Entering leisurely, we are led through its stately arches and along the well-worn labyrinth of path. Here and there is seated a quiet group. The smoke from the pipes is watched as it curls and is lost among the limbs and leaves. Now and then a weird song breaks the silence, or the low mumble of conversation swells the monotone of the stream. There is certainly an enchantment in this unfeigned serenity, ignoring all thoughts of obligation and care, and the impression left gives rise to a swarm of speculative fancies.

A day or two being allowed to test the motives of the strangers, the Indians readily became friendly. We were known to be from Washington. Our clothes told this. Washington is to the Indian a modern Babylon—large enough to contain all people wearing pantaloons over their boots, and coat-tails. The blue shirt men come from Kansas. (Here all the self-cocking revolvers are made.) Upon this recommendation we were granted the freedom of the village, together with its dwellings, and paid for the privilege roundly. Our calls were promptly returned, generally at meal time, this being an hour reserved for the purpose. The chimney of our lodge upon the ground floor was well placed as a centre for the eyes of the little community, and became an irrepressible tell-tale of dining hours. It was possible, also, for the curious to know our bill of fare by analyzing the odors as they rose out of the top. Our food, though eaten by them with relish, was received in a manner bespeaking the compliment which they seemed eager to return upon us in accepting it.

Occasionally we dined out, more from curiosity than for any epicurean gratifications. We usually found the household squatting around a dish of frijoles, or stewed beans, and an olla podrida, or a pot of boiled meat, hot with peppers. As it was the height of the corn season, a tenajah full of real homelike-looking ears was invariably part of the spread. Tortillas are made of flour, a cross between a thick cake and a thin loaf, fried upon hot copper plates. The beans are eaten with scoops, which look like pieces of brown paper; but, strangely enough, both spoon and frijoles go down together. This scoop is an article of food, called guayare, plastic enough to be easily rolled up and used—an advance upon fingers, but a degree below pewter.

To the stranger, with never so limited a knowledge, communication with them is not difficult. One may take his chances in three tongues. It is well to start off in Spanish, which always gains attention. Fairly under way he may find license for the use of an English word or two, which the listener no doubt imagines to be some part of Spanish lacking in his own scanty vocabulary. A pure Indian word thrown in carelessly with proper accent helps much to strengthen a friendship. It is amusing to trace the maneuvers and twistings through which a successfully-developed sentence having this recommendation is evolved. The gesture comes in as an appendix, carrying everything not contained in the vocables. It must be delivered with freedom and force, rather as a substitute for speech than as an apology for its lack. One feels added dignity in a well-swung gesture, and the effect is always satisfactory. Hence we indulge this vanity at the expense of further progress in words; nor is the presence of our ever-ready interpreter calculated to inspire any lasting enthusiasm toward the acquirement of a native dialect.

These people are essentially happy and contented. Life is an enjoyment. They love its picturesqueness, its opportunity of combining work and play; its speedy transitions from the heat of willing labor to the cool quietude of disinclination.

The plowing of the land well illustrates their strong tendency to combine labor with what may rid labor of its servility. Often as many as ten yoke of oxen, awkwardly coupled together by the horns, are seen following the footsteps of a child with a regularity which insures a straight line across the field. No other reason for the number is apparent, but the love of company and a crowd, and the boisterous hilarity which follows the slow company and sends back the bedlam of voices from the bottom-lands, is significant of those simple delights of all yeomen.

Our arrival in the village was none too soon to witness all the operations of harvest-time. This season above all others affords most of the picturesque features of the pueblo life. The various processes follow in rapid succession, and though performed with the clumsy implements of a time long past, the whole work, from the reaping to the housing of the grain, is accomplished within less than a month.

Harvest life here is a great open-air festival, and in the quaint processes employed, carries the mind back to the simple ways of all ancient peoples. The fields of grain surround the village on three sides, but mainly stretch out into the valley, following the great irrigating ditch or acequia. Here we find a score of workers bending their backs among the tall stalks, all armed with knives or sickles notched with saw teeth. The labor of cutting is necessarily slow and irksome, especially to the Indian, who has a particular fondness for maintaining a straight back. But when one throws down the knife there is another close at hand to take it up, so that the good work never ceases. Meanwhile the one relieved rolls himself a cigarette and readjusts his shoulders. Not unfrequently total indisposition asserts itself, and it is by no means a rare thing to see a game of cards engrossing a small knot under the shady cover of a haystack. But the day is a long one, work full under way by five o'clock, and life—what is it to these free-livers, whose lack in material necessities is supplied by the Government, but a routine of accepted employments?—not to be vexed by care or anxiety.

Day by day the reapers return to the fields, and little by little, from the elevation on which the town stands, can be seen the progress made upon the plain below. A line of haystacks moving out from the meadow, up the gentle ascent to the threshing-floor, has an uncertain witchery about it, which is explained by the presence of the burro and his varied adaptability. His master seems to make a sort of joke of him, and takes delight in enveloping his scant size in immense loads. The lumbering carretas, drawn by oxen, are made useful in this work, and go by squeaking and groaning upon their wooden axles.

Men and boys also help in the portage, staggering homeward beneath huge bundles of grain, or carrying them on their backs by means of a leather band passed under the sheaves and over the forehead. In these and in other ways the meadows are gradually stripped, and their abundance piled up in stacks of odd assortment along the banks of the creek.

Now at length the joy of harvest is at hand. Aroused one morning by the monotonous ding-dong of a cow-bell, which had mingled itself with our waking dreams, we found the threshers already established at short intervals along this low mesa, and pushing forward the work lustily. A number of inclosures of the size of a circus ring had been formed by long poles driven into the ground. Connecting these were ropes of rawhide, which supported gayly-colored blankets of various patterns, all so hung as to give the slight framework an aspect of completeness and strength. Each ring had its band of horses, fifteen or more, and not far away were others under guard as relays. The stack of grain in the centre, jostled and leaped upon by the excited horses as they described an irregular wheel about it, fell gradually into the ring and under their hoofs.

Here and there a wickiup, hastily constructed of cottonwood boughs in full view of the threshing-floor, afforded a cool shade for the spectators; of these there is never a lack, and a free lunch of tortillas and boiled corn was in waiting for any who wished it. All about us were heard the shrill cry of the driver's "Hi, ya!" the ceaseless cracking of whips, and the bells of the horses clanking in different time and tone.

Occasionally a colt finds its way into the ring, and is driven on with the rest of the band; but its strength soon fails, and of necessity it must be let out. The innate perversity of colts renders this a delicate matter. The victim first finds a lasso, and then a pair of stout arms about his neck. A wrestling-match, evenly contested over the slippery straw, then follows. The crowd begins to gather—the horses look on with stupid surprise. At length, when the loud wheezing and rolling eyeballs tell of strength almost expended, the animal is grappled by the throat and hurried toward the outlet. The head once pointed in the right direction, a kick delivered with a heavy thud upon the obliquus abdominis finishes the performance. The colt returns the compliment into the air, and, until quite satisfied that no pursuer follows, persists in a series of rapid and undulatory plunges toward the verdie beyond.

While following the band an erect attitude is scrupulously maintained, and, shod with light moccasins, the tall, spare youths seem the personification of tireless activity. They resign the whip with much protest, as though, for the matter of that, they might follow the drove half a day. The stack having been leveled, and the tramping continued until sundown, the corral is opened and the weary horses turned free.

The afternoon breeze, an unfailing event of the day, is an important factor in the next process. With large wooden shovels the threshing-floor is cleared, and the straw thrown high into the air. This, blown but a short distance, forms an embankment on one side. What grain has fallen is then swept up by the women with short sage whisks, carried in their tunics to the adjoining enclosure, and piled for winnowing. With methods so loose and superficial, the various processes demand not a few repetitions, and the next morning finds most of the same grain upon the threshing-floors.

The inclosures set apart for the grain are paved with hard clay. Here the first winnowing is done by the men, the grain being shaken from long boxes provided with four handles, the bottoms of which are stretched with stiff bull's-hide and punctured with small holes. The final winnowing is intrusted to the women, their greater patience being a safer guarantee for the cleanliness of the work. Over and over again it is sifted, thrown up with the hands, or allowed to fall slowly from large flat baskets, until all over the hard pavement the rich yellow piles begin to appear. Day by day small blanket loads are carried into the pueblo by the women, and there stored in the basement of the building.

The enthusiasm of this work continues night and day; the harvest moon looks down upon a busy scene in the pueblos. Swinging around us a blanket in the manner of the brethren, one evening we sauntered forth. The heavens were brilliant, and in the keen atmosphere a wonderful radiance fell over all the plain. Some of the Indians were at work with pitchforks and baskets, others had fallen asleep, buried deep in the loose chaff; a few of the irrepressible youth improved the opportunity for a flirtation; and now and then a merry laugh rippling out on the breeze called to mind the "Minnehaha" of less prosaic times. At a little distance a party of three or four chanted an Indian air, and the dust which could be dimly made out in that direction, told that the forks were kept moving in time with the music. The tintinabulation of a bell farther down we knew to mean a band of horses still tramping within the enclosure.

The care of the flocks forms no small part of the vocation of the Pueblos. Large numbers of both sheep and goats find pasture upon the mountain-sides, requiring diligent protection from the marauding pumas and coyotes. The wool is used largely for the weaving of blankets, which in texture and color design cannot be surpassed in this country. The best make of them will hold water for half an hour; and so highly prized are they for decoration that Boston has lately established an institution for the manufacture of Pueblo Indian blankets.

The most charming piece of Arcadian romance which came to us, eliciting a sympathetic tear for the unhappy ones involved, was found in the ardent attachment which a shepherd boy had for a pretty, bright-eyed, chunky bit of Indian maidenhood. The adroitness with which the unsuspecting eye of village factotums was evaded, and which secured a happy meeting of the lovers on the road when out of sight of the pueblo, was of itself sufficient to call out our benedictions as casual observers. But the fates were ready with the shears. The thread had not been of their weaving. The news of an elopement woke the whole village into activity, and three runners were immediately dispatched. By a cross cut over the mountains the rash pair were intercepted, mounted on one horse and heading toward San Juan, where the Spanish priest was to have tied the knot. The Indians always receive the rite of marriage from the Catholic Church.

Next morning the tear-stained adventurers reappeared, but what sentence was meted out for their irregular procedure we never heard.

To the boys belongs the labor of collecting the fuel. This is obtained far up on the mountain-side, where, at the beginning of the snow-line, the piñon is of small growth and easily cut or broken. Toward noon, heralded by shouts, which for some time might be heard echoing along the sides of the rocky cañon, odd parties of two or three straggle into the village, their little burros bristling all over with the gnarled and wind-twisted branches. When safely carried up the ladders and deposited on the parental hearthstone, their work for the day is done, and the youngsters are left to follow out any boyish inclination. Frequently a game of man-shale, or shinny as we would know it, is started, the players exhibiting unusual activity in their tireless pursuit of the ball. The use of the legs is indeed a necessary part of an Indian education, in many ways proving itself a serviceable acquirement, as in the case of the three runners sent on the track of the unhappy couple whose ante-nuptial journey has just been referred to. The distance from Taos to Santa Fé, seventy-five miles, was covered by one of these swift runners, carrying despatches of importance, whom, starting six hours after us, we found leaning against the door-post of the hotel upon reaching the city on the following day. There was no way of making our four mules ashamed of this fact.

One youth there was too old for the services of a fuel-gatherer, and for whom the labors of the harvest-field had little attraction. His locks, falling to the waist—an unusual length—gave an air to his person quite in keeping with the dignity of his carriage and the fine development of limb and feature. The artistic eyes of the visitors saw in him rich opportunities for a model; and though he gave ample evidence that our choice was regarded as a compliment, all the inducements with which we continued to badger him were graciously rejected. At last the real reason was secured by our interpreter from his mother, who had come to his rescue. He thought our stay in Taos was for the purpose of obtaining portraits, for selection at Washington of the best-looking members of the community; and he considered his chances for being summoned entirely too probable for risk. It did not take long to dispel his fears, and, after a little preliminary arrangement of his costume, he backed up against a wall and motioned to us to proceed. About his forehead he wore a red baudana handkerchief, and the hair falling from beneath it hung loosely over his shoulders, with the exception of the back-lock, which was braided and folded into a short, tight queue. The jacket of coarse white cotton cloth was confined at the waist by a leathern girdle, which held with a brass chain a scabbard and a small tobacco-horn. In common with all bowmen the world over, such as Chaucer typifies in his "Yeoman,"

"Upon his arme, he bar a gay bracer."

This was made of solid silver, and full three inches wide, a perfect protection from the bow-string. Below the jacket the ends of a red sash, tied about the waist underneath, were barely visible. The breeches, of the same white stuff, were wide, caught up at the knee, after the manner of zouave trousers. The leggings of fancifully-cut red leather, were wound around the leg and kept in place by scarlet garters, the bottoms widening so as to almost cover the foot. With white tanned doeskin moccasins, a regular succession of red and white was completed, which gave to the whole costume an attractiveness and simplicity lacking in the more pretentious suits of buckskin. This is the distinctive dress of the Pueblo Indians as we find it throughout New Mexico; but the influence of the Northern tribes is apparent in the frequency with which one meets Pueblo Indians arrayed in a garb copied directly from the Apache costume.

Limited space leads us to sum up the Pueblo's character in a few words, and to omit many illustrations which might amplify the hasty enumeration of his more general traits. We found him social in disposition, clever as an artificer, shrewd at a bargain, gentle in his family, controlled by the precepts of the elders; maintaining a system of government curiously complete in all fundamental principles of civil law; a shepherd, caring for immense flocks of goats and sheep; an agriculturalist; and, withal, an Indian, priding himself in the mark; still using the bow, the eagle plumes, the barbaric fineries of dress; and, though falling upon festal days to the level of the brute in the observances of his heathenish rites, yet seldom committing upon his fellow any act of injustice or cruelty. Recalling the goat-skin which he sold us as a cinnamon bear hide, we smile and forgive him; as well as for the theft of the missing sketch-book—we regard the latter as indicative of a promising tendency toward art. But when we bring to mind his hospitality, his joviality, and picture him as our modern Arcadian free-liver, it is impossible to think of him as other than a good fellow. His quick wit was exhibited on many occasions, but notably in connection with a bargain for a coat and trousers of buckskin attractively displayed over the wearer's fine physique. We were quite willing to wait and receive the purchase from the hands of the man through his window or door, but he too well understood the importance of working with hot iron. A moment's thought, a series of rapid contortions, and the tight-fitting garments were drawn off and thrown at our feet. Before payment could be made, the ludicrous had impressed itself upon the crowd, and hardly had the money been clapped into his mouth than, adroitly snatching a blanket from a bystander, and wrapping himself therein, the youth scampered off, hands over ears, toward the village. A long, lean man, garrulous in witticisms, followed him with banter gobbled out of a turkey-throat. But the annoyance was soon left behind in company with a puff of dust which followed the red bandana and flying locks over the edge of the gulch.

On another occasion one of those small skin-lined saddles, dangling a multiplicity of straps awakened an interest. "Quanto?" (how much). Six fingers are instinctively presented skyward, with an undecided seventh threatening the perpendicular. Obedient to instructions, we lose all interest immediately, and assume the expression of total indifference. (Exit.)

Tableau II perhaps comes off next day. We notice our friend Lucero has frequent occasion to drag his saddle back and forth before our door. At length we mutually discover each other. We smile, and raise three fingers, which, observing the change of countenance this awakens, is finished off as something between a military gesture and a sidewalk salutation, and the saddle moves on. Before both have gone far there is a sudden decision. Our man stops short, and returns a five-finger salutation, very much as an auctioneer elevates his hammer for a last call. The proposition for compromise is submitted to greater experience within, but meets with no favor.

"He'll stick you yet on your own bargain, and don't you forget it," says our interpreter.

Juan Lucero is softened into approach by the indecision; but the Western man's promptings are obeyed to the full extent of indifference. (Very hasty exit—pressing engagement.)

Still the saddle was seen often. We had already taken seats on the morning of departure, with the impedimenta adjusted to a fit; but the man and the saddle were on hand. At the right moment he emerged from the shadow of an adobe wall. Three fingers this time, and an evident swallowing of emotions as an accompaniment to the nods affirmative. The whole bespoke the obstinate wrestlings of flesh and spirit over the decision. For want of room, we tied it to the axle, where, for seventy-five miles, it demanded constant watching, as it had a way of inching on to the wheels, and marvelously defying all sorts of knots.

Some time after, while sauntering through the plaza of Santa Fé, the words of the Western man were brought to mind by seeing a quantity of pack-saddles at one dollar apiece. The Indian has learned to know the white man as one who scrupulously maintains two laws at a bargain; first, never to make an offer for an article himself; and second, to take off one-half of the owner's price when he finds it out. In self-defense, therefore, it is said, the children of the desert always open fire at advance rates of one hundred per cent. Having become rid of this in the calculation, the pendulum still has much freedom of oscillation, and may stop approximately near the centre as the honesty or patience of either party may decide.

Thus readily does human nature evolve the germs of those laws which govern the markets of the world. It was curious to note among these untutored red-men a tendency to speculate for a rise or fall in current rates for such articles as are used for barter in mercantile or speculative transactions. Your wide-awake Taos Indian is not at all slow in discounting an advance in the price of tobacco in consequence of private dispatches received by runner from a more northern pueblo, and he has even been known to hypothecate his personal property in order to raise the wherewithal to corner the market when a demand is anticipated for some commodity on the part of pale-faced visitors. The "Wall Street" of Taos Pueblo is, however, more creditable in morals and moderation than is its eastern prototype.

To the left of the North Pueblo stand the picturesque ruins of a church. While engaged on a sketch of these the portly figure of an Indian threw its shadow over the ground in front of us. After a moment's silent inspection, he broke out excitedly, "Americana! hiss! pop!—boom—boom—boom!" and, shaking his finger toward the once comely structure, strode rapidly away. He had given us a bit of history in which, when a boy, he had doubtless played a part. In the revolt of '47, when the United States governor was killed by the Taos Indians, then in league with the Mexicans, several batteries of artillery were sent with orders to demolish the pueblo. The fighting, however, concentrated itself about the church, which was captured, and, by discretionary surrender of the chiefs, the town was saved.

But at length falling leaves within the sacred grove which skirts the village remind us of the early approach of autumn. In the keen air of morning the crier, calling the inhabitants to labor from the housetop, is seen well wrapped in his ample blanket. Chill winds sweep down from the cañon, and clouds of dust whirl along the road. The corn and grain have been carried and stored for the winter, and the low sound of grinding is heard at each door as we pass. The men of Taos are moulding bullets and mending moccasins for the fall hunting, and the harvest-fields, so recently the scene of glad festival, are desolate and bare.

HENRY R. POORE.

THE HONEYMOON.

THE COLONEL.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

FEW families could be in more desperate straits as to money matters than the Dilloways were, and in few could the facts have been taken with more diversity of opinion. There was Mamma Dilloway, a stately, gray-haired matron, who felt so wronged by circumstance as to be on the edge of a quarrel with the universe. There was Margaret, the beauty, who was in too miserable health to care about money matters, and passed the day on the sofa in languor and indifference. There was Kate, whose situation as a teacher was the mainstay of the house. There were the younger ones, Ethel and Fred and Harry, on whom the world was just beginning to cast a shadow, whose appetites and whose legs grew with every day beyond the bounds of provisions and trousers. And there was Brooks, the proud and suffering eldest son, whose beginnings had all come to naught—who cursed poverty as it had cursed him; and there was Maria, the other daughter, who was not a beauty, but who, nevertheless, had that quality of absorbing and reflecting sunshine which brings sunshine into shadow, and who rather relished the tussle with their wants, and always expected victory.

It seemed to Mamma Dilloway, on the morning that Brooks was summoned to Colorado to take the books of an old friend who had fallen ill, that now the worst had come, and she should never see her son again.

"On the contrary, mamma," said Maria, who was performing a pas seul, "the universe, you must think, is not such a very ill-managed affair after all. Perhaps we couldn't do better ourselves. King David was quite right," said she, pausing in her waltz. "The dance is the expression of joy, and just now, I'm sure, of religious joy; for if ever anybody was thankful—"

"Maria!" exclaimed her mother.

"You know, mamma, you're as glad as I—"

"I don't know any such short-sighted thing," said Mrs. Dilloway. "Colorado is a long way off, and mining life is very rough, and mines are very uncertain; and if Brooks falls ill while all alone there with nobody—"

"Just the way Clever Alice reasoned. I'll tell you what, mamma: I'll go with him. Mrs. Byrnes offered me enough for grandma's cashmere shawl to pay my way, and I need an outing, and may find something to do myself!"

And before Mrs. Dilloway fairly knew what had happened, Brooks and Maria were on their westward way, having left the whole family aghast at the vision of loneliness, oppressed with anxiety, and wretched with something like grief. They could scarcely have told you how they dragged on an existence through the first dreary weeks. The weather fitted with their feelings, and nothing broke the monotony of their trouble.

"You'll have to come back, Maria," wrote Kate. "The house is getting so damp with mamma's tears that the walls will mildew presently. Margaret, too, turns her face to the back of the sofa, and the tears roll down, one by one, for dreariness. The gloom has even infected Ethel, whose dolls are always going to funerals. There seems to be nothing to do, nothing to expect, nowhere to go. My quarter hasn't yet been paid, and we have short commons, I can tell you. The table emphasizes our low spirits three times a day; but mamma will have it set, if there is only potatoes and milk. You were all the life and comfort we had, and now you are gone. But you have had your outing now; and unless you want me to go to an insane asylum, you will have to come home, and leave Brooks to his fate."

The answer to this letter was of a fortnight's later date. "Come home, indeed," said Maria, "when I'm having the first good time in my life! Such a new and strange life, too! Such an atmosphere, and such scenery—a world of pictures. I suppose you think of us in a desert; but can you muster a dozen superb young Sauls, Englishmen and others, every morning with galloping across country, every evening with music and dancing? You know so many English of the first water come over to hunt the buffalo, and some to take up land for ranches. There is a Mr. Cholmondeley, and Captain Arundel and his sister, and Mr. and Mrs. Cecil, and I don't know how many others, first and last—a new one always turning up. So you see the time passes quite differently from time at home, where you so seldom see a marrying man, that when you do, you think he belongs to another species. Oh, and I must not forget the Colonel! Now, what do you think of a real British nobleman, of a family titled since the Conqueror—or is it the Flood? Colonel Sir Guy Temple! Perfectly charming, and rich beyond calculation—tin mines in Cornwall. I think we shall name the mine for him. By the way, didn't Brooks write you that he has a little mine himself? He has given me half of it."

And so the letter ran on, and great cheer it brought into that dull place where it was read.

"The Colonel," said Mrs. Dilloway reflectively, as Maria knew she would. "Colonel Sir Guy Temple. Those old titles think more of themselves than half the ducal houses in the realm, you know. I didn't suppose any one but the Prince of Wales owned tin mines in Cornwall, though. I wonder if Maria's dresses—"

"Oh, they don't need dresses, mamma, in that life—"

"Not need dresses, Margaret!" cried Mrs. Dilloway, holding up her hands.

"I mean, mamma, her riding-dress, that she made from the water-proof, you remember, is as good there as a velvet court-train would be in London."

"Poor Maria isn't really pretty," soliloquized Mrs. Dilloway; "but that's the way things go. What a pity, Margaret, that you couldn't have gone out with Brooks!"

"Oh, Maria's brightness is just as good for her as beauty," said Kate.

"If she only could be comfortably established! That would help all the rest, too. It's too good to hope for, though, in this family."

"Well, perhaps she will be. She certainly has a chance."

And somehow the gray weather was not quite so gray to Mrs. Dilloway and her daughters; it half seemed to them as if the cloud might be about to lift, and in the vague sense of un conjectured possibilities, Mrs. Dilloway felt rich enough to call in a ragged urchin and make him neat with an outfit of Fred's and Harry's cast-off garments, that had already been patched and darned into another color.

"We are just in from a long gallop," another letter of Maria's ran. "The wind is giving me quite a color. I shall turn out pretty before you know it. There are some folks who seem to think I am already. The air is so clear, you think you are on wings. I wish Margaret were here. I really think it would do her good. It would do her good, too, to have a little of this gay life. It really enlarges and opens your horizon. Mrs. Cecil now has yachted up under the Midnight Sun. When she tells me about it, I feel as if I had, too. She has told me all about the Temple Gardens in Cornwall, Sir Guy's place—you were so interested in my mention of him, that I will tell you—running down to the shore, and quenching all their flaming blossoms in the silver wash of the sea there. A fine old Elizabethan place, the mansion is, she says, ivy-covered, with all its quadrangles and courts and wings and stacked chimneys and stables. On the walls of the long hall every Lady Temple, one after the other, for how many hundred years I can't say, makes room for the next one. Think of hanging up your picture there, to look out on the world long after your eyes are dust in their sockets! There are some haunted diamonds in the family, too. Did you ever hear of such a thing? Along the year of the marriage of the heir they blaze like bonfires, with a white light far eclipsing their real lustre; and just before the death of a Temple they blaze again with a baleful red torchlight, and then are dull and ordinary diamonds, not particularly well cut. Mrs. Cecil hinted to me that they were blazing like comets when Sir Guy sent them to the banker's just before he sailed. Sir Guy is very democratic, and doesn't like titles—almost ready to drop his own, and would if the others would. He told Mrs. Cecil, if ever she met him in America, to call him plain Colonel, and she promised. But she has told me all about him. She used to think he would marry Miss Arundel, her sister. Miss Arundel is very pretty, and blushes like a peach when you speak to her."

"People get intimate so quickly in such places," said Kate.

"A great piece of folly," said Mamma Dilloway at this point of the letter. "To think of dropping his father's title—a title won centuries ago. These democratic notions! As for my opinion, there is something in the stability of the British Government that more than compensates for the differences in caste. And as for those very differences," said Mrs. Dilloway, looking out the window and over the rainy fields, pausing a moment to think of the contrast between such an outlook and that of Sir Guy Temple's gardens, "I will admit that it always was irksome to me to shake hands with the tradespeople."

"Oh, mamma, mamma!" cried Kate. "When you know how glad you would be this minute if Fred had a place with our grocer!"

"I don't know anybody, Kate," said Mrs. Dilloway severely, "who has the faculty you have of obtruding the vulgarity of every day upon the ideal. If the contemplation of the marriage of your sister with a British nobleman affords me pleasure, I don't see why you should interfere with it, especially as we should then go and live with her, and become English people ourselves to all intents and purposes. Lady Temple—Lady Temple—" and then, as she saw the girls laughing, she broke into a merry laugh herself—the first laugh that had been seen on her face for years, let it be said.

In the week before a fresh letter came the Dilloway family had nearly worn the last to shreds. But at length Mamma Dilloway tore open another, and having learned that Brooks was well, had nearly cleared up the books, and was busy with his interest in the operations out there, ran hastily into its gossip.

"What does she mean about those operations?" she asks, looking back with a second thought.

"Oh, the little mine he happened on, don't you recollect, when he first went out; great piece of good luck, Maria said; doesn't come to one in a thousand. That may make our fortunes yet."

"If we wait for a Colorado mine to make our fortunes"—began Mrs. Dilloway, with majesty.

"We might as well make them ourselves," said Kate. "Come, come, mamma—the news about Colonel Sir Guy Temple?"

"Colonel Sir Guy Temple," said Mrs. Dilloway solemnly, "is engaged to marry your sister Maria."

It seemed to Kate as if a voice had added, "Let us pray." And there was dead silence for a moment or two.

"I feel," said their mother, "that it is too tremendous an event to read about in our usual light way. But it is not the Englishman, it is not the title, it is not the place by the Cornish sea—I would rather, really rather, there were none of that about it all. I would, on the whole, rather give her to one of our own countrymen. In spite of things I may have said, I can see that this may separate us more widely than distance or the sea. I shall find it hard to surrender her; and so will you. All that gives a tinge of sadness to the joy. But it is a comfort, an unspeakable comfort, to think that even one of my children is to be established in ease and safety. I could prefer it were that little mine developed into wealth, that would let her and Brooks have all they wanted, and let us still have them. But it is a great deal to be grateful for, as it is. It doesn't strike her so, though, at all. You will see that she treats it in rather a frivolous way. But that is natural to youth and joy, I suppose." And, in spite of her little speech, Mamma Dilloway's face was wreathed with smiles as she read:

"Well, to come to something really important. You remember, of course, all I have written you from time to time about Colonel Sir Guy Temple, who has served in India, and has the Victoria Cross, and all that? Well, he is going home to England. Perhaps he is tired of buffalo-hunting, perhaps he has brought down better game. At any rate, he will take his wife with him. Mamma, I never was so surprised. But I must wait till I see you. And I don't really feel as if I had told you anything about the Colonel, after all. It would be difficult to say how much I am interested; how enchanting it all is! What a different life I see before me—immense riches, honor, troops of friends—and all as much yours as mine, dear people at home. But I shall see you soon."

Mrs. Dilloway went about treading on air. What matter that the roof leaked, and rain ran down the walls? It was merely a frescoing there. What matter that the milkman dunned a second time, and said he should not ask a third? She hoped he wouldn't. What had seemed unendurable three months ago, she could laugh at now; three months more, six months more, and there would come an end to all these bitter experiences. The fact of Maria's being well married would marry off all the other girls; and even were her husband parsimonious, what Maria could spare from her pin-money would put them beyond want any more. The sun had come out, the landscape was bathed in beauty, life smiled, all the world seemed propitious—the universe was really better managed than she had thought. Mrs. Dilloway retrimmed her bonnet and went to church with her good spirits, feeling in a thankful mood. It was pleasant to see the neighbors—smiling at one, and bowing to another; it put the neighbors in mind of her, too; and they came to see her that week, and the next, and made it more cheerful than it had been for months. She hinted mysteriously at Maria's good fortune, but was not sure that she ought to commit herself. Good friends, good fortune, and good feeling all gave her a sensation resembling the happiness she used to know; she radiated it on Margaret and the rest till you would never have dreamed it was the tear-sodden family of which Maria and Brooks took leave in the gray of the morning a dozen weeks ago.

"I have been darkly hinting at good fortune," Maria wrote in her last letter.

"I'm sure I don't know what she means by 'darkly hinting,'" said her mother. "It was all plain enough to me."

"Go on, go on, mamma!"

"I have been darkly hinting at good fortune, and see how you read the riddle. Give me Mamma Dilloway for a guesser. The Sphinx would sink into the sands before her. How much interest you have taken in the matter from the first! What do you suppose Sir Guy Temple could have seen in me? Do you imagine he is marrying me for my beauty? How many ideas you have about the wedding! But don't you incline to a quiet one always? Are you going to call me 'My lady,' mamma? and treat me with great respect? Sir Guy Temple, or no Sir Guy Temple—after all, the Colonel has greater charms for me—my dearest, sweetest people at home, I shall always be your Maria."

"Maria will always be frivolous, and a little incoherent," half sighed Mrs. Dilloway, yet with the feeling that a Lady Temple could afford to be frivolous and incoherent—Lady Temple, of Temple Gardens, Cornwall, whose Elizabethan mansion was encircled with flowers and seas; and she saw her daughter dressed out in the haunted diamonds, saw her portrait hanging in the ancient hall: and she washed her cups and saucers that morning with sighs of satisfaction over the divine compensations in this life.

She was rubbing the last plating off the spoons—the real silver had gone long ago to the melter's—with the old bit of chamois cloth, and singing gently to herself, when she looked up at a slamming door, and a vision of splendor that took her breath away—Maria in broad hat and feathers, making her really attractive, with her black hair and blue eyes, and in a dress that was all one sparkle of jet to her mother's bewildered eyes, glistening and dancing like a windy midnight full of stars. And the next moment chamois and spoons were whirling in a cloud of whirling whiting, and Maria was kissing her mother's cheeks and chin and mouth and forehead.

"Oh, you dear, silly little Mamma Dilloway!" cries Maria. "Are you glad to see me? And have you really guessed all this time what has happened?"

"Happened?" cried Mamma Dilloway. "Have you married without waiting to come home?" quite prepared, however, to forgive her if she had. "Where is your husband, then? Where is Sir Guy Temple? I should like to see him."

"Sir Guy Temple? So should I. I never did."

"You—never—did!"

"No, indeed. Mrs. Cecil knew him. I didn't."

"You—didn't! Then how—then where—are you crazy, Maria? Has your good fortune turned your head? If you never saw Sir Guy Temple, if you don't know him, how in the world are you married to him?"

"I'm not."

"Are you going to marry him?" with ominous calmness.

"I am not going to marry him or anybody else. But I am going to do something much pleasanter. I am going to sit down here the mistress of as much money as I want; and so are you, and so are all the rest of us; money that will make our old place an Eden, and educate the boys as well as all the Sir Guy Temples that were ever born!"

"Maria," said Mrs. Dilloway, in a sepulchral voice that came from the depths to which she had fallen in her new despair, "I can't believe a word you say!"

"Oh, yes, you can, mamma. The Colonel has made us all rich—really rich. The Colonel, you know, is Brooks' mine. I was so interested in it all—it was so enchanting—but I didn't dare at first to tell you very much about him, for fear of disappointment. And when I found from your letters that you were taking my casual mention of Sir Guy Temple with such roseate ideas, I thought I would just lead you along to pass the time till we found out where we were."

"Maria! A child of mine—"

"If we panned out poorly I meant to let you down gently, and you would have been beguiled of some melancholy, you see, any way. If otherwise, you wouldn't need any letting down. And he has, mamma, oh, the Colonel has—"

"Maria, I don't understand you. How am I to believe this if I am not to believe that? You are now giving me to understand that Brooks' little mine has lifted us out of poverty and distress. This morning you gave me to understand you were to marry Sir Guy Temple."

"I never did, mamma. You gave yourself to understand so."

"When you said you were going back to England with Sir Guy Temple as his wife?"

"I never said so, mamma. Mrs. Cecil said he was going to take a wife back with him when he came up from Arizona. I didn't say it was I. And I didn't say it was Miss Arundel, although she did. But Mrs. Cecil is a humbug, and I think she was playing off on me."

"And what did you mean about the wedding?" gasped Mrs. Dilloway.

"Oh, that was something you took for granted, you see. But when I give you Brooks' word for it, in a check signed, sealed and delivered, that he has sold out his interest in the Colonel mine for more than half a million dollars, and has divided it, share and share alike, among us all, you'll believe that? So you thought to see me in the haunted diamonds? I'll tell you what, mamma," tilting back her mother's chin and kissing her thin lips, "no more tears in those eyes, remember! I'll tell you what, I'll haunt Mrs. Byrnes if she doesn't sell me back grandma's cashmere shawl! Sir Guy Temple? For my part—do you remember what Mrs. Prigg said to Mrs. Gamp about Mrs. Harris, mamma? 'I don't believe there's no such a person!'"

PERIOD III.

"Love goes toward love as schoolboys from their books;
But love from love toward school with heavy looks."

CHAPTER I.

THE winter, with its terrible stress and fury, is over and past. People sitting in blooming spring gardens or by widely-opened windows, talk comfortably, with lips no longer chapped, of the great snow storm, and compare notes as to the amount of personal inconvenience and discomfort to which it had exposed them. Anecdotes of the awful night spent in snow-stopped trains have formed the convenient opening for many a dinner talk, the anxiety on the part of each interlocutor to prove that he or she had suffered more than the other leading to intimacy before soup is well over. Of its ferocity and its devil-work few overt traces now remain, except killed laurel bushes and rare thrushes. Out of how many sweet little throats full of music has it pinched the tender life! But over its wrecks the sea rolls; and in the bottomless sea of mothers' hearts its drowned sailors lie buried. And does the analogy between the material and the spiritual world hold good? Does the sea of oblivion smoothly heave, and largely sweep above the soul that went down on that dread night? Does no spar pierce the flood to show where that good ship foundered?

It would be the opinion of outsiders who have not visited Oxbridge—if they had formed an opinion at all upon the subject, and were asked for it—that the inhabitants of that university town dwell in gray and ancient houses, time-colored, and with flavors of old learning still hanging about their mossy roof-trees. In point of fact, their lives are passed for the most part in flippant spick and span villas and villakins, each with its half acre of tennis-ground and double daisies, all so new that scarcely any one has had time to die there, though numerous people have taken leave to be born there, and forming in their ensemble an ugly, irrelevant, healthy suburb, that would not disgrace a cotton city of to-day.

It is mid-May, and the hour is one of the afternoon ones; an hour at which luncheon is already forgotten, though tea still smiles not near. Along the shining river, a mile away, eight-oars, four-oars, skiffs are flashing. Scores of happy boys are tearing down the path alongside, keeping company with their boats, exhorting, admonishing, shouting themselves hoarse. But their noise, though strong are their young lungs, does not reach in faintest echoes to the quiet drawing-room, where the as quiet lady sits, head on lily hand, beside the window, staring out at her plot of forget-me-nots and the gold shower of her two laburnum trees.

Warm as the day is, a fire burns on the hearth; a fire whose inconvenient heat Belinda is languidly trying to counteract by the agency of the fan, slowly waving in her unoccupied hand. It is too hot even for Pug, who, shortly panting in her sleep, lies cast on her fat side in a cool corner. Upon Pug's figure, an academic life and the total absence of the thinning emotion of envy, and of the bad but emaciating passion of jealousy (an absence caused by her being sole dog of the establishment, and having no longer any cause for suffering from Punch's tinselly accomplishments) has begun to tell. She could not well look stouter or less intellectual if she were one of the old Fellows of St. Bridget's.

When last we saw Belinda, she was lying groveling among cinders and fire-irons in a fender. Now she is sitting placid and upright on a window-seat. Is the change that has taken place in her soul's attitude as much to her advantage as that which has effected itself in her body's? Who can tell? She is past the age when a smeared face, puckered lips and bawling cries mean grief; when ruddy cheeks and shouting laughter mean joy. She does not look particularly happy, perhaps, but which of us is conscious of looking specially radiant as he or she sits alone, with no one to summon to the surface of the skin that latent cheerfulness, of which few have enough to spend it on themselves alone? And yet, at this moment, the thoughts passing through her mind are not disagreeable ones; scarcely thoughts, indeed, lazy summer impressions rather, of the pleasantness of the tiny sky-colored meadow that lies, all turquoise, under her eyes, and calls itself her forget-me-not bed; of the round mother-swallow's head, peeping over the nest beneath the eaves. At some further thought or sensation, a slight but definite smile breaks up the severe lines of her young yet melancholy mouth. At the sound of the opening door, however, in one instant it is dead.

"I find you unoccupied!" says her husband, entering and advancing toward her, with that shuffling gait which plainly tells of slippers (she has not been able to break him of carpet slippers).

"If I am unoccupied, it is for the first time to-day!" she answers coldly.

"Since you are at leisure," he pursues—his want of surprise at her frigid tone betraying that it is her habitual one—"I have the less scruple in claiming your services."

"What is it that you want?" she asks, lifting her eyes to his face. It is pleasant to be looked full at by a handsome woman; but if she has, before looking at you, taken care to put as much frost as they can hold into her fine blue eyes, the pleasure is very sensibly lessened. "What do you want? We cannot surely be going to have any more Menander to-day; and I have written all your letters—they lie on your study-table, and I have exactly followed your directions as to each."

"It is precisely upon that subject that I wished to speak to you," rejoins he, glancing at a paper in his hand. "You have by no means succeeded in expressing the exact shade of meaning I wished to convey in this letter to Herr Schweizer, of Göttingen, with regard to the new 'Fragment of Empedocles;' and I am afraid that I must trouble you to re-write it."

"And I am afraid that I must trouble you to excuse me," replies she quietly, but with asperity; "my tale of bricks for to-day is really complete."

There is a moment's silence, during which Belinda turns her head pointedly away toward the laburnum tree and the emerald grass; but the Professor shows no signs of retreating.

"If I were taking you from any other employment, I might hesitate," he says, with peevish pertinacity; "but since you are wholly unoccupied—"

"I am unoccupied at this particular moment," answers she, with an accent of carefully elaborated patience, which, to the meanest observer would betray the depths of her impatience; "but in five minutes I shall not be unoccupied; in five minutes I set off to the station to meet Sarah, who, as you are aware, is to arrive by the 4.35 train. You do not, I suppose, wish me to take a hansom?" (with a faint sarcastic smile of a very different quality from that little one lately addressed to the swallow and the flowers), "and the day is too warm for it to be possible to walk fast."

At the mention of Miss Churchill, a distinct new crumple of ill-humor has added itself to the already numerous wrinkles of Mr. Forth's face.

"I am unable to see that any obligation to meet the train lies upon you," he says obstinately; "your sister is eminently well able to take care of herself!"

Belinda shrugs her shoulders.

"It is a mere matter of habit, of course," she says in a key of low resentment; "if you have been born in a walk of life in which it is habitual to you to push and elbow for yourself, of course there is no reason why you should not enjoy it; but you must remember that this is not Sarah's case; and, since you decline to extend your hospitality to her maid, she is alone."

At the end of this conciliatory speech she stops, and there is a pause, which the Professor shortly breaks.

"If you think it necessary," he says grudgingly, "I am willing to send a servant to meet your sister; but I must request you to abandon the idea of going yourself, by which means you will be left free to render me the trifling service I require of you."

"You insist upon your pound of flesh, in fact!" cries she rising suddenly; her body trembling, and her great eyes lightening with anger and disappointment. "Well, you are more fortunate than your prototype! You will get it."

To his death-day, the German savan will never suspect with what hotly raging and rebellious fingers were penned those polite, lucid, and erudite lines upon Empedocles' newly-discovered "Fragment," which he shortly received.

It is long before the Professor can satisfy his own fastidious ear and captious mind as to the fitness of the phrases to be employed. Many a sheet is angrily torn across by Belinda; many a fresh one is sullenly begun before her task is ended—before her "guide, philosopher, and friend" induing, with her aid—aid given grudgingly and not unasked—his cap and gown, leaves her side to attend a college meeting. Not until the banging of the house-door tells her that he is really gone, does she give herself the indulgence of an enormous sigh.

Throwing herself back in the leathern chair, in which she has been sitting at the writing-table, with weary long arms clasped behind her neck, and dogged eyes staring at the flies on the ceiling—

"God loveth a cheerful giver!" she says aloud. "He is not much like God!" (to a woman, the man that she loves and the man that she hates are equally nameless, equally he). "So as he gets his pound of flesh, his tale of bricks, what does he care?"

As she speaks, acrid tears issue from their hidden ducts, and brim her eyes; but she shakes them vehemently away. She will not give to Sarah's penetrating eye the chance of seeing that she has wept.

"I will not be pitied!" she says, rising, and pulling herself together; "she shall not pity me! no one shall!"

She goes away to her own room, changes her gown for a fresher one, dresses her hair more becomingly, and practices looking happy in the glass. Before she has nearly perfected herself in this accomplishment, she is driven from it by the sight and sound of a slow fly, rocking top-heavily under a gigantic dress-basket, which is making for her gate. Sarah is here, and she will not be at the door to welcome her. The thought lends wings to her young heels, and the color and the smile that she has been vainly aiming at, to her cheeks and lips. Five minutes ago she did not think that anything could have caused her such a throb of pleasure as the dear old sound of that jovial high laugh, as the sight of that Dresden china face and of those monstrously irrational shoes are now giving her. When they lived together, they seldom or never kissed each other. Now they cannot hold each other tight enough. Is it only Sarah that Belinda is kissing? Is it not dead youth, dear love, sweet Westenstein, too, that she is so straitly embracing?

Over the souls of both sisters—the sad elder and the radiant younger—the recollection of their last miserable parting on that hideous January morning has poured! For a moment or two neither of them could have uttered a syllable, had you paid them a thousand pounds a word. They are brought back to common life by the sound of very small jingling bells, and by a sensation as of something tightly wound round their legs. It is Punch, who, unmindful of the chain that has bound him all the way down from London, and delighted to be again in the fresh air and among friends, is tearing wildly round, offering eager but unreciprocated greetings to Pug, who, dodging away from him, shrewish and snarling, practically refuses to admit him as an acquaintance at all.

"Why, Punch!" says Belinda, with a rather unsteady laugh, dropping on her knees, taking the excited little dog under the arms, and looking kindly in his Ethiop face; "you here? and who invited you, pray?"

"I am afraid that nobody invited him," replies Sarah demurely; "but he was so sure that it was an oversight, and he says Jane is no companion, and he sent so many messages to Pug, that I thought it was the simplest plan to bring him; do you mind?" with the old wheedling in her voice and her saucy eyes.

"Do I mind?" repeats Belinda, with a reproachful yet apprehensive stress upon the pronoun, passing her lips lightly over the top of his tawny head. "Punch, is it likely I should mind?"

"Will he mind?" inquires Sarah, speaking very low, and mouthing a good deal, as though laboring under a misgiving that the person of whom she speaks is in hiding behind the door.

"He is not fond of dogs," answers Belinda evasively, her face suddenly darkening, as if a light had been blown out in it. "Pug exists only on sufferance, do you not, Pug?"

"Whew—w!" says Sarah, pulling a long face, and with a low whistle; "and shall I, too, exist only on sufferance, pray?"

Belinda is saved from the necessity of answering a question, her reply to which must have been either an incivility or a lie, by the fact that they have now entered the house, and that her sister's roving eyes and attention are claimed by other objects. Preceded by the dogs, Pug churlishly growling and Punch animatedly sniffing, they reach the drawing-room.

"Not such a bad room!" says Sarah patronizingly, looking round; "better than I expected; only it wants pulling about."

"Mr. Forth does not like rooms pulled about."

The other breaks into a laugh.

"Mr. Forth! Is it possible that after six months he is still Mr. Forth?"

"What else should he be?" says Belinda, with stiff embarrassment. "He has not yet been raised to the peerage—he is not 'Lord Forth!'"

"I shall call him 'James!'" says Sarah firmly; "I am sure he will wish me to call him 'James!'"

Mr. Forth's wife laughs grimly.

"It will at least have the charm of novelty for him."

There is such a bitter dryness in the quasi-playfulness of her tone that Sarah stops suddenly short in her critical survey of the early English chairs, and the Albert Dürer etchings, in which Oxbridge drawing-rooms delight; and, focussing her elder with her two insistent eyes, says, taking her the while firmly by both wrists:

"Come, now; we are alone; tell me, how does it work? has it answered?"

But Belinda shakes off the small strong hands as Samson shook off the tough withes.

"You must see the rest of the house," she cries, beginning to talk rapidly and rather loudly, and absolutely ignoring the question addressed to her; "you must see my room; your own room—yours looks upon the tennis-ground; have you brought your racquet and your shoes? we must have some tennis!"

Sarah does not press the subject so obviously avoided, but as she follows her sister up stairs she repeatedly shakes her head.

"This is my room," says Belinda, as they reach the landing, throwing open doors as she speaks. "This is —his" (with a slight hesitation before the pronoun, that shows that only the dread of a repetition of her sister's ridicule has kept her from designating her husband by the formal style and title which she habitually employs toward him); "and this" (not opening, but simply indicating a third door) "this is old Mrs. Forth's."

"Oh, do take me in! do introduce me!" cries Sarah eagerly. "It has been the dream of my life to see his mother! You will not mind my saying so, but there is something so humorous in his having a mother."

"It would be no use," replies Belinda, not offering to comply with this request; "she would probably mistake you for her son."

"Well, we have a look of each other," cries Sarah delightedly; "but is she as bad as that?" arching her eyebrows till they almost meet, and are lost in her hair.

Belinda nods in acquiescence.

"And does she never stop asking questions?"

"Never."

"And do you always answer them?"

"Poor old woman! why not? if I were not answering hers I should only be answering some one else's."

There is such a weary, devil-may-careishness in her tone, that again her sister's eyes flash investigatively upon her; but this time Belinda has been too quick for her, and, avoiding their scrutiny, is doing the honors of a fourth room.

"And this is yours," she says, a smile such as the one with which she had welcomed her sister sweetening and gentling the now habitual sullenness of her face; "it smells good, does it not?"

"Why, you have given me all your flowers!" cries Sarah, burying her face in a bowl of freshly-picked narcissus. "I noticed that there was scarcely one in the drawing-room."

"Mr. Forth dislikes the smell of flowers," replies Belinda. She says it in a tame level voice; not as making a complaint, but simply as stating a fact.

"He seems to have a good many dislikes," says Sarah dryly.

Belinda lets the remark fall upon silence.

CHAPTER II.

DINNER has been early, and is over. The sisters stand, each cooling a fiery cheek against the woodwork of the drawing-room window, while the latest black-bird is singing his version of "Glory to Thee, my God, this night," and the laburnum's lithe bunches hang yellow against almost as yellow a sunset.

"Does he never open a window?" asks Sarah, greedily thrusting out her head into the cool greenness of the very respectably grown clematis and jessamine that climb the house wall.

"Never!"

"Then I should make a point of falling off my chair in a faint regularly every day at dinner until he did."

"You would fall off your chair in a faint every day until the Day of Judgment in that case," replies Belinda, with stony quiet.

"But for the stewpan atmosphere," continues Sarah, heaving her white chest in a deep and vigorous inhalation, "it really did not go off so badly; at first there seemed a trifling awkwardness—I think, Punchy, that you would have done as well on the whole to remain at your town house—but my fine tact soon smoothed it over."

"You did not call him 'James,' however," replies Belinda, with a short sarcastic laugh.

"Well, no," replies Sarah a little blankly, and for once in her life making no attempt at repartee or explanation. "I did not." But the next moment—"How soon do we go?" cries she joyously. "St. Ursula's is the largest college in Oxbridge, is it not? Will all Oxbridge be there to meet the Duke? But I suppose you are all much above setting any store by royalties! It is only the empire of the mind," pompously, "to which you attach any value!"

"Is it?" replies Belinda expressively.

"Now I am the common British flunkey," continues Sarah confidentially; "and so used you to be! I love royalties; there is nothing too small for me to hear about them. I should be thoroughly interested to learn how many pairs of stockings the Queen has, and whether she takes sugar in her tea."

Belinda laughs.

"Everybody will be there then?" resumes Sarah in a voice of the extremest exhilaration, "and you will introduce me to everybody. What will they think of me? Will they expect me to say anything clever? Will they like me?"

"H—m!" replies Belinda dubiously, scanning affectionately from head to foot the seductive but not altogether academic figure before her; "I doubt it!"

"After all, they must be human," says Sarah philosophically; "when one has pierced the thick crust of their erudition—"

"Perhaps in some cases not so very thick," interposes Belinda ironically.

"One will find a human heart beating beneath—a heart that may be punctured by my little darts, eh?"

"Possibly!" in a by no means confident tone.

"I shall devote myself chiefly to the undergraduates,

I think," says Sarah thoughtfully. "Do you know many? do you see much of them?"

Belinda shrugs her handsome shoulders indifferently.

"Poor boys! they come to call; but they are too much afraid of me to open their lips. I have lost none of my power of inspiring terror," she adds with a bitter smile. "It is the one of my gifts that I keep in its entirety."

"We will change all that," says Sarah piously; "the reign of fear is over; that of love is begun!"

Belinda has moved to the middle of the room, and is occupied in pulling down the central gas-jet, and lowering the gas, harshly glaring under its globes. Her pose, wreathed head thrown back, and long bare arm roundly lifted, brings into evidence the finest curves of her noble figure.

"And do not they admire you either, par hasard?" asks Sarah, in a voice of affectionate incredulity.

Belinda shakes her head.

"If they do, they disguise it admirably. Stay!" with a gesture of recollection; "now I come to think of it, I believe that one young person of an esthetic tendency was once heard to observe that I was 'great and still;' but that is the only civil speech I have reaped in six months, and even that one is perhaps a little ambiguous."

"Great and still!" repeats Sarah, giggling; "well, at all events they shall not say that of me!"

She is still chuckling, when the opening door admits her brother-in-law. At once her chuckle has an inclination to die, but she bravely resists it.

"I appeal to you," she says, going boldly up to him. "Belinda has been taking away your town's character; she says that she is not at all admired here, and that neither shall I be; is it true? is it possible?"

It is certainly well to be on easy terms with your brother-in-law; but in a case so exceptional as that of Miss Churchill, it is perhaps hardly wise to address him with an alluring archness that may remind him of former disasters. At all events, in the present case it is not successful.

"I am afraid that I must ask you to excuse me," he says sourly, turning on his heel. "I must refer you to some one better qualified to give an opinion on such a point. Belinda, I must request your assistance with my gown."

There is something in his tone so unequivocally unplayful, that Sarah slinks away snubbed, and for the moment robbed of all her little airs and graces; and Belinda rises with rebellious slowness, flame in her eye and revolt in her nether lip, to render the grudging aid demanded of her. As her reluctant hand holds the gown for her husband to put on, they both find themselves unintentionally standing plump and full before a rather large mirror, inevitably facing their own figures, thus brought into sudden juxtaposition.

Belinda is in gala dress. In honor of the Duke, and for the first time since her marriage, Oxbridge is to see her neck and shoulders. Upon their smooth sea of cream, unbroken by any trifling necklet—a sea that flows unrippled over the small collar-bones—the gas-lamps throw satin reflects; a little chaplet of seasonable cowslips clasps her well-set head, and wrath has borrowed love's red pennon and planted it in her cheeks. She looks a magnificent embodiment of youth and vigor, dwarfing into yet meaner insignificance the parched figure beside her.

Mrs. Forth casts one pregnant look at the two reflections, and then hearing, or feigning to hear, a sound of suppressed mirth behind her, she says, in a clear, incisive voice:

"What are you laughing at, Sarah? Are you admiring us? Are you thinking what a nice looking pair we are?"

She lays a slight but cruel accent on the noun. Pair, indeed! From Fate's strangely jumbled bag were never two such odd ones sorted out before. The Professor has turned sharply away, but not before his wife has had the satisfaction of seeing that her shot has told; but Sarah maintains a scared silence. The fly is late in arriving. Probably it has had many freights to take up and put down on this festal night before the Forths' turn comes. At length, however, and just as Sarah is beginning wistfully to interrogate her Louis Quinze shoes as to their powers of reaching St. Ursula and H. R. H. on foot, it drives up, and they all get in. Possibly Belinda, though she makes no approaches towards a verbal amende, may be remorseful for her spurt of malevolence. At all events, she offers no objection to the raising of the window on her side; nor does she, even by a pardonable gasp or two, or an obtruded fanning, resent the insult to the summer night.

The lateness of their fly has retarded them so much, that instead of being first at the rendezvous, as is the Professor's usual habit, they see, on reaching St. Ursula's, the great quadrangle that the proudest churchman built filled with every carriage and bath-chair that Oxbridge's modest mews can boast; filled, too, with capped men and hooded women, hurrying to the goal. They have trodden the low-stepped stone stairs, along whose side lie unwonted banks of green moss that smells of cool, woodland places, planted with young field flowers; have passed the one slender shaft that, upspringing, bears the vaulted roof, and its loveliest stone fans, and have entered the lordly hall, where Elizabeth Tudor once saw Masks, and where one of the sons of her latest successor is listening with a courteous patience, probably superior to hers, to such improvements upon the barbarous Mask and obsolete Allegory as the nineteenth century, rich in the spoils of its eighteen grandfathers, can afford him. In the present instance, the substitute offered is a tale told, not by an idiot, but by an excessively hot young man, striking occasionally sensational chords on the piano, at which he is seated upon the raised dais, where the "Fellows'" table is wont to stand—a monstrosity long tale about a signalman, who, while busied in working his points, sees his infant, through some glaring domestic mismanagement, staggering across the metals at the precise moment when an express train is due. The struggle between his emotions as a parent and as a pointsman is so mercilessly protracted, that the audience, unable to bear the prolonged strain upon their feelings, are relieving themselves by a good deal of sotto voce, or not quite sotto voce conversation. But the Prince sits immovably polite, not permitting himself even one aside to his sémillante hostess, who, all loyal smiles, is posed in glory on a chair in the front rank beside him.

Large as is the assemblage, so nobly proportioned is the great room, that there is no crowd. Every woman has put on her best gown; and every woman has the satisfaction of thinking that every other woman has seen, is seeing, or will fully see it; not, indeed, to do them justice, that this is a consideration much likely to engage the attention of the Oxbridge ladies. Thanks to the height of the carved oak roof, whither the vapors can ascend, below it is cool and fragrant. With the one emphatic exception of the detailer of the signalman's perplexities scarce one of the living guests has a more heated air than the brave line of judges, bishops, philosophers, premiers—St. Ursula's dead glories—looking down in painted tranquillity from the walls.

"You must introduce me to everybody, and tell me who they are, and what they have done, so that I may say something suitable," says Sarah, in a flutter of pleasure, looking beamingly round on the, to her, eccentric throng of black-gowned M. A.'s, with their flat college caps tucked under their arms; of velvet-sleeved proctors, etc.

"For heaven's sake, do not try!" says Belinda, in serious dissuasion, "or you will be sure to make a mess of it!"

Sarah shrugs her white shoulders. She is so clamorous to be presented to every one, that Belinda, after patiently pointing out to her, and where feasible, making her personally acquainted with the owners of many of the local, all the half-dozen national, and the one or two European reputations that grace the room, at length strikes work.

"You are insatiable!" she says. "You are as bad as Miss Watson!"

"Unberufen!" cries Sarah, with a shudder that is not all affectation, "do not mention that accursed name; I could have sworn that I heard her voice just now!"

The room is fuller than it was. About the door, indeed, and the lower part of the hall, circulation is still easy; but who would be content with elbow-room at a lower end, when the sight of a genuine live English royal Duke—no dubious serene German—is to be fought for at the upper.

"And you say that we are not loyal!" says Belinda, with that irony now so frequently assumed by her, as they, too, push and jostle their forward way. They have to push and jostle for themselves.

Immediately upon their entry, their natural pusher and jostler, the Professor, has quitted them for associates more akin in age and conformable in tastes than the two handsome girls assigned by a sarcastic Providence to his jurisdiction. As they so work slowly forward, gaining a step a minute, they are conscious of a disturbed heaving of the wave of humanity behind them—as when the ocean is plowed by some puissant steamer or monstrous shark. At the same instant a familiar voice, whose accents Sarah had already but too truly caught, breaks in brazen certainty upon their ears:

"I am sure I beg a thousand pardons! but in a crush of this kind it is quite unavoidable. I really must beg you to make way for me! I am naturally anxious to get to the top of the room, having a personal acquaintance with the Duke, or what really amounts to the same thing."

The loud voice grows nearer, the wave-like swell heavier. She is close behind them now.

Belinda has turned white and sick. That dreadful voice! Even here, on this hot May night, in the thick festal crowd, of what power is it to re-create for her that miserable fog-stained Christmas morning, on which, in her madness, she had allowed a few senseless words uttered by that brutal voice to seal her doom for her.

"Speak to her!" she says, in a choked whisper to her sister. "I cannot."

"Hold your head down!" rejoins the other, hastily putting into practice her own precept, and burying her nose in the lilies of the valley on her breast; "perhaps she will not see us!"

But when did Miss Watson ever fail to see any one?

One final oaring of her powerful arm has brought her alongside of them.

"Belinda! Sarah!" she cries loudly, seeing that her mere presence, although sufficiently obvious, has apparently failed to attract their attention; "do you not know me? Emily Watson? Dresden? Has anything been going on? have I lost much?—I could not possibly get here before—quite a sudden thought my coming at all: I heard that the Sampsons were coming down to see their boy, who is at King's; so it struck me I would join them and come, too. I took them quite by surprise—met them at the station. 'Why not see Oxbridge all together?' I said; 'halve the expense, and double the pleasure!'"

She pauses out of breath, and looks eagerly onward toward the spot where, beyond his mother's struggling lieges, the Prince sits, cool and civil, with his suite on their row of chairs.

"I was so afraid that the Prince might be gone," pursues she volubly; "the royalties sometimes go so early, you know. Have you been presented to him? Do you know him? well, enough to present me? No? Well, then I must re-introduce myself: I have no doubt that a word will suffice to recall me to H. R. H.'s recollection. Royal memories are proverbially good, you know. I must get hold of his equerry; I know him quite well—once crossed over in the same steamer from New-haven to Dieppe with him."

The last few words are thrown back over her shoulder, as she has already resumed her vigorous fight onward.

With fascinated eyes they watch her athlete's progress to the front. The human billows part before her. The crowd lies behind her. She has reached smooth water and the Prince.

The signalman's troubles are by this time drawing to their close. His rosy babe has been found lying smiling on the line; the express train having, contrary to its usual habit, passed over the pretty innocent without inflicting a scratch. Most people draw a long breath; but whether at the babe's immunity or their own, who shall decide?

"She is making him shake hands with her!" says Sarah, in a shocked voice, standing on tiptoe, and stretching her neck.

It is too true. In defiance of etiquette, and despite the horrified look of the hostess, Miss Watson is warmly grasping her Duke's hand. Against the background of wall and chairs her figure stands out plainly silhouetted—fringe, garish evening-dress, and hot red neck! To their ears come even fragments of her resonant speech: "Your equerry, sir!" "Newhaven!" "Sea-sick!"

"I should like to sit down," says Belinda, in a spent voice.

This is easier said than done. By slow degrees, however, they succeed in edging out of the crowd; and are lucky enough to find an unoccupied sofa, upon which Belinda seats herself; and whither, presently, various of her acquaintance come and exchange remarks with her upon the success of the entertainment, the excellence of the supper, the affability of the Prince, etc.

In one of the intervals between two of these fragments of conversation she perceives that her charge has left her side; but it requires no very distant excursion of the eye to discover her standing at the supper-table, an ice in her hand, having, by the agency of one of her just-made acquaintance, effected an introduction to a good-looking undergraduate, who in return is presenting to her a second, who in his turn will obviously present to her a third and a fourth.

A little mob of young men is beginning to gather round her. A moment more, and her ice finished, followed by her cortège, Sarah returns to her sister, winking so deftly as to be invisible to the outer world as she comes.

"Belinda," she says, "I want to introduce to you Mr. Bellairs, who tells me that he plays tennis remarkably well" (an indistinct disclaimer from the blushing Bellairs); "and Mr. Stanley, who plays very nicely too; and Mr. De Lisle, who thinks he would play very nicely if he had a little more practice."

Belinda laughs slightly, amused at the glibness with which her sister has already mastered her new admirers' names.

She has risen to her feet again—Professor Forth's wife—the stern-faced beauty whom in their walks and talks the boys have often with distant awe admired.

"I am sure," she says, with a sweet cold smile, "that if you care to try our small ground, I shall be very—"

She is a tall woman, and her eyes are on a level with Bellairs'. She can, therefore, easily look over his shoulder. What sight is it so seen that makes her stop suddenly in mid-speech, with a catch in her breath?

The pause is but short. Almost before her auditors have had time to notice the hiatus, it is filled up.

"I shall be very happy to see you any day you choose to come—to-morrow, any day!"

Her words are perfectly collected; but surely she is far, far paler than she was when she began to speak; and though her sentences are addressed to the young men, her eyes are wandering oddly beyond them.

"Upon my soul, I believe the woman is off her head!" Stanley says confidentially to Bellairs, as they walk home together in the moonlight; "did you notice her eyes when she was talking to us? they made me feel quite jumpy!"

"Off her head!" growls Bellairs, who finds it not impossible to combine a poignant interest in Sarah with a servile moth-and-candle-like homage to the elder and severer beauty; "so would you be, if you were married to an old mummy!"

EBONY: A SOUTHERN SKETCH.

BY CLARA G. STEELE.

I LIKE to think of the time when I first met him, so I shall write down all the circumstances and events surrounding that afternoon, for my friendship for the subject of this sketch is really a part of my life's history; more so, indeed, than my acquaintance with some of the distinguished and important personages of earth, many of whom have long since faded from my memory, while my regard for "Ebony" will ever stand out prominent among life's memories, never to be obliterated by change. A strange friendship this, one would naturally think, between a young girl of seventeen and a poor black dwarf slave, whom circumstances, and what the world would call "chance," had thrown together! And yet, strange as it seems, the mutual attachment waxed stronger and stronger through many days and months, ending only when He who knows distinctions neither of race or color stooped down in pitying love and took into the realms of eternal light His creature, who for many years had been eagerly searching for the light of the truth here below.

It was a lovely, cool, bright day in which I had chosen to leave my home for a temporary residence in the pine lands, not many miles distant from the sea-beaten coast of South Carolina. The conveyance, an open buggy, drawn by a pair of fine bays, gave my companion and me a fair opportunity to enjoy fully the combined charms of earth and sky. Summer, with its long, languid days and its fervid heat, was past and gone, and October, with a lavish hand, had already robbed the forests in gorgeous raiments of orange, crimson and brown, in all their varying shades. Here and there a maple leaf of richest hues fluttered through the air and fell at our feet. In the woods the ripe nuts were dropping, and saucy little squirrels whisked their lithe forms from tree to tree, busily garnering their winter provender. Our drive for the greater part of the journey was along a firm, high road, with deep trenches on either side, shaded by giant trees of maple and live-oak. While nearing, as we hoped, the end of our journey, we came suddenly, by the turn of the road, to a large expanse of water, which the neighboring residents called a lake. On the unruffled bosom of this beautiful sheet of blue water, snowy lilies, surrounded by their broad leaves of glossiest green, were floating. The lake was too deep to be crossed, save over the rustic bridge that spanned it, and we reached the bridge just at the dying that sweet autumn day. But how shall I describe the glory of that never-to-be-forgotten sunset? It comes like some beautiful vision of the long ago, to be seen but once, yet evermore to be remembered. As the eye glanced across the lake, taking in the broad green meadow-lands beyond, low in the far-off west there hung a great golden ball, surrounded by masses of gorgeous crimson, purple, and amber-hued clouds, piled one upon another, which, as they stretched away toward the lake borders, seemed to melt into colors of loveliest rose. The deep purple, shaded into tender violet, and tints of delicate green, floated here and there, dissolving, as we gazed, into soft, creamy hues; and all this beauty was reflected in the mirror-like surface of the lake beneath.

A motion of my hand caused my companion to rein up his horses, and midway the bridge we stopped to drink in with every sense and with emotions of keenest pleasure the exquisite treat which nature had so unexpectedly given us. Lower and lower sank the sun, deeper and deeper grew the shadows; soon twilight's misty veil came down upon us. The grand panorama had vanished, and, with a sigh of mingled enjoyment and regret, we went on our way once more. We had traveled only a short distance from the lake when there came to my ears the sound of a deep, melodious voice, singing in a style very familiar to me, the words of a hymn which I had often heard in the island homes around Charleston. With great fervor the singer sang:

"Dis ole ship er Zion, hit's ter tek us all home!

O! glory, halleyloo-ye!

Hit's lan'ed many er tousan',

And hit'll lan' er many mo';

O! glory, halleyloo!"

But there was one thing which puzzled me. As we drew nearer to the singer the voice seemed to come from the ground beneath us ; indeed, even at our feet. Then suddenly, in answer to my lowly-spoken query, "Who is it? Where is he?" there peered up from a deep ditch by the roadside a human face, black, but very bright, the large ivory teeth glistening in the twilight, the expression of his whole face decidedly agreeable. Jumping out of the ditch with wonderful agility, and doffing his old straw hat with the politeness I afterward found was innate, he exclaimed in a cheery voice :

"Good eben, massa! Good eben, missis! How you both does to-night?"

My companion, I think, responded for both, as I was wholly taken up in regarding this strange creature with a mixed feeling of curiosity and pity. He was but three and a half feet in height, but the head and shoulders were large enough in their proportions for a man of six feet. One hand and arm rested on the spade with which he had been digging when we interrupted him. The other, bare, huge and brawny, as it hung at his side, was nearly the length of his body from his shoulder to his ankle. His face, though so black, was to me at first sight singularly prepossessing; the nose long and straight, the lips not too thick, and well shaped. His clothes, scarce deserving the name (for they were a mass of rags), helped to show his great deformity, for he was a hunchback; and, although agile, was very lame in one hip, which gave him a peculiar gait, quite perceptible as he hastened to the other side of the buggy to pick up the whip my companion had dropped. Just then my attention was called to a beautiful star which had appeared in the heavens, and our remarks upon it caused the dwarf to exclaim :

"God has gib us a mighty pooty wurl, missy! Sometimes I sleeps out all night under the stahs—hit kinder makes me feel nearer to God, hit does."

After a few more words with our strange and new acquaintance, we bade him "good night," and in a short time found ourselves nearing the place of our destination. The host and hostess came down the steps of their beautiful mansion, and welcomed us with warm cordiality to their typical Southern home. The house stood in the midst of a large and beautiful flower garden, odorous with a thousand subtle scents. The grand magnolia spread its evergreen leaves on either side of the dwelling, while the deep-hued roses and heliotropes vied with the sweet scent of geraniums of every species to charm our senses, and a fountain sent up its spray of tangled silver, quite visible from the brilliantly illuminated windows of the large white mansion before us. Within all was elegance and ease, and a delightful supper awaited us. But I could not detach my thoughts from our queer acquaintance by the roadside, and before I retired for the night I had learned something of him. He was one of the two hundred slaves owned by my kind host, Mr. Harleston; but, upon further inquiry in regard to him, I plainly saw that my interest in the black dwarf was not reciprocated, and the surprise of the family at my repeated reference to him was very evident.

The eldest daughter, Elise, a handsome girl, just returned from a fashionable boarding-school, said with a haughty curve of her rosebud mouth: "I should think he would have frightened you to death, the horrid creature! I never look at him if I can avoid it."

But the youngest daughter, Madge, a bright, hazel-eyed little sprite, exclaimed, "Oh, I can tell you all about Eb. He's my best friend, except Aunt Chaney, my dear old nurse. I don't think he's horrid one bit! Why, Miss Lucia, he catches fish for me, and he's always so good and kind; and he knows so many beautiful stories 'bout Brer' Rabbit, and Brer' Fox, and Miss 'Skeeterhawk, and Parson Owil, and he gets lilies for my tub from the pond, and—"

"Why, daughter," said the indolent but gentle mother, "when did you find opportunity to be so much in Ebony's company? for you know we have forbidden you to go to the quarters except when Aunt Chaney is sick."

"Yes, mamma, I know; but that's just where I first knew dear old Eb. Aunt Chaney just loves him, because he's good and religious, and always so kind to her, and to all the darkeys, too. Then, when you and papa were in Charleston, Eb was working in the flower-garden, and he told me the names of the plants, and fixed me a little flower-bed all for myself. Why, Miss Lucia, he's just splendid!" And the sweet child, who had talked herself out of breath, drew a long sigh.

"Hurrah for you, little daughter!" said her father, whose special pet she was, as I afterward found. "I did not know my pet—"

Here Elise interrupted with a disdainful look, as she arose from her chair at the table: "Really, Miss Madge, I must say that you display a charming taste in the selection of your friends."

Mr. Harleston, with his good-natured laugh, exclaimed: "Come, now! let Madge alone. Ebony's companionship will never harm her. He's a clever, good fellow, and I really believe an honest one—a rara avis, Miss Lucia, on so large a plantation; for some years I cannot raise bacon enough to feed my slaves. The roasting-pigs vanish by the dozen; and as to chickens—frying size—well, you know that's one thing no darkey can resist—unless it were Eb. He seems to have a number of his own raising; he is so thrifty."

But I had not been many days in my new home ere I obtained all the information I wished concerning Ebony. He was his mother's only child, and deformed from his birth. A Northern gentleman, visiting Mr. Harleston at one time, chanced to see the little dwarf in his mother's arms, and being impressed by the almost perfectly black hue of the infant, said derisively to his host: "I did not know before that you grew ebony in this form down South." It was a new word to the mother, and must have pleased her, for ever after the child bore the name of Ebony, abbreviated to the diminutive "Eb."

So much of his history was supplemented by Aunt Chaney, the former nurse in the family. His mother dying while he was yet a boy, he had dwelt for many years under Aunt Chaney's roof as one of her own family.

"He allus wuz a berry good boy," the old nurse said; "a 'ligious boy, too—tend ter his own business, and neber gib me one word of sass, do' I raise him myseff," she added, which was doubtless an exceptional instance in the old soul's experience, for she had "raised," as she termed it—her plump face beaming with satisfaction and shining with blackness and good-nature—"lots er 'em, w'ite and cullud."

Ebony was very modest, shrinking even from his own race, who no doubt often wounded the sensitive soul with allusions to his deformity. I always from the first gave a pleasant greeting and a few kind words to the poor fellow, whom I often met in the garden while he worked among the flowers, and also in our daily rambles or drives around the neighborhood. In a short while he showed, though very shyly, a corresponding interest in the young "town missy," as he always termed me. Presents of wild game which he had trapped, bouquets of exquisite wild flowers, were often sent me, as silent offerings expressive of his admiration; and, as I always contrived to thank him in person for them, we gradually became good friends.

One afternoon, as I sat reading on a small balcony that opened out of my room, with side steps leading to the yard, Ebony appeared, and earnestly, though very humbly, asked if I could spare the time to "larn him jest a leetle ebery day; den mebbe I can read God's Word, missy, all for myseff arter 'while." I told him, if his master consented, he might come to my balcony during the one hour given to the slaves as intermission at the midday dinner-horn.

He appeared with a joyful countenance on the next day, cleanly dressed, with his well-thumbed "Webster" in his hand, and unbounded was his gratitude to the "young town missy" who was so "berry good." I believe that I have never seen a human being who so thirsted after knowledge—above all, knowledge divine. His bright black eyes would sparkle, his ivories fully displayed whenever a new idea was gained or a simple sentence read without aid. His heart's great desire, as he at first told me, was that he might learn to read "God's Holy Word" for himself—it was thus that he ever termed the Scriptures; and great was his delight when one day he found that he could read a short chapter in the New Testament.

Never losing an opportunity to "'tend preachin'," some words quoted by one of the ministers who occasionally addressed the colored congregations in this vicinity, seemed to have taken strong hold upon his heart and mind. It was a verse from the Gospel of St. John, and I think that he asked me in his most serious tones at least once a week for a long time afterward:

"Hit's raly put down dere, missy, sho' an' true! 'Him w'at comest unto Me shall in no wise be cas' out.' Sho' an' true, missy!"

Then, to make assurance doubly sure, I would take the large-printed copy of the New Testament which I had given him, and, turning to the verse, point out each word with my pencil, the poor fellow painfully trying to follow me. Many times the great tears gathered involuntarily in his eyes, and he would exclaim:

"Now, ain't dat de mos' preshus ob all, sho'?" and over and over the words, so full of comfort to his lonely heart, were repeated softly under his breath, as though he were trying to realize the truth in all its fullness.

All untutored as the poor fellow had been, it surprised me to see the unconscious gleams of poetry in his nature; the evident reaching forward of the soul for something higher and greater than he had hitherto known. Music was with him a passion; but who that has had opportunity to observe the characteristics of this most peculiar race, can have failed to perceive this rare gift, this divine faculty, which they all possess, with perhaps a few exceptions, to a wondrous degree? The picaninny, rolling in the sand before the cabin door, imitates with accuracy the words and tune of the hymns and songs he has heard from the white children at the great house. The housemaid, as she plies her daily avocation, trills out in sweetest, clearest notes, the most difficult airs from the opera of "Martha" or "Il Trovatore" with wondrous skill as to time and expression—her knowledge gained oftentimes in a few days from the parlor practice of her young mistresses; the plowman, as he guides his weary oxen home through the roseate sunset, keeping time with his iron traces to the exquisite melody of some hymn of the olden time, which, from its tender beauty, has long since found an echo in the universal heart; the boatman, returning at nightfall, sends far over the blue waters the soul-stirring strains of "The Angelus," learned how and when we know not: but in all their weird and charming music we know there appears a perfect rhythmical measure, a harmony so wonderfully true, that we can only refer it to some law of Nature, clearly felt, yet to us inexplicable.

Often, while sitting on the broad piazza in the cool of evening, have I listened with intense enjoyment to the harvest songs which came from the fields near by, where a band of workers were finishing their day's task. Just here, who can but ask the question—What is, and what has been, the great Infinite purpose in the subtle, intricate workings (for thus it appears to human vision) in removing the African from his native forest depths and placing him in contact with civilized white races, first as slave and then as freedman? He who can foretell the final destiny of this singular race will prove himself equal to a mighty prophet, and manifest the wisdom of a true statesman.

How the notes rose and fell with a pathetic vibrance from these dusky children of toil! And in a clearer, higher key from the others I could always recognize Ebony's voice. He sang constantly, and as if with his whole heart. His tones were soft and melodious while working among the flowers, or performing his other duties near "the great house," as the slaves all termed their master's dwelling. But when on his fishing excursions, or hopping along the broad roads with his own peculiar gait, he sent forth an astounding volume of sound, in which there was not one discordant note. Sometimes it was a grand tenor, which made the woodlands ring with its deep, rich melody; then changing in a moment to a weird, pathetic strain, which often arrested my footsteps and caused me to stand and listen in mute delight and wonder. One of his favorite hymns was the refrain sung to the sweet old church hymn, "Come ye who love the Lord." I can hear it now—I think I shall ever hear it—that voice, with a music all its own, as he sang:

"We're marchin' troo Immanuel's ground
To fairer worlds on high."

"What makes you love to sing all the time, Ebony?" I asked one day, as I passed along the road near the field in which he was industriously hoeing.

In an instant he dropped his hoe, and looking me full in the face, gravely and seriously replied: "I has to sing, missy; seems like dere's sumpin' e'enside here," laying his hand on his broad chest, "dat mus' come out." Then, lowering his voice to a solemn tone, he said hesitatingly, "I tinks sometimes—mebbe missy—hit's God's voice widin me—w'at bids me 'sound His praise abroad'—so dat dem w'at doan' lub de blessed Saviour kin yeer an' know w'at a Christian's hope and joy is. Nubbody can he'p singin' dese sperritl songs, missy, ef dey lub de Lord."

Poor, untutored slave! I thought; mind all untrained, faculties untaught, conceptions darkened; and yet may it not be that he has attained to a higher growth in the divine life than many whose advantages have ever been unlimited?

"Sing on then, Ebony," I said to him, "sing on! for then I know that you are happy, and I do love to hear you!"

His face lit up immediately as I spoke; then, while moving on, I heard him ask from Heaven a special blessing for "de young town missy." Was he dimly conscious of how much she needed his humble prayer? Poor black Eb! I know now how abundant were thy treasures. He was not naturally robust, but very energetic, and, as far as the light shone for him, was possessed of a certain conscientious notion in the discharge of his duties.

As often happens in such cases, there was more continuous hard labor put upon him than he was able to bear. Frequently he told me how very weary he was—too weary to sleep at night. And upon one occasion he had asked the white overseer to transfer some very hard ditching to a stronger man.

The answer was: "Well, if you are too sick to work, go into your cabin, and don't let me see you out again for three days."

"Ah, dat git nixt to me, sho'," said the poor fellow in his peculiar dialect. "He kno'ed well 'nuff, Massa Abram did, dat I'd work all my bones out befo' I'd miss my schoolin', so I neber say 'tired' or 'sick' ter him any mo'."

But the terrible strain could not go on always. There had been several cases of malaria on the river-side where Ebony dwelt, and, although deeply grieved, I was not surprised to hear from Madge one day that poor Eb was sick and could not leave his house. Madge's deep interest, added to my own, roused Mr. Harleston to interfere more than was his wont to do in such cases. The next day Ebony was moved to a more comfortable house near Aunt Chaney's, and soon the physician of the district was sent for to treat his case specially.

From the first he had been violently ill, and two weeks of wild delirium were followed by many days when the soul made no sign to denote its presence in the earthly tabernacle—when neither the country physician, or the city sage who had been summoned for consultation, could surely decide whether there still lingered in the senseless frame one spark of that mysterious power we call vitality. But there came a day when he opened his eyes in consciousness of surrounding objects, and held out his feeble hand to Aunt Chaney, who wept over him abundantly. A day or two after, he smiled in faint satisfaction at the soft white pillow on which his weary head lay, made specially for him by "dat blessed little town missy," who was always so "berry good." Then he managed to articulate the word "pray;" and good old Aunt Chaney did pray, kneeling by his bedside, with her wrinkled hands clasped in his own.

Aunt Chaney! Few are the prototypes left us now of all who were once our invaluable household treasures. You were indeed a "ministering angel" to poor black Ebony, and I trust you have, long ere this, met each other in "dat better lan'" concerning which you spoke so often together while here below.

At this stage Madge and myself visited our humble friend daily, carrying him gruel and tempting chicken-broths at each visit. But it soon became apparent that Ebony would not recover, as Madge and myself, the most sanguine of all, had so earnestly hoped. One afternoon, near the setting of the sun, a message came to me. Ebony wished to say "good-by to de young town missy." Silently I followed the messenger, reaching the little cabin just as the autumnal sun was slowly fading away, leaving its golden tints on river, leaf and flower. By a strange coincidence, it was on the same day and at the same hour in which I had first met the poor dwarf one year before. Within was presented a scene which an artist's brush alone could fully depict. In the huge fireplace burned oaken and hickory logs, which, ever and anon throwing out fitful gleams, lit up for a moment the immense blackened rafters overhead, and revealed at the same time the low trundle bed in the farther corner of the room. On this humble couch I distinguished the motionless form of Ebony, his face calm and placid, his once strong hands, never more to ply their ceaseless toil, crossed upon his breast, conveying to me a sense of perfect rest and quietude.

A row of awe-stricken sable faces were ranged around the apartment; none, however, save Aunt Chaney and Lizette, the housemaid, venturing to draw near the bedside. Kneeling between them, by the dying man, I took his hand in mine. Never to be forgotten was the expression of his face, as slowly he raised his eyes to mine. It seemed transmuted with a light not born of earth. "The fairer worlds are drawing very nigh, Ebony." "Tank God, missy, berry nigh!" "And the golden gates, too—they are almost in sight!" There was no answer to this, save a faint pressure of my hand, for the portals of the New Jerusalem were slowly opening to admit the ransomed soul, upon whose face was reflected more strongly than before the effulgent glory of the light within. Unable to control my emotion, I buried my head in Aunt Chaney's motherly lap. Soon kind hands drew me away, and Aunt Chaney's voice said softly, "He 's done cross de ribber, missy, an' landed safe on de oder side. Tank God! Tank God!"

Mr. Harleston was standing outside when I reached the doorway, and together we turned away from the little cabin. As I walked silently homeward through the grove of young oaks which separated the family dwelling from the quarters, the cool night winds sighing through the foliage, and the wild melodies that the river sang as it hurried away beneath the dark shadow of the cliffs, seemed to me a fitting requiem for the soul which but a short while since had been set free, and had passed into the great mystery beyond. And as I looked upward to the bright stars he so loved, and which in the deep azure seemed to glitter with unusual brilliancy, I felt assured that from that glorious world beyond their shining the soul of poor, black Ebony had been in no wise "cas' out."

MOTHER-LOVE.

WOMAN, where'er in God's good world you stand,

Who breathe a two-fold breath with some dear child,
And feel soft, dimpled fingers clasp your hand,
Or on your neck a climbing arm entwine,
Like reaching tendrils of a fair young vine—

And hear the voice that calls for "mother," wild
With happy talk and laughter. . . Ask no more.

Blessed are you who hold a living creed!

For all truth, this is a truth, indeed!

Whatever Life may give or take away

(Counting its keenest hurt all joy above, Glad its blest anguish and dear pain to prove),
Nothing the heart can dream, or feel, or know,

Is half so deep, so dear as Mother-love.

MARY AINGE DE VERE.

WAS EMERSON COLD?

EIGHT generations of typical New England clergymen sent down to him their habit of reticence, of suppressed emotion, and, if one may say so, of natural unnaturalness. The ice that incrusting him had been forming since the winter of 1620. Is it venturesome to try to sound beneath it? Emerson had the temperament of a poet with the mind of a philosopher. His poetry—and it is to his poetry we must look to answer our question—is rarified by his philosophy, and his philosophy is fired by unerring poetic intuition.

Some one said well of him a few years ago, "He is a mystic rather than a skeptic." A mystic cannot be cold, for the very exhalations of thought into the glowing vapor of mysticism implies a central fire. In studying him we must remember that habitual reserve and the interplay of thought with emotion hold him quiet till he has passed the first and second stages of emotional experience, so we can get from him no outcry, no as from Shakspeare—the worse, perhaps, for him and for us. But were the tears and laughter ever there? One has only to be able to read backward a little way to answer.

"Tears and laughter for all time,"

To be cold were to be, for example, like Pope, whose lines, rolling on in smooth succession, give no hint of pain different from that of wounded vanity or ambition, no sign of sensibility to the mysterious forces that are not bound up in books; such as the currents of the air and light, the breath of flowers or the indescribable mental and spiritual quickening that results from fit companionship.

Emerson's poetry is to his prose what the blossom of the delicate, climbing honeysuckle is to the bright red and yellow flowers of the coarser varieties, which, at the same season, make so many trellises gay. Its faintly-tinted and hardly-parting petals open slowly, surprised while they look at you from their shy color into a golden hue; yet this alone of all the family has a soul. To the one who passes near it when the dew falls and the moon is up, it breathes out what all the glare of daylight could never reveal in the others. Emerson had the kinship with nature which made it possible for him to write "The Snow Storm" and "May Day," and to say in one mood:

"A woodland walk,
A quest of river grapes, a mocking thrush,
A wild rose or rock-living columbine
Salve my worst wounds."

He would be not cold, but cool as Wordsworth, if that mood had been constant; but turn a few pages and see what we have—a poem kindled with white heat. Its very concentration carries a convincing intensity, while we might wish it had expanded to the length of "In Memoriam," or had been wreathed with all the "sad embroidery" of Lycidas:

"A ruddy drop of manly blood
The surging sea outweighs;
The world uncertain comes and goes,
The lover, rooted, stays.
I fancied he was fled,
And after many a year
Glowed unexhausted kindliness
Like daily sunrise there.
'O friend,' my bosom said,
'Through thee alone the sky is arched,
Through thee the rose is red;

All things through thee take nobler form
And look beyond the earth;
The mill-round of our fate appears
A sun-path in thy worth.
Me, too, thy nobleness has taught
To master my despair;
The fountains of my hidden life
Are through thy friendship fair."

In "The Nun's Aspiration" there is profound insight, the insight of the heart that detects, in watching her share in life and time,

"How drear the part she held in one,
How lame the other limped away."

It is true Tennyson's "St. Agnes" is read a hundred times for every glance that is cast on this. Tennyson's easy music catches the ear, and its voice is single and simple, the voice of a sweet song, while Emerson's Nun speaks words that would fit Beethoven's music. Artistically, it is, perhaps, a fault that such a poem should demand such close consideration; but the question is not of Emerson as an artist, and, once absorbed, we find the spirit of the poem adequate to the deepest despair and the highest hope. Is it not De Quincey who says, "Absolute despair is dumb"? and if a painter would give us the loneliest sea, he makes a gray waste of water, with only a single rock over which the waves can break, or a dismantled ship lighted only by the after-glow of sunset, saying most by uttering least.

A cold man is never stirred by enthusiasm. He watches critically while troops muster, and sees only through half-lights the beacons that draw high-souled men to glorious loss. He calculates motives while others lay down life. But if one would know of what stuff Emerson's soul was made, he can learn from his war poem, "Voluntaries." Not Lowell and Whittier and Holmes and Mrs. Howe have with their combined voices spoken the full meaning of 1862. Phases of its feeling they caught, and something of its scope, but its awful intensity of passion and principle, the tremendous surge that rolled out from love of country, from long-baffled indignation against wrong, world-wide pity and fore-seeing hope—a surge that swept under in its tide hearts and homes trained by centuries of loyalty to an illimitable tenderness—all this no American less great than Emerson has found a musical chord grand enough to fit.

Still, perception of the secrets that "all can look at and few can see," sympathy with the tragic element in lives that die and make no sign, and even enthusiasm for great causes, leave something lacking to our conception of genuine warmth of heart. We must be told at last how the man can love and grieve in those relations that are common to all—where the philosopher and the day-laborer meet undistinguished. There are two poems, "The Dirge" and "Threnody" that answer us at this point. "The Dirge" is a pensive summer afternoon memory, as he recalls, in his walk by the Concord River, the brothers he had lost. He says:

"I touch this flower of silken leaf
Which once my childhood knew;
Its soft leaves wound me with a grief
Whose balsam never grew."

Then the "pine-warbler," singing to him, says:

"Go, lonely man!
They loved thee from their birth;
Their hands were pure and pure their faith."

There are no such hearts on earth ;
 You cannot unlock your heart—
 The key is gone with them—
 The silent organ loudest chants
 The master's requiem."

"Threnody" is his wail over the beautiful boy, the little Waldo, whom Margaret Fuller and all who saw him pronounced the most gifted and lovable child they had ever known. In "Threnody" it is not Emerson, the great thinker of his time and of his country, who speaks, but Emerson the father, as he hungrily watches from his study window not to miss one innocent and lovely look of the boy on his way to school. No one can ever have loved a child who can read with undimmed eyes about the painted sled and the kennel and the snow-tower, "the ominous hole dug in the sand,"

"And every inch of garden ground Paced by the blessed feet around."

Then there comes the morning, when everything else, all birds and common things could wake to life, but the boy was gone, and the father, "grown early old with grief," reaches out from the vacancy, saying:

"The eager fate which carried thee
 Took the largest part of me,
 For this losing is true dying."

No quotation can give the pathos of the poem—the mourning for the world's loss, as well as his own, rising gradually to those heights where lame reason never carried any man—and closing with an organ tone of sublime faith "of suffering born":

"What is excellent,
 As God lives, is permanent ;
 Hearts are dust—hearts' loves remain ;
 Heart's love shall meet thee again."

Do we need further search, or ever to ask again, Was Emerson cold ?

ELIZABETH T. SPRING.

A SOUTHERLY RAIN.

BY CHARLES C. ABBOTT.

"WHAT about to-morrow ?" I asked Uz, as we stood on the brow of the hill and gazed over the meadows at our feet, now partially veiled in a silvery mist.

Uz wet his forefinger and held it up, looking closely at the movement of the few fleecy clouds above as he did so. After a brief pause he replied, with the air of one well convinced of the truth of his opinions: "There 'll be a southerly rain, and ducks."

A word about weather predictions. I am compelled to admit that I have faith in the judgment of men like old Uz Gaunt, when they pronounce an opinion as to the morrow or a day or two beyond; but he, like all other men, fails in the matter of foretelling seasons. Uz does not like my referring to the winter of 1880-81. His prediction, which he early made known to me, was quite the opposite of what the season proved to be. He consoled himself, however, with the earnest protest that he was never before mistaken, and that "covers three more than fifty years" since he commenced solving the riddle of what the winters will be.

"Natur knows what 's coming," he has often said to me, "and natur gets ready for winter to suit the sort of weather it 's goin' to be."

This is a common impression wherever I have wandered, but it will not stand the test of statistics. Corn-husks, pigs' spleens, goose breast-bones, squirrels' magazines of nuts, muskrat houses—all are relied upon by country people, but not one is trustworthy. Perhaps the position of the dark and light portions of the breast-bones of geese—that is, of geese hatched the previous spring—is more relied upon as an indication of the "open" or cold weather of an approaching winter than all the others; but it cannot be of any use, if for no other reason than because in a number of such bones reported upon by as many different people, there was nothing like unanimity; and, strangely enough, it is yet an open question whether the light portion of the bone is indicative of "open" weather and the dark portion of cold, or vice versa. What originally gave rise to these various signs is well worth tracing; but it is not to be dwelt upon here.

Having wandered too far already, let us take a back track and return to the hill-top, where Uz is still standing. No man who, without any pretensions to "book learning," studied nature out of doors, probably ever excelled Uz Gaunt in correct impressions of nature's methods. As a sportsman, or "a gunner," as he called himself, he was a success; for no one in the vicinity could excel him in finding game or in bringing it down. This, however, never worried me, for he generously gave me chances to shoot, although I often failed to secure a duck which he would surely not have missed. But Uz kept himself at times, when I was with him, so busied about the movements of the birds he sought, and was so interested in determining how nearly correct he had been in his calculations as to their whereabouts, that he forgot to shoot when they were flushed. Not long since he sculled up to a flock of widgeon, which we could not see, but which he "knew" were "just beyond that clump of alders." I had my doubts, and expressed them, but he was very firm. "They are skulkin' in there; now see if they ain't," he persisted; and so, nearer and nearer, we drew toward the bushes. His gun, already cocked, lay in his lap, and I was ready. Up they jumped, sure enough, and I got in both barrels. Uz never thought of his gun, but exclaimed with pride, "I told you so; I knew it." It was enough for him to be correct in his opinion.

So, when the to-morrow I mentioned at the opening of this sketch came, it proved to be a warm, rainy day, with a southerly wind, or "south-southerly" as he always called it. By this he meant that the wind might shift from southeast to southwest possibly, but at all times would be essentially "southerly." Uz was right in this, and the rain came down in a steady pour, with now and then a very brief intermission, and the river was soon swollen to the freshet stage. The meadows disappeared beneath a covering of shallow waters, and, better than all else, the ducks came.

Early in the morning of the fourth day Uz and I stood on the hill-top and took a general survey of the country before starting out. He noted the direction of the wind, the general distribution of the clouds at the time, and then, pointing toward the river, with a significant nod, quietly remarked, "I said so." I looked in the direction indicated, and, sure enough, a long zig-zag line of ducks was coming up the river. "Widgeon and teal," he remarked after a pause, and then made a move to go to the boat. I wondered how he knew they were widgeon and teal, instead of black ducks and sprig-tails, but forbore asking; and on we walked until we reached the boat, a light cedar skiff, well trimmed with evergreens, and just large enough to hold us both. It was a pleasant thing to sit still while Uz did the sculling. With a scarcely appreciable motion of the wrist, he caused the boat to move rapidly yet noiselessly through the water, and, in some way past my comprehension, he knew just where a flock of ducks would be if they tarried in the overflowed meadows.

This day it was a repetition of the story that may be told by any one who has sculled after ducks. At times we were too much for the ducks, and, getting good shots, brought down several. Then again the ducks were too much for us, and were out of shot, in spite of all Uz's ingenuity and our united carefulness. There came a lull in the day's occupation, however, of more interest to me than the shooting. This was when we hauled up for a lunch and smoke. I met with Uz's approbation as well as my own, and when our pipes were lighted I drew him out as I had seldom done before. It was simply glorious to listen to what I may call a natural naturalist, a man that had read no zoological literature, and never heard of Darwin or Huxley.

"Ducks, it appears to me," remarked Uz as he gazed at the pile of a dozen lying in the boat, "either have a strong smack of the human about them, or man has a little of the duck about him."

"Why so?" I asked in surprise; for Uz was not much given to voluntary philosophizing.

"Because they are so cunning, and do so many things that we'd do in the same situation. Now, there's the green mallards. They will skulk in long green grass, and keep their heads moving with it, just so they can see you, but you'd never mistrust they were around. You don't see a widgeon do the same thing. They'll pitch for some dead stuff, hay or rubbish, more their own color."

"But ducks don't always have these chances," I protested, "and when there's nothing but water they've only an even chance."

"That's very true when we're talking about the river, or some big lake; but I'm talking of ducks on these meadows. For something over forty years I've shot over this tract, and don't know about any other but by hearsay; but if you want to know what I think of our meadow ducks, I'll tell you."

"Well, Uz, I won't interrupt again, and I do want to hear all you've a mind to tell me."

"Take 'em for all in all," Uz continued, "the sprig-tail is the shyest duck we have, and I've been outwitted more by them than any other duck; but, dear me! there ain't the ducks now there was when I was a young man. I've seen a thousand at a glance on the lower meadows. Well, as to the sprig-tails, the last time I had a chance at a flock of them worth speaking of was nigh on to ten years ago. A good fall fresh covered all the meadows except the high knolls, and I went down toward Swan Island floodgates, on Crosswick's Creek. Not a duck came near the stools for well on to an hour, and I'd a mind to go somewhere else, when I happened to see a bunch of teal making right for me. I crouched down, and they came in easy shot, and I blazed away—fetched two; and then, what the snakes should jump up but a great swad o' sprig-tails right back of me! They'd been walking about in the high grass behind me, and I know they calculated their chances, and knew I'd be lookin' for 'em on the water, and not high and dry on the knolls. I'd a good notion of sprig-tails' cunning before then, but that made me set 'em down as the cutest of all ducks."

"Perhaps the ducks didn't see you," I suggested.

"Perhaps they didn't, only they did, just the same. Why, boy," exclaimed Uz with unusual energy, "those sprig-tails was within ten yards of me all the time—and to think I didn't even smell 'em!"

Uz here took a few contemplative puffs, and watched the curling smoke a moment in silence. Then, in his usual quiet manner, continued: "I'll tell you another thing about sprig-tails. More than once I've noticed that they make sort of slaves of other ducks. I've seen a dozen sprig-tails circle 'round a lot of stools, and wait until the teal that were with 'em sort of investigated the matter. The teal would settle down near by, and all would seem right, and then the sprig-tails would settle, but always on the off side of the stools; and if they got very near they'd smell a mouse and put off. I've often killed the teal in a flock of sprig-tails, and lost every one of the others. I'll tell you another way they're cunning. They haven't owls' eyes, I suppose, but go a good deal by smell; and they'll leave the river after sundown and come in on the meadows to feed, when there's nobody to disturb 'em. I learned their dodge, and tried night hunting; but it was no use. They'd feed by night where they'd never go by day, but the whole place would be picketed, and you couldn't get anywhere near 'em. Before your boat was shoved off, 'quack!' would yawp some spy, and the whole kit and caboodle would be off. I could hear their splash on the water as they riz up, but couldn't see a feather."

"I've noticed all this, too, Uz; but where is it like human nature to do as you've described?" I asked.

"Just here—just here. The ducks we've left us in these parts know at a glance that it's dangerous ground for 'em, and so they learn at the start to be extra careful. None of 'em are hatched about here, and couldn't know beforehand they'd ever see such a place; and yet, so soon as the freshets bring 'em up the river, they take it all in at once, and work accordin'. A wild duck is wild anywhere, but around here he's wilder than ever; and this bein' wilder only means that he has to be more careful and cunning, and so he is so. That is why I think a duck has some sort of a mind. It's a hard-twisted subject, I know; but the more I think of it, the more I've a notion that there's a smack of man-nature in wild ducks—or t' other way, just as you choose."

"Most people would want stronger evidence than you mention, Uz, to make them think so," I replied, not knowing what to say really.

"I s'pose they would—I s'pose they would; but the only way to see things as I do is to use my eyes. Follow up the ducks and other critters about here as I've done, and they'll look very different to you from what they do when you see 'em once a year only, and then in a m'nagerie. Pshaw, boy! it takes years to get to knowin' birds and things; but when you do, you'll give 'em more credit for common sense than the crowd gives 'em. When you're my age, boy, if you follow it up, you'll think as I do."

"I have been following up this matter for some time, Uz, and have written something about it," I replied, when he had fairly finished his little speech, and commenced a vigorous puffing at his pipe.

"Written somethin'?" Well, that's no harm. Did you have it printed?"

"Yes, certainly; why not?"

"Well, there's just this about it," Uz replied very slowly, evidently thinking as he spoke. "It may be all very well to print what you know, but I've a notion that you're not old enough yet to know much about it. You don't know ducks as I do; but then—but then—but then, if you wait till you're as old as I am, and see things as I do, the world would set you down for a crank if you printed what you thought."

"That isn't very encouraging, anyhow," I said with a half sigh.

"The fact is, boy, that it can't be proved, I suppose, but animals of all kinds are not so wide apart from folks as these very folks think they are. If I've learned nothing else by shooting and fishing all my life, I've learned that. There's a sort of family likeness running through the whole of us, whether we've two legs or four."

"That is the doctrine of evolution, Uz," I remarked.

"Call it what you choose, boy—but my pipe's out, and it's time we were moving."

This was my last day out with Uz Gaunt. Soon after the rheumatism bent and twisted him until he was helpless; and one pleasant afternoon of the following October, while sitting in his wheel-chair and gazing thoughtfully at the giant trees that surrounded his house, he passed quietly away.

THE HOUSEHOLD—WOMEN AS NEWSPAPER CORRESPONDENTS.

It is a comparatively short time since this field of literary work has been opened to women; yet, short as it is, notable work has been accomplished. Names of such writers occur at once to us all, whose power of description, keen analysis of character, delicate humor and wide range of observation have given new life to journalism, and whose letters are looked for with eagerness by every reader. The ideal correspondent—man or woman—requires not only the qualities mentioned, but one which is the rarest of all gifts given to mortals—the power of stating a fact, uncolored by any slightest shadow of personal prejudice for or against. Where it is a mere question of impressions, fancy may have some play, and here a woman's susceptibility serves her in good stead, and her picturesque faculty will construct from even forbidding elements a study in which form and color and tone are all harmonious. But the tendency to exaggeration is not a womanly one alone: it is a national vice, carried to such an extent that we are in great danger of losing all relish for pure English and straightforward statement, this tendency with many having degenerated more and more, till for a certain class it has ended in wholesale lying.

There is a public catered for by such correspondents, the supply almost failing the demand—a public curious as to every petty detail of appearance or manners of any one whose life or work gives opportunity for curiosity, and who, as was most noticeable in, for instance, the case of the dying Carlyle, wanted to know each phase of infirmity and pitiful weakness. That such a public exists is sad enough, but it has been made in part by the very class of letter-writers who, holding nothing sacred, whether in life or death, regard a scandal or a calamity of any sort, public or private, as so much food for comment. And women here are sinners above men, from the very fact of their quicker, keener perceptions, and the added fact that, as women, they are allowed entrance often where men would fail to obtain it, and equally are secure from the punishment now and then awarded the insolent interviewer.

Once in, good-by forever to any sense of privacy or decent reserve. The cut of one's clothes, the quality of the food on one's table, any personal peculiarity, are all registered, with such additions as the increase of interest requires. Any man in public life, any woman whose work makes her in the slightest sense of public interest, runs the risk of seeing themselves placarded in any stray newspaper, and often in such fashion as makes the inference unavoidable that it is by their own wish, and a pleasing sop to personal vanity.

Where—as sometimes happens in Washington, for instance—newspaper correspondents, unless of acknowledged position and reputation, are strenuously excluded from social gatherings, the most ingenious expedients are adopted to secure entrance, and when successful are chronicled at length as instances of journalistic enterprise!

The evil is too widespread and general for immediate suppression, but its remedy is, in part at least, in the hands of women. This passion for minute personal detail has been fostered by them, and in certain cases is legitimate. The habits of a great author, for instance, are full of interest, yet even he has his rights, and we may better forego some bits of such knowledge than fix the keynote to which a band of miscellaneous correspondents will pipe. Refuse to allow journals devoted to this form of news, whether the last agonies of a great man or a murderer, to enter the house, and, the demand ceasing, the supply must in time cease also.

HELEN CAMPBELL.

OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

A RECENT number of the Philadelphia Press alludes very gravely to the rag carpets of our grandmothers as an article of house use almost unknown to the modern housekeeper; and, after stating the fact that they have at last been discovered, appreciated, and are coming into common use among the ladies of the better classes in England, he very earnestly advises his countrywomen to go back about a century to the old style, and make and weave their own rag carpets; and, further, kindly tells us how to make some of them, enlarging on their quiet beauty and many excellencies. He had no intention of being funny, clearly, but that is too much of a joke to be passed in silence by the large number of women he would so kindly teach; and if he was as well informed of the home life of his native state as he seems to be about the nurseries of the "tight little island," he would know that rag carpets have been in steadily increasing use for the last century; that all housekeepers really knowing their business make from twenty-five to fifty yards each year; and for beauty, comfort and utility they far surpass finer grades, to say nothing of the pride and pleasure taken by the worthy dames in their manufacture and use, such as no fine lady ever enjoyed in the possession of the most elegant Brussels, velvet or Axminster. The mothers and home-makers of the old Dutch Commonwealth fully understand the fitness of things, although some of their progeny find it necessary to cross the water to improve their taste in domestic matters.

It is not often that one individual successfully carries a note-book in one pocket and a sketch-book in another, but Mr. Poore, in his illustrated paper on the Taos Indians, proves his facility in both directions, and we only regret that the inelastic pages of a magazine do not admit of more extended notes concerning these singular relics of a civilization literally pre-historic. Mr. Cushing's long residence and studies among the Zunis in a pueblo similar to that of Taos have been received with great favor, and the fruits of his researches will not, it is supposed, be fully revealed until his official report is made. This may probably be the work of years, and will, it is hoped, throw much light upon the history of the vanished races, marks of whose presence in some bygone time are found all over the American continent. The word pueblo, now generally applied to the family of tribes referred to by Mr. Poore, is Spanish, and means simply "village." In connection with Indians it has come to indicate those tribes living in permanent towns, as distinguished from the great majority of the red men whose habits are nomadic, save where they have been restricted to permanent reservations.

Does any one know of a liberally-disposed church organization which permits smoking during the hours of service? We have seen unregenerate youths smoke on the outskirts of a camp-meeting, but the etiquette of our Methodist brethren has never permitted the indulgence, as it were, within the gates. The question is asked in view of the recent invasion of legislative bodies by the now almost omnipresent cigar. In the House of Representatives during session it is common; in the Senate it is by no means unknown, and in many state legislatures it is believed to be practiced with more or less impunity. Courts of justice are probably for the most part as yet free from this nuisance, for nuisance it is when practiced to the discomfort of others and to the detriment of business. How long will it be before one may while away the periods of a dull sermon by watching the smoke-wreaths rise between him or her (why not her?) and the sacred desk? Tobacco is a kindly creature at times, and the almost universal craving of the human male for its narcotic principle goes far to prove its necessity; but the line ought to be drawn somewhere, and we would gladly see it drawn a long way from the door of the sanctuary.

A BRIEF reference was made not long since in these pages to the purchase by the United States of certain papers mentioned as the Franklin manuscripts. It has come to our knowledge that to the great majority of readers the history of these long lost and finally recovered manuscripts is wholly unknown, though it has been widely published in one form or another. We are indebted to R. Meade Bache, Esq., of the United States Coast Survey, for a full account of this remarkable literary find: After Franklin's death, in 1790, the slow-going reading public of that day was content to wait a couple of years for William Temple Franklin to edit and publish the voluminous literary remains of his grandfather. Years passed, however, and as he did not even make a beginning, other books were published forestalling the authorized edition. It was not until 1818 that he brought out the first of his volumes, and five years later he died, leaving his work incomplete, and apparently incapable of being completed for want of material. He was undoubtedly an honest but inefficient man, whose habit of procrastination laid him open to many unjust charges; that, among others, of having been induced by "British gold" to suppress certain documents discreditable to the ministry. Thus ended act the first, and an interval of twenty-two years elapsed. Act the second opened in 1840, when there was discovered on a top shelf in an old tailor's shop in London a bundle of loose papers, which proved to be those the loss of which was suspected but had never been proven. The finder, not aware of their full value, after offering them in several quarters, sold them at last, in 1851, to Mr. Henry Stevens, an American resident in London, and already the possessor of valuable relics of Franklin. Among many other precious documents, the collection contains the original letter-books of the American legation in Paris, during the Revolutionary War, and until 1785. These include correspondence with France, Holland, Russia, Spain; negotiations for subsidies to carry on the war; letters relating to Paul Jones and his naval exploits; to Captain Cook and his voyage of discovery; to privateering; to negotiations for peace; to the treaty; records and correspondence of the commissioners on the part of Great Britain, who negotiated the treaty of 1783; copies of important state papers. A petition of the Continental Congress to the King is the duplicate of the one presented to the King by Franklin, and now deposited in the British archives. To guard against loss, the document in duplicate was signed by all the members of the Continental Congress and despatched to Franklin in separate ships. This copy is, therefore, equally original with that in the British archives, and of the same historical importance and interest. It will be seen, then, that the papers are of the highest value in completing the documentary history of the United States, and it is a matter for congratulation that Congress was, through the efforts of a few appreciative gentlemen, induced to make the appropriation necessary to secure the papers for the national archives.

WOMAN, for whatever reason, received a great deal of attention during the closing of winter and the opening of spring. This period covers the lenten quarantine, when she is not expected to receive so much attention as at other and gayer seasons. In Massachusetts, the usual programme of defeating a bill for women's suffrage was varied by a petition, signed by large numbers of women in the higher walks of life, protesting against the passage of any such law. It is hardly necessary to say that this action on their part arouses great indignation among the leaders of the suffrage movement in the Bay State. In New York, at the same time, the Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix gave great offense in the same quarter by a series of lectures, in which he said some things in a more blunt and outspoken way than is usually affected by Episcopalian clergymen. There was really, however, so much that was good and true and sensible in his remarks that it is a pity it should have been cast into the background by matter which was in itself really of less importance.

city a serious attempt was made to procure the admission of women to the courses of study and instruction offered by Columbia College. The petition was denied by the trustees and faculty on the general ground that there were no funds and no accommodations for such an "annex" in Columbia College; and that, in short, they would rather not, being well satisfied to go on in the good old way. This action on their part was, as in the other cases, seized upon and made much of in a way that creates an unfavorable impression in the minds of many who yield to none in their devotion to women's rights. Strange as it may seem, there are many men who prefer not to share with women their daily tasks of study or instruction, and no doubt there are a great many women who have the same feeling with regard to men. For either sex to persist in forcing themselves where they are not wanted, is at least questionable policy and taste. The higher education of woman, whether in colleges of her own, in co-educational establishments, or through annexes and co-operative systems of home study, is another question altogether, and deserves the success it has achieved; but this perpetual knocking at doors which are deliberately closed and bolted on the inside by the lawful tenants, is in danger of being overdone. This is a matter which will settle itself. As soon as it is apparently to the interest of any college to afford educational privileges to women, a way will be found to accomplish the desired end. Besides all this, the divorce question has been widely discussed in the public prints and by the highest authorities in the land, the best opinion seeming to be that a unification of diverse state laws is one of the first things which ought to be aimed at. This done, reform can be effected from a definite starting point.

THE author of "Miss Molly" gave so much genuine pleasure to her readers in that bright and charming little story that they have just cause to upbraid her for the sombre colors she has used in her latest novel,¹ which is an episode in our Revolutionary war. The local coloring is exceedingly delicate and true to nature. Geraldine herself is a lovely nature, and her dreamy girlhood, her intense power of self-abnegation, and her capacity of unreasoning love are all made very real, and very pitiful also. She loves unconsciously a man who has sacrificed his life to ambition, and whose only real affection has been for his dead mother. He visits Geraldine's birthplace as enrolling officer, in company with a far more lovable friend, Philip Honeywood, also an officer, and both fall in love simultaneously with the beautiful girl. Captain Calverly, the elder, whom she has learned to love as a hero, is naturally the favored one, and a speedy marriage, saddened by some phases of war and its miseries, speedily takes place. Then follows, after a year of happiness, a piece of treason as dark as Arnold's. Captain Calverly goes over to the British side, and, believing his wife will never forgive him, forsakes her with merely a written word of farewell. She follows him, and one tragedy succeeds another, till finally the chances of war bring him, a prisoner and wounded, into the power of the friends he has betrayed. There is a strongly dramatic scene, in which Geraldine petitions her old lover, now General Honeywood, for her husband's life; and there are many quite as effective bits of description when parole has been granted and he returns, a dishonored traitor, to the village that had once rejoiced to honor him. But it is a sad, even oppressive book. Love remains even when respect is dead—a false lesson in any case—and the whole tone is morbid and unwholesome, though possessing undeniable power. The "Leisure Hour Series" has given too much pleasure to its readers to make one willingly accept any addition made up of morbid analysis and a false theory of life, and we beg Miss Butt to return to her earlier manner.

No one who would understand Heine should fail to read Mr. S. L. Fleishman's excellent translation of "The Romantic School."¹ No more audacious pages were ever written. Whether it holds Heine's best work may be questioned, but certainly it is his most characteristic, and every page is filled with the mocking, flashing, often scurrilous wit of this nineteenth century pagan, who, in the mocking, never excepted himself. In one sense the book is a patriotic one, for it was an attempt to make a certain school of German writers known to France, which had no understanding that such school did or could exist. But patriotism was a very small factor in the case. Heine detested romanticism and the men who founded it. Toward some of them, as in the case of Menzel, he had a strong personal grudge, and he doubted the sincerity and the intentions of all. He had long ceased to have the slightest regard for conventionalities, and undoubtedly the irritation of his coming malady worked also against him. Certainly the critical temper, in any dispassionate and quiet sense, had no part in him. Reckless, bitter, vindictive to the last degree, he worried his victims as a terrier worries a rat, with shrill barks of delight at his own success, and with no touch of after repentance. His insight was as keen as his sympathy was dull, and his judgment yielded always to his prejudice.

The German romantic school was really the result of the Napoleonic invasions, which roused and united the German people, and restored their love for old institutions and faiths. Heine defines it as "the reawakening of the poetry of the Middle Ages as it manifested itself in the poems, paintings and sculptures, in the art and life of those times;" and, having defined it, proceeds so far as he can to annihilate it. Against Görres, who represented it very strongly, he has a special fury. Görres was a disciple of Schelling, and one of the chief leaders in the patriotic movement. He became a lecturer at Munich, an advocate of both German independence and a return to the elder beliefs, and Heine takes the ground that "hate against France, joined to a degraded, imbruted standard of right, were his sole motives"—writing of him:

"His lectures, as well as his books, betray the greatest confusion and entanglement of ideas and language, and he was often compared, not without reason, to the Tower of Babel. He really does resemble an immense tower, in which a hundred thousand thoughts are surging to and fro, haranguing, shouting, scolding, and yet unable to understand one another. At intervals the din seemed to moderate, and then his speech was slow, low and tedious; drip! drip! drip! from his dolorous lips fell the monotonous words, like the dreary dropping of rain from the leaden eaves of a roof. When at times the old demagogic fury awoke in him, contrasting most disagreeably with his pious phrases of monkish humility; when he sniveled words of Christian love, at the same time springing to and fro in bloodthirsty rage—then he resembled a tanned hyena."

This is calmness itself compared with his pages on Schlegel, which are too foul for any reproduction, being one of the most abominable outrages ever inflicted by one author upon another. One would suppose both Schlegel brothers and every pupil under them lunatics and fools, while Friedrich Schlegel's wife, Dorothea Mendelssohn, he drags before the public in a scandal which never really touched her, but over the details of which Heine gloats with an absolutely fiendish enjoyment. Nor can he pardon the husband's conversion to the Catholic faith, but brands him as liar and hypocrite, false to every obligation—a despicable and atrocious figure.

For Hoffman and Tieck and Novalis he is less scurrilous but quite as contemptuous. Of Uhland, whom he had once admired, he writes, and one must smile at the pungent characterization:

"His Pegasus was a knightly steed that gladly trotted back to the past, but obstinately refused to budge when urged forward into our modern life; and so our worthy Uhland smilingly dismounted, quietly unsaddled the unruly steed, and led it back to the stable. There it remains to this very day. Like its colleague, the famous war-horse Bayard, it possesses all possible virtues, and only one fault—it is dead."

For Goethe he has only praise, and his eulogy is both fine and discriminating, but his judgments in other directions are well nigh valueless. The book is a powerful one, and of value to all readers who can use their own minds, but demands both prudence and reserve in the reader, who, if fascinated by its brilliant and merciless wit, must never forget how untrustworthy its conclusions are. Mr. Fleishman has various errors in spelling foreign words, for which the proof-reader may be responsible, and his metrical translations are poor; but otherwise the book is very creditably done, and is an interesting addition to the literature of criticism.

MRS. OLIPHANT'S "Little Pilgrim" has gone into its eighth edition in England.

THE Putnams are to republish the mysterious anonymous novel lately issued by the Blackwoods under the title of "My Trivial Life and Misfortunes."

A DIFFICULT task has just been completed by Miss Helen Mercier, a Dutch lady, who has translated Mrs. Browning's "Aurora Leigh" into Dutch, the rhythms of which did not easily lend themselves to the English verse.

WHY one hundred and sixty-five translations of Tennyson's epitaph on Sir John Franklin should be made may be questioned; but the work is done and embodied in a volume, a third of the renderings being in Greek, one in Sanskrit, and most of the rest in Latin.

HENRY HOLT & Co. are soon to issue the initial number of "The Leisure Moment Series." The series will consist of good light literature, principally novels, and will be printed on good paper in clear type. The books will have heavy paper covers, bearing a tasteful design. The prices will be only a trifle higher than those of the various pamphlet "Libraries."

SCANDAL and love of minute personal detail are by no means confined to America. Of the third volume of the "Life of Bishop Wilberforce" five thousand copies have been sold; the entire edition is exhausted, and the success of this volume has given a fresh start to the sale of the two preceding ones. The publishing price of the volume was fifteen shillings, or about four dollars.

THE series of pamphlets entitled "Questions of the Day" has been of especial value and interest, suggesting fresh views even when the reader and author were not in harmony; and this will be found to be the case with "The Taxation of the Elevated Railroads in the City of New York," by Roger Foster of the New York bar. (Paper, pp. 61, 50 cents; G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York).

"THE SANITARY NEWS," of Chicago, an especially bright and well-edited weekly, and The Sanitarian, of New York, are both working in the same field, and the motto of the first, "Healthy Homes and Healthy Living," might equally be that of the last. The articles are popular enough in their treatment to please the general reader, yet thoroughly trustworthy as to facts, and either or both may be considered essential to every householder.

"LATINE" for March is still another proof not only of Professor Shumway's energy, but of his statement that Latin can be made as alive as any modern language. It includes in its varied list of contents a relation of the chief events of February done into Latin and the new schedule of work for Latinists, in which especially noticeable are the proposed comparisons by means of Latin questions of Virgil with Horace, Livy with Tacitus, the letters of Cicero with those of Pliny, and Cicero's "Dream of Scipio" with Plato's writing on the same subject.

MR. RANDOLPH CALDECOTT has illustrated "Æsop's Fables," and the book has just been brought out by Macmillan & Co. The Tribune gives a story of the artist's early days. When he "was yet a clerk in a Manchester bank he was wont to have a ceaseless craving for drawing on his office blotting-paper. The consumption of blotting-paper in Mr. Caldecott's department was so great that the bank authorities had to mildly suggest that, although accounts were drawn against, and in some cases, perhaps, overdrawn, yet the establishment was not a drawing-school."

THE opening chapters of "Timothy: His Neighbors and His Friends," by Mrs. Mary E. Ireland, are so picturesque, as well as true to nature, that one is disappointed in finding the interest slacken and the movement toward the end become commonplace and almost uninteresting. But even with this defect the story, which is the career of a small newsboy, is so wholesome and sweet in tone, and the lesson it holds is so unobtrusively given that the book deserves well of the public, and should have a place for older boys and girls in every well-selected Sunday-school library. (12mo, pp. 292, $1.25; J. B. Lippincott & Co.).

MESSRS. ROBERTS BROTHERS have reprinted a very amusing and equally useful little book, "Whist or Bumblepuppy? Ten Lectures Addressed to Children," by Pembroke. "Bumblepuppy" is persistent playing of whist, either with no knowledge of its rules, or with no memory for any of its fundamental principles. The bumblepuppyist is a source of wrath and aggravation to the scientific player, who abhors a trifter, and demands, like Mrs. Battle, "the rigor of the game;" and the little treatise, ostensibly a joke, is really a trustworthy guide, and will give the average player many serviceable hints. (16mo, pp. 89, $1.00).

THREE of the most finished classical scholars of the day have made an English prose version of the "Iliad," that, if prose be accepted as a legitimate form, is simply perfect of its kind. A prose translation is always more literal, and thus gives more information than a poetical one, which is always open to the charge of having been more or less subject to the translator's fancy. But when men like Andrew Lang and Ernest Myers, of Oxford, and Walter Leaf, of Cambridge, work together, the result can only be not merely perfect accuracy but perfect English, and thus far, at least, poetical quality. (12mo, pp. 518, $1.50; Macmillan & Co., London).

No portrait of Longfellow before the public is likely to give as entire pleasure and satisfaction as the one lately published by Frederick Keppel, of New York. It is drawn and engraved in the pure line manner by Charles Burt, who is the chief engraver of portraits and vignettes for the U. S. Treasury, the basis of the portrait being a photograph which was taken in the poet's seventieth year, and which his family and friends preferred to all others. It gives the full face, and the expression is singularly vivid, yet with all the gentleness which was the poet's peculiar charm, and the engraving is so clear and satisfactory in execution that it should take permanent place among all lovers of Longfellow.

No body of clergymen in the United States needs training in elocution more than the Episcopalians, and thus all will welcome an exceedingly practical and comprehensive manual of elocution by the Rev. Francis T. Russell, "The Use of the Voice in Reading and Speaking." There are few impressive readers in any denomination, but a church where reading forms the major part of the service certainly needs special care to prevent monotony in inflection and manner. As a rule, the noble service is either gabbled or gobbled, and custom alone enables one to sit it out. Mr. Russell writes with careful intelligence. His book is the result of years of study in this direction, and is something much more than a collection of technical rules, and we trust that the clergy will hasten to profit by it. (12mo, pp. 348, $1.00; D. Appleton & Co., New York).

MR. SMALLEY gives some incisive and amusing comments on the system of cataloguing practiced by English dealers in second-hand books. He writes: "In too many cases the English catalogue is wanting, not only in exact knowledge, but in common honesty. In a recent list of books issued by a firm not far removed from (though not in) Leicester Square may be found advertised Merry's 'Witticisms, etc., of Dr. Johnson,' with this note of the bookseller: 'A highly interesting copy, having a super-scription, "To Mrs. Thrale, Southwark," in Johnson's autograph, inserted opposite the frontispiece.' The book was published in 1791. Dr. Johnson died in 1784. If he really wrote Mrs. Thrale's name in this volume seven years after his death, the cataloguer might condescend to explain how he did it, and what were the means of communication between this world and that in which the great moralist was then residing. This is a rather more flagrant example than usual, but it may serve to show how far the dealer presumes on the credulity of his customer."

AMONG books indispensable to the literary worker must certainly be reckoned one which has lately passed to a second edition, "Short Sayings of Great Men, with Historical and Explanatory Notes," by Samuel Arthur Bent, A. M. The book is something far more than a mere storehouse of quotations. Each author mentioned has not only the distinctive phrase or sentence that has made his name famous, but a condensed biographical note, and many notes bearing on his life and work, and containing other sayings less noted but as characteristic. The author writes: "Curiosity, if not gratitude, would wish to follow to their source words which have, during the centuries since their first appearance, come repeatedly to man's aid in the sudden emergencies wherein history repeats itself. Many of them adorn the page of the historian, giving to narrative its local color, and lending to descriptions of character the air and dignity of authenticity. Research may, therefore, pay the debt of history by relieving such sayings of all adventitious circumstance by removing those which belong to history from the domain of tradition, and relegating others to the abode of the myth." The labor involved in such research can hardly be appreciated by the average reader, but the result gives one of the most carefully edited collections ever made, and the book will take permanent place in a niche never before so well filled. (8vo, pp. 610, $3.00; James R. Osgood & Co., Boston).

MR. W. H. BISHOP's "House of a Merchant Prince," which has been running for a year in the Atlantic, is now in book form, and can thus be judged more fully and fairly than separate chapters will ever admit. Mr. Bishop belongs to the Henry James school, and deals like him in microscopic analysis, but fortunately he has too manly and hearty a personality to end in negations or colorless affirmations, and much genuine life finds place between the pages. The book holds a carefully-drawn picture of New York society, of the same variety as that treated in the "Confessions of a Frivolous Girl." There are fashionable women and inane exquisites, with some who are not inane, but merely hurt by inherited wealth.

The career of Rodman Harvey, the merchant prince, his rise and partial fall and forlorn ending are very graphically done. His wife, who is as inconsequent as Mrs. Nickleby, is very amusing, her mixed metaphors being one of the bright points in the conversations, which are all bright. Otilie, the poor niece of the merchant prince, is a very charming figure—independent yet gentle, spirited but very loving; and that Bainbridge finally conquers all her scruples and wins her is a great satisfaction to the anxious reader. It is a misfortune that the opening is so tedious, but, as a whole, the book is well worth reading, and will even be of value from the historical point of view, so faithful is every detail of mercantile life in New York. (12mo, pp. 420, $1.50; Houghton, Mifflin & Co.).

In books with a purpose artistic qualities are usually sacrificed to the end to be accomplished, and the story as such is lost behind the moral; and "John Bremm, His Prison Bars; a Temperance Story," by Mr. A. A. Hopkins (12mo, pp. 256, $1.50), barely escapes this fate. But it does escape it, even when the purpose is most strenuous, and the course of the spirited and popular boy toward a manhood full of the temptations that beset especially both journalistic and political life, is given with an interest that holds one to the end. He is early betrothed to a woman whose own convictions are so intense and deeply rooted as to make her absolutely inflexible where any change is demanded. John Bremm's yielding again and again to the spell of liquor is forgiven at first, but always with a lengthening of the time of probation, till at an especially flagrant breach it is broken, to be renewed and consummated only when the victim has paid the penalty of his own transgressions and lies on his death-bed. The woman is less lovable than the man, yet it is impossible not to respect her standpoint. The political life of the capital at Baylon—otherwise Albany—is minutely and excellently drawn, and many of the minor characters in the book are very much alive to the reader. In dramatic power it must take rank below a later story in which some of the same characters appear—"Sinner and Saint: A Story of the Woman's Crusade" (12mo, pp. 336, $1.50). Those who followed the course of this movement at the West will recognize its fidelity to fact. "Fashionable Hospitality" does its usual work in unsettling weak purposes, and putting unnecessary temptation in a way already hard enough for those who walk in it. It is John Bremm's widow who appears again, and takes active part in a crusade, the story of which may stand as history. Ransom Wilde is a strongly-drawn character, and his story, for which there is no room here, of absorbing interest. His struggle against long habit is a tremendous one, most graphically given, and the reader rejoices with him when it ends triumphantly, and he is restored to his family and to a love he has earned fairly and fully. Keen observation, an easy and graceful style, a very sympathetic and tender nature, and a faith that there is hope for the worst, set the books far above the usual work in this direction, and indicate qualities from which we may confidently expect more and better accomplishment in the future. THE New York Tribune has published in pamphlet form a series of lectures recently delivered in the Church of the Strangers, by Prof. C. A. Young. In the one upon Meteors and Comets occurs the following: "I think I may say that I will take for my text this little piece of stone which I hold in my hand, and which to the casual observer has nothing peculiar about it. It is only a little grayish piece of rock with a dark crust upon one side: but when I tell you that it is a piece of one of those bodies which drop from the sky on to the earth—a part of another world, in short, that has come to us from the planetary abyss—I think it will have for all of us a new and peculiar interest. The stone of which this is a fragment fell in 1857, at the village of Parnallee, in Southern India. The Rev. H. S. Taylor, a missionary of the American Board, who was then stationed at that place, visited the spot a short time after the fall. Of the two stones which fell at the time, he obtained one and sent it to the Western Reserve College. This body, which was somewhat larger than a man's head, was broken up for distribution to different cabinets, some being reserved for the college cabinet there, and other pieces being sent to the British Museum. Mr. Taylor gives the following account of its fall, and it is so good an account of what usually happens under such circumstances that I will read it to you. 'Two meteoric stones fell on the twenty-eighth of February from a clear sky, about noon, near the village of Parnallee, where some of our Christian people live. The smaller one weighs thirty-seven pounds, and the larger one is three or four times as heavy. The larger one fell first, the smaller one two or three seconds later, and two or three miles south of the first one. The larger, falling into tenacious and hard earth, sank into the ground but two feet five inches: it came from the north, making an angle with the vertical of about fifteen degrees. The smaller one fell nearly perpendicularly, and sank in the ground two feet eight inches. As there had been no rain since they fell I was able on going there three days ago' (the letter was written early in April), 'to measure their depth, to see just the impression they left when taken up, and to assure myself by inquiry and observation as to the stones having really fallen there. Some children were picking cotton within a few rods of the first when it fell, and two women were standing near the place when the second struck. A cloud of dust was raised in each case, for the ground was dry, and before night the large stone was visited by crowds from the neighboring villages. The noise which the stones made was terrific to all in the vicinity, and was heard distinctly for a distance of from fifteen to twenty miles. The people generally say that it lasted twenty minutes.' This last statement I will remark, in passing, is a very fair example of the exaggerated estimate of time which people make under excitement. It is not at all probable that the noise could have lasted two minutes, and it is not possible that it could have lasted five. At first it seemed so unlikely that stone and iron should fall out of the sky that it was quite pardonable for scientific men, up to the beginning of the century, to doubt the fact. In 1803, however, an event occurred which put an end to all skepticism. On the 26th of April, of that year, at about half-past one in the afternoon a shower of stones fell within eighty-five miles of Paris, in Normandy. There were about two thousand of them, weighing from eight ounces to seven pounds, filling a space some seven miles long and a mile and a-half wide. The French Academy appointed a committee to investigate the matter, under the chairmanship of M. Blot, and they looked into the thing thoroughly. They got possession of a great many specimens. They talked with people who actually burned their hands and had sore fingers from having burned their hands in picking up stones when they were hot, and they saw marks on the buildings and trees where they had fallen. That very same year, a few weeks later, a stone struck a chimney in Yorkshire, England. That stone is preserved in a cabinet, and has been analyzed and found to be very much like those in France. In the United States there have been quite a number of cases of this kind. In Western Connecticut, on December 14, 1807, a most remarkable fall occurred. The meteor came down through Massachusetts, traveling a distance of eighty or ninety miles before the pieces struck the earth. There was about one thousand pounds weight in all, and some two hundred or three hundred pounds of the specimens are still in the Yale College cabinet. In 1843, a stone fell in South Carolina which was much like chalk, instead of being iron. In 1847 a stone fell in Iowa, another in North Carolina in 1849, slaty in its structure. In 1860 there was a shower of stones in Ohio, weighing altogether something like a ton. The largest, weighing four hundred and fifty pounds, is now in the Amherst College cabinet. In Iowa, in 1875, there was a quantity of them, four or five hundred, and again in Iowa, in 1879, something like a thousand pounds weight of pieces fell—several hundred stones in all."

A RECENT writer in the China Review exemplifies the difficulties surrounding interpretation from Chinese into English, or vice versa, by mentioning that the simple question, Was he (or she) dead? which occurs so frequently in inquests and other judicial proceedings, admits of a positive or negative reply according to whether the European or Chinese idea as to when death occurs be followed. We believe that a man is dead when he has ceased to breathe, and when his blood no longer circulates. The Chinese consider him still alive whilst a trace of warmth lingers in the body. The two estimates may thus differ by several hours; hence it was that in inquests in Hong Kong the time of death formed a stumbling-block in almost every Chinese case. The medical evidence would show that the deceased must have been dead when brought to the hospital, while the relatives would swear he was alive at the gate. Subsequent inquiry showed that the general view among the Chinese is that a person is considered to be dead when the body is cold, and not before. It does not speak very well for the Chinese scholarship of the officials of Hong Kong that it took about forty years to discover this important distinction.

A GOVERNMENTAL decree has just been issued in France containing six articles relating to the employment of children in French factories. It is absolutely forbidden henceforth to employ children in the manufacture of certain dangerous chemicals, or to let boys under sixteen or girls under eighteen years of age do hard work at mills. It is also made illegal to allow boys or girls under a certain age to draw any trucks on the public streets or highways, or when inside the manufactories to draw any vehicles which, together with their load, shall weigh more than one hundred kilogrammes. Neither must children be employed in manufacturing bone, horn, or mother-of-pearl articles, the dust from which is injurious to the lungs; nor in business involving risk to life and limb; as, for instance, slating roofs. Proper ventilation of the factories is also made compulsory.

Kitty.

I COULD not call her by the name
 Her Quaker mother gave her;
 Unwilling were my lips to frame,
 For one like her, a word so tame,
 With neither salt nor savor.
 But, somehow, as I dreamed of her,
 Neglecting Kent and Chitty,
 To mind and heart would still recur
 One name, and that was—Kitty.

A name some flitting fancy wrought,
 I know not why nor wherefore,
 It came to dwell with me unsought,
 Yet ever to my mind it brought
 One face and form, and therefore
 On many a marge of legal brief,
 In many a careless ditty,
 On tinted sheet and printed leaf,
 I scrawled the name of—Kitty.

I wrote to her one day, but why
 I do not now remember;
 I know I dared address her, “My Dear Kitty,” and, in swift reply,
 All in the glad September,
 Came friendly note, and, at the close,
 Than written word more witty,
 A pictured kitten in repose,
 The sign and seal of—Kitty.

This name I gave her to her face,
 Her lips did not reprove me;

It fitted her with dainty grace,
 And—strange the name should win the race—
 Thenceforth she learned to love me.
 And sweet the joy I find in this,
 While all the world I pity,
 That none with me may share the bliss
 Of calling her my—Kitty.

DELPHINE GAY DE GIRARDIN—FROM A PAINTING BY LOUIS HERSENT.

"THE TENTH MUSE."

PERHAPS in the whole history of France, rich as it is in records of lovely and famous women, no one of them was ever so flattered, so popular, so idolized and at the same time so beautiful and gifted as Delphine Gay, who later became Madame de Girardin. Whenever she appeared, on the promenade, in the theatre, academy or salon, she was the one centre of attraction; and what was most remarkable was her freedom from vanity and affectation, her perfect simplicity, naturalness and girlish gayety. The adulation she received made her happy; the knowledge of her beauty was a delight to her, and she accepted both as something for which she should rejoice and be glad. One of her earliest poems was upon the happiness of being beautiful—"Le bonheur d'être belle"—in which she sang her own charms, and with what delicious naïveté:

"Mon front était si fier de sa couronne blonde,
Anneaux d'or et d'argent tant de fois caressés;
Et j'avais tant d'espoir quand j'entraîs dans le monde, Orgueilleuse, et les yeux baissés."

Of Sophie Gay, the mother of Madame de Girardin, Lamartine said that she had "flamme" enough to illuminate a dozen salons. She lived at the beginning of the present century, and was contemporary with that galaxy of women famous for beauty, wit and grace—Madame Récamier, Madame Talien and Josephine de Beauharnais: but she herself more beautiful, witty and heroic than them all. Divorced from her first husband, she afterward married M. Gay, an officer of the Empire, and was living at Aix-la-Chapelle when her youngest daughter, Delphine, was born. This was in 1804. The little girl was baptized on the tomb of Charlemagne, and grew up in the midst of luxury, so that her poetic temperament and ardent love of beauty were nourished in an atmosphere most favorable for their development. A few years later, however, Madame Gay, who was Parisienne, returned to Paris, bereft of husband and fortune. Her eldest daughters, charming and intelligent girls, were both married: her son had died from a wound in Algiers, so that only the youngest of her flock was left to her for comforter and friend.

Once in Paris, she installed herself in an humble entresol, and set bravely about eking out an existence with her pen. She wrote romances, comedies and music. For Delphine, she was all love and fear, hope and pride, as the little maiden grew daily more and more beautiful—a beauty like the realized dream of a fair statue, but abounding in rich, poetical life, full of verve, harmony, fancy, passion and feeling. She dreamed of a happier future for them both, when the genius of her child, allied to her own, should double their slender income, giving them ease if not opulence. But poor and mean as was her low entresol, with its few pieces of furniture that told of happier days, it was the resort of the most illustrious men and women of that epoch, so glorious in Parisian life. So it happened that Delphine developed into womanhood in the society of such minds as Chateaubriand and Madame de Staël. She thought and talked in verse, and amused herself in reciting in a peculiarly charming and half-dramatic fashion the popular poems of the time, as well as her own rhymes.

The first positive impression she made upon the literati of the day was when she was seventeen years old. It was at one of the reunions at the Abbaye-aux-Bois, and Madame Récamier begged her to recite a poem which was then under discussion as to its merits. The young muse acceded to the request, reciting the verses with a voice, intonation and charm of gesture that placed the interpretation in value above the poem. When she had finished, her mother leaned toward Madame Récamier and whispered: "Ask Delphine to recite something of her own." As yet, but few knew of the girl's poetic talent, and much curiosity was aroused at hearing Madame Récamier beg her to favor them with something original. After much pleading, Delphine triumphed over her timidity and embarrassment, and began the recitation of a poem entitled "The Sisters of Saint Camille"—an episode of the pest at Barcelona, and which shortly after obtained a prix extraordinaire from the French Academy. As she recited she grew more and more radiant, so that when she had uttered the concluding words, the "literary church" was at first silent from surprise and then wild with enthusiasm. Among her auditors were the Queen of Sweden, Mathieu de Montmorency, the wife of General Moreau, and the painter Gérard, whom one remembers as the artist who painted that exquisite portrait of Madame Récamier reclining at full length on a couch.

From this time Delphine sang successively of the Greeks, the Romans, the French, General Foy, Charles the Tenth, and other prominent themes of the day. She wrote a poem called "La Fuite" in behalf of the Greeks struggling for independence, the sale of which realized four thousand francs. An extract from her poem on the death of General Foy is engraved on his tomb, which bears also a medallion portrait of herself, sculptured by David. Her ode on the coronation of Charles X so pleased the king that he accorded her a pension of fifteen hundred francs out of his private purse. And she was at this time scarcely more than eighteen years of age.

Soon after this event, Madame Gay and her daughter made a journey through Switzerland and Italy, and it was during this journey that Lamartine first saw Delphine; and no better idea can be conveyed of her appearance at that time than the description he himself wrote of her years after. "The first impression Delphine Gay made upon me," he wrote, "after having heard much of her, was so vivid that the place, the day, the site, the persons have remained in my memory so that I could dictate to a painter the sky, the landscape, the features, the colors, the expression, except perhaps the brilliancy in her eyes, the inflexion of her lips, the blush and paleness of her cheeks, the undulations of her hair. . . . I was passing from Rome to Florence, and halted for a night at Terni. As it happened, Madame Gay and her daughter were stopping in the same hotel. I learned the fact the following morning after they had taken a carriage to drive to the Cascade. I hastened to join them, and approached them quite nearly without being perceived. Delphine was leaning on a parapet of rocks, contemplating the fall. A painter could not have chosen an attitude, an expression and a day more suited to her great beauty. She was half seated on the trunk of a tree, which the poor children had rolled there for the convenience of visitors; her arm, white and admirable in shape,肘bowed on the parapet, supported her pensive head; from her left hand, which hung at her side, as if weak from the excess of sensations, dangled a small bouquet of periwinkle and water flowers, tied by a thread which the children had probably given her; the outlines of her tall and pliant figure were revealed in the carelessness of her pose; her hair, abundant and silky and of a perfect blonde, was blown about by the breath of the tempestuous waters like that of the sybils loosed by ecstasy; her eyes, the same color as her hair, drowned themselves in space; her profile, slightly aquiline, was like that of the women of Abruzzo. She resembled them also by the energy of her structure and by the graceful arch of her neck. In her face, pride struggled in admirable equilibrium with sensibility; her brow was manly, her mouth feminine; upon the mobile lips lay the impression of sadness; her cheeks paled by the emotion of the spectacle, and, somewhat deprived of roundness by the precocity of thought, had the youthfulness but not the plenitude of the spring-time. It was the character of her face which attracted most of attention and of interest. With more color she would have been too dazzling. The soul, passion, piety, enthusiasm and grief are pale. I saluted the mother, who presented her daughter. The sound of her voice completed the charm; it was the tone of inspiration. Her conversation had the suddenness, emotion and accent of poets, with the decorum of the young girl. She had, to my taste, but one fault—she laughed too much. Her head and the carriage of it recalled, feature by feature, feminized, that of the Apollo Belvidere."

The sojourn of the Gays in Italy was a repetition of triumphs for Delphine—adoration for her genius and beauty and thrilling experiences. Like "Corinne," she made a pilgrimage to Cap Miseno. At Rome she was present at a dinner given by the French Ambassador, Laval Montmorency, to the equipage of the French corvette which had ransomed and brought back from Algiers to Civita Vecchia certain Roman captives held by the Musselmans. The occasion inspired the muse of Mademoiselle Gay, and she recited a poem upon the event which won her the hitherto unparalleled honor of being received at the Capitol a member of the Academy of the Tiber by the élite of Italian men of letters, and in the presence of the French nobility then in Rome.

Upon their return to Paris, the mother and daughter established themselves in a low and gloomy entresol in beauty and charming talents. At one time the effort was made by her friends at the court of Charles X to effect a secret marriage between her and that monarch. Of course their plottings were quite unknown to the young muse, whose entire innocence of the matter rendered her only the more naïve and charming. Her beauty had greatly attracted the king, and he often met her in the Tuileries at the residence of the Duchess de Duras, where she was often invited, and where, before brilliant assemblages, she was persuaded to recite her own verses. But whatever the feelings of the king may have been regarding Mademoiselle Gay, he had pro-

the Rue Gaillou, a street full of noise and movement. On the table in the salon lay the poems of the daughter and the romances of the mother, which, with corrected proof-sheets, revealed the industry of the two women, whose beauty—brune in the case of the elder, and blonde in that of the younger—afforded one of the pleasant contradictions of this humble home of genius.

Notwithstanding the mediocrity of their style of living, now that the daughter had been crowned with the laurel, their salon became more than ever the resort of Parisian notables. Although without fortune, which is so essential to a girl in France who expects to receive a suitable husband, a thousand rumors were rife concerning Mademoiselle Gay's marriage. Aspirants for her hand were legion—Italians, Swiss, Germans and Englishmen, as well as Frenchmen, eager to give their titles and their fortunes in exchange for her marvelous mised the last mistress of his affections, upon her death-bed, that no other woman should ever occupy her place in his heart; and to this singular vow he remained unexpectedly faithful.

One has only to imagine this beautiful girl at a grand soirée at the Duchess of Duras' or a matinée at the Chateau de Lormois, whither she often went, clad in a robe of white, with her profusion of curling, fair hair, at one moment a laughing, careless child, and then suddenly summoned into the presence of the most exclusive society, and reciting her own verses with a serious air, the light of inspiration upon her brow, her voice ringing out with a tone and inflection that touched in turn every cord of the heart; with gestures full of force and grace; and, more than this, her statuesque, wonderful beauty—and cease to wonder that she was called the "Fourth Grace," the "Tenth Muse"!

That she did not lose the charm of modesty might have been in part due to the extravagant worship of her mother. Madame Gay's head was turned with the phenomenal popularity of Delphine; and her daughter, often embarrassed and humiliated by her mother's unconcealed and irrepressible vanity, was frequently at her wit's end to know how to bear it.

While young men exalted her charms, old men pitied a celebrity which seemed to them sad, as it must destroy all domestic happiness for her; and everybody wondered if such a woman, accustomed to the adulation of the world, could be content with the worship of a single heart, and, perhaps, an obscure place at the hearthstone of her husband. Intellectual as she was, the tenderness of her heart seemed to be in no wise affected by it. To her poetic temperament love was a devotion, and she naturally aspired to a husband worthy of her affection in the highest sense.

Lamartine, whose admiration and affection for her remained ever unabated, was, whenever in Paris, an assiduous visitor at the famous entresol. He relates that one afternoon he observed there a young man standing at the back of Delphine's chair, who was short in stature, but had a charming face, and who in years seemed hardly to have outgrown adolescence. He spoke little, and his name was not mentioned. He seemed to be on terms of intimacy with the two women, and his eyes were fixed incessantly upon Delphine. He talked to her in a low voice. She carelessly turned her beautiful face to reply to him or to smile upon him over the back of her chair. There was that in his expression that denoted a remarkable character. Lamartine was curious to know who he was, and asked Madame Gay. She replied that he had asked for the hand of Delphine, and that his name was Emile de Girardin.

Although so young a man, Girardin had achieved a notable name in the literary world by the publication of a novel, "Emile," in the previous year. It was the romance of his own life. Born of parents legally unknown, he bore the name of Emile de Lamothe until 1827, when he assumed the name of de Girardin, declaring himself to be the son of General Alexander de Girardin. This step on his part was bitterly contested by his reputed father, who forbade him to assume his name, and the matter was for a long time contested. Ten years later the general acknowledged Emile to be his son, and his mother, instead of being the "Demoiselle de Lamothe, lingère," proved to be Madame Dupuy, a daughter of an eminent financier attached to the court of Louis XIV, and wife of a royal counsellor. She was a woman of great beauty, and her portrait is to be seen in the young girl in Greuze's charming picture known as "Jeune fille à la Colombe."

The story of the babyhood and childhood of Emile de Girardin is one of the most pathetic on record. Secretly supported by his father and tearfully visited by his mother at only rare intervals, the boy grew up isolated and saddened by a sense of his strange and unnatural position. But his parentage is still questioned by some incredulous Parisians, who believe him to have been a son of Napoleon I. The date of his birth, which was first placed in the year 1806, was later found to have been four years earlier, in 1802. It was in 1831 that he was married to Delphine Gay, she being at that time in her twenty-seventh year.

This marriage was a turning-point in the career of both the husband and wife. It was the beginning of a career for de Girardin that eventually placed him at the head of French journalists, and directed the talent of Madame de Girardin into a style of descriptive and dramatic writing that gave her a far more extended and enduring fame than had any of her previous work. At the time of her marriage, her published poems numbered several volumes. The titles of a few, chosen at random, will convey an idea of the themes she sang: "Hymn to St. Genevieve," "The Vision" (an apostrophe to Joan d'Arc), "The Return," "The Pilgrimage," "The Last Days of Pompeii," "Disenchantment," and "Repentance," and various others heretofore mentioned of a purely patriotic character. Two years after her marriage she published "Napoline," a poem in which she put perhaps most of feeling. "Napoline" is an alleged daughter of the First Consul, who attends a dazzling embassy ball, where she meets a warrior, who is young, handsome, wounded, pale. She loves; is deceived; has a rival; is abandoned; consoles herself. Meantime Madame de Girardin also wrote a bitter satire against General Cavaignac, and an epistle addressed to the Chamber of Deputies on the occasion of her husband's rejection by it. With these her career purely as a poet may be said to have ended. Poetic greatness she never, in the true sense, possessed. Her life, training, surroundings, all the influences that could reach and act upon her, prevented her being a great poet. Her style is of marked elegance, very rhythmic and harmonious, but the flavor of her poems is that of the salon. Although her verse is strong and nervous and rich in fancy, she did not reach to the bottom—to the soul of things. Her youth ripened with no loss of freshness, so that at thirty-five she was at the apogee of her beauty as well as of her fame. In the first year of her married life she published her first romance, "Le Lorgnon," a charming story, and regarded by many as her best. This was followed by "The Cane of M. de Balzac," "One Must Not Play with Grief," "The Marquis of Pontanges," and "Marguerite," a novel that excited the liveliest interest because of its paradoxical character, "Margaret" having two lovers, and loving both, but unable to tell which one she loved with the vrai amour.

In romance writing Madame de Girardin displayed her skill in portraying society scenes. Her observations are fine, sometimes forced, paradoxical, overcharged with emotion, but revealing a remarkable science of fashionable society, so to speak, the art and even the trade of elegance. A leader in society, her salon the centre of fashion and wit, one can imagine the interest aroused in the Parisian world at the appearance of a new book, a new poem, a new tragedy or comedy from her pen.

In the columns of her husband's journal, La Presse, she began a series of articles under the title of "Lettres Parisiennes," under the signature of "Le Vicomte de Launay." The letters appeared regularly from 1836 to 1848, and were read all over the continent. They greatly extended her renown, and made the fortune of her husband's journal. They pictured the fashions and follies; events grave and gay; the persons who figured on the horizon of the political, literary and artistic world, in a spirit and style, with a piquancy, originality, frankness and keenness of appreciation the like of which has seldom been equaled. Lamartine said they were veritable pages of the Spectator, although in no degree an imitation of them. It was a doubly happy circumstance that with Lacordain and Ravignan in the pulpit of Notre Dame; Thiers, Lamartine, Guizot and Berryer in the Chamber of Deputies; and Duprez, Lablache, Mario, Mars, Garcia and Rachel in the theatre, Madame de Girardin was the chronicler of the epoch.

Theophile Gautier has written of the enthusiastic impression produced by her appearance in her loge at the forth from the people. Happy moment when the crowd, impassioned with nature and art, thus applauded talent and beauty."

In her feuilletons in La Presse (she is accredited with being the originator of the feuilleton, which soon became a feature of the French journals), she often wrote grandly and nobly. She was not always in political harmony with her friends—whom she bravely defended—for at one time she attacked Thiers, who was inclined to sneer at those of noble birth, and Lamartine was noble. The large, grandiose eloquence of Lamartine possessed great attractions for her. In olden times, poet and prophet were called by the same name, and in 1841, in the Chamber of Deputies, Lamartine is said to have predicted the Commune of 1871; while Henri Heine, in the same year, in the columns of the Augsburg Gazette, predicted the same thing and the razing of the Column Vendome.

But partisan as the "Vicomte de Launay" may at times have been in La Presse, the salon of Madame de Girardin remained neutral ground, where the warriors of all parties met to wage battle or arbitrate for peace. Lamartine lived in it as in a temple. There incense was burned for him, and he in turn burned it for the presiding muse. His unbounded admiration for her and interest in her were often misinterpreted, and whenever the opportunity seemed to demand it he cautioned his friends against interpreting his friendship for her as love.

In 1841 Lamartine wrote to Madame de Girardin: "In your place I would make a grand book of human, or mundane philosophy, of the kind of Madame de Staël's 'Germany.' You are now at her height, plus poesy. Become thoroughly serious and in earnest; touch no more the semi-serious cord of feeling. Gayety is amusing, but at the bottom is a petty grimace. Really, what is there gay in Heaven or upon the earth? Happiness itself is sad when it is complete, for the Infinite is sublime, and the sublime is not gay."

Whether from the encouragement of Lamartine or from an impulse of her own heart, she decided to essay a more serious and profound field of composition. The genius of Rachel acted upon her as an inspiration; so, after writing a vaudeville, "The School of Journalists"—a play in five acts, with the study of journalists made from life—she wrote two tragedies for Rachel, which were played at the Theatre Français. The first of these, "Judith," was the first creation of Rachel. It was a biblical study of great merit, admirably adapted to the Jewess that interpreted it; but its popular success was not marked, and it was soon withdrawn. The second, "Cleopatra," presented in 1847, was a double triumph for author and actress. Rachel was sublime in the beautiful tableau of the second act, where, surrounded by a court of soothsayers and magi, she complains of the implacable azure of the sky, and in the magnificent apostrophe to the sun, where she cries:

"Oh, African sun! God of day! God of fire!"

the effect was indescribably majestic.

"Cleopatra," pronounced by Lamartine to have the solidity and polish of marble in style, was his favorite of all her works. While writing it she was invited by him to come to his country place at Saint Point and spend some time with him and Madame de Lamartine. At the last moment she received a note from him saying, "Be sure to bring 'Cleopatra.' Don't forget it. Do not come unless you know how to endure ennui and go to bed with the hens," a trace of fun rarely seen in Lamartine. She seems only to have begun "Cleopatra" at this time, for she worked upon it during her visit, reading to the poet and his wife every morning what she had added to it the previous evening. When the drama was produced Lamartine wrote her: "No woman ever had this triumph, all virile, since Victoria Colonna, whom you resemble in features, in genius, and also, I think, in heroism."

In 1851 Madame de Girardin wrote a short play in one act, "It is the Fault of Her Husband," which was played at the Theatre Français. This was followed two years later by "Lady Tartufe," in prose, in five acts, in which Rachel quite excelled herself. After this appeared "La joie fait peur" (Joy makes fear), a remarkable production, in which the maternal feelings are portrayed with extraordinary power. A sailor is lost at sea (or supposed to be), and is mourned by three women—his mother, sister and betrothed. Suddenly he returns, is received with transport by the two women, but the mother's sorrow had so affected her that it was feared she could not bear the joy of finding her son alive again, which necessitated the greatest care and diplomacy on the part of the sister and fiancée. This play, which bathed all Paris in tears, was the result of a dream she had, and was clothed in words born of her own strong maternal feelings. This production was followed in 1854 by the "Watchmaker's Hat," which was of altogether a different character, convulsing audiences with laughter.

As a writer, it would be difficult to accord to Madame de Girardin her just place in the literature of France; but, as a woman, she was the most charming of her time. Her greatest genius was in her conversation, her face, her voice, her manner. With what enthusiasm her friends still recall her salon in the Rue Lafitte, a room hung with sea-green rep, with bands of velvet of darker green, forming such an admirable background for the splendor of her fair beauty. In the morning she wrote, her hair floating over her shoulders, and the folds of her large white peignoir falling about her like those of a Greek goddess. In the evening she wore a robe of black velvet, with her exquisite arms and shoulders, fine as any ever sculptured by Phidias, uncovered. Her conversation was varied as nature herself. She was amusing, pathetic, fascinating. She seemed never to be affected by envy or jealousy of others, and her life passed apparently untouched by those unhappy passions. She had the peculiarly happy faculty of creating a success for a good work or protecting a meritorious person from the coalition of his enemies.

As the Girardins prospered in worldly possessions they removed (in 1844) to the Champs Elysées, where their salon became more and more the resort of the eminent men and women of the time—Hugo, Balzac, the two Dumas, Georges Sand, Jules Sandeau, Soumet, Prince Augustus of Prussia, Rachel, Meyerbeer, Charles Nodier, Jules Janin, Theophile Gautier, and scores of others.

But, with all her glory, was this woman happy? Lamartine once wrote her: "Are you happy? I do not mean through M. de Girardin. I know him. He loves you. But from exterior circumstances. Do you see your way and his clear in the future? Will literature give you peace? Write me often of you three. Send me some bribes of your verse, pages of your mother's romances, to cheer me. I find nowhere your mother's flow of spirits, so piquant, gracious, inexhaustible. To my mind, she ought to write without form, hour by hour, in the style of conversation, or monologue, of a woman of society. Such a book written by her and read by us would be charming." He rarely wrote her, except in a mood of sadness, and then he would add, "I am the more sad because I fear you are not happy. I shall be doubly glad the day you write me, 'I am happy.'"

That she ever wrote the desired three words to Lamartine is doubtful. With all her strong maternal feelings children were denied to her. A child she adopted proved only a source of trouble; the persecutions, imprisonments and other unhappy political events in the life of her husband destroyed her peace. In 1851 he was exiled from France, and soon after this her mother died. A poem from Madame de Girardin's pen, in which she poured forth her sorrows, touched all hearts; and, thanks to that and the intervention of Prince Napoleon, M. de Girardin was allowed to return.

Early in the spring of 1855 she seemed less strong than usual, and went to Saint Germain for country air. Nothing seemed to announce a decadence in her life. Her hair was full and blonde, her arms as beautiful, her features as delicate, her expression as radiant with soulful light as ever. But returning soon to Paris, the announcement of her death came almost with the news of her illness.

M. Méry thus recounts one of the last dinners at which she presided in the "Athenian Temple," as her house in the Champs Elysées was called. It was built upon the model of the Erechtheon, with its caryatides, its lawn-fountain, its large chestnut trees, half shading the front, seeming peculiarly fitted for the abode of the woman who had been so justly named the Tenth Muse.

"Her noble face was slightly emaciated," writes Méry, "and her great blue eyes burned with the fire of fever. She ate nothing. Carried away with a flow of feeling, she seemed inspired as none of us had ever before seen or heard, neither will again. She passed from one subject to another, leaving upon each a luminous trace. We were all filled with admiration, and when we rose from the table, Georges Sand, who remained silent during that wonderful improvisation, exclaimed in a low voice, 'Ah, what beauty! What a mind!'"

But after such gleams of inspiration reaction followed, and, although she loved her husband and espoused all his journalistic battles, and had won all the glory, success and fortune that can make one love life, she seemed to desire the end. The evening before her death (she died of the same disease as Napoleon I), some of her friends chanced to meet about her couch, which was drawn out into the open air of the court; two of them were Lamartine and Georges Sand. "She died standing, so to speak," says Madame Sand, "full of courage even to the last hour, and in all the radiance of her mental and physical beauty. It seemed to me in this last interview that her beauty of body and of soul had never been sufficiently praised; perhaps neither before had been so complete. By a strange result of her malady, her form, face and hands bore no traces of advancing years. She was slender, she was pale, but she seemed to have no more of age. It was not the freshness of youth, but the transparent whiteness and the clear, pure look of immortality. It is the most beautiful and durable souvenir of her that she could have left in the souls of her friends. It seemed as if she wished to put her heart and her spirit in unison in this ideality, for she seemed never before to have risen in so high a sphere, rising there of her own self, with the same candid simplicity which often formed in her a powerful contrast with the charming exuberance of her witty sallies."

Because of her own personal misfortunes Madame Sand seemed especially to have appreciated the spiritual nature of Madame de Girardin, her ardent sensibility and tenderness of heart that the life of the world covered with a veil of discretion and sprightliness. Madame de Girardin once complained to her of her deprivation of children, when an idea occurred to Madame Sand, which she expressed—"Had you been a mother," she said, "three-fourths of your life had been lost to your mission. You would have been obliged to sacrifice either literature or the relation of which you are the soul. Time would not have sufficed for you to be both."

"With what joy I would have sacrificed society!" she cried. "Society has only served to distract me from my loneliness." Her friend assured her that Providence occupies itself with us not in view of our personal satisfaction, but in that of our general utility to humanity.

That she was beautiful, rich, free from cares and intense fatigues, brilliantly surrounded, admired and appreciated was what she ought to have been. And still she suffered because she was too complete a being not to desire a life complete. She felt herself too much sacrificed to exterior relations; she confessed, as did Madame de Staël, that she dispensed too much of her soul fire, and that she sometimes felt herself broken by it.

The best portrait made of Madame de Girardin is that engraved by Blanchard from a drawing by Chasarian. It best combines the two types of beauty known as Delphine Gay and Madame de Girardin—the young girl in the first bloom of her inspiration, and the woman of genius in the full possession of her éclat. She was at one time both these types at once, blended in an aureole of sweet melancholy.

After her death a letter was found directed to Lamartine, in which she prayed him to finish her poem, "La Madeleine," which she regarded as her best work. But the poet never fulfilled her request. "Only the hand that began it could finish it," he said. She lies buried in the cemetery of Montmartre. The marble slab which marks her resting-place bears this inscription under a cross cut in bold relief:

"ON METTRA SUR MA TOMBE UNE CROIX POUR SEUL ORNEMENT.

8 AOUT, 1854.

DELPHINE GAY DE GIRARDIN (ÉMILE),
MORTE LE 29 JUIN, 1855."

She had requested in her will that only a cross should ornament her tomb, and that extract from her will was also placed upon it. It was nearly six and twenty years later, in April 1881, that this tomb was opened to receive the remains of Emile de Girardin, whose domestic career after her death was in strange contrast to that which had preceded it. Their beautiful home in the Champs Elysées, where Delphine Gay had reigned as queen for thirty years, was torn down, and de Girardin went to reside in a palatial dwelling which he had built at the corner of Rue La Perouse in the Champs Elysées. This establishment was fitted up in the most luxurious style, and as the years rolled by it was greatly enriched with works of art of extreme interest. In the vestibule of the rez de chaussée, or first floor, were Clésinger's Lucrèce, the Angelica of Carolus Duran and a bust by Colonna. From this vestibule, on the left, opened a great salon. Above the mantel was a portrait of Montaigne. On the walls, hung with red cloth framed with black bands, were four mythological pictures by Delacroix. On stands of great height with onyx pedestals, were portraits of Sara Bernhardt, of Parot, of Rachel, of Madame O'Connell; aside from these were a bust of Delphine de Girardin, statuettes in white marble, a grand piano, large divans and two large stands loaded with books. From the end of this room opened the dining-room, finished in mahogany. From the opposite end of the salon, through a small apartment, M. de Girardin's library was reached, where he had twenty thousand volumes—a great many dictionaries and encyclopedias. At the foot of the stairs that led to the next floor stood Carrier Belleuse's superb statue of Andromeda chained; following this were works by Duran, Courbet, Rubens, Hébert, Benjamin Constant, Corot, Clésinger, Van Hove, etc., with modern bronzes; a beautiful bust of Prince Napoleon, of Delphine de Girardin, one of his second wife, of Georges Sand, and a portrait of his daughter who died at Biarritz, and whose death was rendered memorable by the kindness of the Empress Eugenie. Girardin's work-room was on the floor reached by these stairs, where he worked from seven until ten every morning. Much of the house was hung in black, for which Girardin had a special liking, and the effect of black curtains drawn back with great yellow cords was very striking.

Emile de Girardin's second marriage, contracted a year following the death of his wife, was altogether an unfortunate affair. The lady was very young, of noble birth, of unusual beauty and attractiveness, and a blonde like Delphine Gay. She had three children, two of whom died, and one of whom, born at Brighton, England, during the war, Girardin disavowed, and was sustained by the courts. At the same time he divorced his wife, giving her an annuity for her support.

LA JEUNE FILLE A LA COLOMBE.*

Emile Girardin had, however, a son, whom he recognized, and who, by "imperial decree" was authorized to bear his name; and this son, Alexander de Girardin, with his wife and child, occupied a part of the father's superb house, and is his successor and heir. It is alleged that there is also a daughter, who at the time of Girardin's death was nineteen years old, whom he did not acknowledge—but it is to be hoped that this allegation is unfounded. Girardin's journalistic life was a stormy one throughout, and his life was often in peril. He fought three duels, killing one of his opponents and sustaining a terrible wound himself, from which he ever afterward suffered. He was a man of remarkable method and business exactitude. He replied immediately to all letters and telegrams, allowing no letter to go unanswered to which a reply was requested. He saw all callers who sent him a card. He kept no secretary. He was very fond of horses and had one of the finest turn-outs in Paris. He was greatly beloved by his servants; he had the same coachman for thirty years, and his valet de chambre died in his service. To his valet who was with him when he died he left ten thousand francs. As a journalist, he was really the founder of what may be called modern journalism in France. He believed in the liberty of the press, and was the first in Paris to publish a first-class daily journal at a low rate. He cared little for the society of men, but was very fond of that of women, especially brilliant women. He proposed that the woman should be the head of the family, that the children should bear her name instead of the father's, and that the dower should replace the dot.

THE KING'S DAUGHTERS.

BY MARGARET VANDEGRIFT.

THE King's three little daughters, 'neath the palace windows straying,
Had fallen into earnest talk that put an end to playing,
And the weary King smiled once again to hear what they were saying.

"It is I who love our father best!" the eldest daughter said;
"I am the oldest Princess!" and her pretty face grew red;
"What is there none can do without? I love him more than bread!"

Then said the second Princess, with her bright blue eyes
afame,
"Than bread? A common thing like bread! Thou hast not any shame!
Glad am I it is I, not thou, called by our mother's name.
"I love him with a better love than one so tame as thine—
More than—oh, what then shall I say that is both bright and fine,
And is not common? Yes, I know—I love him more than wine!"

Then the little youngest daughter, whose speech would sometimes halt
For her dreamy way of thinking, said, "You are both in fault,
'Tis I who love our father best—I love him more than salt."

Shrill little shrieks of laughter greeted her latest word,
As the two joined hands, exclaiming, "But this is most absurd."
And the King, no longer smiling, was grieved that he had heard.

For the little youngest daughter, with her eyes of steady gray,
 Could always move his tenderness, and charm his care away.
 "She grows more like her mother dead," he whispered,
 "day by day."

"But she is very little, and I will find no fault
 That, while her sisters strive to see who most shall me exalt,
 She holds me nothing dearer than a common thing like salt."

The portly cook was standing in the courtyard by the spring;
 He winked and nodded to himself, "That little quiet thing Knows more than both the others, as I will show the King."

That afternoon at dinner there was nothing fit to eat;
 The King turned, frowning angrily, from soup and fish and meat,
 And he found a cloying sweetness in the dishes that were sweet.

"And yet," he muttered, musing, "I cannot find the fault;
 Not a thing has tasted like itself but this honest cup of malt."
 Said the youngest Princess, shyly, "Dear father, they want salt."

A sudden look of tenderness shone on the King's dark face,
 As he set his little daughter in the dead Queen's vacant place;
 And he thought, "She has her mother's heart—aye, and her mother's grace."

"Great love through smallest channels will find its surest way;
 It waits not state occasions, which may not come, or may;
 It comforts and it blesses, hour by hour and day by day."

AT EVENTIDE.

If sometime, when the day was wearing late,
 And stars were coming in the darkening sky,
 As once for you I might in rapture wait,
 And feel your presence surely drawing nigh;

Could I but hear your quick and happy feet
 Come up the pebbled pathway as of yore,
 And hasten with a beating heart to meet
 And welcome you before you reached the door,

And draw you in beside the household fire,
 And sit beside you, looking in your eyes;
 To read within them, as the flame burned higher,
 The love that answering love alone describes—

I think—but no! the past is far away:
 Its dear and mournful memory is mine;
 And in the gladness where you walk to-day
 I would not have you know that I repine.

For if again you sat beside me here,
Your eyes would read the lines made deep by pain,
And see the cheeks whose youthful bloom was dear,
Like flowers grown pallid in autumnal rain.

And I, perhaps, should fear to meet those eyes
That in the light of Heaven had grown so clear,
Lest in their love should be a sad surprise
At what had worn my soul from year to year.

I will not let my longing soul grow wild
With useless visions of what may not be;
While in the glory, radiant, undefiled,
You stand and stretch your angel hands to me.

AMELIA D. ALDEN.

A QUESTION OF TASTE.

BY MARGARET J. PRESTON.

"NONSENSE!"

"But I'm in earnest."

"Oh, no! you could not be gravely in earnest about such a trifle."

"But I tell you I am in earnest, and if it be such a trifle, why refuse to gratify me?"

"Because I can't conceive of a reasonable man making a point of so small a matter."

"And I can't conceive of a reasonable woman making a point of what she treats so lightly."

"Well, then, as the thing is so petty, let us hasten to drop it out of sight once and forever."

"No; the motion of a feather may indicate the direction of the wind."

"I tell you then, my good Professor, that the current of my will sets decidedly against the abandonment of my curls." And the lovely speaker archly gathered up the shining masses of ringlets that shaded her glowing cheeks with both hands. "Nature gave them to me just so, and just so I mean to keep them."

"Is nature always infallible? Red hair, for instance? Beside, my taste is positively against curls—"

"Taste! As if a man who breakfasts on Greek roots and flavors his dinner with spices from the Zend-Avesta, and sips on quotations from Sa-koontalâ—as if he should know anything about hair-dressing!"

"Well, not to provoke a discussion on the canons of taste, I at least know what pleases me."

"But a scholar is supposed to be ignorant of the existence of such things as curls, unless, indeed, it be the hyacinthine locks of Apollo."

"No; I think I have as keen an eye for external, mere personal beauty, as your Beau Brummel friend, Forrester, to whose judgment, you tell me, the ladies often refer mooted questions of taste for adjudication; and, if you allow me to say so, from the first moment my eye was arrested by your face, I felt as if you had not studied its contour aright—as if those clusters of drooping curls somehow marred its beauty and lowered its sweet dignity. It seemed to me like hanging French frizzes over the forehead of one of Raphael's Madonnas. Just imagine the 'Della Sedia' with bunches of little tendrils like these." And the Professor gently touched one of the multitudinous wayward curls that swept around the fair face beside him. "Think how they would—well—vulgarize her—"

"Is that objectionable word intended for the Madonna or me?"

"Oh, neither! I am only supposing a case."

"There is no supposition about it: the case itself is before you."

"What! a befrizzed Madonna?"

"A 'vulgarized' one."

"Come, come, my darling; you are suffering yourself to become fretted, and it is too minute a matter for that."

"Let us have done with it, then."

"Yes; the moment you tell me that you mean to gratify my expressed desire by smoothing back these French tresses. You have never seen yourself, perhaps, with your hair arranged with the classic simplicity which would so become you."

"You never saw me so, and therefore your opinion is based on nothing but a whim of your own; and my 'French tresses,' as you see fit to call them, have a right to be French-like: wasn't my mother's blood Gallic? But this aside—your words argue dissatisfaction. Why did you not object to my appearance when you asked me to become your wife?"

"A true lover likes to know that the slightest wish to which he gives utterance has its weight with the woman whom he loves."

"Yes, in all important matters."

"Who is to be judge as to their importance?"

"In this instance, I am. It is simply absurd for you to insist upon being my hair-dresser, Professor Fenton."

"Marion, you know you are the very core of my heart, and nothing connected with you is matter of small moment to me;" and he made a gesture as if to draw his companion on the sofa beside him closer, but with a little impatient, repelling motion of her pretty white hands, she resisted.

He went on as though he had not observed it.

"I do want to see you willing to gratify me in a trifle that costs you nothing."

"Ah, a change of base, I see! You want me to bend my will to yours. The question of taste is set aside. I suspected as much."

"No, it remains the same: from the first I asked you to gratify me."

"Then I am not to your mind just as I am?"

"Why, my love, the Angel of the Flowers thought it possible, once on a time, to add to the perfections of the rose."

"So I remember! and therefore hung myriads of infinitesimal mossy curls about her!"

"You are not your own reasonable self to-night, Marion."

"Just as reasonable as I ever was; I insist on nothing."

"Indeed! not on having your own way, then?"

"I don't wish anything to be different from what it has always been since we have known each other. You do; and I own I don't like your being so exigeant."

"But if your love was as deep as mine you would not hesitate an instant to gratify even what you are pleased to call a whim. True love is ever and always self-nunciative."

"Then prove it so by dropping this disagreeable topic, on which we have been foolishly sparring too long already."

"You don't mean, then, to meet my wishes by smoothing back your curls?"

"I assuredly do not," said Marion, with a certain graceful haughtiness so very becoming to her that it heightened the fascination of her manner.

Her companion rose with an air of marked dignity, and, walking to one of the windows, parted the curtains and gazed out, half abstractedly, upon the lighted street, as if meditating what further course to take with his refractory lady-love. Coming slowly back, he paused before her, as she turned over, with seeming preoccupation, the leaves of a book, and said quite emphatically:

"I don't like to hear such expressions of downright willfulness."

"Do you mean your own?" And she looked up with a sort of audacious archness of inquiry. "Nor do I."

"I mean, plainly, your defiance of my wishes."

"I do not defy your wishes; I merely choose to judge for myself in this matter."

"I claim no right, but, to the loving heart, wish is law."

"You bring the question, then, to this test: your will must yield, or mine. All the laws of chivalry require that you should yield."

"Is this to be the life principle that is to guide us two months hence—after our wedding-day is over?"

"It is curls, not principles, we are discussing."

"But a principle underlies the matter."

"So I now perceive; but that is one you have no right to press upon me now; nor to press upon me ever, for that matter, in regard to such a trifle. I have not yet promised obedience—"

"I never could," interrupted the Professor, proudly and with emphasis—"never could thoroughly respect as my wife a woman who could be so unwise as deliberately to match her will against mine—"

"I trust, sir," broke in Marion, rising, with much warmth of manner, while her eyes flashed and her cheek paled with repressed emotion—"I trust, sir, your capacity to do so will never be put to the test;" and with her head erect, and her slight form drawn to its fullest height, she swept, without another word, from the room.

II

MARION WARDOUR was a girl of unusual loveliness of person and of character. Among her friends she had always been singled out as the model of all that is fairest and truest and sweetest and most gracious in womanhood. She was well-born and well-bred; and the fact that she was closely connected by blood with some of the high names familiar in English art and literature, gave her a sort of prestige among her companions, and a feeling of pride in her and homage toward her seemed a perfectly natural thing on their part. She was the most feminine of women. An English author, speaking of Leonardo's Mona Lisa, says that "She is the embodiment of all modern female life: in her ten thousand experiences are compressed into one." So Marion Wardour's friends said of her, "She is the impersonation of all femininity." With her lithe, buoyant figure, her step, which always called to mind Charles Lamb's "Hester:"

"A springy motion in her gait,
A rising step did indicate
Of hope and joy no common rate
That moved her spirit."

Her finely-cut features, her floating masses of rich, light-brown hair caught away in silken clusters from her faintly-tinged cheeks, her airy vivacity of speech and manner, which came to her as an inheritance with her mother's Huguenot blood, she was a creature to impress and charm even those who carelessly passed her on the street. Like the little Savoyards of whom Madame Récamier speaks, they all turned to look upon her.

She had the loveliest trip of the tongue imaginable, which could not be called a lisp in any respect, and it gave an added fascination to everything she said. One of her peculiarities was that, with any embarrassment—and it was not hard to embarrass her—this pretty trip grew all the prettier; so that her admiring companions loved to see her lose her poise a little sometimes, just that the charm of her talk might be thus increased. She was one of the highest-mettled persons we had ever known. Not in the least impatient of contradiction, and in argumentative discussion, of which, with her bright mind, she was exceedingly fond, she never lost her temper in the hottest banter of wit. She was not in the slightest degree willful; but if any one attempted to trench on what she deemed her prerogative, or aimed to force her to a conclusion contrary to what was calmly her own, it was soon discovered that there was some stern stuff in the making up of that exquisite womanliness.

Miss Wardour had been born to large wealth; but some sudden misfortunes connected with her father's English possessions—for the family was American only by one generation—caused great reverses, and the proud old man, who had never known anything but a life of easy luxury, could not endure the altered state of affairs, and, within two years after the fortune was lost, died, leaving his four daughters to provide for themselves as best they could. Miss Wardour became a teacher of French in the great girls' seminary in the university town of —, not a hundred miles from the city of her birth.

Here she became at once a centre of attraction with both sexes. The girls whom she taught adored her as the type of womanhood which they were accustomed to look for only in poetry and romance. The cultured society of the little city looked up to one who, without a conscious effort, so readily impressed her superiority upon it. Among the bevy of unmarried professors and their assistants who swarmed at every social gathering, and helped to give a certain classic flavor to the society of the place, various were the victims who were caught in the meshes of those floating curls.

It grew to be a matter of the eagerest interest with her pupils as to who should be the successful suitor for their liege lady's favor. That it must be a professor in the university they were not long in settling. Work-a-day people, such as lawyers and physicians and business men in general, were not considered, in their critical eyes, worthy to occupy the same plane with their "heavenly Una." So a professor it must be—a man of books—a man who concerned himself with culture and sweetness and light; and such a man they thought they had found out during the second year of their dear Miss Wardour's residence at the seminary.

Professor Fenton was the ideal of a gentleman and a scholar in the eyes of the romantic girls. He was tall, dark, of the most delicate courtesy of manner—a little severe, perhaps, though their opportunities of judging were of the narrowest kind, as they only saw him in the street, or at church, or at a concert, or some such public place. They rather liked his somewhat lofty reticence—thought it grand, and after the pattern of some of the Sir Alfreds and Honorable Messrs. So-and-so with whom the English novels they were so fond of were crammed. It seemed so superior to them—something that separated him from the inelegant society chatters about him—and they soon got to think that Miss Wardour was of the same opinion.

Often and often, in their mischievous prankishness, would they try the effect of suddenly springing upon her the name of the Greek Professor, just that they might have the delight of seeing the lovely auroral blush creep up over neck and cheek and brow, as their teacher would begin to trip in her charming way over the impertinence of their talk.

They had been keenly watching. They knew of the long twilight walks; of the occasional boatings on the river; of the constant interchange of books; of the daily votive offerings of flowers; for Miss Wardour was never seen without a rose in her hair. It was just as much a part of her daily toilette as the gorgeous crimson flower was a part of the personality of Hawthorne's Zenobia. They were aware of the showers of notes—what school-girl's vision was ever blinded to things like these? They agreed that matters were tending to a crisis, and they were awaiting with fervid anticipation the denouement of their romance.

Sure enough! It came in due time, and Miss Wardour's engagement was announced, the news leaking out no one knew precisely how, until every one was aware of it.

III

"AND now, girls, for the bridal present," said Edith Strother, a few days afterward, as they were all assembled in the garden alcove at the conclusion of afternoon lessons. "It is just three weeks till the close of the session, and you know that a month or so after that Miss Wardour said she was to be married. We must have it ready for presentation before she leaves the seminary."

"We have not much time to lose then," said Mary Styles. "Here's the subscription list—it is complete, I believe. Now, what shall it be?"

"A handsome bracelet," cried Annette Hayes; "just such a one as a cousin of mine had given to her last summer when she was married. A series of gold chains, forming a broad band, with a centre oval locket, whose lid, set with a circle of pearls, opened with a spring, and showed the loveliest ivory miniature—"

"Hear her!" interrupted Harriet Gwinn. "She talks as if we had five hundred dollars at our command."

"Yes, such a bracelet would cost a round sum, I'm sure," said Edith Strother, quickly and decidedly quashing the idea of a bracelet. "Besides, Miss Wardour does not love jewelry. I've seen sets and sets that belonged to her mother in her ebony jewelry-case, none of which has she ever worn here. And how absurd to give her her own likeness!"

"Oh, but we wouldn't have hers—we would have Professor Fenton's," eagerly explained Rosie Pratt.

"And, pray, how are we to come by Professor Fen-ton's, I'd like to know?" asked Edith half contemptuously.

"Why, I'll ask him for it the next time we meet him in that narrow path by the River Rocks," said Rosie, not willing to be suppressed so unceremoniously. "I'm not afraid!"

"You will, indeed? Why you would waddle away, if he threw one of his lofty looks at you, as fast as a duck would if a clod was pitched after it."

"I've got it!" exclaimed Fanny Shaw. "Let's have the artist, Mr. Strong, paint an oil picture of the view from the River Rocks: there's where we used so often to pass Professor Fenton, you know."

"No, no," said Harriet Gwinn: "there is not time enough for that. Besides we only have sixty dollars in hand, and artists like Mr. Strong don't paint pictures for that."

"Well, if you'll all listen," broke in Edith decisively, "I think I can propose something more reasonable. When I was at home, I saw on Appleton's counter one day an exquisite set of French classics, bound in Russia leather, in a case—Corneille, Racine, Molière—and I asked the price; just sixty dollars. How would they do?"

"Admirably!" "Just the thing!" "So appropriate for our French teacher!" was heard on all sides. So it was agreed that the case of French classics should be ordered without delay, and Edith Strother was chosen by acclamation to write to the importer for them.

Not half a dozen hours after this parley of the school-girls in the garden alcove, the conversation which has been related between Marion Wardour and Professor Fenton had taken place in the seminary drawing-room.

After her abrupt leave of him, she advanced with a more elastic step than was her wont, even, along the corridor that led to her chamber. Not till she had shut the door behind her, and walked up to her mirror and pushed back from her face the innocent curls that had been the cause of the little quarrel just over, did she at all realize what she had done. That Professor Fenton was very seriously offended she well knew; but she quieted her agitated heart by saying over and over to herself: "To think he should be so unreasonable—so unreasonable!" She was not cool enough, as yet, to be conscious of any unreasonableness in herself.

Her nature had been a proud one, and she had not readily yielded to the first advances of love. But when she came to know and understand the depth, strength and worth of the love offered, her well-entrenched heart began to falter, and when its maidenly reserve was once beaten down it gave itself up, an utter captive. His strong character had been the first thing that had attracted her about Professor Fenton. Before she ever saw him she was predisposed in his favor, by hearing the praise lavished on him for his resolute courage in the case of a high-handed rebellion in the university, which his unflinching firmness and courage had alone been the means of quelling. And when she came to know him personally, his chivalrous sense of honor, his elevated, unworldly-like principle, his pure-heartedness, his fine attainments and handsome presence, worked their natural result. She loved him with a woman's first passionate love. She gave him what a woman can give but once in her life.

"For never woman,
Fashioned a woman, heart, brain, body, soul,
Ever twice loved. False gods there be enow—
But o'er the altar of her worship, see,
Highest and chiefest of her decalogue,
That First Commandment written—No love but one!"

That Professor Fenton's will was a strong one, Marion had had occasional little evidences in her own experience; but she had no complaint to make that it was so. Resolute men were to her mind, and she had no fear that in his case it would be pressed unreasonably. "To-night," she said to herself, "he was unreasonable, because he was exercising his will out of his own domain." She excused her own anger at first; but by-and-by, as hour after hour wore away, her excited heart grew calmer, and a doubt of her own wisdom, in acting as she had, began to subdue her. Mechanically, as she still sat in the low chair she had drawn up before the mirror, her fingers began to twirl the plain gold band on her left hand; the touch had magic in it; a sudden rush of arrested feeling overflowed her whole nature, and her fortifying pride gave way and was swept clean out of sight, as a breakwater built by childish fingers out of flower-stalks and rushes goes down before the oncoming torrent that swoops down from the hills. Covering her face, as if to hide her confusion from her own sight, she said half aloud, "What a weak, unwise creature I have been! I, who so pride myself in rising superior to the petty vanities of my sex. Marion Wardour, I am ashamed of you!"

She rose and stood before the glass and brushed back the offending curls. "I would cut them every one off should he ask it; I would coif my face like a nun if that would please him. Well, well, when we meet again he shall see that my disregard of his wish was only a thing of the hour."

IV

BEFORE Miss Wardour passed into her French room the next morning she summoned a servant and put into his hand a book to deliver to Professor Fenton. It was a volume of Dante which he had lent her, and which they had been reading together; and her only object in returning it now was that she might slip within its leaves one of her own engraved visiting-cards, on which she had written in pencil only the words, "A riveder-la." Then, with a light heart, she went her way to her morning tasks.

The day wore on, the evening came, and Marion did not forget that in the public concert-room of the town there were to be that night some fine renditions by celebrated artists of a few of Beethoven's arias, of which she and Professor Fenton had spoken as a thing to be enjoyed together. There had been no positive engagement to go to the concert, but certainly a tacit one.

The little white flag of truce despatched in the morning brought nothing back in answer, to Marion's surprise and dismay. She did not know that the careless servant had unconsciously dropped it on his way to Professor Fenton's rooms. She could not, therefore, know that the sending back of the volume was construed into an iterated insistence of her words and actions the night before. All her penitent pride began to rise up again, in face of this discourteous silence, as she conceived it to be; and when the foppish resident graduate, Forrester, who had often been the mark for Professor Fenton's sarcastic arrows, presented himself and offered himself as her escort, she accepted, with a desperate feeling that she might there chance to meet the Professor, and with one glance melt away all misunderstanding.

"Oh, dear! just see Miss Wardour!" shouted out Rosie Pratt from amid a group of girls who were sauntering in the corridor, as Marion, bonneted and gloved, advanced along it toward them.

"What has become of her curls?"

"I declare I hardly knew you, Miss Wardour," cried Mary Styles. "Why did you smooth them back? Please don't do so any more!"

"No, don't! don't!" exclaimed one and another. "You are not your dear self at all without them."

"You weren't meant for a Madonna, Miss Wardour; you're a St. Cecilia!"

"A Madonna!" The word hurt her, and, with a forced smile, she escaped hurriedly from the curious and questioning eyes that still continued to follow her inquiringly.

The concert was half over before she discovered the face she was almost afraid to search for. Professor Fenton did not see her, and was not sending any anxious glances around the hall; instead, he was engaged, with a vivacity unusual with him, in easy chat with one of the gay society girls of the town, with whom he had apparently come to the concert. Only as they were passing out of the crowded room were they jostled within touch of each other in the doorway. Marion felt, rather than saw his presence, and if his swift glance held her in its sweep, it was for such a mere instant that the smooth bandeaux were unnoticed, and, therefore, made no mute appeal. He was conscious of nothing more than that she was on the arm of "that crack-brain, Forrester," whom she knew he considered beneath his scorn; and, with that thought in his mind, the noisy, chattering crowd closed between them.

A day or two after this Marion happened to stand with half a dozen of the school-girls at the counter of a book-store, turning over engravings. She felt little Rosie Pratt nudge her elbow, and following the direction of the child's glance, she saw Professor Fenton at another counter, bending over an open volume.

"See here, Miss Wardour!" one of the group cried out in no softly modulated voice. "Judge for us between this beautiful 'Notte' of Correggio and Raphael's 'La Belle Jardinière.' We girls are going to get one of them for our drawing-master, M. Pélot, before school breaks up."

"Ah, here is something prettier still!" said another, holding up before Marion a genre picture by a modern French artist, and giving the title of it for the benefit of the entire group. "See! 'Will he Never Come?' Oh, Miss Wardour, isn't it lovely? Just look at the despair in her face! She has hurt her lover in some way, and she's afraid he's not going to come back. Girls, isn't it beautiful?"

"Hush, Annette! Who wants a Frenchified thing like that? Now, here is something like—this 'Reconciliation' of Bouguereau's—"

"Oh, let those modern pictures alone!" interrupted another girl. "We all want something from the old masters. Now, here are three of the finest. Miss Wardour, you shall be our umpire."

It was not possible that Professor Fenton should not have heard the whole of this noisy conversation, in which Marion's name was so bandied about by her thoughtless companions; but he never turned his head or gave any more sign of having heard than the bust of Plato which stood in a niche above him.

Marion acceded with all haste to the children's request about the picture, quieting them with a whisper that did not cross to the opposite counter; and when, dropping her veil over her face, which she felt was paling strangely, she passed out of the shop, a side glance, which was unavoidable as she turned to reach the door near which he stood, showed him still bending in apparent absorption over the book before him.

"Curious—wasn't it?" whispered Edith Strother when they were fairly in the street. "He's not good enough for her!"

"What's curious?"

"Oh, Harriet Gwinn! you're such a piece of matter-of-factness! Didn't you see Professor Fenton? He's a bear! he never said a word or threw a look toward Miss Wardour."

"That's the right way for engaged people to do, my dear."

"Nonsense! To forget he's a gentleman?"

When Marion came down to tea that evening, the shining braids had been replaced by the loosened tresses, and the cheek which even the girls had noticed as having lost its color, brightened painfully as one and another gave way to their satisfaction at the change.

"Now we've got you back again!" cried Rosie Pratt, reaching up her chubby arms to clasp them about Marion's neck. "You've been away for all these days: that smooth-headed lady wasn't our darling Miss Wardour. Promise us you'll never tuck up these pretty, pretty curls again."

"I certainly never will."

The last evening of the session at ——— Seminary drew on. A grand concert was to crown its close, and Marion was obliged, though feeling utterly unequal to the task, to take a conspicuous part in it. She was standing before the glass, placing the only ornament the merry girls who were talking and laughing about her could persuade her to wear in her hair—a delicate rose.

"Your cheek used to be that color," said the outspoken little Rosie Pratt, who was watching the process of the toilette, "but it isn't now. What's the reason?"

Before Marion could reply to the child a card was laid upon her dressing-table, which the merest glance showed her was Professor Fenton's. Her face flushed suddenly: "The roses! the roses!" cried Rosie, sotto voce, behind her hand. "Don't be vexed, Miss Wardour, at his coming just now when you have to go to the concert-room. We'll run and tell him you are engaged;" and without waiting for permission, off flew a couple of the officious little maidens.

Another was sent after them in all haste, who met them returning out of breath with their rapid run. "Betty told him you were busy; but he didn't wait a minute, she said; see, Miss Wardour, it's a P. P. C. card," and the speaker pointed to the letters in the corner.

How Marion ever got through her part of the evening's entertainment she did not know, and cared not to inquire. She turned the key inexorably on the waiting heart that throbbed beneath her bodice, and threw herself into the music with an abandon that excited the wonder and admiration of the assembled guests. And when she sang one of Schubert's songs, full of wild pathos and heart-break, there were eyes that had tears in them, as one auditor said to another: "Why, I didn't know that music was her forte; she's a St. Cecilia!"

Late that night, after the concert was over, Marion returned pale and weary to her room; and as she tore from among her curls the one rose now wilted, and threw herself with an air of utter hopelessness into a low chair, she saw on the table beside her the case of beautiful French classics, and lying on top of them a card from the effusive school-girls:

"FOR OUR DARLING MISS WARDOUR.
A Bridal Present from her Devoted Pupils."

This was the over-brimming drop. The aching eyes closed; and when a servant came to her room a little after on some trifling errand, she found Marion lying in a swoon upon the floor.

The vacation passed away; the seminary resumed its regular duties, but a new French teacher sat in Marion Wardour's chair. A long spell of violent illness set in very shortly after her return home, and for several months she was unable to take up any occupation. No one at home guessed the trouble that weighed down their usually so buoyant Marion. Occasionally there was an eagerness in turning over letters which the post brought, and two or three times, when the post-mark of the university town turned up, a swift flash would cross the pallid cheek, and the thin hand held out for them would tremble. But a subsidence of all emotion would follow as she would say, with a little faint panting: "Ah, yes; Edith Strother's handwriting:" or, "Dear little Rosie! she remembers me still."

But youth does not so easily succumb; grief does not kill out the sweet life so soon. By-and-by, health came back, and with it the necessity for exertion. So when a charming position as governess in the family of a wealthy planter in South Carolina offered itself, Marion thankfully accepted it, and for years did not return to her northern home.

One cool, starry night in October found her on her way back to her friends after this long period of separation. She was traveling alone, and on this particular night was speeding along on a night train between two of our principal cities. She was worn with her long, solitary journey, and lay, half-reclining, with her head supported by her traveling wraps. The seat immediately in front of her had been unoccupied the early part of the night, and she had not noticed when it was filled; only when she raised her head to peer through the window and see if there was any indication of dawn she observed that two gentlemen occupied it.

Suddenly the distinctly pronounced name of the university town, so linked with her happiness and her sorrow, arrested her ear. Her heart stood still; for, notwithstanding all the hard and reiterated tutorings of womanly pride, it was but a rebellious heart after all.

"How long since you landed?" she heard one of the gentlemen ask the other.

"Only ten days ago."

The words were nothing, but the voice—not a vibration in its tone had been forgotten, although she had not heard it for nearly three years. It went to her heart with the clean thrust of a sharp stiletto.

"You were two years abroad, I think?"

"More—almost three."

"And did you like Bonn?"

"Yes—as much as I could like anything in the mood in which I then was."

"What sort of mood—eh?"

"Well, one of desperate chagrin and disappointment."

"Disappointment? Why, old fellow, I never heard you own to disappointment about anything."

"What's that the conductor sung out?" asked the other, interruptingly, as the aforesaid official startled all the sleepers with his stentorian shout: "Our station, is it? Yes? Well, gather up your traps, Fenton; or shall I help you? You seem to have as many as an old maid."

TEN years after the date of this new engagement, which had been succeeded by others of a similar nature, there sat, one brilliant summer afternoon, on one of the seats facing the grand ruins of the old castle of Heidelberg, a lady, busy with her sketching materials. All tourists will recall the beautiful, well-preserved window overlooking the shrubbery below, with its pointed arch overrun with fine stone tracery, as though the vine had been once green about it, and had been fossilized through the action of centuries. The sketcher—it was Marion Wardour—was wholly absorbed in transferring this lovely window into the pages of her scrap-book in its picturesque beauty.

Her companions were running over the castle, examining the Big Tun, peering into the ancient rooms, trying the stone stairways, making the hoary walls echo with their young merriment, and calling occasionally down to Marion as she sat over her work.

Three of the party were young girls who were Marion's peculiar charge. A kind family friend of hers, who had watched with concern the paling of the delicate cheek and the too sad expression of the drooping eye—which he declared to his wife had no business to be intruding to her detriment at thirty-three, when a woman should be in her richest prime—settled it to his own satisfaction that her devotion to her duties as governess to his children had much to do with this apparent failure of Marion's health and spirits.

"Marion is too lovely to be allowed to droop to so little purpose," he said one day, after watching her somewhat languid movements. "Now, here she has been teaching these girls of ours for five years without taking a holiday worth speaking of, and she's plainly running down. Don't you think, my dear, the best thing we could do would be to carry her with us in the spring when we go abroad? In your delicate health, she could relieve you of a world of anxiety, if you had her at hand to turn over to her these three spirited young things, who will want to drag you everywhere. Such a traveling governess is not easily to be secured."

"A capital idea!" exclaimed Mrs. Floyd with eagerness. "I wonder it had not occurred to me without your suggestion. Apart from all thought of relief to me, she would augment so greatly the pleasures of travel for us, for she is a better reference than Murray and Black and Bédaker all rolled into one. Let us speak to her about it at once."

Consequently the arrangement was brought about; and when the Floyd family—father, mother and three daughters—started on their two years' tour, Miss Wardour was one of their party.

They had only arrived at Heidelberg the day before the one of which we speak; and, of course, one of the first "lions" they determined to seize by the mane was the famous old castle, whose history Marion took pains to make her pupils familiar with prior to their investigations. She had just gone the rounds of the picturesque ruin with Mr. Floyd and his daughters, and as they had not fully satisfied their curiosity, she descended and left them to farther search while she put upon paper her reminiscences of the fine exterior.

As she dashed in with rapid hand her India-ink drawing, she allowed herself to be so absorbed by the thought of the old historic associations over which she had been going that morning with her pupils, that she ceased even to hear the echoing laughter, or note the coming and going tourists, some of whom, like herself, were busy with pencil and sketch-book, or to observe the occasional occupants of the benches beside her. Only once, when a sudden movement caused her sketching materials to roll from her lap, and spin beyond her reach on the smooth walk, a stranger, who had been loitering somewhere near, gathered them up, and, with a low bow, but in entire silence, restored them to her. She did not look up, but, with a kindly-spoken "Thank you," received them. She had not been aware till that instant of his proximity. He had immediately stepped aside after having done her the small service; and when, on the conclusion of her work a few minutes later, she looked around, she saw no trace of him.

As they sat at the table d'hôte that evening, Mr. Floyd's youngest daughter, a bright child of twelve, suddenly turned to Miss Wardour and said:

"If it wasn't always happening to us to run against people we know at home, I should think it odd to find an acquaintance of yours here, Miss Wardour. He came up to me in the balcony, after we returned from the castle, and, very politely introducing himself, said he had heard me, in speaking to my sister, name a familiar name, and he thought he had one whom he used to know long ago in our party. I asked him who it was, taking for granted that it was papa, who knows everybody. But, no; he said it was 'Miss Wardour.' And then he took out a card—I declare, dear Miss Wardour, I forgot it till this minute; pray, forgive me. I have it here in my pocket," and she searched for it, but in vain. "Well, I'll go this minute and get it, for I know I must have left it in my Bédaker, for I had it in my hand when he came up to me."

Miss Wardour said it was of no consequence, and would have detained Emily Floyd, who rushed without farther word from the table in search of the missing card, and in a few moments laid it beside the plate of her governess. She took it up carelessly and turned it over. A sudden, unaccountable added paleness overspread the always pale face, and, without seeming to know exactly what she did, she laid the card upon the table again and slightly pushed back her chair.

With the familiarity of long established friendship, Mr. Floyd, who sat next her, took up the card, and, merely saying, "With your permission," read aloud the name:

"MR. F. H. FENTON,
Ezmoor University,
U. S. A."

"Dear me, Marion! I never dreamed Fenton was an acquaintance of yours! I've been seeing his name half a dozen times in the hotel registers since we have been on the Continent, but never thought to mention it, as I supposed him a stranger to everybody but myself. He was just entering the academic shades of Harvard when I passed out from them into the busy world, and I've seen but little of him for years past. We'll have him with us at once. It will be a delightful addition to our party, eh, Marion? Emily, as you brought the Professor's card, carry Miss Wardour's back to him—"

But before Mr. Floyd had gotten to the end of his sentence Marion had hastily risen and disappeared from the salle-à-manger.

VI

"My dear," exclaimed Mr. Floyd to his wife, breaking suddenly, two days after, upon her afternoon siesta, "pardon me for disturbing your slumbers, but the prettiest little romance has spun itself about us. You can't think how charmed I am!"

"What is it? You're not thinking of taking a suite of chambers for us in the old castle, I trust, and trying to resuscitate for our enjoyment some of its old life."

"Oh, no! nothing so old or musty, I assure you, but a fresh, living romance of to-day, such as we read of in novels often enough, but something that does not occur so readily in real life; in short, such a thing, which when we meet with it even in novels, we are apt to designate unreal, unlikely, clap-trap—"

"Pray, enlighten me at once, without farther commentary," said Mrs. Floyd, rising from her sofa with a look of unusual animation. "Whom does it specially concern? You haven't made a matrimonial alliance for our Jeannette with that Bavarian Count who has so taken your fancy?"

"Not quite; but there's a 'matrimonial alliance' in the case. You see Marion Wardour has not come to Europe for nothing."

"It's Marion's romance, then?"

"Yes, it's Marion's romance; for I have always suspected she had one hidden safe away somewhere in that self-contained heart of hers. She has just sought an interview with me, and, as being in loco parentis to her, she has asked my advice, and, what's more to the point, I've given it with unction."

Mr. Floyd then sat down beside his wife's sofa, and recounted Marion's story of her early engagement with Professor Fenton, and the sudden and irrational breaking of it. For ten entire years their paths had never happened to cross. Again and again had the Professor gone to the place which he had heard of as Miss Wardour's temporary abode, and failed to find her. Once, twice, even thrice, had he addressed letters to her; either they had never reached her (which proved to be the case), or, as he supposed, she had treated them with silent indifference. The fates seemed in league to prevent them from ever meeting. Three days before he had sauntered into the grounds of the old castle, with not the remotest thought of Marion in his head. He observed a lady sketching. She dropped her pencils. From mere gentlemanly instinct, he returned them to her. She received them without lifting her head, but her "Thank you!" thrilled him very strangely, and on a second look he recognized the woman he had been chasing through the world for ten long years. Overcome with the unexpectedness of the whole thing, he had hastened away without revealing himself. "You remember Emily's handing Marion a card at table two or three evenings ago?" added Mr. Floyd. "Well, he sought her out at length; one interview led to another; the misapprehensions of years were cleared up; explanations were made, and the upshot of the whole affair is—"

"That he has told her he wants to marry her on the spot; have the Big Tun filled with wine, in which we are all to drink to their health and happiness, and—he has consented!"

"Bless me, but you women are keen in your scent where love and marriage are concerned! Why, the very thing! barring the filling of the Tun, and I dare say the Professor would like amazingly to do that, too. Everything, it seems, has been made perfectly satisfactory to both parties."

"What was the difficulty?"

"Oh, some trifle, as is always sure to be the case, which a word would have set right; some quarrel, I believe, as far as I could understand, about curls—Marion's curls, which must have been the prettiest curls in the world. But the curls and everything else are straightened out now."

"Yes, after ten years."

"But you see he tried to find means of explaining things before. Anyhow, Marion declares that she is the only one who has been to blame."

"Oh, I dare say! That's a matter of course. Marion wouldn't be a real woman of the approved pattern if she didn't take all the blame to herself."

"Just as you would have done in like circumstances, my dear," laughed Mr. Floyd, as he took his wife's delighted face between his hands and kissed it.

"Well, now for the denouement of the romance; what did you advise?"

"That, as we are going to remain a whole month at Heidelberg, she should send Professor Fenton off to Southern Germany till she should get up her trousseau, and be ready at the month's end to let him come back and claim her as his bride. She's coming to hear what you think, after I have prepared the way for her by telling her story, which she declares it impossible for her to repeat."

"Yes—yes; it is a nice little bit of romance to weave into our German summer," exclaimed Mrs. Floyd with unwonted excitement. "Jeanette and Annie and Emily shall be her bridesmaids. It's really delightful! But to think that her pretty curls should have lost her ten years of happiness!"

LOVE'S GREETING.

"HOW WOULD YOU GREET ME, DEAR, IF I SHOULD COME?"

You ask how I would greet you;
Love, why ask?

Can I paint rapture in mere words,
Count heart-beats as a task?

I only know the sight of you would be
The glad surprise
That the first glimpse of light and flowers would be
To long blind eyes.

But ah! what words are deep enough to hold
The raptured hush
In which they'd watch the sunset's gold
Or rosebud's dewy blush?

I only know the sight of you would be
As dew to flowers,
That drooping on their stems have hung
Through noontide hours.

But, yet, I cannot paint in words
The joy that thrills
Throughout each fragrant heart as drop by drop
Each chalice fills.

And so my joy at meeting you
Would pass the reach
Of words in any tongue that's known—
All powers of speech.

But though I cannot tell, I think perhaps
That I could show
Just how I'd greet you if you came,
So if you care to know:

There stretches out between us, dear,
No bridgeless space,
And your question were best answered
Face unto face!

THE CHILDREN OF SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY AMELIA E. BARR.

THAT splendid world which Shakspeare imagined for us contained certain characters which we at once classify as types of humanity. His kings, jesters, philosophers arrange themselves with a singular clearness, and we readily contrast and criticise them with reference to each other. But the children of Shakspeare's plays seem to escape general notice; and it may be safely asserted that few of his readers ever bring them consciously together.

Yet they have all a positive individuality, and the English historical dramas contain some lovely types of boyhood—clear, single characters, whose feelings have a child-like sincerity, uninfluenced by complex motives and divided duties, and, for this very reason, not likely to attract metaphysical comment or detailed criticism.

All readers of Shakspeare must have observed his fondness for taking some master passion as a text, and then heightening and strengthening his argument by the grandest and most superb contrasts. Thus, the prevailing characteristic of "King John" is craft and cruelty, and against the baseness of the king's dastard soul, full of shuffling sophistries and mean subterfuges, he places the clear, gracious innocence and boyish loveliness of the little Prince Arthur.

The character of Arthur is not only unique in Shakspeare, but also in dramatic literature; for he is not a precocious child, astonishing us by a display of feeling and intelligence beyond his years. The charm of Arthur's character lies in his unconscious childishness and helplessness, his inability to comprehend the facts by which he is surrounded. The presence of quarreling kings, and the sight of warriors who fight for or against him, terrifies the child; and when his mother and grandmother come to words as sharp as blows, he cries, with tears of alarm and sorrow:

"Good my mother, peace!
I would that I were low laid in my grave;
I am not worth this coil that's made for me."

Historical accuracy could not be scrupulously regarded in the play of "King John." A time in which England was "baffled and affronted in every enterprise" would necessarily be an unpleasant subject for an English public and an English court; and Shakspeare, therefore, concentrated the interest of the drama upon Arthur, whose unhappy fate is the link binding every action together. We know, also, that at the time to which the tragedy refers Arthur was older than Shakspeare represents him; but the poet knew how much more interesting weakness and innocence in the power of craft and cruelty would be if exemplified in the person of a little child.

From his very birth Arthur was the object of England's rapacity or fear. Henry the Second and Cœur de Lion coveted the duchy of Brittany, which he inherited through his mother, Constance. John boldly seized the English throne, which he inherited through his father, Geoffrey. Then Constance placed her son under the protection of Philip, King of France, who pledged himself to maintain the child's rights. It is at this point in Arthur's history the play opens, and in all the Shakspearean drama there is no bolder and more effective introduction. In plain and rapid words Arthur's "most lawful claim" is asserted, and the defiance given and returned.

The second act brings us into the very heart of the conflict, and the spirit of the Middle Ages is upon us. Arthur, indeed, appears only as the guileless child of all times, but the men of six centuries ago surround him, and in their gothic grandeur make a most effective background to the little child who stands so helpless among them. Vowing hollow friendship or stern defiance; "gone to be married, gone to swear a peace;" gone to keep the feast "with slaughtered men;" defying spiritual power and sovereign authority; swayed by every passion, yet ever willing to defend the right, we cannot but feel the superb contrast which Arthur in his unconscious and perplexed simplicity makes to them.

The third act reveals the boy to us through his mother's terror and anguish. She has realized that her child is but a puppet to be played by the rival kings for their own benefit; and when at last the fate of battle throws him into John's hands she abandons all hope. Is he not in the power of men "fit for bloody villainy?" A mother's presentiment assures her that "never, never" shall she behold her "pretty Arthur more," and in words of passionate sorrow she appeals to Cardinal Pandulph for spiritual consolation:

"My poor child is a prisoner.
And, father cardinal, I have heard you say
That we shall see and know our friends in Heaven;
If that be true, I shall see my boy again;
For, since the birth of Cain, the first male child,
To him that did but yesterday aspire,
There was not such a gracious creature born."

No more pitiful lament was ever conceived, unless it be the one sorrowful cry of Arthur, as he stands among his wolfish enemies in the English camp:

"O this will make my mother die with grief!"
For Shakspeare well understood that this "gracious creature" would, in such extremity, feel more for those he loved than for himself. In his mouth he puts no words of entreaty, and no reply to John's pretenses of affection. A child of such rare spiritual sensitiveness doubtless divined the bloody thoughts already in his uncle's heart—thoughts which John furtively translates to Hubert de Burgh in three muttered words, "death" and "a grave," and then retires from the deed he has prompted.

The fourth act gives us the incomparable scene between Hubert and the child, and, in a few beautiful lines, the little prisoner reveals himself to us in all his winning nature. "So he were out of prison and kept sheep, he could be merry as the day is long;" and yet he "would to heaven that he were Hubert's son, so that Hubert would love him." If it were not that these first words make us feel that Hubert never can burn out the child's eyes, the horror of the situation would surpass the limits of tragic emotion. But with every fresh appeal Hubert visibly relents, and before he utters the words,

"I will not touch thine eyes
For all the treasure that thine uncle owes," we have anticipated them. The boy's desperate attempt to escape from prison and its fatal result speedily follow :

"The wall is high ; and yet I will leap down :
Good ground, be pitiful, and hurt me not !

O me ! my uncle's spirit is in these stones."

And these, his dying words, make us feel that "the bloody fingers'-ends of John" have all the taint of Arthur's murder on them. Therefore we welcome with eager satisfaction that poetic justice which annihilates time, and makes the death of John rapidly follow the death of Arthur. Fourteen years really elapsed, but Shakspeare rouses at once the stern anger of the dis-tempered lords for the "ruin of that sweet life," and then hurries forward civil revolt and foreign invasion, treason and treachery, until John expires, not like the brother of Cœur de Lion, but writhing and moaning with a monkish poison in his veins.

The beautiful and amiable Prince Arthur has little resemblance to the gallant Edward Plantagenet. His father, Henry the Sixth, was indeed more fit for a pope than a king; but he inherited through his famous mother, Margaret of Anjou, the beauty and spirit of her great ancestor, Charlemagne. Shakspeare has dealt hardly with Margaret; still she undoubtedly had an overbearing, impetuous disposition, and Philip de Comines, who knew her well, attributes the overthrow of the House of Lancaster to her rash interference in the quarrel between Warwick and Somerset. Henceforward her life was a weariful watch and battle for the rights of her husband and son; for Henry was not only strangely indifferent to his own rights, but also quite willing to give up those of his son, if by so doing he could win the peace he craved but never on earth reached. The incident is in the first scene of the third part of "King Henry Sixth," and it is impossible in it not to sympathize with Margaret and the young prince, nor wonder that, when Henry urges, "Be patient, gentle queen," she should answer :

"Who can be patient in such extremes !
Ah, wretched man ! Would I had died a maid,
And never seen thee, never borne thee son,
Seeing thou hast proved so unnatural a father !
Hath he deserved to lose his birthright thus ?

Prince. Father, you cannot disinherit me :
If you be king, why should not I succeed ?

K. Hen. Pardon me, Margaret ; pardon me, sweet son :
The Earl of Warwick, and the Duke, enforce'd me.

Q. Mar. Enforce'd thee ! Art thou a king, and wilt be forc'd ?
I shame to hear thee speak. Ah, timorous wretch !
Thou hast undone thyself, thy son, and me,
And given unto the house of York such head,
As thou shalt reign but by their sufferance.

The soldiers should have toss'd me on their pikes
Before I would have granted to that act.

The northern lords that have forsworn thy colors
Will follow mine, if once they see them spread :
And spread they shall be.

Thus do I leave thee. Come, son, let's away ;
Our army's ready ; come, we'll after them.

K. Hen. Stay, gentle Margaret, and hear me speak.

Q. Mar. Thou hast spoke too much already ; get thee gone.

K. Hen. Gentle son Edward, thou wilt stay with me ?

Q. Mar. Ay, to be murdered by his enemies.

Prince. When I return with victory from the field,
I'll see your grace ; till then, I'll follow her."

The prince was then only seven years old, but he had been familiar from infancy with battles and flight and exile ; and, being Margaret's son, nourished amid the clashing of swords and the hate of rival claims, we cannot wonder that he elected to follow her, and win back on the battle-field the crown which his father had resigned in the council chamber.

All the gentlemen and barons of the great northern counties had a local interest in the House of Lancaster, and they rushed to arms at the call of Margaret in behalf of her son's rights. But, noble as Margaret was under defeat, she could not bear victory, and her triumph at Sandal Castle was sullied by the murder of "sweet young Rutland," the little son of the Duke of York, who was seized while flying with his tutor.

The sketch of this little York is but a slight one, yet it is a masterly portrait of the terror of a child who had been all his short life under priestly dictation, and who could have no conception of the scenes in which his Lancastrian cousin Edward learnt how to defy his enemies, and receive their daggers without flinching.

Rut. Ah, whither shall I fly to 'scape their hands ?

Ah, tutor ! look where bloody Clifford comes !

Clif. Chaplain, away ! thy priesthood saves thy life.

As for the brat of this accursed duke,

Whose father slew my father, he shall die.

Tut. Ah, Clifford ! murder not this innocent child,
Lest thou be hated both of God and man.

Clif. How now ! Is he dead already ? Or is it fear

That makes him close his eyes ? I'll open them.

Rut. Ah, gentle Clifford, kill me with thy sword,

And not with such a cruel, threatening look.

Sweet Clifford, hear me speak before I die :

I am too mean a subject for thy wrath ;

Be thou reveng'd on men, and let me live.

Clif. In vain thou speak'st, poor boy ; my father's blood
Hath stopp'd the passage where thy words should enter.

Rut. O, let me pray before I take my death :

To thee I pray, sweet Clifford, pity me !

Clif. Such pity as my rapier's point affords.

Rut. I never did thee harm—why wilt thou slay me ?

Clif. Thy father hath.

Rut. But 'twas ere I was born.

Thou hast one son ; for his sake pity me ;

Lest, in revenge thereof—sith God is just—

He be as miserably slain as I.

Ah, let me live in prison all my days,

And when I give occasion of offense,

Then let me die, for now thou hast no cause.

Clif. No cause ?

Thy father slew my father, therefore die !"

And whispering his last words in Latin, the boy falls.

Shakspeare makes Margaret offer the Duke of York, Rutland's father, a handkerchief dipped in his child's blood, to wipe away the tears he sheds for his untimely end ; and it is certain that her immoderate laughter and brutal triumph over York was such as, in some measure, to justify the tragic death of her own son under the daggers of the three remaining sons of York—Edward, Clarence and Richard.

Soon afterward Margaret rescued her husband from his Yorkist jailors, and with exultation presented to him the young prince, who had shared with her all the perils of the war, saying :

"You promised knighthood to our forward son ;
Unsheath your sword, and dub him presently.
Edward, kneel down.

K. Hen. Edward Plantagenet, arise a knight ;

And learn this lesson : Draw thy sword in right.

Prince. My gracious father, by your kingly leave,

I'll draw it as apparent to the crown,

And in that quarrel use it to the death."

The Lancastrian nobles had, however, so little respect for Henry that they urged him to leave the field to the conduct of Margaret ; and Shakspeare, by a subtle touch of filial respect, at this juncture adds the noblest grace to the young Edward's character :

"Prince. My royal father, cheer these noble lords,

And hearten those that fight in your defense :
Unsheath your sword, good father ; cry Saint George !"

The battle of Towton, fought on Palm Sunday, "with lances instead of palms," made Margaret and her son again wanderers and exiles. They fled from Scotland to France, and from France to Scotland, finding in every place misery and danger. An inflexible evil fortune followed the mother and son ; their bravery and devotion could not propitiate it. Treachery, shipwreck, hunger, cold and weariness were familiar to them. Poverty manacled them, defeat after defeat dogged their footsteps. Year after year the struggle was continued, until on the "bloody field" of Tewkesbury the house of Lancaster buried its last hope of sovereignty with "the gallant, springing young Plantagenet."

Here Edward was taken prisoner with his mother, Margaret, and brought before King Edward the Fourth, and his brothers Clarence and Richard. This, the final scene of his short life, was not unworthy of the stormy years which it closed. Unterrified by the cruel York faces which glared upon him, he fell beneath their daggers asserting his rights to the last moment, and dealing out to his enemies quick, angry speeches, full of poignant sarcasms and reproaches.

The assassination of Henry the Sixth, which speedily followed that of his son Edward, ended the civil war ; but we should close the historical dramas at this point with a sense of injustice and incompleteness. The play of "Richard the Third" is the legitimate sequel to "Henry the Sixth," and Richard himself the terrible Fate who, destitute of pity, love or fear, fills for others the cup of retribution which he also had to drink. This idea is distinctly prominent. Margaret is brought forward to keep alive, by her frantic prophecies, the past in the present ; and in that night so full of "fearful dreams" and "ugly sights" which foreboded to Clarence his own murder, he tells, shudderingly, how there

"Came wandering by

A shadow like an angel, with bright hair

Dabbled in blood ; and he shriek'd out aloud :

'Clarence is come ; false, fleeting, perjured Clarence,
That stabb'd me in the field of Tewkesbury.'"

The murder of Clarence produces the affecting scene between his mother and two children. The sketch of Clarence's son is very slight, but full of character. He had been told by Richard that his uncle the King, "provok'd to 't by the Queen," had caused his father's death. He had been kissed by Richard, and told to rely on him as a father, and when his grandmother dropped a hint of his uncle's treachery, the child, with that sweet credulity that can see no guile beneath a kind demonstration, answered, "I cannot think it."

The death of Edward soon after the murder of his brother Clarence placed Richard so much nearer the throne. Only Edward's two sons barred his right. These princes are drawn with exquisite skill. With scanty means he indicates in the Prince of Wales, then thirteen years of age, a disposition promising a most perfect manhood. Dignified, earnest and clear-seeing, there is an air of pensive thought about all he says ; while his younger brother of York is spirited, quick-tongued, almost malapert, but yet just the keen, observant child that might be expected as the growth of a court full of hostility, hypocrisy, and jealous, quarreling women.

Richard, as Protector, wishes the brothers to go to the Tower pending Edward's coronation. The young king does "not like the Tower of any place ;" but he gracefully consents, asks questions about its builder,

Julius Cæsar, and makes reflections on his life. But the bold little York protests :

"I shall not sleep in quiet at the Tower.

Rich. Why should you fear ?

York. Marry, my Uncle Clarence's angry ghost.

My grandam told me he was inurther'd there.

Prince. I fear no uncles dead.

Rich. Nor none that live I hope.

Prince. An if they live, I hope I need not fear."

The son of Clarence was incredulous as to his uncle's falseness ; the young York had that boyish quickness which instinctively discerns the danger it has no power to ward off. His pert, sly taunts to his uncle of Gloucester are very natural, and very skillfully contrasted with the delicate caution and acuteness of the little king's remarks. "O 'tis a parlous boy," says Richard to his creature Buckingham.

Bold, quick, ingenious, forward, capable ; and from that moment we know that Richard will have no relettings.

The plot deepens rapidly ; the mother and grandmother of the princes—the latter woefully counting her "eighty odd years of sorrow"—are forbid access to them ; and there are few more touching lines in all the Shakspearean dramas than those in which the fearful mother addresses the prison of her boys :

"Pity, you ancient stones, those tender babes

Whom envy hath immur'd within your walls !

Rough cradle for such little pretty ones !

Rude, ragged nurse ! Old sullen playfellow

For tender princes, use my babies well !"

King John incited Hubert to murder Arthur with trembling, cowardly innuendoes ; Richard, with cynical indifference, summons Tyrrel to his presence and asks :

"Dar'st thou resolve to kill a friend of mine ?"

And receiving Tyrrel's ready assurance, exclaims exultingly : "Thou sing'st sweet music !" Yet if there is any scene conjured in wondrous words to abide all time it is Tyrrel's description of the two children "girdling one another within their alabaster, innocent arms." Endless repetition has not made it stale, nor do artists ever seem to weary in interpreting the tearful words in lovely forms.

The wailing for their murder is worthy of their tragic fate. Margaret of Anjou, hungering for revenge, had appeared in the early part of the play despair-crowned and breathing curses ; and after their death she comes again, to add her note of gratified hate to the lamentations of three generations, and to forbode the despair and horror and death waiting for Richard on the field of Bosworth.

An admirable contrast to these English boys is the Roman son of Coriolanus. How charming is that scene in the house of Marcius, in which his grandmother and mother, as they sit sewing, talk of the boy to their morning caller, Valeria ! "He had rather see the swords, and hear a drum, than look upon his schoolmaster," says the proud grandmother ; and Valeria adds :

"Val. O' my word, the father's son. . . . I looked upon him o' Wednesday half an hour together ; he has such a confirmed countenance. I saw him run after a gilded butterfly ; and when he caught it, he let it go again ; and after it again ; and over and over he comes, and up again ; caught it again ; or whether his fall enraged him, or how 'twas, he did so set his teeth, and tear it—O, I warrant, how he mammoocked it !

Vol. One of his father's moods," is the grandmother's proud admission ; and we see in this boy who "mammoocked" and tore his butterfly prey the epitome of the father, who "fluttered the Volscians about like an eagle in a dove-cote."

"He has such a confirmed countenance" is Valeria's description of the child's appearance, and the simple phrase conveys the perfect idea of a sturdy child and a self-willed character. He appears again with Volumnia and Virgilia, when they plead for the safety of Rome. The women declare that Coriolanus must tread upon their bodies if he "march to assault his country;" but the young Marcius, mimic of his father, cries out:

"He shall not tread on me.

I'll run away till I am bigger; but then I'll fight.

If we take up the play of "Macbeth" after that of "Coriolanus," we are in a new world. It transports us from the sunshine of Italian cities to the mists and glooms of the Scotch Highlands. Everything is tinged with the supernatural. Men are credulous and excitable, and their ordinary speech is poetical and full of grand images. The mighty forms of Macduff, Banquo, Siward are of very different aspect to the downright, hard-headed, hard-fisted Roman nobles; and the preternaturally wise son of Macduff, vainly trying to form a conception of a traitor, tyrant and murderer, is a very different child from the young Marcius, to whom difficulties would only suggest fighting. The little Scot dreams and wonders; but withal, when the time for action comes, he is no coward. Dimly comprehending from his mother's irritable complaints that a traitor "swears and lies," when the murderer sent by Macbeth calls his father "traitor," he at once, with childish passion, answers, "Thou liest!" and being instantly stabbed, uses his last breath to urge his mother, "Run away, I pray you!"

From the gloom of the Scotch Highlands, "Love's Labor Lost" takes us to the sunny plains of Navarre. Here all the men are idle, and the women, too; and we may laugh with Costard over the tricks and speech of that "nit of mischief," that "half-penny purse of wit," the little page, Moth. Shakspeare has in this comedy imitated the pedantic style of conversation affected by the witty and learned of that time, an excellent description of which he puts into the mouth of the critical Holofernes as "too picked, too spruce, too affected, too odd, as it were—too peregrinate, as I may call it."

None of Shakspeare's contrasts are more decided and amusing than that of the stiff, affected, melancholy Armado with the page Moth, who, light as his name, is all jest and playfulness, versatility and cunning. Armado is a great coiner of words, and the alliterations, antithesis and Latin phrases of the curate, schoolmaster and knight are a perpetual joy to Moth and his admirer, the clown Costard. "They have been at a great feast of languages, and stolen the scraps," whispers Moth to Costard.

"Cost. O, they have lived long in the alms-basket of words! I marvel thy master hath not eaten thee for a word; for thou art not so long by the head as honorificabilitudinitatibus," answers Costard, who had also picked up the fashion of big words, and stolen the longest in the comedy. We may find Don Adriano de Armado dull, and the curate's and schoolmaster's disputes on the golden cadences of poesy very tiresome; but we shall always be ready to say to that handful of wit, the tiny Moth, "An I had but one penny in the world, thou shouldst have it to buy gingerbread."

Shakspeare gives to the pages of his plays as decided an individuality and as national a flavor as he does to far more important characters. Thus Lucius, the page of Brutus, touching his instrument in his master's tent at midnight, and dropping away into the irresistible sleep of boyhood, is as far apart as time and race can put him from the mannikin Robin whom Prince Hal sets to walk behind the fat knight Falstaff, for the pure fun of the contrast; a merry little rascal, killed at Agincourt, with "the poys and the luggage, expressly against the law of arms," as Fluellen decides. And when Henry, in retaliation, cut the throats of his prisoners, perhaps some memory of this pet boy mingled in his revenge.

No sketch of child-life could possibly differ farther from Moth than the tender, sensitive Mamillius of "The Winter's Tale." The petted darling of the ladies of the court, he is half ashamed and half resentful of his baby honors, fearing they will "kiss him hard, and speak to him as if he were a baby still." How easy it is to imagine the solemn little face with which, when begged to tell a tale, he asks:

"Merry, or sad, shall 't be?"

And then adds:

"A sad tale's best for winter.

I have one of sprites and goblins."

And what mother would not have answered:

"Let's have that, good sir.

Come on, sit down—come on, and do your best

To fright me with your sprites; you're powerful at it."

And then the tale that was never to be finished began:

"There was a man—dwelt by a churchyard—I will tell it softly—"

In this little scene, so familiar to every parent, Shakspeare got at the very heart of child-nature. But the tale is rudely interrupted by the wicked and unjust arrest of the queen, his mother, by whose side Mamillius is sitting, and we are left to infer the grief and suffering of the child by the few lines which close her trial:

"Servant. My lord, the king, the king!

Leontes. What is the business?

Servant. O sir, I shall be hated to report it!

The prince your son, with mere conceit and fear

Of the queen's speed, is gone.

Leontes. How! Gone?

Servant. Is dead."

It may be observed of the children which Shakspeare draws that their ideality is generally preserved, either by an early death or by some strange fortune. Arthur of Brittany and the unfortunate princes of Lancaster and York have in his pages an eternal childhood. Again, over the early years of some of his most exquisite and noble characters he throws a romantic glamour that is made to glorify their whole after life. He shows us Miranda, and leaves us to imagine her childhood in that enchanted isle. We meet the lost princess Perdita at the sheep-shearing, sharing her daffodils and violets, and we know in what sweet, innocent content she has grown to such exquisite maidenhood; or among the wild Welsh mountains we see the stolen princes of Cymbeline drinking in the free air and offering morning salutations to the rising sun, and are certain, from their generous manhood, that the breath of the old innocent world was about their youth.

And if the child-world of Shakspeare is sad, it is always pure and sweet. We cannot enter it without feeling that Heaven lies nearer to us. Perchance some memory of his own lost son touched every child he drew; at any rate, we cannot doubt that Shakspeare revered childhood and tenderly bent over its joys and sorrows.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE CHURCH MILITANT.

THE administrator of George Eighmie was very far from being a bad man. He considered his cousin's relation with Alida, and the attempt to free his slaves and devote the proceeds of his estate to the benefit of the children resulting from that union, an outrage, not only upon society in general and the peculiar institution of the South in particular, but especially upon his own kith and kin. This feeling at least was but natural, and simply represented the general sentiment of the community in which he dwelt, intensified somewhat by that feeling of personal resentment which the heir-expectant always feels when his hopes are blighted by unanticipated claimants. He bore no ill-will to Alida or her children, but he believed them to be legally and justly the slaves of his long-deceased relative, and, as such, rightfully subject to the claims of the heirs. This belief was an inherited one. He had been little more than a boy when his cousin died, and the sentiment had grown stronger and stronger in his breast with every succeeding discussion of the subject in the family councils. He had been selected for his present position, after the long years of litigation, because he was cool, courageous and intelligent. He was a man of substance, though not of great wealth—thrifty, energetic and respectable. He was a member of the church, consistent, earnest and devout. He would no sooner have committed what he deemed a wrong than the saintly-faced Miss Hunniwell herself. Nay, he would have resisted what he thought to be injustice just as stubbornly, and with the same immutable conviction that he was doing right thereby. He was a law-abiding man; upright and fair in his dealings with others, and no more desirous of securing his own rights than of rendering righteousness to others. It was his duty, as he was instructed and believed, to reduce to possession the assets of the estate he had sworn to administer. It was especially his duty toward the rightful heirs to reclaim Alida and her children, because they had been advised that it was possible that complications might arise through the suit already begun by Jared Clarkson, as the guardian of Alida, which would be entirely avoided if the children of Eighmie were brought within the jurisdiction of the courts of the state in which he died. He had no doubt that Hilda was the daughter of Alida, and he had determined to obtain possession of her person, and bring her to Carolina before Clarkson or others of her friends could have an opportunity either to place her beyond the reach of the law or to interpose any legal barrier to her removal. He did not regard Hilda as having any rights at all, except the slender one of personal defense which the law allowed the slave. He was ready to admit that it would be hard for her to come down from the luxurious position she had occupied as the petted daughter of a wealthy and refined gentleman to a state of servitude, and he would have felt no little pity for her on that account. Were her state of subjection once clearly acknowledged, and her claims as the heir of Hargrove abandoned and extinguished, he would willingly have consulted her happiness by consenting to release the claims of the estate upon her person for a nominal consideration. In short, Sherwood Eighmie was an honest, upright, Christian gentleman, who had no more doubt of the righteousness of slavery than of any other tenet of his faith. He did not wish to secure the girl from any motive of cruelty or revenge. He would have treated her kindly, according to his ideas of kindness, had she fallen into his hands; but he did not regard it as any injustice or inhumanity on his part to perform to the letter the duties his position devolved upon him. He was a just man even to his own slaves, treating them fairly rather than indulgently. He expected and exacted service, and he held himself bound as a Christian master to give good support, attention in sickness, and a reasonable amount of relaxation to those who served. He would have fought for one of his slaves only less readily than for his children, and would have resented their ill-treatment by another to the limit of the law or the extent of his power. He would have done this, however, not so much out of consideration for the slave himself, as because he regarded it as the duty of the master, and also because any interference with his servant was an infraction of his right as master. In short, he was a good, fair, average man, shaped and fashioned by one set of ideas, as Harrison Kortright had been by another. Submitted to the same influences, the two men would not have been unlike in character. Growing up as they did, they seemed to stand at the very antipodes of thought.

The fact was well known both to himself and his lawyer that Miss Hunniwell was not inclined to the extreme doctrines of the Abolitionists, and from this it was inferred that perhaps the best method to secure his end was to speak her fair, and obtain if possible her co-operation in getting possession of the "person held to service or labor" whom he sought. He could not understand, nor could his counsel, why any one not a rampant Abolitionist should object to rendering to him what the law not only gave him the right to have, but commanded him to take and keep as a part of the estate of his intestate. He had arranged it so that his attorney's letter should reach her just at the time it did. In fact, he had himself brought it the day before and mailed it in the village. He had been at slight pains to conceal his identity, and had brought with him from Baltimore two men who were ready to perform his bidding in all things. They were men of experience, too, for they had more than once been engaged in the recapture of slaves in several of the border states.

As regards Miss Hunniwell, both he and his legal adviser had made the common mistake of the Southerner in estimating the Northern character,—by supposing her to be entirely mercenary in her impulses. That anything beside her material interests would affect her action in the matter he never once dreamed until he stood in her presence and heard her indignant refusal to accede to his request. Even then he was unable to appreciate the motive that controlled her action. He accounted her show of indignation as resulting from a careful balancing of profit and loss, and sought to convince her that refusal would be far more disastrous to her school than assent to his demand could possibly be.

When her soft cheek flushed and her clear blue eyes flashed at this, and she requested him to leave the premises without delay, he simply thought he had blundered in the method in which he had broached the subject. It was not until his second visit, when he came armed with his proofs, which were merely received as evidences of a wicked purpose by the mistress of Beechwood, that he mistrusted that her refusal arose from the fact that she, too, had imbibed the pestiferous notions of the Abolitionists. When she openly avowed not only her purpose to harbor and maintain the slave without regard to his demands, but also declared that she would do all in her power to prevent his getting hold of his property at all, then he first perceived that, like all the rest of "the Yankees," she was at heart an enemy of "the South," and thoroughly determined to obstruct the execution of any law designed to protect the interests of her people. Thereupon he had at once determined to use any means short of actual violence to secure possession of his slave. He had a good idea of Hilda's appearance, for she had been pointed out to him in the town that morning as "the daughter of that poor Captain Hargrove that was killed by the slaveholders lately."

He at once took measures to apply for a warrant, and set his men to watch the institution to prevent the escape of the fugitive. He had strolled restlessly about the building, not so much with the idea of securing the prize as to see what avenues there were for her escape. The note which Amy had thrown at his feet first put in his mind the idea of forcibly seizing and carrying away his slave. He knew he was in a community intensely hostile to his purpose, who would spare no pains to outwit, delay and thwart his plans. In a legal struggle he dreaded their activity, shrewdness and fertility of resource, especially aided, as he saw it would be, by an almost universal public sentiment; but he thought that a bold, quick stroke would meet with little or no resistance, and estimated that he would be able to remove the girl should he once get her in his power without serious inconvenience. Like most Southern men of that time, he counted all Northern men as cowards, and had no doubt that himself and his two assistants would present a show of force that would effectually prevent all attempt at a rescue.

Upon mentioning the matter to these worthies he found them entirely of his opinion. They at once proceeded to reconnoitre the rear of the seminary, and announced their readiness to undertake the enterprise that very night. Their plans were quickly matured. One of them had noticed a ladder lying beside the carriage-house which was all that was needed to give access to the roof below Hilda's window. A carriage was easily obtained, which one of the assistants was to drive, while the other, with the aid of Eighmie, was to secure the girl. It seemed a very simple matter. None of them had any fear as to the result. Indeed, they thought it more than likely there would be no resistance or pursuit, but Sherwood Eighmie hardly relished the idea of a stealthy entrance into the house. He would much have preferred to go in by the front door, regardless of all remonstrance, and carry away what he was entitled to take. The entry by the window smacked to him of burglary; but his two assistants, with whose lives this method was more in harmony, overruled his objection by dwelling on the obstacles he was likely to meet with from a hostile community and the very slender prospect of obtaining justice by strictly legal methods. Besides, they argued that a bold and dashing movement of this kind would greatly increase the prestige of the South, and as they could easily be beyond the state line before any pursuit was made, there was really only a show of danger in it—just enough to make it enjoyable. This advice was not altogether disinterested, since these worthies would be able, as they well knew, to demand a much greater sum for engaging in such an adventure than if they should merely follow their employer about as an unnecessary body-guard while he awaited the slow process of the law to put him in possession of his own. To climb a ladder, crack a window or forcibly remove an unwilling slave-girl from a harbor of refuge, were none of them acts that they regarded with any especial horror. So they ridiculed the hesitancy of their principal, made light of his objections, piqued his vanity and appealed to his prejudice until they carried their point, and it was decided that the capture should be made an hour after evening prayers at the seminary.

A little after dark two vehicles moved out of the village toward the seminary. In the first of these was the worthy pastor, whose face glowed with the anticipation of doing a good act. The man and horse were oddly matched, and yet there was not lacking a sense of fitness between them. The divine, a great broad-shouldered, Saxon-visaged man, sat in the light, covered buggy, his soft felt hat pulled well down over his ears, the robe tucked close about him, and urged forward the staid, shambling bay with an occasional cluck, which had no effect upon that animal, which merely kept on at the same steady pace. Yet a close observer could see at a glance that there was good material both in man and horse. The broad, firm jaw and cool gray eye bespoke a man who, if somewhat slow in making up his mind, would never waver from a decision once made. The firm grip of the bare broad hand that grasped the reins showed that even in a physical contest he would be no mean opponent. The horse was a dark blood-bay, whose powerful shoulder and long, sloping quarters showed that his stride was capable of being quickened until it reached a rate by no means despicable even among frequenters of the turf. In his careless way the dominie was a horseman, and, despite his seemingly careless driving, was not accustomed to take anybody's "dust" on the country roads he traveled. His horse knew all his moods, and would not only endure his perpetual nagging, but when his master was in serious earnest, pricked up his ears, stretched out his long neck, and threw the dirt in a style that made urging superfluous. He was a sagacious beast, too, and at the word of command backed from the stall into the shafts, and, with the buggy attached, out of the barn into the little yard behind the parsonage. He was even trusted to trot round to the front door without a driver, there to wait while the dominie changed his clothes and prepared for the road. Left unfastened by his absent-minded master on the highway for a time longer than he deemed needful for a pastoral call, he sometimes trotted leisurely home and waited at the stable-door for his master's return. In short, Mr. Amory and his horse were well suited to the plan he had devised, which was nothing less than to take Hilda twenty miles and more across the country before sunrise to a state that had never felt the foot of a slave except on his way to freedom—the only state of the North from which one never was returned to bondage.

He had laid his plans with great care. The man-of-all-work at the seminary was a good and true man, and a member of his church. To him he had revealed just enough of the facts to enable him to understand Hilda's danger and his pastor's desire to avert it. Through him he had conveyed to her the note she had received, but he had neglected to inform him of the means he intended to take to thwart the designs of the enemy. For this reason he had received no intimation of the change of heart of the Principal, and the change of the plan of escape through her co-operation. The coachman thought he was simply carrying out the design of his pastor when he drove through the town, in open day almost, with the prize which the slave-master coveted. So the good-natured 'divine's eyes shone with the warmth of benevolence behind his gold-bowed glasses as he clucked to his bay horse, and imagined himself a knight-errant bound to the relief of a sore-distressed damsel.

As he drove on down the river road that ran in front of the seminary, he heard the rattle of wheels behind, and looking around he saw a two-seated carriage containing three men. He could not see very well at a distance, but he knew the team with a horseman's instinct, and wondered where it could be going in that direction at that time of day. Half unconsciously, he drew rein, and scanned the occupants of the carriage more closely as they came near. He recognized them instantly. They were enemies—enemies of all that was good and tender in humanity—traffickers in human flesh—man-slayers, women-stealers—the enemies of God, because they were the enemies of His poorest poor.

These thoughts went through the good pastor's mind as he looked through the little window at the back of his buggy into the face of his brother in the church, Sherwood Eighmie, deacon of the church at Rawdon, in Clayburn County, Carolina. Strange that a few degrees of latitude should put honest men so far asunder in belief as to what constituted righteousness!

The dominie did not think of this, however, but began to wonder what their mission in this direction could be. Little by little the essential elements of the plan of the kidnappers dawned upon him. Both were after the same game, he thought, but he had the advantage—he knew them and they did not know him. He would foil them. Then it occurred to him to wonder how they expected to get possession of the prize. It did not take him long to conclude that she was to be betrayed by the teacher. It was common report that Eighmie had been twice to the seminary on that day, and as nothing was known of the result of his visits, this conclusion, though it seems to be harsh to us who know the truth, was by no means unnatural to one in his state of knowledge. That Hilda was to be betrayed he felt assured, and that he must save her he felt still more convinced.

It was now quite dark, and they were more than a mile beyond the seminary. Once or twice the party behind had halted. Then the dominie had stopped, too, and watched them through his little window. The others had not been unmindful of this maneuver.

"That old duffer's a-watching us, Colonel," said one of the assistants, speaking to Eighmie.

"What makes you think so?"

"Think? I know. When we go fast, he throws out a leg and gits away from us; when we slow up, he shuts off steam, and when we stop altogether, he anchors just ahead of us."

"Oh, pshaw! you're too suspicious, Barnes. How do you suppose that man knows any more about us than we do about him?"

"I don't know how, Colonel; but I'll lay a fiver that he knows us, knows our business here, and guesses, if he don't know for certain, that there's some sort of devilment brings us this way at this time of night."

"Really, Barnes, you're getting nervous. You seem to think these Yankees know everything."

"Don't you have any trouble about Jim Barnes. He never showed no white feather yet, and he ain't likely to now."

"But you were so eager for this plan—"

"So I were, Colonel; so I were—not exactly as hot for it as Bill Marsden, but I thought it a heap better 'n the one you had in mind."

"Of course it is," said the one called Marsden, sullenly. "I'd rather have a hundred men after me than a lot of screechin' gals at my heels."

"There ain't no doubt about this bein' the best way," said Barnes; "but they ain't neither of 'em clear of difficulty. You see, Colonel, I've been on this sort of expeditions before, and I tell ye what it is, these Yankees are mighty knowin' folks."

"They are said to be very inquisitive," said Eighmie, laughing, "but they haven't troubled us yet."

"That's just where our Southern folks make a mistake about the Yankees," said Barnes oracularly. "It ain't so much the number of questions they asks as 'tis the amount of things they'll find out without askin' questions, thet makes the Yankee different from the rest of mankind. Now, here we've been in this little town two days, and there hain't hardly been three questions asked all on us, but you can jest bet your bottom dollar there hain't a boy in Bloomingdale don't know who we are, where we come from, and thet we're after that gal they call Hildy Hargrove up there at Beechnut Seminary, or whatever its name is."

"That's so," said Marsden. "You can read that in their faces, men, women and children, when we go 'long the street. Ye see, Colonel, we're three strangers in a little 'huddle,' as they call it, where strangers ain't over-abundant as a rule, so they put things together and find out all about us while a Southern man 'ud be gettin' an introduction."

"That may be," said Eighmie; "but that's no reason why the man in that buggy ahead should be watchin' us now."

"It may not be any reason," said Barnes, doggedly; "but they're nigh about all against us here, an' when you've got sech a thing on hand as we have to-night, it's well enough to be looking out for accidents."

"Well, what do you propose?" asked Eighmie.

"We've got to throw that fellow off his guard some way, and I think the best plan is to go by him. It may make us a little late, but we've got to chance that; and, mind you, we ain't any worse off if this plan falls through in that way than if we hadn't started out on it."

"Well, go ahead," said Eighmie.

Barnes touched the horses with his whip, and almost at the instant they broke into a trot; the dominie's horse did likewise, and for a quarter of a mile, despite a constant acceleration of speed, the two vehicles kept at about the same distance apart, until finally the bay turned sharply into a lane leading up to a farmhouse on the hill-side, in whose window a bright light was burning.

"What do you think now?" asked Eighmie with a quiet laugh.

"Mebbe you're right," said Barnes; "but I'm always suspicious of a Yankee, and you'll find, Colonel, that the safest way of dealing with 'em is to credit them with knowing all that you know and a little more besides."

The others laughed at Barnes' justification of his caution, and dismissed all farther thought of its cause.

Hardly had the other vehicle passed the opening of the lane, however, when the bay horse again slackened his speed to a walk, and the dominie, peering out at the side, watched the carriage until it disappeared from sight around a little hill that effectually hid from view the road along which they had come. Then he stopped the bay, listened a moment to make sure that he was not mistaken, reined his horse to one side of the narrow lane, backed until the near wheel touched the wall, gave the bay the word, and in a moment was whirling along the road they had come at a gait anything but ministerial. In five minutes he was in front of the seminary. It was considerably past the hour when he had hoped to arrive. The evening prayers were over, and the pupils had dispersed to their rooms. Many of them had retired, as the darkened windows showed. It would not do to drive up the frozen avenue. Still less would it do to go on a hundred yards and take the wood-road that led up to the rear of the building. He knew every inch of ground. The wood-road was narrow and rocky. If he had abundance of time, the sagacious bay would pick his way along it almost noiselessly, but haste was necessary now. Hilda must be waiting. At any moment the enemy might return. He passed through the gate, turned out of the avenue upon the lawn, crushing an arbor vitæ beneath each wheel as he broke through the scanty hedge, drove noiselessly along the turf until he reached the opening between the carriage-house and the kitchen, looked hastily about, and, seeing no one, let the horse take its way to the rear of the premises, and turned him down the wood-road to a clump of evergreens half a dozen rods away. By this thicket the horse and buggy were completely hidden. He lowered the top of the buggy, threw the robe over the dashboard, twisted the reins about the whip, stepped quickly down, and hurried back toward the house.

The night was a cool one, and he swung his arms and stamped cautiously upon the turf by the roadside to restore the circulation as he went. The stars shone brightly, but there was no moon. As he neared the rear of the building he moved more cautiously. He fancied he heard a step in the bushes at his left, and thinking it might be Hilda waiting for him, he stopped and called her name softly. There was no answer, but he was sure he heard a suppressed breathing.

"Hilda—my child—Miss Hargrove—don't be afraid. It's I, Mr Amory. Are you there?" he said in a half whisper. Then he listened. No answer. He could hear his heart beat. The stars seemed blinking in mockery at his anxiety. He was sure a human being was crouching near him. A thrill of terror swept through his frame. Could it be that the kidnappers had an accomplice watching outside? Had the poor girl been seized because of his delay? A thousand possibilities occurred to him ere he had breathed twice. Then a touch of fear came. It was a strange position for him, a minister of the Gospel, to be in. Suppose he should be set upon and overpowered? Suppose he should get into a conflict with these Southern desperadoes? Suppose—He shook his broad shoulders and threw away his fears. He would suppose nothing. He had come to do right—God's right—and he would do it whatever the result. His hands shut tight and his teeth met under his tawny beard like the jaws of a vise. He was no child to be frightened at a shadow. He marched with the step of a grenadier to the corner of the carriage-house and stood there listening. A solitary pine growing just at the corner of the stable screened him from view in all directions. There was no light at the back of the house except in Amy's room, and a soft flickering one in Hilda's. Presently the former was extinguished. Then he watched the door expecting Hilda to appear. He was afraid to approach the house and knock lest he should destroy her chances of escape. Then he remembered her girlish escapade of climbing down the roof, and thought perchance she might have recourse to the same method again. He heard the horses munching their food in their stalls, and wondered if it could be that, not finding him at his post, she might not have saddled her horse and fled without waiting for his aid. It was like her to do so. She was not the girl to sit quietly and meet an evil fate. The cold stung him as he waited and speculated on his strange position. Should he go or stay? He had forgotten those whom he had come to circumvent; he thought only of the girl whom he meant to succor. He had almost lost hope, but still he waited. Something had evidently gone wrong! He did not know the time, but it was past nine o'clock, for the lights were all extinguished. He had just decided to wait no longer when he heard a sound that put all thought of leaving out of his mind.

There was a step upon the gravel walk beyond the carriage-house—soft and stealthy, but a man's step—then another. Then two men came from beyond the carriage-house bearing something between them. Very cautiously they passed through the open gate within a yard of where he stood, and went round the rear of the building to the other side of the wing. What was it they were carrying? He could not imagine. He waited till they had passed out of sight, and then stole softly along and peered around the corner of the house. Not twenty feet away two men were raising a ladder to the roof beneath Hilda's window. The whole scheme flashed upon him at a glance. The other man was waiting in the carriage. These were to bring the girl, and before morning poor Hilda would be on her way to servitude without hope of rescue. It all depended upon him. He was one to two—aye, one to three, and unarmed at that. But then he had been a champion wrestler at old Bowdoin in his youth. He had grown up a fisherman's son on the coast of Maine, and had matched his muscle against wind and tide in many a storm. He would do what he could. But for his remissness Hilda would have been beyond danger now. He had no idea what he would do. A thousand plans flashed through his mind. He did nothing—only waited.

One man was half-way up the ladder when a stone fell from the orchard wall not a rod from where he stood. There was a rustle in the bushes, too. The man upon the ladder paused. The watcher at the corner could hear their words as they whispered to each other in the chill night air.

"What's that, Colonel?"

There was a moment's silence.

"Nothing, I reckon—a stone loosened by the frost, or a cat, maybe."

They waited a moment more, then the man ascended. "Now," thought the minister, "is my time," and yet he hesitated. He felt a stone beneath his foot, and reached down and picked it up. He clutched it eagerly in his right hand. It made a deadly weapon in that brawny fist. He felt himself a match for the man at the foot of the ladder, however he might be armed. He took a step forward, then paused, holding his hand before him irresolutely. "No," he thought, "I will not subject myself to temptation. Only as a last resort will I use a weapon." He dropped the stone in the pocket of his overcoat.

There was a low, tremulous moan. The man at the foot of the ladder ran quickly up to the eaves. The minister sprang forward and saw the other one step out of the window of Hilda's room with a limp, white figure in his arms.

"She's all right, Colonel," he heard him say. "She won't make no more fuss. You jes' stiddy the ladder while I bring her down."

The minister stood spell-bound. The horror of the scene overpowered his faculties. He could neither move nor cry out. One man was at the foot of the ladder and the other half-way down before he awoke to the necessity of instant action. Colonel Eighmie heard a step, and turned his head quickly over his shoulder, still keeping his grasp upon the ladder. The minister took five steps like a whirlwind, and his fist fell with the force of a sledge-hammer at the base of Eighmie's ear.

"Scoundrels! Kidnappers!" he hissed through his set teeth.

Eighmie staggered and fell, half overturning the ladder as he did so.

"No ye don't," said the voice of Barnes, as he sprang up the ladder with his limp burden.

It was too late. Hardly had he reached the eaves when the ladder, disturbed by the fall of Eighmie, slipped, turned, and the top began to slide slowly along the tin gutter against which it rested. Barnes saw that he must drop the girl or fall with her to the ground and into the hands of he knew not how many enemies. It did not take him long to decide between a negro girl and himself. In an instant his arms were free; and, clutching the ladder with one hand and the spouting with the other, he threw his feet against the upright portion of the building and swung himself lightly upon the roof which he had lately quitted. Gilbert Amory, looking upward, saw the white figure as it fell, and springing forward, caught it before it reached the ground. The shock brought him to his knees, but he rallied and started to run toward where his horse was waiting. As he did so, Barnes, who began to realize the weakness of the attacking party, and who, even when engaged in an unlawful enterprise, was, as he had quietly declared, "no part of a coward," swung down from the eave-spout and dropped to the ground. Amory had just turned the corner when he started in pursuit. He was a little shaken by his fall, and not noticing the ladder which lay in his way he stumbled over it, and fell heavily to the ground. By the time he reached the corner of the house Amory was almost out of sight.

Only a flutter of white down the lane served to guide him in his pursuit.

Even with the burden which he bore Amory would have found it easy to outstrip his pursuer had he gone up the hill instead of trying to utilize his buggy as a means of escape. The time occupied in placing the half-unconscious girl in the vehicle enabled Barnes, who had no idea of yielding peaceable possession of his booty, to approach almost within striking distance before Amory could back his horse out of the bushes and take his seat in the buggy. He stood holding the reins in his left hand, which also supported the young girl upon the seat. His right hand clasped the stone in the pocket of his overcoat. He could just see the outlines of the man's figure as he stood in the shadow of the pines. The right hind wheel of the buggy was between them.

"Halt!" shouted Barnes. "Give up that gal or I fire!"

The hand flew from the pocket; the stone whistled through the air; there was a flash, a shriek; the minister sprang into the buggy, and the sparks flew out of the cold rocks along the wood-road as the frightened bay sped homeward. The figure that lay across his lap, hidden by the robe, moaned and shivered, but never once replied to his repeated assurances of safety. When he reached the highway Amory raised the cover of the buggy but did not check the speed of the excited horse until the wheels rattled up the entrance to his own barn. Then he sprang out, looked carefully around, and, taking the girl in his arms, he bore her into the house. As he laid her upon the lounge in the cosy sitting-room his wife saw that his hands were stained with blood. As he stood looking at the ominous stain she sprang forward, and, lifting the bowed head, they gazed into the thin, pinched face, now bloodless and pallid, of Amy Hargrove.

"Why, husband!" cried the wife, "this is not Hilda! What does it all mean?"

"I—I—don't—know!" said the minister in amazement. Nor did it matter. A physician who was soon called pronounced the wound dangerous, and prescribed silence, darkness and the strictest care. The bullet of the slave-catcher had just missed the heart of the informer.

Ten o'clock brought the southward train and the full moon. Other strangers came likewise to Bloomingdale. The battered sign that hung at the door of the unpretentious inn creaked on its hinges in surprise as they passed beneath it. The rooms were full for once, and the smiling landlord thought to himself, as he looked over his register, that a fugitive slave was almost as good for an inn-keeper as a circus. Two of the newcomers were evidently officials. They had that unmistakable uniform of self-importance that leads one to consider whether life would be worth living should reform at length fix the limits of life as the measure of official tenure. They inquired for Mr. Eighmie, and when told that he was not in looked knowingly at each other.

They were the United States marshal for the district and his deputy. They had a warrant under the broad seal of the District Court running in the name of the Chief Justice of the United States, commanding them to take the body of a certain slave-girl Hilda, otherwise known as Hilda Hargrove. They evidently understood the situation, or thought they did, for after some refreshment they started out on foot toward the seminary. A young man had taken the same direction a few minutes before. He turned off into the wood-road; they advanced straight on, and, turning into the grounds, walked up the avenue to the house. Just as they reached it they met Marsden and Eighmie. There was a hurried consultation, not altogether pleasing to the officer of the law as it seemed. After a moment he said angrily:

"So it seems, gentlemen, that instead of waiting for the assistance of the law you have attempted an abduction and been roughly handled."

"We found the girl was about to escape, sir," said Marsden.

"Very likely," said the marshal, incredulously.

"Oh, but we did, sir!" said Eighmie seriously.

"Well, even if you did, it is no excuse for your violation of the law. I can have nothing to do with it."

"But the girl, sir," said Eighmie, "and the rascals who set upon us?"

"I understand you took the girl out of the house, and she was then taken from you?"

"Yes; and there was a shot fired, and we believe Barnes must have been killed."

"Very likely. People who will insist on being kidnappers must expect to get their necks broken. I will have nothing to do with it. There is no use of disturbing the seminary people any more. Indeed, you have disturbed them too much now for your own good. I should advise you, gentlemen, to make yourselves scarce before morning."

"Just what I've been telling him," said Marsden quickly, "but he won't take any advice."

"I will not go until I know the fate of Barnes," said Eighmie stubbornly. "I may have acted imprudently. If I have violated the law, I am ready to suffer for it; but I will not desert a man who shared the danger at my request."

"Help! Murder! Help!" came from the wood-road as he spoke.

They all ran quickly in the direction of the sound. In the middle of the lane, by the little clump of evergreens near which the minister's horse had stood, a man was kneeling and supporting on his arm the head of another. The moon was shining full upon the face of the prostrate man. They scrambled over the wall, the marshal and his deputy ahead, the others following.

"Barnes!" said Marsden, as soon as he caught sight of the face. He knelt down and put a hand upon his breast. "Dead!"

The man who was supporting the other had no hat. His face was pale, and his teeth chattered as he looked from one to another of the observers.

"What does it mean?" he asked.

"It means murder, young man—that's what it means!" said Eighmie excitedly.

"Murder?"

"Yes, murder."

"Who could have done it?"

"You were the first that found it out it seems," said Marsden, with a sneer.

"I?"

"Yes, you!"

"But I know nothing about it. I stumbled over him as I came along just now."

"Just now?" said Marsden, still sneering. "This is a pretty time of night for a stroll, ain't it?"

The young man laid the dead man's head carefully upon the ground, and, rising, folded his arms, and said with dignity:

"Gentlemen, if any one has any suspicion of me, I am willing to answer to the law; but I will not endure such remarks from any but an officer of the law."

"You are right, too," said the marshal. "I am an officer—the United States marshal. When did you find this body?"

"Just a moment ago."

"What were you doing here at this hour?"

The young man's face flushed, and he stammered as he tried to answer.

"Tell the truth," said the marshal, "or do not speak at all. Where is your hat?"

"I don't know," he answered confusedly. "It must have fallen off when I stumbled."

"Quite likely," said Marsden, with a sneer. "Perhaps this is it?"

He drew a crushed and battered hat from under his knee beside the dead man as he spoke. The other assented silently by taking it, brushing off the dust and striving to restore it to its original shape. It was sodden on one side. His hand was moistened as he brushed, and he carelessly wiped it against his sleeve.

The marshal watched him keenly.

"What is your name?" he asked.

"Martin Kortright."

"That is he," said Eighmie excitedly. "I knew he was one of her friends. He did it, you may be sure. He's her lover, sir."

"Hers—whose?"

"Hilda's—the girl we're after—the one we had when we were attacked."

"What of her? Where is she? What do you mean?" said Martin, striding over the prostrate form and clutching the arm of Eighmie.

"Stand off!" said Eighmie. "Stand off! Oh, you know where she is! And you know about this, too," pointing to the body of Barnes. "Why don't you arrest him, Mr. Marshal? Are you going to let him escape?"

"I am sorry to say I must arrest both him and you, gentlemen. This is a matter for the state courts; but, as a felony has been committed, if not two, I must take you into custody and deliver you to the state authorities. Come."

As he turned there was a rush into the undergrowth at the road-side, and Marsden fled up the mountain-side.

"Never mind," said the officer to his deputy, "we will hold these two. The fool thinks he can get away, but he hasn't a ghost of a chance."

He laid his hand on Martin's shoulder as he spoke, and the deputy in like manner took hold of Eighmie.

"You need not hold me," said Eighmie. "I will go wherever you wish."

"So will I," said Martin.

"Come on then, gentlemen," said the marshal; "but let us see if this poor fellow is really dead. Take hold, and let us carry him to the seminary."

The officers and their prisoners bore the inanimate form carefully around to the front of the building, and laid him down upon the broad, white steps just as a carriage drove up, and the mistress of Beechwood alighted.

A Statistical Criticism.

THIS is the age of statistics. It is also the age for pitching into the novelist, Henry James. The statistical may not be the most finished form of criticism, but there are times when it reveals truths which would otherwise remain hidden. Let us apply the process to the famous little story, "Daisy Miller." The reader will have observed that the young lady of this name is addicted to the use of the conjectural expression, "I guess." Upon her first introduction she uses these words at least once upon every page of the book, and these pages are exceedingly small. In her first conversation the phrase occurs seven times. But as the story advances, she gradually abandons this form of speech, so that in part second of the volume it occurs but twice.

This little census affords us the key to Mr. James' literary construction. Desiring to sketch a representative American girl, he found himself in lamentable ignorance of that class of people, owing to the fact that he had lived so long abroad. In this emergency he drew upon the English book of travels for the desired information. We have all seen the Englishman's record of his observations in the United States. It is in two volumes. The first of these is devoted to the country at large; the second to Utah and the Mormon religion. In the first volume Mr. James found what he wanted—a description of the American people. The American, says the Englishman, is known by a nasal twang, a profuse expectoration, a habit of resting his feet on the table, a passion for pie, and the use of the shibboleth, "I guess." To the credit of Mr. James be it said, that he chose the least unlady-like of these characteristics as an endowment for his heroine; and having, by its frequent repetition at the opening of the story, duly impressed us with the fact that the girl was undeniably American, he kindly spared us the infliction in the subsequent portion. The reader may have also noticed that Daisy Miller's mother, from whom she learned her language, and her younger brother, whose vocabulary might easily have been corrupted by her example, are not guilty of guessing; it was not necessary, since the author did not intend that they should stand out as types of the American.

Perhaps it is improper, as a matter of language, to guess; perhaps it is vulgar; perhaps it is even immoral; but, without discussing these momentous questions, let us, as statisticians, discover if it is as common among us as English authors and their imitators would make it appear. Let the reader note for several days the conversation which goes on around him in the mixed society into which he may be thrown; if his luck be not different from that of the writer he will hear the offensive expression, on an average, about twice in three days. If, therefore, there is anything improper in guessing, the American woman has new grounds of slander for proceeding against Mr. James.

Mr. Howells, in his celebrated remarks upon Mr. James, makes one quotation from the latter's writings. It is from the "Pension Beaurepas." Let us quote the quotation, with so much of Mr. Howells' notes as naturally cling thereto:

"These are my ideas," says his (Valentin Belgarde's) sister-in-law, at the end of a number of inanities. 'Ah, you call them ideas,' he returns, which is delicious, and makes you love him."

We do not have to ransack our memories very deeply in order to find a parallel to these words—so close a parallel, indeed, that there seems to be imitation somewhere. Said Falstaff to Poins in the olden time, "Call you that backing? A plague upon such backing!" Would Mr Howells think of calling these words delicious? Evidently not, as they were spoken in Falstaff's bluff, hearty, earnest manner, which, if you are a modern dilettante, does not "make you love him." The deliciousness of Valentin Belgarde's gentle sarcasm lies in the preliminary "Ah!" the implied drawl and the superciliously benevolent smile which, it is safe to infer, accompanied this speech. Without doubt, also, the speaker added to the effect by twiddling his thumbs, crossing his legs, lifting his eyes to the ceiling, or performing some other act of posturing which, in the new style of novel, is supposed to be so pregnant with meaning.

The "Ah," whether preliminary or interjectional, is rarely found in the American language. The American, like the Frenchman, says "Well," when he hesitates. "Ah" is English. Those who ought to know say that the Englishman, in the intercourse of the drawing-room and other places where refinement prevails, is constantly catching himself on the verge of using some dreadful slang of the club or the stable, and supports himself with an "Ah" until he can think of something proper to say. At any rate, it is not an Americanism, and yet, in the conversation of the three or four Americans in Mr. James' little book called "Confidence," there are—blessed be statistics for the straightforward story they tell!—seventy-five sentences introduced by this unnecessary monosyllable. Captain Lovelock, the Englishman of the book, does not use the word; he says "Gad!" "By Jove!" and other mild oaths from the cigarette-smoker's vocabulary. But our countrymen out-Herod Herod. "Ah, we'll all go," says one. "Ah, my dear Gordon," Longueville "murmurs." "Ah, my dear fellow, you are ridiculous," says another. Nothing could be more unnatural than such speeches as these. They are debilitating to the reader. Doubtless there are foolish Americans in Europe—and perhaps in New York—who affect the "Ah," but fortunately they are rare, and are not representative by any means. There are communities in the United States where a man would be mobbed without delay for saying "Ah, my dear fellow!" Nor does the able-bodied American "murmur" to his comrade as a rule. Brooks murmur, and lovers murmur, but the American tourist is of sterner stuff, and does not murmur, except over a slow train or an exorbitant bill. If Mr. James wishes to establish a reputation for drawing character true to life, he should stop the printing of his "Confidence" immediately. When the Englishman misrepresents us, we can forgive him, and, pardoning much to international jealousy, ignorance, and foreign ideas of what constitutes fun, we can even laugh at his burlesque of us. Thus we find great amusement in the characters of Senator Goto-bed, Jefferson Brick and Mrs. Henry V. Clams. But when a man who is almost an American produces an overdrawn caricature of the American girl, and makes her stalwart brother murmur, "Ah, my dear fellow!" there is righteous cause for indignation.

SOMEWHERE in these United States there is a fortunate young artist waiting to have the sum of three thousand dollars placed to his or her credit on the books of Harper & Brothers, in New York. The said sum will be subject to the order of the artist in question, as it may be needed for the prosecution of artistic studies at home and abroad during a period suitable for the expenditure of the sum named. The sole conditions are that the artist must be under twenty-five years of age, must be an American, and must take for the subject of the drawing offered in competition the Christmas hymn of Alfred Domett, a printed copy of which will be sent on application to the Messrs. Harper. This generous offer was made, with full particulars, in Harpers' Weekly for March 17, and no doubt many a deft pencil is already at work making studies for the tempting prize. It is rather appalling, when one thinks of the amount of human vitality that will be set at work by this proposition, and how much of it must of necessity result in the bitterness of disappointment. What weary hours of toil and thought will be spent by hundreds of young and hopeful aspirants for fame! None of it will be wasted, however; the practice will all go to the benefit even of those who have not a chance to win. It is to be hoped that the victor in this honorable strife will be every way worthy of the coming triumph. It would be pleasant to have the good fortune fall to the lot of some one whose artistic life must otherwise be an uphill struggle. Fortune, however, cannot be trusted to make such an equitable arrangement, and just as likely as not the prize will go to one who needs it least of all. It is too much to hope that should such be the case the fortunate winner will magnanimously pay the sum over to a brother or sister artist who is less favored of fortune.

THE penning of the foregoing paragraph recalls a very clever exposition which appeared in the Atlantic Monthly a year or two ago, setting forth a grievous lack of the English language in the matter of pronouns. The paragraph in question is an instance in point. How much simpler it would have been could the competing artists have been referred to in one word, instead of by the awkward phrase "he and she," "him and her," "his and hers," etc. Every writer of English is frequently confronted by this dreadful dilemma, which always arises when (alas, here it is even now!) he or she wishes to circumvent a possible complication of the sexes. Suppose, for instance, that the pronoun who, with its natural modifications, were adopted to meet the exigencies of the case. It would not take us long to become accustomed to hear the minister say at the close of an appeal for a generous contribution: "I hope each member of the congregation will give liberally according to whose several ability." The teacher in a co-educational establishment will not be liable to stumble after this manner, after the new pronoun has won popular favor: "Let each scholar put away their books—that is to say, his or her books—and leave the room quietly." He will substitute "whose" for "their," and all the he's and she's will go on their way rejoicing. In the eye of the law, of course, "his" and "their" include both sexes, irrespective of race, color, or previous condition, but in the colloquies of everyday life a new combination pronoun is required, and the sooner the philologists come to the rescue the better it will be for all concerned.

ONCE more the American woman abroad finds place on the dissecting-table, and Mr. Henry James, graceful, self-possessed and more than master of the situation, uses his scalpel with his accustomed directness and his accustomed success.¹ It is another bit of morbid anatomy that he serves up to us, however, and not even his delicate touch and airy style can make it anything but morbid anatomy. Mr. George W. Curtis, in the "Easy Chair" of Harpers' Magazine for April, speaks, with all his peculiar grace and courtesy, a word in defense of both Mr. James and Mr. Howells, who find various indignant American critics arrayed against them. "The Europeanized American," he declares, "in whatever form he may be viewed, is as distinctive an American figure, and as legitimate a study for the satirist, the novelist or the philosopher as Billy Bowlegs, or Leatherstocking, or a party boss." Certainly, no one will contest the right, but every one may question if the analysis has not gone far enough. Vivisection undoubtedly serves certain scientific ends, and results in the benefit of the race in general; but when a point is proved, the experiment ceases to have interest or justification, and if the operator persists not only in probing and cutting, but in salting the wound as well, disgust takes the place of toleration.

In "The Siege of London," first printed as a serial story in a popular English magazine, the type is in some points a new one, and sufficiently amusing to reward the reader for the time spent: it is a Mrs. Nancy Headway, a Western woman of many marriages and many divorces, handsome enough to attract all men, and with skill enough to veneer easily when brought into contact with the right surfaces. She is good natured and kindly, too, and avows openly that she wants and will have a chance to be "respectable." Her marital experiments have been always a search for something better, and the best at last appears in the shape of an infatuated young Englishman, Sir Arthur Demesne, to whom she has told as much of her story as he can be made to understand, and who values her brightness and beauty sufficiently to ignore all that he cannot. In fact, he regards a succession of sudden marriages and more sudden divorces as an American trait—a national peculiarity—and Mr. James, as a whole, encourages the belief, and sighs his own pensive regret at the tendency. Sir Arthur's mother, to whom the story has not been told, scents some mystery, and appeals in all directions for confirmation of her suspicions. Waterville and Littlemore are two representative Americans, in whom culture has wiped out all natural instincts of genuine delicacy or honor, and whose perceptions are not keen enough to make them know respectability from its opposite. They posture through the various scenes, Littlemore, the elder, whose fortune is the result of a lucky game of poker—as is the supposed case with all cultured and desirable Americans—finally telling the unfortunate Nancy Headway's secret, too late to be of use, but early enough for infinite harm. He is right, of course, in asserting that she has no place in a decorous English household; and, pity her as the reader will, the skillfully-drawn portrait gives fullest evidence that she was not a naturally good and delicate woman, trying to get back to the place she should have been born to; but an inherently coarse woman, trying to steal a place she could not honor. But the whole thing is depressing—even humiliating—and in the two sketches that fill up the remainder of the volume, "The Pension Beaurepas" and "The Point of View," there is nothing to alter the impression. It may be very real life, but it is the life of a vacuum. Not an honest heart-throb, not one drop of generous blood makes itself felt. Mr. James has never, since his "Passionate Pilgrim," made man or woman wholly worth loving, unless, indeed, we may except Isabel in "The Portrait of a Lady;" and it is certain that whatever his art may represent, it has no fellowship with the noblest and deepest facts of life. Till some gleam of spirituality is added he must remain artist, but can never become creator.

(1) THE SIEGE OF LONDON, AND THE PENSION BEAUREPAS. By Henry James. 12mo, pp. 299, $1.50. James R. Osgood & Co., Boston.

MACMILLAN & Co. are soon to issue an edition of the "Essays of Elia," edited by the Rev. Alfred Ainger.

SWEDEN is to have a series of translations of English novels, the first being Mr. Anstey's burlesque tale, "Vice Versa," which will soon be issued at Stockholm.

THE next Round Robin novel is to be called "Fanchette," and introduces the American rajah of an East Indian province, a Russian Nihilist prince, a Buddhist priest and a French actress.

DR. RITTER's book on "Music in England and America," is soon to be brought out by Charles Scribner's Sons, who will also issue the late Sidney Lanier's lectures on the English novel in book form.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS are to publish in this country Renan's "Recollections of My Childhood and Youth." Both the Roman Catholic Church and the priests are said to be treated in it with entire respect.

A DESCRIPTIVE illustrated catalogue has become a part of the advertising system of every large seed house, there being an apparent rivalry as to neatness of make-up. Elwanger & Barry, of Rochester, have issued a very attractive one, and Alfred Bridgman, of New York, is also in the field.

A ROMANCE written by Kong Ming twenty-two hundred years ago, "The Fan Yong, or the Royal Slave," is to be translated into English by Wong Ching Foo, editor of The Chinese American. The novel is a popular historical one, and Kong Ming's style is said to greatly resemble that of Victor Hugo.

A COMICAL little play, forming No. 1 of a series for amateur performance, has been received from C. B. Vaux, of No. 27 Rose Street, New York. It is entitled "Rebecca and Rowena; or, the Triumph of Israel," and is based on Thackeray's "Sequel to Ivanhoe." No. 2 of the series will be entitled "Royalty at Home; or, Henry VIII's Four o'clock Tea." (25 cents).

PRINCE BISMARCK has dropped butchering and taken up general philanthropy, having lately sent an earnest letter to the officer of a German anti-vivisection society, in which he says that were he not so overburdened with other business he would use all his influence for the passage of a law imposing upon every person convicted of vivisection a fine so heavy that he would be likely never to repeat the offense.

THE second number of The Art Student, which appeared in December, and which is to be issued twice a year, is fully as attractive as the first. It is designed as a record of progress, and the number contains various figure studies, all from the life, and reproduced by a new process. The sketches are full of life and vigor, and there is a very pleasant impression of hard work, and of very positive growth of the art feeling, which augurs well for future work from the same sources.

THIRTY years and more have passed since the first appearance of the "Widow Bedott Papers," but they are still the source of many of the humorous dialect studies that have taken their place. A new and cheap edition lately issued by A. C. Armstrong & Son, puts them once more within the reach of all, and time in this case has detracted nothing from the interest and value of the sketches, which are as laughter-provoking to-day as in their first appearance. (12mo, pp. 403, $1.25).

IN its issue for March 31, The Critic made a valuable and interesting contribution to the literary history of Washington Irving, in view of the one hundredth anniversary of his birth, which fell on Tuesday, April 3. Mr. George William Curtis contributes a paper on Irving's "Knickerbocker," Mr. S. H. Gay on his character as a historian, Dr. Holmes and Charles Dudley Warner touch upon the humorous side of his works, and Mr. Edmund W. Gosse offers an essay on his life in England.

"ILLUSTRIOUS SHOEMAKERS" afford a theme for W. E. Winks, who has made a book on the subject. Fifty shoemakers, or thereabout, are enumerated as illustrious, and of these more than half achieved fame through the medium of their pens. It will be something of a surprise to most readers to find Noah Webster, John G. Whittier, Roger Sherman and Henry Wilson named among American shoemakers. Among the foreigners are William Gifford, Hans Sachs, Richard Savage and John Kitto.

THE English "Society for the Suppression of Blasphemous Literature" makes the following rather astounding announcement: "We propose to get up cases, as our funds will allow, against Professor Huxley, Dr. Tyndall, Herbert Spencer, Swinburne, the author of 'Supernatural Religion,' the publishers of Mill's works, the publishers of Strauss' works, Leslie Stephen, John Morley, the editor of The Jewish World, Dr. Martineau and others who, by their writings, have sown widespread unbelief, and, in some cases, rank atheism, in cultivated families."

THE author of "John Inglesant" has an article in the current number of Macmillan's Magazine on "The Humorous in Literature," in which he speaks of Washington Irving as perhaps the most genuine humorist that ever lived. "The charm of humor," says Mr. Shorthouse, "consists not merely in laughter, or even in joy, but in the stirring of those sympathies and associations which exist invariably in the race, for we inherit a world-life and a religion, the earth's springs of whose realities lie, perchance, too deep for laughter, but not, Heaven be thanked, too deep for tears."

ROSE PORTER's sensitive and delicate touch has lost none of its early qualities or grace, and anything new from her pen is sure of welcome from many readers. Her standpoint is that of quiet observer, and while her books hold little of the hearty and joyous side of life, they are full of spiritual insight. In "Our Saints: a Family Story" it is the soul-life of the brothers and sisters that is given, and the only fault to be found is in the over-analysis of spiritual phases. These "saints and their bodies" are too far apart, and a little more earthliness would make them more real; but in purity of tone and a fine literary quality there is nothing to ask. (12mo, pp. 264, $1.25; A. D. F. Randolph, New York).

SPECULATION will go on, no matter how conclusively a question may seem to be settled, and thus one need feel no surprise at the title of a book lately issued by Fowler & Wells—"A New Theory of the Origin of Species," by Mr. Benjamin G. Ferris. Mr. Ferris has written a thoughtful and well-considered argument against the theories of development held by Darwin and his school. He accepts evolution in a general sense, but insists that "creation as it goes on under our observation is by the ordinary process. From this we are able to evolve not merely the general, but the invariable rule that every living organism, within historic times, has required a receptacle or matrix for its conception, gradual development and final birth. Surely from what we thus see we should be able to find a general law for the production of new species. If species are reproduced by this ordinary process, then it is fair to conclude that they must have originated, not by an unusual birth, but by an extraordinary generation, and herein I apprehend may be found the key to the whole mystery." He claims that this extraordinary generation is brought about by a fresh "influx of life" from the Creator, "whenever, in the orderly progress of changing circumstances, a new species becomes necessary;" and his argument will be accepted by many who would reconcile biological science with belief in an over-ruling Providence. (12mo, pp. 278, $1.50; Fowler & Wells, New York).

In the preface to Mr. Sala's new volume, "America Revisited," he makes very open confession of certain past offenses. "When I first went to the United States," he writes, "in the year 1863, I was, comparatively speaking, a young man—very prejudiced, very conceited, and a great deal more ignorant and presumptuous than (I hope) I am now. When I landed in America, the country was convulsed by one of the most terrific internecine struggles that history has known. I took, politically, the wrong side—that is to say, I was an ardent sympathizer with the South in her struggle against the North. In so taking a side, I was neither logical nor worldly wise—in short, I approved myself to be what is commonly called a fool; but my partiality for 'Dixie's Land' was simply and solely due to a sentimental feeling; and at thirty-four years of age it is permissible to possess some slight modicum of sentimentality. My heart was with the South, because I came, on my mother's side, of a West Indian family—and a slave-owning family ruined by the abolition of slavery in the British colonies; and although I know perfectly well that I was altogether wrong in what I wrote politically concerning 'America in the Midst of War,' my heart is still in the South, with her gallant sons and her beautiful daughters; and the song of 'Maryland, my Maryland' yet stirs that heart like a drum, and will not so cease to stir it, I hope, until it ceases to beat for good and all."

THE many who have enjoyed the brilliant work of De Amicis in the various translations issued by G. P. Putnam's Sons, will need no recommendation to read this latest book, "Military Life in Italy." "Latest" applies, however, only to the order of issue, its composition having preceded that of the travels. It is the record of the author's own military experience, lived through in his early manhood; but the same quick observation and humor, keen insight and sympathy are as noticeable here as in the later work. There are many strongly dramatic situations, the sketch entitled "Carmela" being not only dramatic, but full of pathos, the story being told with a simplicity that distinguishes De Amicis, who instinctively avoids the melodramatic element a Frenchman would have been likely to infuse. In the preface De Amicis gives the motive of the volume, in speaking of one of the sketches it includes: "A workingman said: 'When I had finished reading it, I would have gladly pressed the hand of the first soldier whom I happened to meet.' A soldier said: 'It is a story full of consolation, which inspires a man with good-will for his duties.' Let the one wish well to the soldier and the other be a soldier from the heart. Should I succeed in obtaining these two results in any of my readers, I should feel well repaid for my pains, and my liveliest and most earnest desire would be fulfilled." (12mo, pp. 440, $2.00).

MISS BRADDON'S school, which has ceased to mean all the objectionableness that the phrase implied fifteen years ago, and which now includes not only highly wrought incident but much real knowledge of life and a style much more finished than of old, has no more charming follower than the author of "Phyllis," "Molly Bawn," and sundry other society novels. That they are a little stagey and improbable, and that everybody's doll is not only stuffed with sawdust but losing it as fast as possible must be taken for granted. Aside from this mournful tendency they are excellent pictures of some phases of English life, and in the present case, "Portia, or 'By Passions Rocked,'" the author's latest venture, shows considerable dramatic power. The scene is laid in an English country house. The hero, Fabian Blount, the nephew of the owner, lies under suspicion, having been accused of forging his uncle's name on a check five years before. Sir Christopher, the uncle, who cannot believe him guilty, has shielded him, and he has the unquestioning loyalty of a pretty sister whose complicated love-affairs are first amusing, then rather tragic, with a final return to the first lover, the only one she has really cared for, but whom she jilted, believing him indifferent to her. Portia is a half cousin, beautiful and cold outwardly, who believes Fabian guilty and who from pride crushes out her growing love for him. He in turn, when finally cleared, will not forget the doubt, and flings away his life in rescuing sailors from a wreck. Portia dies of a broken heart, and the two leave the world almost together. Morbid, pathetic, melodramatic, it is still in many points an unusually well-told story. Among the minor characters, Dicky Browne, though a little too much given to telling old stories, is yet very amusing. (12mo. pp. 299, $1.25. J. B. Lippincott & Co.).

EBERS is more at home on Egyptian soil and in the time of the Pharaohs than in more modern scenes, and his latest novel, "Ein Wort," which has been translated by Mrs. Mary J. Safford, under the title of "A Word, Only a Word," and recently issued in their excellent series of translations, by William S. Gottsberger & Co., is in some points a failure. The historical interest is very perfectly preserved, and there is the sense of absolute accuracy in every detail that makes Ebers' work so satisfactory and valuable. This alone is sufficient to make the book a desirable possession, and there is much picturesque and vigorous description of the life and manners of the time, which is that of the seventeenth century. The word is first given by a scholar and recluse, a Jew, under the ban, who has a Christian wife and whose child becomes in the end the wife of Ulrich, the boy who appears with her in the first chapter; who is educated in part by the Jew, and receives the impression that the knowledge of "one word" will give him success in life. "Art" appears to him the only word holding power enough to sway a life, and he studies painting under a Spanish master, till disappointed in his own capacity in this direction, when he substitutes "power," and becomes a Spanish soldier. At this point the book is extraordinarily vivid, and the campaign in the Netherlands is given almost with a Motley's vigor. Wounded and left for dead after a battle he is found by Ruth and his father, the latter having previously refused to recognize a son who had given his allegiance to the Spaniards, and as he slowly recovers, owns that "love" is the only word that has power for both this world and the next. Ruth is a delicate and beautiful portrait, and the book fails only in making its characters really alive, too much of the feeling of puppets being about them all. (1 vol. 18mo, pp. 348, 75 cents).

(1) THE SIMS ARMS, FROM A TOMBSTONE IN ST. PETER'S CHURCHYARD.

THE RIGHT TO BEAR ARMS.

"UPON his entrée into Boston society the stranger is met with the query, implied if not spoken, 'What do you know?'—into New York society with, 'What are you worth?'—and into Philadelphia society with, 'Who was your grandfather?' " The journalist who let slip from his pen this familiar criticism, epigrammatic if not axiomatic, was something of a cosmopolitan; and that fine old master of sententious Saxon, slightly Americanized, Dr. Holmes, has indulged in a bit of witticism equally as pungent in referring to the Quaker City as "the genealogical centre of the United States." This paper, therefore, while having to do for the most part with Philadelphian crests, is really of very general interest.

Those Philadelphians "to the manner born" who claim the ancestral distinguishment, for the placid burgh of their nativity, by way of explanation and corroboration, cite the fact that, while the intrepid Puritans who landed from the Mayflower at Plymouth Rock had come from the lowlier walks of life, and that while the sturdy Teutons who, under the guidance of the explorer Hudson, disembarked upon Manhattan Island, had also occupied humble estates in the fatherland, yet the Quaker compeers of the founder of Pennsylvania, who in 1682 landed upon these sylvan shores from the Welcome, comprised many men of high position—descendants of English and Scottish sovereigns, relatives of British nobles, representatives of the landed gentry of the Mother Isle, collegians and men of letters. Just how many of these distinguished emigrants had sought America's broad shores to escape hanging, local chronicles magnanimously refuse to disclose. That, however, one of the early members of the Provincial Council had left England because of the provoking existence of a superfluity of wives, and that the daughter of another early councillor—who was also at one time chief magistrate of the province—married a pirate, cannot be authoritatively denied.

A distinctive element of that phase of society popularly known as "aristocracy," whether monarchical or democratic, is heraldry, which, in encyclopedical language, is defined as "the art of arranging and explaining in proper terms all that relates or appertains to the bearing of arms, crests, badges, quarterings and other hereditary marks of honor." As a rule, in European countries and in Great Britain all distinguished families, not only those belonging to the nobility, but to the landed gentry as well, bear distinctive coats-of-arms. This of course is a matter of common knowledge. It may not be as generally known, however, that during the last century, especially prior to the war for Independence, arms were frequently borne by Americans, particularly by Philadelphians and Bostonians, and by the leading families of South Carolina, Virginia and Maryland. Yet such is the fact. For many years subsequent to the war of the Revolution, however, the use of heraldic devices remained in ill favor, everything that savored of royalty being rigorously tabooed. For this Spartan sentiment, however, nature soon provided a reagent in that love of ceremony which wealth and ease are sure to call forth. Within the past half century the ante-bellum custom has been revived in this country to an astonishing extent, until we have become altogether accustomed to the sight, in polite circles, of coats-of-arms and crests upon stationery, plate, furniture, coaches and the like.

(7) PENN.

In favor of this armorial revival it is urged that the custom, if properly understood, is not at all a concomitant or an evidence either of snobbishness or of social exclusiveness. But, it is maintained, heraldry is an invaluable aid to biography and genealogy. Says an

(9) BARTRAM.

American writer, "Arms are worthy of preservation, since they are valuable evidence for the genealogist."

On the other hand it is maintained with equal vigor that the indulgence in heraldic devices evidences a monarchical tendency, altogether out of place among republican institutions; and that, while heraldry may have been an aid to the genealogist in semi-feudal ages, in these days of comprehensive journalism and a super-abundant literature practically there is no need to resort to armory in the making of genealogical investigations; and, farther, that while some American families are undeniably entitled to bear arms, the great majority of those who do bear them are mere usurpers, who audaciously assume the arms of certain English families of the same name, in whose veins flows not a drop of kindred blood; unless, perchance, the two families happen to be, in common, lineal descendants of Noah.

This last objection is unquestionably a tangible and a truthful one. It has been asserted with much positiveness that, of the many Massachusetts families now bearing arms, only eleven have a technical, i. e., an hereditary right to them. To a more or less extent the same thing can be said of Pennsylvania. There are scores of families in Philadelphia to-day whose stationery is gorgeously illuminated with armorial insignia, to which they have no more right than to the castles and estates of the nobility and gentry whose arms they have filched. There is no question but that this is a species of combined robbery and snobbery which is unpleasantly common.

The mode of procedure is as follows: Mr. Michael Patrick McLarry has recently "struck oil"—or a "bonanza." Mr. Michael Patrick McLarry having settled himself in his brown-stone front, and having decked his mansion, his family, and his person with all the approved accoutrements of wealth, wends his way to the Professional Pedigree Preserver and Armorial Artist, and informs that individual that he desires a coat-of-arms, "as foine as innny in the market." The astute and urbane P. P. P. A. A. inquires the customer's name, which is given. He then opens, at the letter M, a massive tome, very nearly as large as the "Philadelphia Directory," known as Burk's "General Armory." He turns the leaves backward and forward, hesitates with some little concern for a moment, and then suddenly exclaims: "Ah, yes! Do you think you are descended from the Mallories, of Mallorie Manor, County Surrey?" "I think so, sorr," replies Mr. Michael Patrick McLarry, with a look and in a tone which give conclusive evidence that he doesn't think anything of the kind; and the ratio of probabilities to possibilities is as a thousand to one that he would have made precisely the same reply if the Molarries, of Molarrie Castle, County Sussex, had been cited, instead of the Mallories, of Mallorie Manor, County Surrey.

This method, however, is by some fastidious individuals deemed to be entirely too vulgar. Their mode of procedure is somewhat more genteel—at least it is more expensive. A trip to Europe, and a visit to the Herald's College, in London, are essential to the carrying out of this more select plan of action. To obtain an assignment of arms it is customary to present a petition to the Earl Marshal, and the applicant is required, nominally, to produce evidence that he can sustain the rank of gentry. The fee for a general search is £2 2s.; for an ordinary search 5s.; and for copying and registering 6s. 6d. for the first, and 5s. for every other generation. The officials are very affable, and the search clerks not critically captious; and the customer carries away with him the arms of his newly-acquired forefathers, which are thereafter cherished with much solicitude—i. e., with emotions somewhat akin to those entertained by the eccentric Major-General in the "Pirates of Penzance," who sits in pensive melancholy in an old chapel, upon his recently-purchased estate, and indulges in that plaintive colloquy which, though familiar, is worth quoting :

(13) CHEW.

(14) LARDNER.

General. Why do I sit here? To escape from the pirates' clutches I described myself as an orphan, and I am no orphan. I came here to humble myself before the tombs of my ancestors, and to implore their pardon for the disgrace I have brought upon them.

Frederick. But you forget, sir. You only bought the property a year ago, and the stucco on your baronial castle is scarcely dry.

General. Frederick, in this chapel are ancestors; you cannot deny that. I don't know whose ancestors they were, but I know whose ancestors they are, and I shudder to think that their descendant by purchase (if I may so describe myself) should have brought disgrace upon what I have no doubt was an unstained escutcheon."

There are, however, in the United States many old families who bear arms, not ostentatiously, but modestly, which have been borne by their ancestors before them for a century and more. As to how these heraldic emblems, individually or as a whole, came to be originally borne the writer declines to express an opinion. That a very large percentage of those whose coats-of-arms are referred to in this sketch are lineal descendants of fine old families belonging to the English, Welsh, Scotch or Irish gentry, and that they, therefore, bear their armorial insignia by right of heredity, the writer is firmly convinced. That, however, some few of them bear their arms without such right cannot be questioned; for no less a personage than the eminent and cultured James Logan, Chief Magistrate of the Province from 1736 to 1738, has left a manuscript—recently published in Keith's "Provincial Council-

Before going farther it may be well to premise a brief statement of the significance attached to the more common of the heraldic lines and symbols.

The "shield," or the leading feature of an armorial coat, is distinguished by certain colors, called "tinctures," which are separated by division lines. The tinctures used in heraldry are metals, colors and furs. They are often expressed in their natural colors, but in drawings and engravings are represented by certain lines and points—an invention of a noted Italian herald, Sylvester Petra-Sancta. The two metals employed are: or, or gold, represented by little dots in a plain field; and argent, or silver, expressed by the shield being entirely white. The five colors used are: azure, or blue, de-resented by lines from the sinister chief (upper left-hand corner) to the dexter base (lower right-hand corner). The furs most frequently employed are: ermine, depicted by a white field with black spots of a peculiar shape; and ermine, indicated by a black field with similarly shaped white spots. These explanations, which are, of course, technical and encyclopedic, are given in order that the reader of this sketch may be made familiar not only with the charges upon the accompanying coats-of-arms, but also with the hereditary tinctures with which these heraldic coats are colored—in a word, that the artists' work may be intelligently examined.

The arms of William Penn, whose father, Vice-Admiral William Penn, was knighted by Charles II, were long borne by members of his family, and are borne to-day by Major Peter Penn-Gaskell Hall, U. S. A., of this city, quartered with those of the Gaskell family (7).

Judge Bushrod Washington, who for many years honored the United States Circuit Court bench at Philadelphia, bore the same arms as did General George Washington, both the general and the judge being descendants, as is supposed, of the Washingtons in the north of England. The same arms are borne to-day by William Herbert Washington, Esq., of the Philadelphia bar (6).

Among other distinguished Philadelphians of early times was Thomas Lloyd, born in 1640, who was the first Chief Magistrate of the Province under Penn. His ancestry can be traced back through "the fair Maid of Kent" to the latter's grandfather, Edward I. Many of Lloyd's descendants, through the female branches, are now living in Philadelphia, who bear the Lloyd arms, impaled with those of Thomas Lloyd's mother, née Elizabeth Stanley. The accompanying illustration is that of a coat-of-arms on an oak panel formerly at Dolobran Hall—the Lloyd estate—Dolobran, County Montgomery, Wales (2).

(35) THE PETERS ARMS IN STUCCO, AT BELMONT.

Dr. Thomas Græme, another early member of the Provincial Council, was also of royal lineage, his ancestor being Sir Thomas Graham (or Græme) who married a daughter of King Robert III of Scotland. None of his descendants are now living in Philadelphia, but the Græme coat-of-arms, as borne by the famous Elizabeth Ferguson, née Græme, his daughter, is given herewith (3).

Robert Assheton, who was likewise a Provincial Councillor early in the last century, descended from Sir John de Assheton, who was made a Knight of the Bath at the coronation of Henry IV. None of Robert Assheton's descendants now reside in Philadelphia; but so long as any members of the family remained they bore the Assheton arms as given above (4).

James Logan, born in 1674, besides being a Provincial Councillor, was Penn's private secretary, Mayor of Philadelphia, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, President of the Council, etc. His coat-of-arms, referred to above, as borne by himself and by his descendants of the present day, and as used by the Loganian Library, is also given herewith (8).

Likewise will be found above the arms of John Dickinson, born in 1732, author of the famous "Farmer's Letters," founder of Dickinson College, and, successively, President of Delaware and of Pennsylvania. His brother, General Philemon Dickinson—both being sons of Judge Samuel Dickinson, of Kent County, Delaware,—bore the same arms (5).

Benjamin Franklin's brother, John Franklin, bore a coat-of-arms, as given above, although it is stated upon very excellent authority that it was borne without right, being of spurious origin. That Benjamin Franklin brought this heraldic insignia with him when he emigrated from Massachusetts is not clear. It is very probable that he did not (36).

Among other distinguished members of the Provincial Council was Thomas Hopkinson. Francis Hopkinson, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence from New Jersey, was a son of his, while a son of the signer, Joseph Hopkinson, was a distinguished judge, and the author of that familiar song, "Hail Columbia." The name is still a reputable one in Philadelphia. The Hopkinson arms are given herewith (38).

Accompanying this sketch will also be found the arms of John Bartram, born in 1701, spoken of by Linnæus as "the greatest natural botanist in the world." His grandfather John Bartram, came from England with Penn, in 1682 (9).

Among other distinguished Philadelphians whose descendants bear their arms, which are given herewith, may be noted the following: Edward Shippen, born in 1639, a member and the president of the Provincial Council, Speaker of the Assembly, and the first Mayor of Philadelphia (10); Thomas Janney, born in

(37) PENINGTON.

1633, for many years an esteemed minister of the Society of Friends, and one of the earliest members of the Provincial Council (12); Benjamin Chew, born in 1722, member of the Council, Attorney-General, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, President of the High Court of Chancery, etc. (13); Dr. Thomas Cadwalader, an eminent physician in his day, who was also a member of the Provincial Council (32); Valentine Hollingsworth, who accompanied Penn in the Welcome, in 1682, and who was a member of the first Assembly in 1683, and one of the first grand jury impanelled in the province (17); Isaac Norris, who came to Philadelphia in 1692, who was President Judge of the Court of Common Pleas, and, for upwards of thirty years, a member of the Provincial Council (20); Charles Willing, born in 1710, twice Mayor of Philadelphia, whose son, Thomas Willing, was the senior partner in the famous firm of Willing & Morris during the Revolution, and president of the first United States Bank (15), and Francis Rawle (18), Anthony Morris (16), Phineas Pemberton (11), Lynford Lardner (14), and James Tilghman (21), who, besides holding other offices of honor, were members of that distinguished body, so often referred to in this sketch, the Provincial Council.

There are still other Philadelphia families who have borne arms since some time in the last century, among them the following: Biddle (28), Powel (22), Gilpin (24), Lenox (25), Allison (26), McCall (23), Penington (37), Williams (19), Boudinot (30), Watmough (29), and Abercrombie (33).

Most of the illustrations given are fac similes or reduced copies of book-plates—that is, engravings of family arms placed upon the inside of the front cover of the books comprising a library, as a distinguishing mark of ownership, for books will be borrowed. Arms were chiefly used upon seals, however, in olden times, when pretty much all correspondence was fastened with sealing-wax, the envelope of the present being a thing not dreamed of. Accompanying will be found copies of the coats-of-arms, taken from the individual seals of five of the early Governors of the province, to wit., Patrick Gordon, 1726-36; James Hamilton, 1748-54, 1759-63; Robert Hunter Morris, 1754-56; William Denny, 1756-59, and John Penn, 1763-71, 1773-76 (27).

Coats-of-arms have long been utilized also upon stationery, silver plate, furniture and family coaches. This latter custom, a common one at the present time, was in vogue so early as the time of the first Isaac Norris, who came to Philadelphia in 1692. From a manuscript now extant, we find that in ordering his carriage he directed his family arms, "three falcon heads," to be quartered upon it.

Armorial coats have also for many years, and indeed for centuries, been made an important element in architecture, in the shape of wood carvings, stone sculptures, and metal castings. Upon the grating covering each of the two lower front windows at the present rooms of the Historical Society, on Spruce Street above Eighth, is an iron casting of the arms of William Penn, the Founder, the appearance of which is indicated by the illustration (7). Coats-of-arms were likewise painted in panels upon the walls of many residences, and, in the form of stucco work, were placed upon the ceilings of family mansions. The arms of the Peters family, in this latter form, can be seen to-day upon the ceiling of one of the lower rooms at Belmont Mansion, in Fairmount Park, formerly the historic residence of Judge Richard Peters, of Revolutionary fame (35).

In early times coats-of-arms were also occasionally cut into gravestones and vault-slabs. At St. Peter's (39) FROM THE WALLACE VAULT AT ST. PETER'S.

Church, Third and Pine Streets, there are two such heraldic devices, one on the Sims slab (1), on the eastern end of the church, and the other on the south side of the Wallace vault, near the Third Street end of the churchyard (39). There can also be found at the present time, in the burial-ground of Christ Church, Fifth and Arch Streets, a number of coats-of-arms cut into old tombstones and vault-coverings; but they present so crumbled an appearance as to be practically illegible (34). An old custom, still much in vogue in Great Britain, was practiced in this country to some extent seventy-five or one hundred years ago. Reference is made to the use of hatchments upon the occasion of the death of some distinguished personage. Hatchments are lozenge-shaped frames charged with a shield-of-arms—a sort of inescutcheon—usually affixed to the front of a house upon the decease of one of its principal inmates, and, upon the day of the funeral, carried to the church and hung upon the wall, or upon some convenient pillar, there to remain for all time. There are but two hatchments positively known to be in existence in America at the present time. One of these, containing the arms of Frederick Smyth, a former Chief Justice of New Jersey, hangs beneath the belfry of Christ Church, where it has remained since 1806. The only other authentic hatchment in this country is one known as the Ralph Izard hatchment, hanging in the quaint Church of St. James, at Goose Creek, S. C. The Izards are related to the Draytons of Philadelphia, formerly a South Carolina family also. They are likewise related by marriage to the Shippens, George Izard, a son of Ralph Izard, having married the relict of Thomas Lee Shippens.

The older we grow as a nation, the more heed we naturally give to matters historical and antiquarian; and as genealogical research lies distinctively within the domain of the historian and paleologist, so the subject of heraldry, which is, according to the argument of the armorial enthusiast, an important adjunct of genealogy, grows upon the attention of the careful student, and, to some extent, of the public as well. There is no doubt but that we have made more or less progress since the benighted days, some years ago, in which an English diplomatist in this country underwent so painful an experience. While in New York he sent his London chariot to a certain coachmaker's, and upon calling shortly afterwards was somewhat astounded at discovering his ancestral shield and crest upon half a dozen Yankee gigs and dog-carts, and having asked for an explanation was informed that "the pattern seemed to be very much admired." We have gotten beyond that stage of blissful ignorance, however, and we may well speculate with Mr. William H. Whitmore ("Elements of Heraldry") as to whether or not, "with this increase of familiarity with the science, we may also expect a more scrupulous attention to its laws, and a decrease of the ridiculous assumptions which have thrown an undeserved stigma upon American Heraldry."

RAND KENNEDY'S WOOING.

BY ELIZABETH OLMIS.

To observe a fine example of contrast, one should walk through the upper end of Duke Street, in the thriving city of Exeter.

Upon the right stand long rows of cheaply finished tenement houses, of a light dust color, with trimmings of imitation brown-stone, thin bay-windows extending from basement to attic, and flights of wooden steps leading to the front doors. Upon the left are the grand old trees of Kennedy Park, extending in an unbroken line for more than half a mile along Duke Street, as far indeed as the river.

Years and years ago the whole country for miles around had been owned by Gilchrist Kennedy, and had formed a portion of his only daughter's marriage dower. Upon her death it had reverted to her brother, and remained in the family ever since. It was for her that the quaint, rambling, roomy old mansion had been built which was to become the cradle of so many Kennedys, and at last the gloomy, cheerless home of the sole survivor of them all.

Rand Kennedy's mother died almost before he was old enough to retain more than a dim memory of her gentle caresses, and he lived for years after alone with his father. When he had grown to manhood they spent a few years abroad, and almost immediately upon their return Rand found himself orphaned by a sudden accident. He found, too, upon examining his father's papers that there had been for years an outstanding debt to a considerable amount against the estate of which he had never dreamed. Himself the soul of honor, and open as the day, he could not help feeling strangely hurt at what seemed to have been a lack of confidence upon the part of the parent he had idolized, and whose loss he mourned almost inconsolably. His family pride was touched too by the thought of obligations so long unfulfilled.

Just at this time, while depressed by his recent bereavement and this unlooked-for burden, he was waited upon by a committee from the City Council and informed of the decision reached by that body to extend Duke Street through to the river. This would cut the Kennedy property nearly in two and bring the street but a few feet from the rear of the mansion, if either side could be so called, when each was equally handsome. The project had been contemplated for some time, but no one had ventured to propose it during the lifetime of the elder Mr. Kennedy. Many expected opposition as it was, and it became a matter of equal surprise and congratulation that Rand so quickly allowed them all they asked, and even more. They hardly knew what to make of the quiet, dignified young gentleman who met their proposition without a protest.

"By Jove!" said one worthy to his companion as they found themselves outside the lonely house; "he can't be a Kennedy in anything but the name. There never was one before who didn't hold this place dear as the apple of his eye, and who wouldn't have cursed us out of our boots for such an errand as ours."

He little dreamed of the suffering concealed beneath Rand's calm demeanor. His home, and the home of his ancestors, a grand old place still, was dearer to him than everything else life held, and a month before he would have believed anything sooner than that he would ever part with an inch of it. But having at once determined to cancel his father's indebtedness to the uttermost farthing, he had discovered that the only way of doing so lay in the sale of a goodly portion of the estate. And herein was to be found the secret of his ready granting of the roadway. A few feet more or less mattered not, and it appeared only a fitting climax to the general upheaval of things he had always regarded as fixed as the eternal hills, that a new, noisy, dusty street should run through the primeval shades of Kennedy Park. But, although the thoroughfare was duly laid out, it was some years before it became more than a country road. Then rows of tall, pale tenement houses sprung up, long stretches of pavement were laid before them, milk-wagons rattled out there before dawn, babies sprawled and bawled upon the wooden steps, hucksters made the air hideous with their yells, and everything was in the most rattling, bustling, spick-and-span contrast to the ancient elegance and dignity of the grand old trees and mansion just over the way.

Meanwhile Rand had grown into a prematurely middle-aged man. Though scarcely more than thirty-five, he had the appearance of fifty, with his thick, long beard, already turning gray, and his silent, forbidding manner. He had never thrown off the depression consequent upon his father's death and the swiftly following events of that fateful spring. In truth, he had made no great efforts to do so. And the years as they passed found him leading a lonely, cheerless, monotonous life. Every morning he went to the office in town, where an unbroken succession of Kennedys had preceded him, and went faithfully through the routine which there devolved upon the head of the family. Invariably punctual and diligent, and not unkind, he often passed days without addressing those about him. At night he walked alone to his home, and spent a solitary evening with his books in the dim old library.

An aged negress, formerly one of the chattels of the place, and her equally aged husband constituted the entire corps of servants. The former never left the dusky recesses of the kitchen Rand had not visited since his boyhood; the latter combined in his dignified and infirm person the valet, the butler, the steward and the devoted worshipper of "Massa Rand."

The old house was fast falling into decay from non-use and negligence. Only three rooms were kept open, and they were cheerless and forlorn. No one ever came there, and for years Rand had crossed the threshold of no other home.

Such was the state of things upon either side of upper Duke Street one wet and dismal November evening. Mr. Kennedy had returned from town rather later than usual, and was still lingering over his last cup of coffee, when a loud peal from the door-bell rang through the house, startling both master and servant from their musings, and re-echoing through the wide old halls long unused to such a sound.

"'Fo' God, Massa Rand," chattered the old negro, not stirring from his place behind Rand's chair, "nuffin' human ain't rung dat do'-bell dat way such a dub'us night as dis is! Don't yer go, honey, don't," he pleaded, his toothless old voice growing strangely tremulous as Rand, humoring the superstitious fear of his aged servitor, had himself arisen to answer the summons. His only reply was to take the lamp from the table and proceed toward the door; and 'Demus, bravely resolving that his beloved master should meet neither man nor spirit alone, followed closely after, rolling his great eyes and quaking in every limb.

It was with some trouble that Rand succeeded in unfastening the bolts. At last they yielded to his efforts, and the door swung open, only to admit a dash of rain and a gust of wind which nearly blew out the light.

"Who's there?" asked Rand, peering forth into the darkness. "Who's there?" he cried in louder tones as no answer came. Still no one replied.

"I dun tol' yer, Massa Rand," whispered 'Demus; "tain't nuffin' dat kin speak wid mouf and tung. Ole 'Demus ain't live all dese yeres fur nuffin'. Come in, honey, out de wet."

But Rand was not yet satisfied. He took a step forward, and his foot struck against something. Looking down, he saw a dark object lying on the porch. Bending lower, he discovered it to be a basket covered with a thick shawl.

"Set it inside out of the rain, 'Demus, and I'll call again for the owner. Some miserable fellow who wants a night's lodging, I suppose."

'Demus obeyed, grumbling audibly, in no wise pleased with the whole matter. But in a moment or two he had the satisfaction of seeing Rand come in from the porch, wet and blown, and close the door behind him.

"It's as dark as Egypt," he said, catching his breath between the words. "Let the basket stay there, 'Demus. Some one will call for it by-and-by, perhaps." And they returned to the dining-room.

An hour or more later, as Rand was comfortably seated in his big leather chair before a rather dim fire in the library, he was again startled by an unusual sound. This time it was not a pealing bell nor any ghostly call, but the unmistakable cry of a baby. And it did not come from any of the houses across the way, where babies grew and multiplied, but from some place very near the amazed and mystified gentleman.

For an instant he listened incredulous; then he sprang to his feet, irresolute; then, as the cries grew louder, and evidently came from the hall, he went quickly thither. There could be no doubt of it—a baby was crying lustily in the old house where no baby had been for thirty-five long years, and Rand by instinct understood that language of imperative demand. Hastily returning for a lamp, and looking vaguely about the shadowy spaces, his eye fell upon the forgotten basket.

A long, low whistle escaped him as he gingerly lifted the noisy burden and deposited it upon the floor before the library fire. Awkwardly throwing back the various wrappings which covered it, he came at length face to face with his uninvited guest, and it would be difficult to tell which of the two regarded the other with the greatest curiosity and wonder. Quite reassured by the evidence that measures were being taken for her relief, Miss Baby had ceased her cries and lay calmly looking up at her new-found friend with the brightest of blue eyes. Presently there was a dimpling of the round cheeks, upon which the tears were not yet dry, and the rosy lips curved into a confident smile as she stretched out her arms with the mute invitation, "Take me."

But Rand was not yet prepared to extend hospitalities so far as that. He had never, to his recollection, held a baby in his arms, and knew about as much of their ways and wants as he did of the habits of young penguins.

Slowly the bright expression faded; this time the lips curved sorrowfully, and the blue eyes were overflowed again. And very soon, finding that her neglectful attendant was not to be moved by pathos, the wee damsel brought temper to bear upon the vexed question, and long and loud were the screams, which at last aroused Rand from his contemplation of infantile beauty, and brought him to his feet.

Acting upon the principles of homeopathy, in which he was a firm believer, he seized the poker and tongs and beat a lively tattoo upon the coal-scuttle. This produced a temporary lull, but baby soon discovered that she was still upon her back, and began again more vehemently than ever.

Then a bright idea occurred to him.

"That basket is too small," he reasoned with an air of conviction. "No wonder the child cries."

So he took hold of the basket and proceeded to roll Miss Baby out. It was not until he succeeded and she lay, silent for the moment with astonishment at this new experience, in a queerly tumbled heap upon the floor, that he remembered how hard and uncomfortable such a bed might be. And the young lady herself seemed to think of it at the same moment, judging from the decided way in which she gave vent to her feelings. His next move was to pick her up very hesitatingly and at arms' length, and set her up in his arm-chair. But that being covered with very smooth leather, and baby having no strength to speak of in her back, she immediately slipped down, and would probably have prevented the finishing of this narrative by the breaking of her neck if Rand had not caught her just in time.

For a minute or two he held her by her clothes, and gazed at her helplessly over the top of his gold-bowed spectacles. Could it be possible that this kicking, squirming, screaming, scarlet bit of humanity was the same innocent, lovely little creature who had looked up at him so smilingly but a short time before?

And, still more startling question, could it be that he, a man in his prime, fairly well endowed with good sense and ability, was puzzled out of his wits to know what to do with a specimen of flesh and blood that he could crush with his hand? Rand was fond of philosophizing in his own way, and the present problem seemed an interesting one, both from its novelty and its importance, too. But he soon decided that it were wiser to discuss it at some future time. The query of the moment was: "How shall I stop this infernal racket?"

He dropped the baby, face downward, in the basket, put his hands over his ears and tried to think. Strange to say, it never occurred to him to rouse old Aunt Cleo. Indeed, nothing seemed to occur to him. He sat in despair, half deafened by the still continuing cries. Then he grew excited. The perspiration stood upon his forehead. He pulled out his handkerchief to wipe away the drops.

"Eureka!" he cried, as a crumpled paper fell to the floor, and he recognized it as an advertisement a boy had handed him, which he had read and mechanically placed in his pocket. It was a notice of a lecture to be given in a day or two for the benefit of a new foundling's hospital about to be erected, and upon it—happy chance—were the names and addresses of some of the prospective lady directors and physicians. He looked them over in eager haste. Here at last was a loophole of escape, and he drew a long breath of relief as his eyes fell upon the following:

"MISS BERTHA ADAMS, 1425 Upper Duke Street."

"Who would ever have believed such good fortune could come from one of those miserable houses?" he said aloud, throwing down the paper, and picking up "baby and cradle and all." To decide was to act in this case, and he was soon splashing his way across the street in the darkness and rain.

By the aid of the flickering gaslight he made out the right number, and gave a vigorous pull at the door-bell. The summons was answered almost immediately by a gentleman in hat and ulster, followed by a lady enveloped in rubber waterproof, with a veil tied closely over her hat. They were evidently upon the point of leaving the house as Rand ascended the steps.

"I wish," he began, "to see Miss Bertha Adams, the lady who has—who is—who—who knows about babies."

The sentence was ended hurriedly, and it cannot be denied that the dignified representative of the ancient and honorable line of Kennedy felt as guilty and confused as he looked while making his errand known.

"Sir?" the gentleman replied somewhat sternly, bending a keen gaze upon his visitor and half shutting the door.

This significant action roused Rand from his embarrassment, but before he could explain farther, a series of muffled sobs and cries were heard from the depths of the basket upon his arm. They increased in volume with such rapidity that the lady who had up to this time remained a quiet looker-on, rushed forward, saying quickly:

"Where is it? Give it to me."

Without a word, Rand deposited the basket at her feet. He never forgot the single upward glance of mingled indignation and dismay which she gave him as she pulled away the shawl and discovered the poor, struggling, half-smothered child, flat upon its face. In another instant it was lying in her arms and being soothed and comforted in a way entirely acceptable to her small ladyship, and which seemed nothing short of magic to its nurse of an hour before. From very exhaustion the child fell asleep, and then the gentleman turned toward Rand as if for some farther remarks on his part, and in a few words the whole story was made known.

"How very unfortunate," said Miss Adams, for it was really she, when Rand had finished, "that everything has just been moved out of the house. The last load has been gone but a few minutes, and we were about leaving as you came."

"And we shall miss the train if we wait any longer," remarked her brother significantly, eyeing the baby and Rand, too, with no favor. "Come, Bertha!"

"We were going out of town, you see," she explained in a frank, straightforward way. "I am almost a stranger here, and I do not even know where my landlady has moved to; and one couldn't take a baby out in this storm. It is hard to decide just what can be done with her."

By this time Rand had so far recovered his self-possession as to hand his card to Mr. Adams, and that gentleman's grim countenance relaxed visibly at sight of the well-known and honored name.

"Perhaps, as Mr. Kennedy lives so near," he suggested, more courteously than he had yet spoken, "we might go over, and you could fix the—it, somewhere, and then it would give no more trouble, and to-morrow it will be easy enough to find an asylum."

"Oh, if you would be so kind!" cried Rand beseechingly, once more rescued from the brink of despair at the thought of being left with the child upon his hands again.

It was not until baby was well wrapped up, the house-door locked and the muddy street re-crossed that Rand bethought himself of his position as host. In his delight at being relieved from his troublesome charge, he had quite forgotten the fact of his aversion to other companionship than his own meditations. However, there was little time for reflection. They reached the gate, and his guests followed him with uncertain steps along the stone walk which led to the mansion. Here they found the outer door wide open and the hall flooded. In his haste Rand had forgotten to close it, and the rain had been pouring in. Then the library fire had burned low, and, to add to the general discomfort, the innocent cause of all this extraordinary commotion awoke from her nap, and announced in unmistakable tones that she was hungry.

"The poor child must be half-starved," said Miss Bertha compassionately. "Mr. Kennedy, will you please bring some milk and sugar and water?"

Had she asked him to produce the sacred cow of India, Rand could hardly have been more at a loss what to do. But there was a goodly supply of pluck under his mild, elderly exterior; moreover, something in the quiet, pleasant, decided tones compelled obedience to their requests. So, after a moment's indecision, he picked up the lantern, and left the room quite as if it had been his nightly task for years to fix baby's milk.

"Well, Bertha," remarked Mr. Adams, after a silent survey of the musty old library, "your love of the antique seems in a fair way to be gratified. Everything appears to have come down from Methuselah—not excepting the queer old cove himself."

"Hush, George," said Miss Bertha reprovingly. "He has a kind heart, and—"

"Judging from the remarkable way he stuffed that child into the basket, I think he has myself," interrupted George gravely. "The only thing to be regretted is that it did not succumb to treatment."

"George!" again cried his sister, though she could not help smiling at the remembrance, "you are incorrigible." Then, after a long silence, during which the young man took another journey around the room and baby manifested much impatience at the long delay of her supper, "Do you suppose you could find the kitchen?"

"And leave you here to be carried off by Google" knows what ghosts and goblins? No, thank you. Of the two, I prefer to lose the infant if either must be sacrificed. But starvation is not imminent, my best of sisters. Such vigorous lung powers testify to abundant vitality."

This time Miss Bertha laughed outright, a hearty, sweet little laugh. And she made no more suggestions to her brother, but devoted herself to quieting the baby.

In course of time Rand was heard returning, and an extraordinary appearance he made as Mr. Adams opened the door for him. His clothes were covered with cobwebs and dust, a dozen or more straws stuck at all angles in his hair, and one cheek was ornamented with a long smut mark. That he had been prosecuting his quest under difficulties was evident; but it was also to be seen that he had come off victor, for he carried an immense tin pail, holding about three quarts of milk, and one nearly as large filled with water. These he gravely deposited on the floor at Miss Adams' side, and then produced a small box of sugar from his pocket and laid it on the table.

It required all Bertha's self-control to repress a smile as she glanced at the bountiful supplies and their bearer, particularly as she saw her brother apparently examining a cabinet, but really shaking with laughter.

"Thank you. Now, I shall have to trouble you for a cup and spoon," she said pleasantly, after a minute.

Rand turned to the cabinet, and, after unlocking a few doors and drawers, brought forth a cup of dainty egg-shell china, of veritable baby blue, with a large gilt K delicately traced upon it; also a case of gold-lined spoons with the Kennedy monogram.

"By Jove, Mr. Kennedy!" cried the irrepressible George, drawing near, "you don't do things by halves, do you? That set out is fit for a princess!"

Rand glanced up in surprise.

"It is for my guest," he began with some haughtiness; and then, with a sly twinkle in his eyes and a broader smile than his face had known for years, he added dryly: "One visit to the lower regions is enough."

By this time baby's supper was ready for her, and as she was quite ready for it, the meal was soon dispatched. But she did not go to sleep again, as Bertha had expected. She seemed restless and feverish, and required constant soothing. So an hour passed, and it soon became evident that the little thing was very ill. Once more Rand made an expedition out into the storm to bring a doctor, who pronounced the trouble scarlet fever, aggravated by exposure and the milk to which it was unaccustomed. It was not until the next afternoon that the weather allowed of the baby's being taken to the hospital. Rand accompanied Mr. and Miss Adams and saw that every possible care should be given to the little waif. Then, having expressed anew his obligations and gratitude to both brother and sister, he bade them adieu, and took his way back to his home.

It was not yet twenty-four hours since that ringing peal of the bell had startled him, but it seemed a lifetime almost, so much of new emotion and experience had been crowded in. He could define nor explain nothing; he did not even attempt to philosophize on the matter; he only knew that he seemed to be living in a dream, a pleasant, alluring dream, and he dwelt again and again upon each little incident of the lately passed hours.

In such a mood he reached the house and entered the library. His glance rested upon the deep old rocker which had been brought down from some long unused chamber, and in which Bertha had sat with the child upon her knees; at the screen which she had made of some shawls which had been his mother's; but the memories they awoke in him extended no farther back than that very morning, when Bertha's hands had pinned them there; at the cups and bottles which disordered his writing-table; at the pillows heaped upon the lounge; at the tiny sock which must have been dropped from baby's foot at the last minute. I think the master of Kennedy Park had never before seen just such a looking room, but he made no attempt to arrange it. He put on his dressing-gown and drew his own easy chair nearer the fire, and sat there trying in vain to convince himself that it was not lonely and desolate.

Suddenly his eye fell upon a strange object lying across his sleeve—a long hair of a soft golden brown color. Staid old bachelor that he was, he blushed like a girl as he took it gently in his fingers. Then he fell to remembering how sweet and womanly Bertha had looked, sitting in the deep old chair with the baby in her arms; how gentle and tender she had shown herself to the poor, little forsaken thing; how bright and charming and capable she had been in a thousand little ways. He never knew how long he dreamed there, still holding the brown hair as tenderly as though it could feel his touch, and 'Demus hardly knew whether to be most alarmed or distressed when his master bade him, next morning, leave everything just as it was in the room.

"'Pears like Massa Rand done got right smart 'fobulated wif all dis yer 'motion 'bout dat misabul pore white trash. He ain't nebber ben hisself sence old massa died, do'! Praise de Lord! in his marcy he done spare ole 'Demus to tend on de dear boy—and he need tendin' now fur shore." And the faithful old creature hobbled down to confide to Aunt Cleo his dread suspicions that their beloved "young master" was slowly but surely taking leave of his senses. And "confirmation strong" was not wanting within a week.

Going to call Rand to dinner one evening, 'Demus found him forever disappeared, and in his stead a fine looking gentleman some fifteen years younger in appearance than the late master of the place.

The long straggling beard and the bushy hair were trimmed quite short, the gold-bowed spectacles replaced by eye-glasses which it seemed need not be worn constantly, and so allowed a good view of a pair of keen, kindly, dark gray eyes; the rusty old clothes had been superseded by a quiet, stylish suit. But the greatest change of all, and the one which poor old 'Demus felt most surely, was in the air and bearing of the man himself. He seemed to have awakened from a Rip Van Winkle sleep and to feel once more the youthful blood coursing in his veins. A new interest in life, a consciousness of his own needs, and bright hopes for the future, showed themselves in every movement.

'Demus waited upon Rand in silence, though his heart was full to bursting. But at length the younger man felt something breaking in upon the brightness of his own musings, and looked up quickly to see great tears rolling down the black, wrinkled cheeks beside him. He sprung up in alarm.

"Why, 'Demus," he cried, "are you suffering? What can I do for you?"

'Demus gave a mighty gasp and made a brave effort to control himself. But it was of no use. He broke down utterly, and clasping Rand in his arms as he had done many a time when he was a little fair-haired lad, he sobbed forth all the misery and pity and loving sympathy of his faithful soul.

At first Rand was bewildered and utterly at a loss to comprehend ; but as 'Demus became calmer, and was able to speak more coherently, he came to know the full weight of the burden his devoted old friend had been carrying. His own eyes were dim with tears as he gently disengaged himself, and holding both the hard black hands closely in his own, said affectionately :

"No, dear 'Demus, your 'young massa' has not lost his mind. Think rather that he has found it, and that the long years of darkness and desolation in this home are at an end. For though it may not be for me to win the brightness I covet, thank God I have been awakened from my selfish living, and we shall all be better and happier henceforth I trust."

It was not long after this that Miss Bertha Adams received a call from Rand Kennedy. Of course she was surprised to see him at all, still more so at the change in his appearance, but most of all at his errand ; for Rand was exceedingly straightforward, and so, with manly frankness, and withal a certain chivalrous delicacy, he told her the story of his life, its sudden clouding, its loneliness, its morbid selfishness, and his recent awakening to the need of something nobler and sweeter.

Then, having laid his heart open before her, he begged her to allow him to become her friend, and, if he might, win her for his wife.

It was all so unexpected, so strange, so unlike anything which had occurred in Miss Bertha's quiet life, that she sat quite overwhelmed, unable at first to reply. But that she did so in time may be inferred from the fact that Rand made frequent journeys from home during the next six months, and one lovely September evening he did not return alone.

This all happened several years ago. Kennedy Park is now beautifully kept, and the old house has come to be a happy home. And almost as dearly loved as his own two little ones is the blue-eyed damsel who creeps into Rand's arms when her long play-day is over, and falls asleep there.

"Our Theodora," he sometimes says softly to Bertha as he kisses the dimpled cheek. "Truly she was to me a 'gift of God' which, being accepted, brought all other blessings."

But to 'Demus, loving and faithful still, the old, silent, quiet years seemed best.

HYLAS.

Oh, Hylas ! pretty Hylas, call aloud !

Behold the summer comes ! awake ! awake !

And bid the willow hang her golden lamps,

And crowding alders all their tassels shake !

Spread out the tapestry of bud and flower

Along the arches of the forest old,

And call the sunshine through their swaying leaves

To braid the mossy floor with green and gold !

Unfold the ferns, and bid the larches swing

Their perfumed censers ! Call the swallows home !

In the deep grass for snowdrops white and blue

And saxifrage and violets make room !

Call, oh, my Hylas, call aloud

On all the pretty things that slumber late,

While swiftly fly the birds from o'er the seas !

For lo ! the summer-time is at the gate !

L. A. MILLINGTON.

FIRSTLINGS OF SPRING.

PRETTY golden dandelions,

With your seeds of feather,

Starring all the country-side

In the sunny weather ;

Violets, filled with dewdrops,

Delicate and sweet,

Giving out your fragrance

Underneath our feet ;

Daisies in the meadow,

With your silver frills ;

Roses by the wayside,

Kingcups on the hills ;

Star flowers and innocence ;

Windy, cloud-swept clover ;

Lovely little blossoms

All the wide world over—

When I see you crowding

I know that summer comes ;

Soon, I know, the bird sings,

Soon the wild bee hums.

When I see you blooming,

All a honeyed crew,

Into songs and gladness,

My heart blossoms too !

G. HALL.

Here Cupid hammers out his darts—
His roguish eyes of jet a-twinkle—
And here, from his long slumber, starts
The poor old dreamer, Rip Van Winkle.

And so throughout the varied tale
Of carved groups, and forms and faces
Of man and brute and elfin frail,
From ancient myths and modern races ;

Long pipes and short ones, straight and curved,
High-carved and plain, dark-hued and creamy ;
Slim tubes, for cigarettes reserved,
And stout ones, for Havannas dreamy.

But when you've seen them, turn you here
To this plain box, and in it shall you Find treasures that my heart holds dear
Above the sordid count of value.

Not half so rare they are, you say,
As those to which your eyes still wander :
Quite true ! And yet my friends are they,
While those are but fine strangers, yonder !

This cricket, on an amber spear
Impaled, recalls that golden weather
When love and I, too young to fear
Heartburn, smoked cigarettes together.

And even now—too old to take
The little papered shams for flavor—
I light it off, for her sweet sake
Who gave, with it, her girlish favor.

And here 's the mighty student-bowl,
Whose tutoring, in and after college,
Has led me nearer Wisdom's goal
Than all I learned of text-book knowledge.

“A HOST of meerschaums !” did you say ?
Well, yes, it is a fair collection ;
Though valued chiefly in a way
Not plain to casual inspection.

You 'll see some dainty carving there
Upon those shelves, some curious fancies,
And many a color, deep and rare,
That well may tempt a stranger's glances.

Titania and her long-eared love
Are here beside a Venus lying ;
And wan Mazeppa, just above,
Before the wolfish pack is flying.

“It taught me.” Aye, to hold my tongue,
To keep alight, and yet burn slowly ;
To break ill spells around me flung,
As with the enchanted whiff of Moly !

There was a lesson in its smoke
Too volatile for earth to fetter :
Its fire, which ashes could not choke ;
Its worth, which age but made the better !

This narghileh, whose hue betrays
Perique from soft Louisiana,
In Egypt once beguiled the days
Of Tewfik's dreamy-eyed Sultana.

And this strange stone, whose mystic lines
And hieroglyphs the eye bewilder,
The love and patient art enshrines
Of some pre-Adamite mound-builder.

Speaking of color, do you know
A maid with eyes as darkly splendid
As are the hues that, rich and slow,
On this Hungarian bowl have blended?

Can artist paint the fiery glints
Of this quaint finger here beside it,
With amber nail—the lustrous tints
A thousand Partagas have dyed it?

“And this old silver-patched affair?”
Well, sir, that meerschaum has its reasons
For showing marks of time and wear;
For in its smoke, through fifty seasons,

My grandsire blew his cares away!
And then, when done with life's sojourning,
At seventy-five, dropped dead one day,
That pipe between his set teeth burning!

“Killed him?” No doubt! it's apt to kill
In fifty years incessant using—
Some twenty pipes a day. And still,
On that ripe, well-filled lifetime musing,

I envy oft so bright a part—
To live as long as life's a treasure;
To die of—not an aching heart,
But—half a century of pleasure!

Well, well! I'm boring you, no doubt.
How these old memories will undo one!
I see you've let your weed go out—
That's wrong! Here, light yourself a new one!

BELINDA.

BY RHODA BROUGHTON,

Author of "Good-by, Sweetheart!" "Red as a Rose is She," etc., etc.

PERIOD III—CHAPTER III.

AND what was it Mrs. Forth saw over Bellairs' shoulder? What is the sight that, now that the temporary call upon her attention is withdrawn, is riveting into such an agony of search the lovely cold eyes, to which so few things seem worth looking at? Fortunately for her, a new batch of undergraduates has hurried up to be presented to Sarah. Never since the days of Dresden and the German army has Miss Churchill had her hands so full. Belinda is free to send her gaze unnoticed round the hall, in a silent, breathless, passionate quest. Quest of what? She does not ask herself how much the better off she will be if she succeeds in finding the object of that quest. To find it! to find it! Come what may of the finding, to find it! Most people would feel sure that she has been deceived by an accidental resemblance to Rivers in some stranger; men of his size, complexion and bearing being, though unhappily in a minority, yet still numerous among two thousand youths of the English upper classes. But Belinda would laugh to scorn the suggestion that at any distance, or in any glimpse, however momentary, she could have mistaken any other for him.

There exists in her mind no smallest doubt that the face seen in that one lightning flash, and then instantly hidden by twenty other intervening faces, was his—his or his angel's! Perhaps he is dead, and that he has come to tell her. A mute sob rises in her throat. Whether in the spirit or the body, she must find him! At intervals of every few minutes she is interrupted in her search by the greetings and observations of passing acquaintances. She answers them politely and connectedly, but with a brevity that does not encourage a prolongation of their civilities; a brevity that will the sooner leave her free.

The room is thinner than it was, or rather the crowd is distributed more evenly over its whole area. Since the supper-tables sprang into sight—even loyalty giving the pas to hunger; the uncertain hope of a bow from the Duke, to the sober certainty of lobster-salad—the packing about H. R. H. is less dense. The guests are extended along the line of tables. Of Sarah, indeed, scarcely a vestige is to be seen, so closely is she hedged in by a wall of boys. At something she has just said they all laugh rapturously; those who did not hear it—so firmly assured already in her character as a wit—as well as those who did.

The signalman's biographer has descended from his estrade, and is talking as commonplacely to his hostess as if he wotted nothing of parental agonies or points, and as if the rosy babe had been sent to bed with the whipping it deserved. Through the slackening of the press it has surely become easier for one seeking to discover the person sought; and yet for a while she seeks in vain. How many heads there are! heads bald as Caesar's; heads thickly clad as Absalom's; heads white, heads brown; sandy heads, pepper-and-salt heads, gold heads; long heads, round heads, knobby heads! And how they shift and move! Will they never stay quiet for a moment? And among them all, he is not! He must have gone—gone without ever conjecturing her nearness!

Again that mute sob rises chokingly. Why should he not be gone? Why should she wish that he were not gone? Why should she wish to see him? What has she to say to him when they meet? But she pushes roughly aside Reason's cool pleading. Why does she wish it? Why—why? There may be no why, but she does wish it; wishes it with such a compelling frenzy of wishing, as seems as if it must produce the fulfilment of that wish. And it does. Its might prevails. Ah—h—h! For in a moment she has seen him again. He is nearer now; so near as to be recognizable past mistake or mis-giving, even by eyes less acquainted than hers with every trick of lip and brow. If he continues to advance in the direction at present taken by his steps, it is impossible but that in one minute or less—in perhaps fifty seconds, perhaps forty—she will come within the range of his vision. He will be aware of her as she is aware of him.

"Are you ready to go home?" says a voice at her elbow.

She turns suddenly; eyes alight and heart madly bounding, to find her husband at her elbow. The revulsion is so hideous that speech wholly fails her.

"I should be obliged if you would tell me where I am likely to find your sister," he continues, taking her silence for assent, since she is never very prodigal of her words to him; "so that I may let her know that we are going."

But at that she finds voice.

"Going!" she says, flashing one look of passionate dissent at him. "Why should we go? Impossible!"

"I see no impossibility," he answers captiously; "we have already amply satisfied the claims of civility. The impossibility, as you are perfectly aware, lies in combining such late hours with early rising in the morning."

"Then why should you rise early?" answers she, with tremulous rebellion. "It is no use talking—I cannot come away. You forget Sarah; it—it would not be fair upon Sarah; I have neither the wish nor the right to spoil her enjoyment."

"I should imagine that nothing would be easier than to find a chaperon in whose charge to leave her," rejoins he persistently; "if indeed," with a slightly venomous look in the direction of his sister-in-law, "she considers one necessary."

But Belinda only observes a silence which he divines to be mutinous. He is accustomed in her to sullen compliance, uncheerful acquiescence, loth obedience; but to open revolt he is not accustomed, and, on the spur of the moment, and in so public a place, he is not prepared to deal with it.

"Since you manifest such an avidity in the pursuit of pleasure," he says resentfully, "I will indulge you with another half hour, at the end of which time I must beg that you and your sister will be prepared to accompany me without farther remonstrance."

He does not await the answer, which perhaps he knows he would not receive; but turns on his heel and leaves her—leaves her free to pursue that feverish search which his coming had so rudely interrupted.

It is some moments before she again finds the object of that search; moments long enough for her to tell herself in heart bitterness that she has pushed against her fate in vain. But then, all in a moment, she has found him again. He is farther off, indeed, than he was: some trifle must have diverted his steps from the direction then pursued by them; and he is still, in his unconsciousness, slowly widening the distance between them.

Is it possible that he is tending toward the door? that she, unable by word or sign to arrest him, will see him go? Oh, but life is a hard thing! Knowing as she does that at one lightest cry from her he would turn; to be no more able to utter that cry than if a real material gag were choking her utterances! Can it be, then, that her soul's cry has reached his soul's ears? for he does turn suddenly and smiling. Has he seen her, that he smiles? Ah no! Would he indeed smile if he saw her? She has not given him much cause to smile at the sight of her. Well, he is wise. He has again averted his look. And the half-hour, the inexorable half-hour is passing! How much of it has already gone? Ten minutes, at least, must by this time have passed.

There are only twenty minutes for hope to work upon. Twenty minutes!—and then the close fly, the Early English Villa, Professor Forth, and the Fragments of Menander! To the end of time Professor Forth, and the Fragments of Menander!

Again her thoughts are broken in upon by a voice—Sarah's this time; Sarah having shaken herself free of her disciples; Sarah with a solicitous look and an anxious eye.

"I think it best to tell you," she says hurriedly, and narrowly watching the effect of her words upon her sister's face; "I was afraid lest you might hear it suddenly from some one else—some stranger. I suppose you have not seen him yet, but he is here!"

"I know it," answers Belinda shortly, and very low.

"You—you are not going to faint?"

"Faint! why should I faint?" with an accent of intense impatience, her eyes still riveted on the now again approaching figure; "do I ever faint?"

"Would you like to go home?"

"Go home!" echoes Belinda, in an accent of fierce desperation; "why do you all sing the same song? why are you all determined that I must go home?"

"I thought you would wish it," replies Sarah anxiously. "I should if I were in your place. Do you not think it would be better?"

But she speaks to deaf ears. Her eyes, still fastened on her sister's face, see that face's lilies suddenly dyed with a most happy and loveliest flush.

The sun has risen; he has touched the sunless snow on the Jungfrau's crest, and all the world is rosy red. So then he has seen her! There is now no longer any fear of his departing unintentionally ignorant of her neighborhood.

There is indeed time for one short pang of alarm lest he should do what in her heart she knows if he were wise he would do—and who knows how much of wisdom these two years may have lent him?—turn away, and knowingly avoid her! But apparently he is not wise.

In a moment he has pierced the small portion of crowd that still separates them; pierced it with a goodwill that would not have disgraced Miss Watson. She has one instant of such blissful anticipation—only a thousandfold intensified—as used to be hers in the Lütichau Strasse, at the sound of Tommy's childish foot pattering up the stone stairs, and her love's firm and eager tread behind it.

The next moment they have met. Their unfamiliar right hands lie in one another; and they say—nothing. Of what use to have mesmerized him hither by her eyes, and the insanity of her voiceless prayers, if she have nothing to say to him now that he has come? But happily, though she and he are speechless, Sarah is not.

"So it is you, is it?" she says in a dry voice; "now what eccentric wind has blown you here?"

He does not answer at once. Evidently, as of old, he has forgotten her presence.

"I see that you still have your old trick of not answering me," pursues she, running quickly on with a flightiness that conceals a good deal of real nervousness; "but never mind: there are places where I also am admired," as Goldsmith said. Belinda, do you know that twenty-five young gentlemen of different colleges are going to be so good as to call upon you between the hours of three and seven to-morrow?"

Belinda is struggling to rouse herself out of her intoxication; already so far unintoxicated as to know that it is intoxication.

"Are they?" she says, with a weakly laugh; "I am sure that I am very much obliged to them."

"And meanwhile, what has brought you here?" asks Sarah persistently, carrying on her determined talk as a shield to her sister's emotion.

Her speech has the effect of making Rivers, too, put down the wine-cup; of bringing him also back to the bald, sober morning prose of life.

"I have come to take my degree," he answers; "I have been prevented by—by circumstances from taking it before."

So now she has heard his voice! To have touched his hand; to have met his eye; to have heard his speech! Is not this to have had her wish? Surely now she is content. Surely now she will go home at ease and satisfied. But who was ever satisfied with one wish? What wish ever died barren, without engendering a hundred more?

"The half-hour is expired!" says a voice.

The Dresden quartette is complete. Perhaps it is this thought that, rushing simultaneously into three out of the four minds, strikes them momentarily mute. Sarah is, of course, the first to recover herself.

"What a mysterious utterance!" she says, with a rather forced gayety; "what half-hour? any particular half-hour? You remember Mr. Rivers, do you not? Mr. Rivers, you know Mr. Forth, my—my brother-in-law?"

There is a slight unintentional hesitation before pronouncing, and a perhaps intentional slight stress in pronouncing the last word. Rivers has stepped back a pace or two, isolating himself from the augmented group; but at this summons he again advances, and except by the two signs of a sheet-white face and set teeth, is not to be distinguished from any other well-mannered young man making a bow. But the Professor would be slow indeed to mark the hue of any undergraduate's or ex-undergraduate's face, or to note whether his mouth were open or shut.

"The fly is waiting," he says, returning Rivers' salutation with cursory indifference. "Belinda, I must beg you to accompany me at once, and not keep it waiting."

As he speaks, he looks at his wife, as one expecting and braced for fresh rebellion. But he meets with none.

"Come along!" cries Sarah with alacrity; "we are quite ready, are we not, Belinda? Enough is as good as a feast; and we have supped full of pleasure. Good-by!" nodding with cool friendliness over her shoulder, and taking her sister's hand.

Belinda offers no resistance; flaccidly she complies, and without one look at Rivers, with only a faint bend of her head in his direction, begins to follow the Professor of Etruscan out of the room. Rivers stands stupidly looking after them. The tart imperativeness of her husband's tone; his employment of her Christian name; her own dull docility—which of these is it that makes him feel as if some one had given him a great blow over the head with a club? Presently he begins, mechanically and purposely, to follow them.

The crowd is thick at the entrance and on the stone stairs—the departing crowd. The quadrangle is full of vehicles. Footmen are few in Oxbridge; but such as there are, are shouting their mistresses' carriages: the humbler multitude are pushing, asking, struggling for their flies. Lucky ones are finding them and driving off; unlucky ones are vainly striving to identify horse or driver. Among the latter are the Forths. In coming out, they have been parted by the press—that is to say, the sisters have lost each other—the younger loitering in injudicious dalliance with some of her new sweethearts; the elder plodding on in dull and woolly oblivion of all but the iron necessity of following that cap and gown ahead of her.

It is not till the elusive fly is at length found—till her foot is on the step, and Professor Forth is sharply urging her in by the elbow from behind, that she becomes aware of having mislaid her junior.

"Get in—get in!" cries he crossly; "what are you waiting for?"

"But Sarah!" she says, awaking from her unconsciousness and looking hastily round; "what has become of Sarah? we cannot go without Sarah?"

He makes an irritated gesture.

"No doubt she has joined some other party; no doubt she will do very well: at all events, in this confusion it is impossible to attempt to find her?"

"It is much more impossible to go without her!" replies she firmly, withdrawing her foot from the step; "I wonder that you should propose such a thing!"

"She is perfectly well able to take care of herself!" retorts he, recurring to his old and spiteful formula; "she will find her own way home!"

"Then I will find my own way home, too!" answers she indignantly, and resolutely turning her back upon him and the open fly-door. She is too indignant even to deign to observe whether he takes her at her word.

The crowd is still issuing, issuing; crossing the moonlit square on foot; nodding good-night out of carriage windows; away they go! She retraces her steps to the stair-foot. It is not pleasant work pushing against a human tide; and so she finds. It is bewildering to be staring into every face; peering under all the hoods and mufflers. And among all the faces, under all the hoods and mufflers, is no Sarah to be found. It is obvious that the Professor is right. She has found her own way home.

The company is melting away so rapidly that, unless she wishes to be shut into the college for the night, she must needs follow her example. Well! there is no great hardship in that! She is in the mood when the abnormal, the unusual, seems more tolerable to her than the accustomed, the everyday. Half an hour of solitude and midnight! Half an hour in which to be Belinda only—not Belinda Forth at all! Half an hour in which to reckon with this night and its work! She has already made half a dozen steps along the stone flags of the quadrangle, when some one comes up behind her. Had she known that he would come up behind her, that she makes no sign of surprise, nor any pause in her walk?

"You are alone?" he says with agitation.

"It seems so," she answers. It is the same dry voice with which she had so often galled and chilled him at Dresden.

"You have lost your—your party?"

"I have lost Sarah."

"And your—and Professor Forth?"

"He could not wait, and I could not go without Sarah."

"And he has left you behind—alone?"

She is silent, still speeding along in the moonlight.

"And how do you propose to get home?" he asks, keeping up with and determinately addressing her.

"I am getting home as fast as I can."

"You mean to walk?"

"It looks like it."

Her tone is brusque and dogged; but if she hopes by its means to rid herself of her companion she is mistaken.

"In evening dress?"

"Pooh!" she says, with a hard laugh; "we are not so fastidious here, nous autres; I walk out to dinner every night of my life!"

"But not alone?"

Her face darkens. "No, not alone."

They have reached the gateway and Wren's dome tower. She has stopped in her resolute walk; but in the stopping there is as much resolution as there was in the hurrying.

"Here we part," she says shortly; "good-night!"

"You must allow me to see you home," he answers firmly.

"I have already told you that it is absolutely unnecessary," retorts she roughly.

There is an instant's interval before his rejoinder. They are putting out the lights in the hall; the great building is greedily devouring half the moonlight in the quad, with its raven shadow. It has embraced the fountain in the middle. It is not much of a fountain, but how pleasantly its little voice pierces through the noise of rolling wheels and human shoutings! For how many centuries could she gladly stand here listening to it!

"You must allow me!" with perfect respect, but obstinately.

"I must not!" Is the night-wind heady, like wine? Her tone changes to one that is almost entreaty. "I had rather you did not; I ask you not!"

Her incivilities had left him iron; to her pleading he is as wax.

"It shall be as you wish," he says, gravely bowing.

There is nothing now to detain her, and yet she lingers an instant, as though expecting him to say something more. But he adds nothing. She turns out of the gateway and into the street, and walks fast and steadily up it. There are not many towns through which it would be judicious for a young and solitary woman to take her way, bare-headed and in flimsy ball-gown, at midnight; but about Oxbridge, Una, without her lion, might have strayed unassailed from sunset to sunrise. Involuntarily she slackens her speed a little, from the almost run with which she had begun her course, though still keeping at a moderately rapid walk. What cause is there for hurry? There is nothing now to hasten from; and Heaven knows there is nothing to hasten to!

She did well to be peremptory; but after all, he was not very much in earnest; he did not press the point. It is much better that it should be so; but still, as a mere matter-of-fact, he did not. She looks up at the sky, which is spreading out the jewels it has kept hidden through the staring day, spreading them out for to look up at and admire; all its bright belts and bears; its gods and goddesses. Then she looks suddenly round. There are still a good many people about, but no undergraduates; for the University mother has gathered her curled darlings to her bosom for the night.

The man, then, who is keeping pace with her, foot-step for footstep, twenty yards behind, is no undergraduate. She redoubles her speed again! Pooh! his presence has no reference to her. He is only taking the natural road to his hotel. But she does not look round again until the more bustling streets lie behind her; until she has reached the broad still thoroughfare where a range of gray colleges and a row of sentinel elms hold quiet converse with the stars.

Then, as if the muscles of her neck had been moved by some one else, she not consenting, once again she turns her head. The hotels are long passed. If he is still following, it is she whom he is following. And lo! twenty yards behind her, there he is, stepping through the moonlight!

She gives a low, excited laugh. Well, they have both had their will then: he has not walked home with her; she has not walked home alone. It is a compromise. Again she looks up to the heavens. What a lovely, lovely vault! What seed-pearl of constellations! What great planet-diamonds!

The clocks have just begun to strike midnight; the city's innumerable clocks, cathedral, college, church; the booming bell, the sharp strike, the melodious chime! How nobly their loud wedded harmony floods the night! And is there one of the gardens—she has reached the suburb of villas and gardens by this time—that has not contributed the breath of its gillyflowers to make the boon air so sweet?

She walks on with her strong elastic tread. After all, it is good to be young: to have a fine ear for sound; a nostril sensitive to fragrance; and—the consciousness that behind you there is one protecting you where there is nothing to be protected from—guarding you where there is nothing to be guarded against.

She has reached her own gate, and at it halts, her hand upon the latch. Here surely, under the ægis of her own roof-tree—here, where that twinkling night-light shows the exact spot where her husband is addressing himself to his slumbers—she may abate a little of her rigidity.

Seeing her arrived, he too has halted; nor is it until by a faint motion of her hand she gives him leave to approach, that he ventures to draw near her.

"Thank you!" she says with a smile; to which it is perhaps the moonlight that lends its quivering uncertainty; "but it was not necessary."

He neither disclaims nor accepts her acknowledgments. Gravely he unfastens the iron gate for her; while above his gold head the laburnum droops her gold curls. The moon has taken her color out of both, and substituted her own. Is he then still going to say nothing? But as she passes through, he speaks:

"I—I—am not leaving Oxbridge to-morrow. I shall be in Oxbridge all to-morrow."

"Shall you?" she says faintly.

"I have not done anything to forfeit your friendship, have I?" he asks, while in the moonlight she sees his right hand tighten its nervous clasp on one of the spiked iron uprights of the gate.

She is quite silent.

"Have I?" he repeats, in a tone as of one who, though patient, will not go without his answer. (Is truth always the best to be spoken? Then let it be spoken!)

"Nothing!"

"Is there then any reason why I should not come and see you to-morrow?"

Silence again; her look wandering undecidedly over her flower-bed.

"Is there?"

Her eye has caught the Professor's night-light again—that ill-favored Jack-o'-Lantern that is to dance forever across the morass of her life.

"None!" she answers firmly; and with that firm "None!" she leaves him.

NURSERY EPISODES.

NEARLY all mothers must meet, sooner or later, the problem of how to rebuke or punish a sensitive child without wounding or destroying his self-respect. (The term self-respect here includes that mild form of self-esteem which often fortifies a child against discreditable acts). With different temperaments entirely different methods are necessary. Two children in the same family often need opposite modes of treatment. I therefore attempt to lay down no general rule, but venture to give my own successful solution in one difficult case, hoping that it may prove at least suggestive in other and similar ones.

I early found self-respect to be the basis of all good manifestations in my little daughter—the corner-stone upon which alone I could build firmly. If I made the mistake of correcting her fault in such a way as to lessen her self-respect, everything seemed to give way beneath us—I had nothing left to build upon.

When she was three years old, I was startled into deep consideration of this matter. Up to this time she had been so habitually and cheerfully obedient that I rarely corrected her, and she lived in a joyous atmosphere of approval very sweet to her soul. From the height of conscious rectitude she obeyed with the air of noblesse oblige, and her prompt and loving acquiescence led us to believe that no difficulty lay in the path of her development. But one day, in a sudden freak of temper, she did wrong, very wrong, and I, amazed and shocked, rebuked her quickly, little thinking how wrong it was for me to say, "You naughty girl! Mamma does not love you when you do so!" Instantly my loving little daughter was transformed. She screamed, pushed me away, and sobbed herself into quiet at last in a far corner. Even after comparative cheerfulness was restored she repelled all my advances, and carried a strange, hard look in her face while she played with her dollies, ignoring my presence.

Within a few hours she disobeyed me again, and, in reply to a gentle rebuke, said sullenly: "I not care—mamma not love me!" From that time, for two days, she showed a dogged, hateful spirit, willfully disobeying me, and always saying, "I not care; I not want to be good!" or, "I not good girl; mamma not love me!"

I saw, too late, that by calling her naughty, and making her think my love withdrawn, I had brought the sensitive little soul to despair. Self-respect and public respect were lost. She had no motive for good behavior. The three-year-old desperado was equal to any villainy. She despised the blandishments of the mother who did not love her. Her lips were unresponsive to my kiss. She was absolutely cold and unapproachable, yet with a most pathetic look of misery haunting her eyes.

Finally, I knelt on the floor beside her, and very tenderly explained that, however naughty she might be, mamma loved her just the same; that nothing she could ever do would stop mamma's loving her. An incredulous, hesitant look was her only response. I then dilated on my theme, saying always that I should love her "just the same." "Just de same?" she repeated wonderingly. So, at last, I won my rebel. She clung to me convulsively, and kept asking in a soft, delighted voice such questions as these: "If I strike, does oo love me just de same?" And when I said that it would make me sad that I might be compelled to punish her, but that I should love her just the same, she would hug and kiss me in an ecstasy. For the next twenty-four hours she continued to propound, with wistful look, new conundrums of childish infancy, always ending with, "and oo'd love me just de same?"

At last she was fully reassured, and ever since, through all vicissitudes of discipline, she has had perfect confidence in my unshaken love.

Out of the exigencies of this occasion was evolved the scapegoat, which has ever since proved a brilliant success in our family. I saw that so long as she felt herself a "good girl" she was loth to do anything unworthy of her lofty ideal of herself, and that I must discover some way of correcting faults without discouraging her and lowering her self-respect.

Knowing that children enjoy personification, I vividly personified her cross, naughty, impulses as a naughty spirit who delighted in making trouble. "When he sees a dear, good little girl like you he thinks, 'Now I'll get her into trouble;' so, when mamma tells you to do something he whispers, 'Don't do it,' and if you listen to him all sorts of bad times begin." This struck her imagination forcibly; the "Naughty Cross," as she named him, became a foe to resist on every occasion. "I won't be cross, I will mind my mamma," were often her audible answers to secret impulses. I always looked tenderly at her when she inclined to disobedience, and said: "You good, sweet little girl, the Naughty Cross is trying to make you do wrong." Often I would apostrophize the Naughty Cross, saying sternly: "Go away! leave this good girl!" This spirited address frequently served as a diversion and ended all trouble. Sometimes she would join with me in exorcising the tempter, even giving herself a rousing slap in moments of righteous wrath, saying, "Go away! I won't be naughty!"

Under cover of rebuking the Naughty Cross I was able to be far more severe and make more telling points than would have been possible in addressing her; yet she herself—the ultimate core of her—never was wounded or depressed by it. It was always, in her mind, a struggle between an upright little girl and a tempter. Her sense of honor and rectitude grew and blossomed, in spite of frequent episodes of discipline.

Gradually she took the matter more and more into her own hands, and often came out triumphant from severe personal struggles. One day she turned away with a sullen frown in response to a maternal suggestion, and went to the window. I watched and waited. In a few minutes she came back with sweet, upturned face: "Is dis a pleasant 'ittle face, mamma?" And when I kissed her she explained: "De Naughty Cross tried to come in, but I went to de winner and asked Jesus to send him off."

She felt that she had a strong ally in Jesus and appealed to Him for help with perfect confidence.

Before she was five years old self-discipline was established; she wrestled with and subdued her own bad impulses, and who shall say that her prayer of faith was not directly answered? Of course, this refers to her interior condition. Outwardly she was no paragon. She was robust, noisy, liable to mistakes of all sorts, full of social atrocities and altogether childlike.

The best and sweetest phase of this development was that we never antagonized each other; even in our most tragic moments all my energies seemed directed against the Naughty Cross, and she felt that we were comrades in warfare with a mutual enemy. She has a tremendous will, but she has never found it out, because it has never been opposed to mine. She has a capacity for obstinate defiance that would have been a dreadful element in family discipline, but she has had no chance to develop it. Now, her will and obstinacy, if developed, will be used against the temptations of life, never, I believe, in opposition to her mother.

I found that to forewarn her often averted trouble. If she came in hot, tired and dirty from play, I would exclaim, "The Cross will be here in a minute! He sees you are hot and tired, and he knows you hate to be washed; he thinks, 'Now I'll catch her! Now I'll make her naughty!'"

"He won't!" would be her heroic response, as she patiently underwent the penance of the wash-bowl.

MARY H. BURTON.

THE HOUSEHOLD—BEFORE THE HOUSE-QUAKE.

AMID the domestic epochs of the year, what is so formidable as the spring upheaval? After enduring the premonitory pains, then sustaining with what fortitude is possible the successive tremors of the shock itself, and, lastly, recovering by slow stages from the after-effects, one is almost ready (happy if only almost) to "go to boarding." But by many repetitions of this discipline one learns to soften its rigors.

Nothing does this so effectually as a thorough preparation. There is, especially in country homes, a variety of "odd jobs," such as only come once or twice a year, that are commonly left to be done "when we get through house-cleaning." Nearly all of them may be done to better advantage at the outset. Let me assume that these hints are offered to the intelligent housekeeper who takes upon herself the actual administration of her small kingdom. Wise woman that she is, she will wish in the spring to repair the ravages of time, and even to advance a little the whole line of her fortifications.

She may begin with her linen-closet. We all know how much faster house-linen wears in winter than in summer. It is usually an unpleasant surprise to find, upon a full and careful examination, that there are not actual deficiencies, but points that need unexpected reinforcement. Perhaps we need not put ourselves in the place of the young German countess, who envied her American friend her immunity from darning kitchen-towels; but, without going to extremes, dainty darning is not by any means to be despised, if, perchance, there is any one in the household capable of it. Everything in this department should be put in absolute order, those articles past wear condemned and given away or put to baser uses; and, on some weekly cleaning-day, a perfect cleansing given to closets and presses, and a fresh and orderly disposition made of new and old stores. To those who have family sewing done at home, the late winter or early spring—least tempting for out-door employments—is a most favorable time for this work. The new table-linen, then, beautifully hemmed by hand, marked with pretty etched designs in indelible ink, if one of the daughters has a gift for such things; the new sheets and pillow-slips all finished and laundered to perfection, the blankets cleaned and re-bound with a broad ribbon, the silk coverlet done at last, perhaps one or two new mattress-covers made, thin quilts of soft unbleached muslin, much pleasanter next the sheets than the mattress, with its hard tufts, and much easier changed and cleaned; the mattresses, bolsters and pillows thoroughly examined, and whatever repairs or renovations are needed accomplished, the housekeeper has an excellent piece of work to think of with satisfaction as done rather than with uneasiness as a burden in store.

Where there are children, the spring review of the family wardrobe should come either a little earlier or a little later, as convenience dictates. Everything should run the gauntlet, restorations be planned, and purchases decided upon. Who knows how much more can be got out of a certain allowance by judicious planning? Closets, camphor-trunks and cedar-chests, or whatever takes the place of them, must be carried over from winter estate to summer estate.

Then the store-room proper, the preserve-closets, the china-closets—all these demand the same severe scrutiny and energetic yet prudent reconstruction. When all this is done, with the extra washing which it always involves, you will be surprised, if it is your first trial of the method, to find how much of the terror of house-cleaning has departed. If you have the housekeeping instinct, you have found much satisfaction in your unhurried work as it went on, and you think of your closets with great complacency as you marshal your forces for the short and sharp campaign which must begin with the actual tearing up of rooms.

But even in this it is best to conquer by small installments. Before the final rush, have everything in readiness, so that, without too much disorganization, a large portion of the regular household work may be skipped for a fortnight. Lay in stores for a grand family picnic—plenty of appetizing edibles, such as may be set forth at a moment's notice; a boiled ham, a large joint of roast beef, some mince pies, canned meats and fruits—whatever suits your taste and purse that can be eaten without much immediate care of preparation. Above all, being well provided with cheerfulness, good temper and health, a speedy triumph is certain.

D. H. R. GOODALE.

A FAMILY DINNER.

Vermicelli Soup.

Oyster Fritters.

Roast Turkey.

Potatoes mashed.

Salsify.

Stewed Cranberries. Apple Pudding. Hard Sauce.

Tea or Coffee.

VERMICELLI SOUP.—One knuckle of veal, about four pounds; half a pound of lean ham, four quarts of water, one tablespoonful of salt, one teaspoonful of pepper, a bunch of sweet herbs. Boil very slowly for five hours and then strain into a jar to cool. When ready to use, take the cake of fat from the top and put over the soup to heat. Boil quarter of a pound of vermicelli twenty minutes, using just enough water to cover it, and then put in tureen, straining the soup on to it and serving very hot.

OYSTER FRITTERS.—One pint of oysters; bring them to boiling point in their own liquor; skim out at once and cut each one in three pieces. Strain the liquor, and if there is not enough to make a large cupful add water. Beat three eggs light. Stir in to the oyster liquor a large cup of sifted flour and half a teaspoonful of salt; add half a teaspoonful of soda dissolved in warm water, then the eggs, and last the oysters. Stir well, and drop by spoonfuls into boiling lard. Drain on brown paper, and serve hot.

ROAST TURKEY.—Dress and carefully wipe out the turkey. Make a stuffing of a quart of bread crumbs, quarter of a pound of salt pork or sausage chopped fine, an even tablespoonful of salt, a teaspoonful of pepper and a teaspoonful of thyme or savory. Moisten with half a cup of hot water, and a spoonful of butter melted in it. Truss neatly. Pour a cup of boiling water into pan, and allow three hours to an eight pound turkey, basting very often. Twenty minutes before serving, dredge thickly with flour, and baste with a little melted butter. Skim off all the fat from the gravy, thickening it with one tablespoonful of browned flour.

STEWED CRANBERRIES.—One quart of cranberries, one cup of water, one pint of sugar. Stew slowly, without stirring, half an hour, then pour into dish.

SALSIFY.—Scrape the roots and throw them into cold water with a little vinegar in it. Let them lie an hour; then cut in pieces and boil till tender, about one hour, in well salted water. Drain off nearly all the water, and add one cup of cold milk. When it boils, add a large spoonful of butter and two tablespoonfuls of cracker dust. Boil five minutes and serve hot.

APPLE PUDDING.—Three cups of fine bread crumbs, three of chopped apple, two cups of sugar, juice of one lemon and the grated peel, one teaspoonful of mixed cinnamon and mace, two cups of boiling water, one large tablespoonful of butter melted in the water. Put a layer of crumbs and a layer of apples till a deep dish is full. Pour the water in which the sugar, etc., has been dissolved over the whole, cover with a plate and bake an hour; then remove plate and brown.

HARD SAUCE.—Half a cup of butter worked to a cream, two cups of powdered sugar. Flavor with half a grated nutmeg and the juice of a lemon. Beat very light, and pile on a butter plate. Set in cold place till used.

OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

"Is coffee-drinking as unhealthful as many physicians insist, and has it any virtue in intermittent fevers?"—D. M. L., Scarsdale, N. Y.

Ans.—The question has had lately some very vigorous discussion, and here are two conclusions: The arraignment of coffee-drinking by the noted Dr. Bock, of Leipsic, as one of the chief causes of nervous diseases now so prevalent, is vigorously combated by the eminent Dr. Segur. According to the latter, it is a mental and bodily stimulant, assisting to convert the blood into nervous tissue, and thus recruit the nervous moving and thinking faculties; it lessens the waste of tissue, and thus diminishes the amount of food necessary to support the system. Again, Dr. Segur declares that it will often cut short and cure attacks of intermittent fever; in typhus fever it increases the excretion of urea, and so far purifies the blood without increasing tissue metamorphosis; it tends to lessen coma and low delirium; it is a diuretic in cardiac dropsy; in opium-poisoning its efficacy is well known; and, adds Dr. Segur, it is his chief reliance in yellow fever.

"What is the proper pronunciation of the word tomato? With us there has been a perpetual controversy since we saw 'The Colonel,' and heard Mr. Coghlan's method. What is the real American method.—C. L. Y., Philadelphia."

Ans.—The answers given by Americans are as various as those of English folk who have been in the United States. Everybody knows that, although pronunciation is far more homogeneous in the United States than in the United Kingdom, there are distinct dialects even in the former favored country, that of the West varying widely from the accent of New England, and both from the curious snoring twang of the rural districts of the South. We have heard the love-apple called "tomahto" and "tomato," with the "o" sounded very distinctly in both cases, and also "tomatter" in the States by persons from different districts and of different degrees of culture. In Boston, which city, by the way, is called "Bawston" by the inhabitants, the accent is of the broader kind, or "very English," as other Americans say. A Bostonian says "tomahto," or, still more accurately, "tomahtah," the exact pronunciation of the original word.

"Can the 'Household' give any form of preparation for shampooing the hair, and can it tell me if headache is helped by the process, and oblige, B. B. M."

Ans.—The Druggists' Circular gives the following recipe for the "dry shampoo," considerably used by barbers, now generally known as "sea foam." Alcohol, eight ounces; water, sixteen ounces; ammonia, one ounce; cologne, one ounce. It is rubbed on the head until the liquid evaporates. No subsequent rinsing is necessary. A distinguished physician, who had spent much time at quarantine, said that a person whose head was thoroughly washed every day rarely took contagious diseases, but where the hair was allowed to become dirty and matted, it was hardly possible to escape infection. Many persons find speedy relief for nervous headache by washing the hair thoroughly in weak soda-water. I have known severe cases almost wholly cured in ten minutes by this simple remedy. A friend finds it the greatest relief in cases of "rose cold," the cold symptoms entirely leaving the eyes and nose after one thorough washing of the hair. The head should be thoroughly dried afterward, and not exposed to draughts of air for a little while.

"Is there any perceptible interval between the actual contact of a touch or a blow and the consciousness of it by the person touched or struck?—R. Y. T."

Ans.—The American Journal of Arts and Sciences said recently in a learned discussion of this subject: "Sensations are transmitted to the brain at a rapidity of about one hundred and eighty feet per second, or at one-fifth the rate of sound; and this is nearly the same in all individuals. The brain requires one-tenth of a second to transmit its orders to the nerves which preside over voluntary motion; but this amount varies much in different individuals, and in the same individual at different times, according to the disposition or condition at the time, and is more regular the more sustained the attention."

"I WOULD very much like to know how to preserve, pickle or candy fresh limes. If you can give me a recipe for either or all through THE CONTINENT, I shall be very grateful. And in answer to K. I would be Oracle No. 4. Put glycerine papers over, instead of brandy, and seal as usual. It is tasteless and harmless, and I find it effectual in the warm climate of California. This year, for jelly that has a smooth surface, I shall paint over with a light brush in glycerine, and seal; for jam or rough surface, rub both sides of the paper, then seal.—L. F."

"EDITOR CONTINENT: Neither tea nor coffee should be bottled for one moment. Boiling brings out certain acrid and unwholesome properties in both leaf and berry. The one should be steeped, boiling water dripped through the other. The almost universal use in this country, and this country alone, of such elaborate barbarisms as are indorsed by the editor of your 'Household Department,' makes, to that extent, a decent cup of coffee an unknown thing to our people. The darkeys of San Domingo are ahead of us, and civilized, in this.—A TRAVELER."

PETER COOPER was one of the few wealthy men of his day who did not, from the simple fact of his wealth, provoke the hatred of the "irreconcilables." "Few" is perhaps the correct term, but in point of fact it is not easy to name one other equally rich man who was less an object of envy to his impecunious fellow-citizens. The position of Justus Schwab and his fellow-reformers has not been publicly announced regarding this particular case of accumulated wealth, but presumably they hold that Peter Cooper ought to have "divided" after the manner prescribed by them for other mortals. Divided! Where will you find a man who has, upon the whole, divided more judiciously than he? The Cooper Union, in New York, is his monument. Costing near a round million, its free schools are devoted to the advancement of the useful arts and sciences. A skilled mechanic and inventor himself, the aged millionaire knew how hard it is for a poor boy to gain the instruction necessary for the best development of his talents, and from early forenoon until late in the evening the lecture and class-rooms of the vast building are thronged with students in all branches of technical and artistic learning. Mr. Cooper was literally a kind of patriarch in the great Babel of New York life. His ninety-three years weighed less heavily upon him than do threescore on most of us, and his familiar and venerable figure, with its accessory wraps and cushions, will be sadly missed for many a day by frequenters of the Union. It has been said that few begrudged Mr. Cooper his great wealth, and the reason perhaps was that even in the commercial metropolis few had the moral audacity to credit themselves with truer views as to spending money than were possessed by this genuine philanthropist. On no one point are human beings so perfectly in accord as upon that of riches. Every man thinks that if things were as they should be he would be among the wealthy ones of earth, and a great many, it is to be feared, look with envious eyes upon the full coffers of richer men. How should it be otherwise when every one of us honestly believes that he ought to be richer than he is? Mr. Cooper was never the object of the envious hatred engendered by this almost universal feeling. He never received threatening letters, save from the insane; he never found it necessary to be escorted by armed attendants, as is the case to-day with some of our moneyed magnates; and, though there are no doubt wretches who would violate his grave if they could hope to claim a ransom, it is safe to say that his ashes will be suffered to rest with such guard of honor only, as is vouchsafed by popular esteem.

THE department of "Notes and Queries" introduced on page 539 of the present number will be a regular monthly feature of THE CONTINENT, and will include such subjects as may be thought of general interest to our readers, or any considerable class of them. In the conduct of this we shall not be limited by any fixed or definite line. All sorts of inquiries will be published and answered, provided only they are of a character which seems suited for our pages. It is not intended to make it merely a bureau for private information—a substitute for an encyclopedia—nor a simple puzzle-column for literary ruminants. Questions touching all subjects will be welcomed, provided they possess the one essential—general interest; but the editor reserves the right of decision without appeal as to which questions are to be answered and which omitted. A record will be kept of all questions received, and such as may be deemed especially adapted to the department will be selected for answer and comment. As the selection of a title for one of our editorial departments—Migma—has been criticised by certain of the wise men who invariably know just what others ought to do, we have chosen a double heading for this new department which will perhaps suit everybody. The meaning of the point of interrogation is plain, and if any find trouble with the Latin let them be heard from. The design is especially adapted to this use, because, like good Dame Eleanor,

"Each queer feature asks a query."

The following rules will govern correspondence designed for this department, and readers are cordially invited to contribute either questions or answers, always bearing in mind the fact that, while a score of communications may be received, only one can ordinarily be published.

- 1—Letters designed for it should be distinctly marked with an interrogation point above the address upon the envelope in which they are sent.
- 2—The full name and address of the writer must accompany each inquiry; not for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith.
- 3—Each inquiry must be written on a separate piece of paper.
- 4—In answering inquiries always refer to the number of the query, and not to the number or page of the magazine.
- 5—Answers may be by members of the editorial staff or from other sources, in which latter case the initials, name or nom de plume of the author will be affixed.

HAD the little book, "Emerson as a Poet,"¹ by Joel Benton, no other excuse for being, sufficient might be found in the beauty of its make-up. A new and very excellent portrait of Emerson, from a photograph owned by Theodore Parker, is the frontispiece; the cover, with its pine tree, Æolian harp, and "burly, dozing humble-bee," is especially attractive, and the broad margins and clear type make a book which must satisfy alike both publisher and reader. A portion of the matter given was read at Concord on the day set apart to Emerson by the School of Philosophy; but few alterations have been made, and the whole stands as an argument, or rather an impassioned appeal, for full recognition of Emerson's place as poet. Mr. Benton is an ardent lover, but he is appreciative and critical also; and while many will question some of his verdicts, none will deny that his claim is in great part vindicated. That the poet must be studied to be understood is to be counted no more against his power than against that of Robert Browning; and while it may be doubted if the truest poetry is that which requires such mental effort, there are enough passages whose beauty impresses itself at once and forever to entitle him fully to the name of master here as everywhere else. If Mr. Benton's tone is a little exaggerated, it is no more so than is demanded in the attempt to make plain something that has been denied, and its effect will certainly be to give a new and truer view to many who have refused to admit its claim.

PROFESSOR RASMUS B. ANDERSON'S notably well-performed task is ended, and the final volume of his translation of Björnstjerne Björnson's works is now before the public. "Magnhild"¹ can hardly fail to attract attention, possessing, as it does, not only many of the author's most striking merits, but also very pronounced and aggressive defects. It is a fashion at present to discourse at length on the singular purity and unworldliness of nature which is the birthright of these far northern nations, and critics insist upon the divine simplicity of Björnson's heroines. In part they are right. Imagination is exalted by the solitude and silence of those wonderful valleys, and the deep blue waters of the fiords, in which nixies still frolic and the water spirits still lure bewildered boatmen to destruction. Dogged fidelity and a deep and impassioned power of feeling are part of the northern inheritance, but conditions are all against a genuinely harmonious development. The shepherd maiden, singing like a seraph on the height where her flocks are feeding, and whose eyes are blue and deep as the water below, descends at night to a supper of black bread and cabbage soup; a home where herding is the only word that effectually covers the family life, and a grossness of thought and expression that make her prematurely wise with a one-sided knowledge that holds no real education, but simply leaves her the more open to the wiles of the first attractive stranger.

Magnhild is the child of a Norwegian farmer, who sees her home and family swept away by a land-slide, and who is cared for and practically adopted by the village pastor. Her strange, irresponsive, unawakened nature is powerfully drawn, and her girlhood and the life in the pastor's house are filled with the insight and picturesqueness that are inseparable from Björnson's work. She marries a traveling saddler, a dissolute and frightfully unpleasant-looking object, whose power to fascinate is meant to be a mystery, and who guards and provides for Magnhild with devotion, seeking to preserve in her the innocence which has charmed him. Her voice has been trained during her life in the pastor's house, but she ceases to use the gift, and is sinking into a mere household drudge, when roused by the advent of a famous musician, who brings his piano, and is soon followed by the wife of an officer, whose relation to him is very evident. Some morbid freak causes her to resolve upon waking up the soul of Magnhild. She bends every effort toward bringing her to the notice of Tande, the musician, with the speedy result of making him unfaithful to herself. Then ensues a series of unwholesome experiments, not only among the characters of the novel, but quite as evidently in the author's mind, and the whole atmosphere is so befogged, the smell of sulphur so strong, that one prays for a keen wind out of the north that may, with one blast, disperse these mephitic vapors. Skarlie, the husband, who watches the whole with a half-cynical curiosity, has really more honesty and genuine human nature than any one, save the fat pastor, with no suspicion of his own solid value. The musician dies, Magnhild returns from travel with an old friend, and takes up work in a healthier fashion, and the lady, whose share in the general discomfort has been much to her mind, disappears with her unsuspecting and stolid husband. Altogether, in spite of very charming pictures, much intimate knowledge of character, and the charm of a style which loses little in the careful translation, "Magnhild" is the least desirable number of the series, and should have no permanent place in literature.

(1) MAGNHILD. By Björnstjerne Björnson. Translated from the Norse by Rasmus B. Anderson. Author's edition. 16mo, pp. 223, $1.00. Houghton & Mifflin, Boston.

A NEW club in London, semi-literary in character, has chosen the singular title of the "Sette of Odd Volumes."

THE British Museum has bought the beautiful copy of Petrarch, purchased by Mr. Pickering at the Sunderland sale for $9750, paying for it $10,250.

MR. EDWARDS, the inventor of the heliotype process, has printed a richly illustrated book, the record of a yachting trip, only ten copies of which are published.

"FIGURES OF THE PAST," by Josiah Quincy, one of the most delightful sets of reminiscences ever published, has gone into a fourth edition, which is selling rapidly.

THE beautiful memorial edition of Irving's works published by the Putnams, is limited to three hundred copies, each set of three volumes being numbered before delivery.

DR. HOLMES is to write the life of Emerson for the "American Men of Letters" series, and this seems to refute the assumption of many, that his work hereafter would be found only in the pages of the Atlantic.

THE letters of the late French critic, Paul de St. Victor, are being collected for publication by his daughter, and will soon be issued in Paris. Another more celebrated correspondence is also to appear there—that of Armand Barbès, the revolutionist.

THE beautiful little "Parchment Series" of which D. Appleton & Co. are the publishers for this country, has in its latest issues, Keble's "Christian Year," "The Imitation of Christ," by Thomas à Kempis, and "Select Letters of Percy Bysshe Shelley." "French Lyrics," selected by George Saintsbury, will soon follow.

MR. CHARLES F. LUMMIS has published a few of his poems in a tiny book of birch bark, which may be had for twenty-five cents, by addressing him at Chillicothe, Ohio. The bark was gathered in the White Mountains, to the permanent injury, it is to be feared, of a number of valuable trees, and the poems are on various aspects of mountain scenery.

THE May Century contains a supplement to Dr. Washington Gladden's "The Christian League of Connecticut," in which he describes the overcoming of certain practical difficulties that arose. The articles have attracted wide attention in this country and in England, and deservedly so, Dr. Gladden being one of the most earnest and successful workers in such fields, while his power of literary expression, always graceful and readable, has increased steadily.

AN American reprint of Professor Jowett's edition of "Thucydides" has been issued by D. Lothrop & Co., in a finely printed and handsome octavo. The original edition was in two volumes as printed by the Clarendon Press in 1881; the first containing the translation of the Greek text, and the second, elaborate notes on the text and the Bodleian MS. Rev. Dr. Peabody writes an introduction to the American edition, for which Professor Jowett's name is sufficient guarantee, and the volume will undoubtedly find many readers. (8vo, pp. 724, $3.50).

It is unfortunate for Mr. A. B. Muzzey's "Reminiscences and Memorials of Men of the Revolution and their Families," that it must inevitably be compared with Mr. Josiah Quincy's "Figures of the Past," one of the most delightful books of the year. Mr. Muzzey's book is an exceedingly faithful and minute chronicle, which will be of great value to all local historians, and there are many amusing bits of anecdote, but as a whole it fails to excite interest, and is not likely to attain popularity outside the circle of which it treats. (8vo. pp. 423, $3.50. Estes & Lauriat, Boston).

THE problems which arise in the study of natural science, more and more popular with every year, are a stimulus to renewed philosophical investigation, and though the general reader is inclined to resent any demand for keen and long-continued attention, a pamphlet will be tolerated where an elaborate treatise would fail. Dr. McCosh is known as a powerful and vigorous thinker, and in the "Philosophic Series" he has condensed this thought and freed it from every particle of irrelevant matter. "Energy, Efficient and Final Cause," is a discussion of the doctrine of Causation. His views appear to be a mixture of Chalmers and John Stuart Mill, with more than a suspicion of Jonathan Edwards, but the argument is an interesting one and will stimulate discussion and investigation. (Paper, pp. 55, 50 cents. Charles Scribner's Sons).

AT a meeting lately held in Baltimore by the subscribers to a fund for a memorial to Sidney Lanier, Mr. J. R. Tait said of him: "I remember his describing, when very ill himself, the condition of a brother poet of the South, with a laugh in which were blended sympathy and tenderness, with a certain sense of the grotesqueness of the situation. A poet who lived at a place—no, not a place, but a pump in the pine barrens, where thirsty locomotives stopped to drink, and where in a log cabin of smallest dimensions, tapestried with pictures from the illustrated newspapers, the poet, an invalid, dwelt and wrote and cared for his family. The laugh ended in something like a sob, and there were tears in his eyes of admiration for the pluck and sympathy for the lot of one so much worse off than himself. And yet Paul Hayne has lived to write his elegy."

THE readers of THE CONTINENT who have followed Mr. Julian Hawthorne's brilliant romance, "Dust," through several months will welcome it in its present form, the third number in "Our Continent Library," which has already made many friends. The title is the least suggestive point in the book, which deals with the opening of the nineteenth century, and a set of characters all sharply defined, though at times it is the sharpness of a faithful painting and not of real life, a suspicion of melodrama being encountered here and there. The story is exceedingly complicated, the plot hinging on the hidden relationship of Perdita, Marquise Desmoines, to several persons in the story, and on the fortunes of Bendibow Brothers, a great banking-house, owing its origin to a fortune made in the South Sea Bubble period. The story opens with a picturesque description of English society at that time, and an accident to the Brighton coach, by means of which the hero, Philip Lancaster, is introduced to the reader. He meets Marion Lockhart, who, with her mother, lives in an old London house, part of which they let for lodgings. In time Philip and Marion marry, but there are many complications, resulting from Perdita's love for Philip, her suicide at the last being the solution for all. A fine portrait of Mr. Hawthorne is the frontispiece of the volume. (12mo, pp. 402, $1.50).

MISS ANNA BUCKLAND, in "The Story of English Literature," has done a work having no kinship with the average compilation, but full of suggestion as well as fact. In her modest preface she writes: "We shall not in this story of our literature attempt to deal with the philosophic history of thought, nor venture into the critical examination of special works, nor enter upon a search into the hidden meanings and explanations of early texts; these branches of a higher study are left in far more able and scholarly hands, of whose labors this little book is gratefully content to avail itself. This is only a story of English literature, and it is only told to those who come quite freshly to the subject, not as critics, nor even yet as students, but who, with awakening intelligence, are ready to have their eyes opened by literature to the beauty of the world around them, the sweetness of that love which fills our homes with blessedness, the nobleness of faithfulness to duty at any sacrifice and the glory of faith and patience, enduring all things with hope and courage to the end. And through it all we shall endeavor to catch a glimpse of the hand of God, leading mankind onward and upward from age to age." The difficult task is accomplished with great skill. Miss Buckland writes easily and gracefully; her estimates are, as a whole, exceedingly just, and the critic or student for whom she has declined to write, will find the book well worth careful reading, giving a far more coherent and intelligent idea of the subject than any mere manual has ever held. (12mo, pp. 519, $1.50; Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co., London and New York).

IN one point Mrs. Dahlgren has shown much wisdom in the plan and arrangement of material in her "Memoir of John A. Dahlgren, Rear-Admiral United States Navy," in that she has let journals and letters tell the story. Properly speaking, this is rather a history of the United States Navy than genuine biography, and as history it has a very positive value, the journals holding a carefully-written yearly record which gives progress, or, more often, the want of it, in a very faithful, if exceedingly uninteresting manner. For a life which held so much valuable work, and so conscientious a devotion to duty, there is an almost inconceivable lack of real human interest. Mrs. Dahlgren's very feminine comments, interjections, italics of disgust and capitals of amazement when appreciation is wanting, are the only entertaining feature. Her style is Southern in all its characteristics, and its occasional grandiloquence a reminder of the once popular Miss Evans. Even in the final pages her description of some of his last words might have been written by the author of "Beulah." "As he took the goblet in his hand he said, with that ineffable elegance of diction he was wont to use," etc. There are many reasons why a wife should not become her husband's biographer, and they operate more strongly even than usual in the present case. It would be well-nigh impossible to make the life deeply interesting save in its connection with the civil war, and elements that in other hands might have been used to advantage are by their handling rendered often almost ludicrous. But it is a valuable record, and a less voluminous but far better likeness of the real man may by-and-by be given. (8vo, pp. 660, $3.00; James R. Osgood & Co.).

THUCYDIDES. Translated into English. With Introduction, Marginal Analyses and Index. By E. Jowett, M. A., Edited, with a Preface to American Edition, by A. P. Peabody, D. D. 8vo, pp. 724, $3.50. D. Lothrop & Co., Boston.

1—WHY cannot the Government of the United States be sued for debt?

Will some brother, learned in the law, please furnish a brief authoritative answer?

2—Who was the subject of the "Epipsychidion," by Shelley? Was she the lady of whom the poet wrote to his friend Peacock, in March, 1821: "I have made acquaintance in an obscure convent with the only Italian for whom I ever felt any interest?"—J. L. C.

3—WHY was it that John Milton suffered so much obloquy, public and private, during his lifetime?—BRESCHIA.

Professor Morley's stirring commentary on Addison's opening paper expounding "Paradise Lost" (Spectator, No. 267, Routledge editions, London) enumerates Milton's "critical neighbors." The poet was not acceptable either at home or abroad. One of his latest reviewers wonders that he was not sent to the scaffold at Charing Cross, or to the dismal prison which so speedily ended the life of Hutchinson. Milton, according to the phraseology of his Puritanic associates, was at once the railing Shimei, the blasphemous Rabshakeh, and the crafty Ahithophel of the Revolution. He had declared the marriage tie to be a nullity; he had discountenanced every form of religion; had abused Parliament, lauded Cromwell, cursed every one who attacked the Commonwealth; he had justified the execution of Charles the Martyr, slandered his memory, and allowed the newspaper which he edited to call Charles II "the young Tarquin," and "the thing called his majesty."—M. R. S.

4.—WHAT is the whole of the inscription said to have been engraved on an old watch, beginning, "Time is—the present moment well employ"?—THORA.

"Time is—the present moment well employ;
Time was—is past—thou canst not it enjoy;
Time future—is not, and may never be;
Time present—is the only time for thee."

LATHAM.

5—How did the custom originate of using stained glass in church windows, and of hanging pictures on the walls?—S. L. V.

A high authority says: "Besides constituting splendid ornaments, painted windows representing Scriptural subjects may serve to refresh the memory, to fix wandering thoughts, to place a familiar idea in a new light, to suggest some sentiment or awaken a spirit of inquiry. It was for instruction that pictures were anciently placed in churches. 'Picturæ ecclesiarum sunt quasi libri laicorum.'"—CH. A. COLE.

6—How and when did the following sayings, or set of sayings, originate? "That I spent I had; that I gave I have; that I left I lost."—M. A. Y.

An epitaph in St. George's Church, at Doncaster, England, on "A Charitable Man," runs:

"How now, who is heare?
I Robin of Doncastere
And Margaret my feare.
That I spent, that I had;
That I gave, that I have;
That I left, that I lost."

E. C.

7—I HAVE noticed recent allusions to the manufacture of glass coffins. Am I wrong in thinking that this is no new thing, as seems to be claimed?—H. K.

Coffins have been made of glass. In the Musée du Louvre there are several which were found at Persepolis. Strabo, according to Mr. Nesbitt, asserts that the body of Alexander the Great was deposited in a sarcophagus of this material.—CH. A. COLE.

8—WHAT are the most conclusive evidences of early Phœnician civilization?—A. C. H.

Phœnician civilization has its greatest glory and the plainest mark of its early existence in the invention of alphabetic writing. Besides navigation, architecture, metallurgy and embroidery, Professor Rawlinson reminds us in "The Origin of Nations," that the Phœnicians excelled also, at a very early date, in the manufacture of glass, in dyeing, and perhaps in music.

9—MAY I trouble some kind reader to refer me to any printed authority for the punishment of "one Andrew Low, junior," who broke into Mr. Ling's house at New Haven, in 1643, took thence some "strong water . . . and 6d. in money," and remaining "horrible obstinate and rebellious against his parents, and incorrigible," is ordered by the court to be as "severely whipt as the rule will bare, and work with his father as a prisoner, with a lock upon his leg so that he may not escape?"—SENEX.

10—WANTED—the date of the commencement of the construction of the great cupola of the Cathedral at Florence by Brunelleschi. The architect had for years, in the early part of the fifteenth century, a great deal of trouble to bring the civic authorities to a sense of his powers, and a host of envious competitors to obstruct him. Q. L.

11—"Twas impious then (so much was age revered)
For youth to keep their seats when an old man appeared."

This is the translation to a motto from Juvenal which heads one of Steele's papers on "Polite Behavior," where Sir Richard quotes the following pretty story, which I would very much like to trace to its origin: "It happened at Athens during a public representation of some play exhibited in honor of the commonwealth, that an old gentleman came too late for a place suitable for his age and quality. Many of the young gentlemen, who observed the difficulty and confusion he was in, made signs to him that they would accommodate him if he came where they sat. The good man bustled through the crowd accordingly; but when he came to the seats to which he was invited, the jest was to sit close, and expose him as he stood out of countenance to the whole audience. The frolic went round all the Athenian benches. But on those occasions there were also particular places assigned for foreigners. When the good man skulked toward the boxes appointed for the Lacedæmonians, that honest people, more virtuous than polite, rose up all to a man, and, with the greatest respect, received him among them. The Athenians, being suddenly touched with a sense of the Spartan virtue and their own degeneracy, gave a thunder of applause, and the old man cried out, 'The Athenians understand what is good, but the Lacedæmonians practice it.'" EDW. M. HENRY.

12—WHAT authority is there for the popular legend concerning skiagraphy as the origin of portrait painting? A. H. M.

There is a translation by Lodge of Winckelman's "History of Ancient Art," methodized into two volumes, and published by J. R. Osgood & Co., Boston. No one disputes Winckelman's authority about the classic periods; but only a very small portion is devoted to painting in its earliest state. The legend by Pliny which relates the delineation of a shadow or a shade runs thus: The daughter of a certain Dibutades, a potter of Sicyon, at Corinth, struck with the shadow of her lover, who was about to leave her, cast by her lamp upon the wall, drew its outline with such force and fidelity that her father cut away the plaster within the outline, and took an impression from the wall in clay, which he baked with the rest of his pottery. But there are numerous other claimants, Dr. William Smith reminds us, to the honor of having invented skiagraphy.

13—WHERE are these two stanzas, touching the execution of a French woman Communist to be found? Apparently she was one of a group sentenced to be shot:

"Powder and bread
Gave out together;
Droll! to be dead
In this bright weather!"

"Jean, boy, we might Have married in June!
This the wall? Right!
Vive la commune!"

14—WILL any one of your readers oblige me with a description of the piece of plate used by the French sovereigns and wealthy nobles in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries called a "neff"? The French metal work of the fourteenth century was highly prized throughout all Europe.
M. P.

15—(a) I AM, or rather was, a mechanic, and worked at my trade for nearly four years; but so many of my friends thought it such a degraded position, that I gave it up, and am now salesman in a wholesale store; but I find that in one thing the mechanic is on top of the ladder—he is comparatively independent. Now, I cannot understand why mechanics are looked down on in the United States, so that they are not so well received socially as clerks. I left school young, but have taken to reading, and have quite a library of my own. (b) What is the most suitable age for a man to get married? I am twenty years old, and would like to marry as soon as I can afford it. Do you think it advisable?
N. O. L. A.

(a) The tendency of people to separate into social classes, according to their several modes of earning a living, is so general that it may be termed universal. It is based on the great natural law that we become more or less like those with whom we associate, and find the companions of our leisure hours among those with whom we are thrown in our daily employments. That a clerk has a better chance socially than a mechanic has is probably true, and it is one of the many absurdities of which modern social life is full. The mechanic is often the better man of the two, morally, physically and intellectually, and it is to be feared that the true reason why society prefers the clerk is the very superficial one of clothing and personal appearance. The clerk can, if he likes, dress so that he will look nearly as well as a millionaire. This the mechanic cannot very well do without taking a deal of trouble. The reason is a very poor one, but its force is indisputable. (b) It is impossible to give a definite answer to this, because of the infinite differences that are possible in character and circumstances. Twenty-five years is commonly regarded as a good average for a man; but the one great essential is to know whether or no you have found the right woman. When she is found the mere question of age is of small consequence.

16—WHAT is the correct costume for a groom at a twelve o'clock (noon) wedding? Are gloves and white necktie admissible? By answering you will oblige a constant reader.

P. W. B.

Gloves and white ties are generally associated with evening dress, which is "inadmissible" before six o'clock P. M. or thereabout. For a twelve o'clock wedding the best taste would indicate a frock coat, plain tie or scarf, and either no gloves at all or such as one might wear in the street.

17—THERE is in Robert Burns' poems a sentence which reads thus: "Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn." Will you please say whether this sentence or idea is found anywhere else, and if the word "thousands" is changed to "millions"? It is claimed that it is so in either Shakespeare or Cowper, but we are unable to find it.
A. S. B.

Will some one who knows please answer?

REFERENCE CALENDAR.

[THIS COLUMN IS INTENDED AS A RECORD FOR REFERENCE, NOT AS A SUMMARY OF CURRENT NEWS.]

March 7.—The envoys from the Queen of Madagascar to the Government of the United States were officially received by the President in Washington, having previously ratified the treaty as proposed by U. S. Consul Robinson two years since. At present there are indications that France will declare war against Madagascar, with a view to establishing her own supremacy.

[See "Three Visits to Madagascar," by W. Ellis, Philadelphia, J. E. Potter; "History of M., " Am. S. S. Union; J. Pfeiffer, "Travels in M., " N. Y., Harpers'; Harpers' Magazine, Vol. XVIII, p. 586; Scribner's Monthly, Vol. I, p. 639].

March 8.—The funeral of Alexander H. Stephens, late Governor of Georgia, took place in Atlanta. It is estimated that eighty thousand persons witnessed the procession.

[The principal literary works of Mr. Stephens are: "A Constitutional View of the Late War Between the States," "A Review of the War Between the States," "Reviewers Reviewed," "A History of the United States." See also "A. H. Stephens in Public and Private Life, with Letters and Speeches," The Nation, Vol. II, p. 519, and Vol. XXVII, p. 241. A sketch of Mr. Stephens will be published in No. 64 of THE CONTINENT, with portraits and other illustrations].

March 9.—A Socialistic outbreak occurred in Paris, and like disturbances threatened other parts of France and certain of the Spanish provinces. In Paris the military was called out and a number of arrests were made. It was resolved by the authorities that foreigners who were concerned in the riots should be expelled from the country.

[See Scribner's Monthly, Vol. XVI, p. 387; Penn Monthly, Vol. X, p. 285; The Nation, Vol. XXVII, p. 207; Old and New, Vol. VIII, p. 422-525; "Nordhoff's Communistic Societies of the U.S.," N. Y., Harpers'; "J. H. Noyes' History of American Socialism," Lippincott].

March 10.—M. Coumoudouras, a Greek statesman of worldwide repute, died in Athens. For twenty years he has been a leader in the affairs of modern Greece.

[See "The Greeks of To-Day," by C. K. Tuckerman, G. P. Putnam's Sons, N. Y.; "Modern Greece," by H. M. Baird, Harpers', N. Y.; Contemporary Review, Vol. XXXVI, p. 164].

March 11.—A great indignation meeting was held by the Socialists in Paris.—Prince Gortschakoff, ex-Chancellor of the Russian Empire, died at Baden-Baden. He was born in Moscow, in 1798, and has been engaged in the diplomatic service of successive Russian sovereigns ever since he came of age. He was a warm friend of the United States during the civil war.—The three days ending with March 11th will be remembered as the period assigned for a "planet-shaking" storm by a Canadian "weather prophet." Many millions of people put faith in his forecasts, and sought to assure their own personal safety in various ways. An ordinary March storm occurred within the limit named, but there was nothing of a generally terrific nature.

[See articles on "Meteorology" in Nature, Popular Science Monthly and American Journal of Science].

March 15.—A violent explosion, generally supposed to have been the work of Irish "patriots," occurred in the Local Government Board Offices in London.

March 17.—Lady Florence Dixie reported an alleged attempt upon her life by masked ruffians near London, whom she supposed to be Irish "patriots." She is generally believed to be the victim of hallucination.

March 19.—In the Canadian House of Commons, a resolution was carried favoring the re-enactment of a reciprocity treaty on the basis of that of 1854, the mover holding that the United States is the natural market for the surplus Canadian produce, and that the throwing open of the fisheries will furnish an equivalent for the balance of trade.

[See "Reciprocity Treaties," Penn Monthly, Vol. V, p. 529; Hunt's Merchants' Magazine, Vol. XII, p. 282].

March 22.—The body of John Howard Payne, author of "Home, Sweet Home," was landed in New York, and received with suitable ceremonies.

[He was the author of a number of dramas—"Ali Pasha," "Charles II," "Clari," etc.—which are published by E. S. French. His most important play is "Brutus; or, The Fall of Tarquin," published by Munsell. [See Every Saturday, Vol. X, pp. 505-515].

March 25.—Postmaster-General Timothy O. Howe died.

March 28.—Gen. A. B. Buford died in Chicago, aged 76 years.

April 4.—Peter Cooper died in New York, aged 93 years.

April 5.—A number of arrests of Fenian suspects took place in England, and great excitement prevailed on account of alleged incendiary plots against the government.

Oh, mother, I am perfectly wretched! Robert is a villain! We were so happy, and now the canker-worm of—you know what the poet says the canker-worm does to the peaceful household. We were so happy; Robert gave me everything I asked for, and was the most indulgent of husbands—and now I am a forsaken wife. I feel, dear mother, just as Modjeska looks in the play when she sinks down with a stony stare and her dress drapes around her so beautifully. My dress won't drape at all, though I have sunk down lots of times. I must tell you all about it. You see Robert has been in the habit lately of staying down town on business until quite late; he said that important contracts were being decided and he would make lots and lots of money, and could sign his check next year for a hundred thousand dollars if everything went well; though I don't see why he should wait until next year to do that, for he has a number of check-books in the house which look the easiest thing in the world to fill out: he showed me how once. I'm sure I could sign one for as many figures as the line would hold, but he never lets me; he says I don't understand business, but I'm sure I understand an easy thing like that. I didn't think anything of this, until now; in the light of later facts, I can see that he does not love me enough to let me keep a pretty check-book of my own. But as I was saying, I did not think anything of his staying away late, until yesterday, when he left his office coat at home for me to send to the tailor's to be made over or something—have a new breadth put in the back, I think. And speaking of breadths, mother, you ought to see my new Paris dress with the gold embroidery down the skirt, with ever so many flounces of lace and the most lovely buttons. Well, as I was looking at it (I mean his coat) a bill dropped out of an inside pocket—an inside pocket—just think of it! I don't know how it came to fall out, for I am sure I would not do such a thing as to rummage into my husband's pockets. A lot of other things fell out too from all the other pockets, but they were only money and things. I took the bill up, and the strangest thing is that it persisted in flying right open before my eyes without my ever touching it. And what do you think it was? Oh, mother! that I, your daughter, nurtured in the exclusive east wind of dear old Boston should be so disgraced. It was this bill from Mme. Dougan, the milliner, which I enclose, my husband's name as plain as can be; and only to think of it, a bonnet to Miss B. at her house. Oh, the shame of it! If it had been a diamond pin now, or a horse and carriage, it would not have been so bad—but a bonnet! Oh, the brazen huzzy! Miss B. indeed! I should like to scratch her eyes out! I know she is some insignificant doll-faced, long seal-skin-ulster girl. And, mother, suppose he knew her when we were engaged. Oh, I shall die! I know I shall! We have only been married six months. He must have known her. What shall I do? I have taken off all the jewels he has given me except my diamond ear-rings: they are too pretty to give back; he would only send them to Miss B., I suppose. Yes, I will keep them just to spite him. I have packed up all my dresses that he has bought for me, except my last new one, the Paris one—you ought to see it, mother. Now write at once and tell me what to do. Your own

LITTLE CARRIE.

P. S. It fits me beautifully, and of course I must have something to cover my back.

MR. WILSON—

SIR: I leave your roof, which cannot shelter me any longer. I go to my dear mother who will protect her outraged child. More than widowed, and with a broken heart, I cast down the idol which was enshrined in my heart. Go to your Miss B.

Farewell for ever,

YOUR DECEIVED WIFE.

GENTLEMEN. I desire you to commence an action for the divorce of my daughter, Caroline Wilson, from her husband, Robert A. Wilson, of New York, alimony to be arranged for as large an amount as possible. I should desire matters to be expedited, and will place myself and daughter in your hands, to do whatever you may direct. We, of course, should desire the affair to be arranged without publicity if possible. I enclose the document, a bill from a Mme. Dougan, milliner, which will be our principal piece of documentary evidence, and I also enclose a short statement of the actions of Mr. R. A. Wilson which have compelled us to take this step.

Very respectfully yours, ELLEN E. ARMSTRONG.

ROBERT A. WILSON, Esq.—

SIR: In pursuance of the instructions of our client, Caroline Wilson, of the City of Boston, County of Suffolk, State of Massachusetts, we forward herewith the charges and specifications of an application for divorce and alimony for the aforesaid Caroline Wilson from Robert A. Wilson. We shall be pleased to be referred to your attorney, who will doubtless file your answer within the succeeding twenty days. We have the honor to be

Your most obedient servants, DOEM AND SHARP.

NEW YORK, Nov. 9, 1882.

DEAR MRS. ARMSTRONG: Have you all gone crazy? What infernal nonsense is this you are playing? My business presses me so that I cannot leave, or I should be in Boston. If this is a joke it has gone far enough. First, Carrie leaves me a most enigmatical epistle, in which she says "Go to your Miss B.," and saying she is going home to her mother. Perhaps it is a laudable desire on her part to wish to see her mother, but why does she insist on my going to see a Miss B.? What Miss B.? I fear Carrie is not well; be sure and have advice from your old family physician. I sent Dr. Brooks to see her the day she left on this remarkable trip, but he tells me he did not see her. Next, I received a letter that I wrote her, returned with "unopened" written on the envelope in her writing. Then some lawyer firm send a most astounding document for me to answer through counsel: said document being charges upon which are based an application for divorce by one Caroline Wilson, wife of Robert A. Wilson, etc., etc., which also bristles over with the remarkable "Miss B." Confound it, I can stand a deal, and I like a joke, but this suits me too well. What possessed Carrie to run off to Boston without warning, just on the eve of her birthday too? I had bought her a bonnet of Mme. Dougan, and her friend, Miss Bond, was keeping it for me. I wanted to surprise her with it. For Heaven's sake, write or come home with Carrie at once. I am nearly crazy with anxiety about her and my business combined. It was the very worst time she could have chosen to launch out into the role of humorist, for I see my way clear to make a fortune if I can attend certain meetings for the next few days. Telegraph me or do something at once. Yours anxiously,

ROBERT.

P. S. I enclose a letter which came for Carrie the other day.

1200 FIFTH AVE., Nov. 6, 1882.

MA CHÈRE: I did not see you at Mrs. Bellows' ball last night. I hope you are not ill. Everybody was there—the Watkyns, the Bruyngies—everybody. Mrs. Watkyns wore a lovely shrimp pink satin with the skirt looped with diamond ornaments that were worth at least ten thousand dollars. I wore that new dress I showed you when you were here the other day. You remember, of course—the pale blue with the real Spanish lace, and I fear I have completely ruined it. That clumsy Dick Bellows was passing me a glass of wine, and he spilled it right down the front and made two fearful spots. He looked frightened to death—you know he is just from college—but I told him it was nothing, and waltzed with him afterwards to make him feel that I forgave him. They say he is very rich in his own name. No, there is nothing between Mr. Harper and myself. I perfectly detest him, and I wish people would stop talking about us. Even if he did dance twice with me the other evening (he is a beautiful partner), it is no reason why everybody's tongue should begin to run. I declare, my tongue is running. I sat down to write this to ask you to come over to my house to-morrow. I've got something wonderful to show you. It belongs to a friend of mine, and her husband is going to give it to her for a birthday present. It is the loveliest bonnet—oh! there now, I've told you what it is, and I know your husband would be very angry if he knew I had told—gracious! now I've told you who it is for. How stupid! I never could keep a secret. You remember at school I used to tell everything. But do come over and see it; it is just too lovely. You know Dougan does get the most stunning things sometimes. By the way, I met Elsie last night. You remember her at school. Well, you know she married that rich Tom Chamberlin last year, and had such a swell wedding and such a trousseaux from Paris. Well, as I was saying, I met her last night, and would you believe it—but of course you wouldn't—she had on precisely the same dress she wore last fall at Mrs. Howard's ball. I was never so much taken aback in my life. They do say he has failed, but Mr. Williams failed the other day and his wife has got a number of new diamonds, but I never did understand business, did you? How I do run on! Now don't forget to come over to-morrow early, and then we will go out to luncheon at Del's. Mother sends love.

Your own

MARION.

DEAREST HUBBY: I shall see you before you get this, but I must write to tell you how absurd it all is and how foolish, and what a little goosey I have been. But you'll forgive me, won't you, my darling boy? there's a good fellow. You see it was all on account of that coat you left at home, and which had that horrid bill for my birthday bonnet. You naughty fellow, why didn't you tell me who Miss B. was? It must be lovely. Marion—just think of my not thinking that Miss B. meant Marion, when I have known her for all these years, and, indeed, we played together and went to school and the French convent together, and she was one of my bridesmaids, and I was to be one of hers only I was married first as you know—wasn't it absurd? Well, Marion writes that the bonnet is perfectly lovely, and no one of our set has anything like it, and I must send you a kiss right here at this moment for it, and will give you more when I see you, which will be, as I said before, before you get this; but I am so happy and glad that we are not going to be divorced, and that those horrid lawyers won't publish everything in the papers, so that I shall not be able to hold my head up for shame. I shall never be jealous again. I—but mother says the carriage is here—I was only going to say—but I shall see you before you can get this anyway.

With lots of love and kisses, YOUR LITTLE WIFEY.

Mr. Wilson presents his compliments to Mme. Dougan, and will deem it a favor if she will request her bookkeeper to abstain in future from using any more abbreviations in his or her correspondence with Mr. Wilson or family than are required for a proper economy of his or her doubtless extraordinarily valuable time. The simple fact of having used an initial instead of a full name in account rendered November 5th, ultimo, has already cost Mr. Wilson some fifty dollars, more or less, and he has reason to anticipate an attorney's bill amounting to several hundred dollars more.

Whole No. 64

MICHAEL MUNKACSY.

WHEN Michael Munkacsy's now world-famous picture of "Christ Before Pilate" was first exhibited in Paris, in June 1881, its appearance caused a veritable art sensation. No such fire of criticism had been aroused by any picture painted within our century. In its conception and execution, the "Christ" was a daring innovation. All foregone traditions were cast aside. It was an audacious handling of a subject hitherto attempted on any large or ambitious scale only by the great artists of the Renaissance. As a creation it was as novel and original as if Tintoretto had never dreamed or Rembrandt handled a brush. The dominant note of its originality was its modernness. Here was a picture at last which gave an entirely new and nineteenth-century rendering to an ideal subject. This "Christ" had the stamp of the century upon it. Such a work could only have been produced in an age of religious doubt and intellectual freedom. As such, it was claimed by radicals as the great picture which had finally appeared to typify the naturalistic tendencies of the age. Realists hailed in Munkacsy the genius who had come to free art, ideal art, from classical and religious trammels and superstitions.

On the other hand, the "Christ" aroused a storm of adverse criticism from those who had neither admiration or even tolerance for the new school of naturalism; who attack from the highest standpoint of critical grounds the introduction of realism into the domain of art. To believers and idealists this new picture stood as the embodiment of the most demoralizing intellectual teachings of the age.

But whatever the verdict awarded the picture upon ethical grounds, there was no question as to its merits as a work of art. Its harshest critics and detractors admitted its greatness as a production. It was universally regarded, both by the press and the Parisian public, as one of the first pictures of the century, if not, indeed, the very first.

In France it is no idle boast that art has no country. Michael Munkacsy was Hungarian, having no claim upon French pride or French patriotism. He was only one among the thousands who have chosen Paris as their adopted home, drawn thither by the irresistible spell of its art fascinations. Yet, when through his new picture, the artist achieved the greatness of glory and success which crowns genius, Paris fêted the fever, and exclaimed, amid the tumultuous applause of the three hundred guests, "This is my speech!"

But the greatest triumphs which greeted the artist were those tendered him by his own countrymen. After the close of the exhibition in Paris, the "Christ" was sent to Buda-Pesth on its way to Vienna. Shortly afterward Munkacsy determined to visit his native country. The story of his reception there reads like one of those Hungarian as enthusiastically as if he had been born a Frenchman. It is this heartiness and generosity of response to creative talent which makes Paris the only Athens of our day—the true nursery and home of the ideal.

At one of the many banquets given to Munkacsy in those first days of his triumph, a little incident occurred delightfully characteristic, not only of that French emotionalism at which it pleases us to smile, but also proving the large generosity of French feeling. Jules Breton, the celebrated painter, was called upon for a toast. In response to the invitation, he rose, approached Munkacsy, threw his arms about him with true Gallic beautiful old tales of mediæval enthusiasm—such a tale as comes down to us from the time, six hundred years ago, when all Florence joined in the procession which, with festal music and streaming banners, bore Cimabue's wondrous Madonna from the painter's house to its resting-place in the dark little Chapel of Santa Maria della Novella. For Munkacsy also, in these days of nineteenth-century prose, there was the poetic pean of music and festal pageantry. His entrance into a city was like that of a king. His advent was the signal for an ovation. On reaching Buda-Pesth, the whole city turned out to do him honor, municipal and clerical authorities preceding the brilliant cortège of young girls who flung flowers in his path, and of citizens and art-students who rent the air with their "bravas!"

In the Palais des Arts, where his "Christ" was on exhibition, he was led, there to be crowned by the venerable archbishop, who addressed him in language which matched well with the old-time enthusiasm of his reception: "Great compatriot! illustrious citizen! we salute thee with respect! Thou art the great Magyar painter! Thou art the painter anointed by genius! We present to thee a crown for thy triumphal return to Hungary. Receive it as the homage of our admiration inspired by as unknown to the throng of English, German and American visitors as it appeared unpronounceable to the French and Italian critics. But there was no mistaking the strength of the artist's genius. The "Milton" was declared to be, both by the press and the public, the picture of the exhibition, and the art judge ratified the verdict by awarding it the honor of the Grand Prix. With this sudden celebrity fresh interest was naturally enough awakened in the other pictures sent by Munkacsy to the exhibition. In these, "Les Recrues Hongrois" and "L'Intérieur de l'Atelier," thy genius." Certain episodes in Rubens' romantic career alone furnish a parallel to this picture of overwhelming adulation.

The interest in the history and career of the man who has evoked such a recognition of his genius deepens when it is known that no longer ago than 1878 he had barely been heard of by the great world. Previous to the Paris International Exhibition, where his "Milton" brought him into sudden fame, Munkacsy had been known among certain circles of painters and the concenti of Paris and Germany as an artist who had produced some clever genre pictures. But he ranked no higher than a dozen other clever genre painters. Among the masterpieces that filled the art galleries of the exhibition, however, there was one picture so striking in its power and originality as to excite universal admiration. It was signed Michael Munkacsy, a name almost the artist displayed a versatility both of method and of fancy, and a breadth of scope which proved that the extent of his gamut was a wide one. No scene could be imagined in more marked contrast to the finish and poetic treatment of the "Milton" than the realistic figures dashed in with a con furioso touch composing the group in "Les Recrues." In "L'Intérieur" an equally distinct note of originality was struck. Here was an entirely new treatment of a genre subject, as unique in style and as novel in character as Fortuny's famous "interiors;" but this picture had none of that painter's rococo extravagances, recalling, on the contrary, the finish and the repose of those older masters whose methods were at once so simple and so subtle.

In a very marked degree Munkacsy's art has followed his fortunes. In the early days of his poverty and obscurity he painted those mournful figures and landscapes—reproductions of scenes from his native country—which won for him his first successes. But of late years, since his days of opulence, his canvases have reproduced, in a somewhat unusual degree, the splendor which characterizes his life. It may, indeed, be doubted whether the secret of much of Munkacsy's success in solving some of the difficulties of his art is due to the fact that latterly fortune has placed him in the midst of splendid surroundings. It is questionable whether if he had remained poor he would ever have risen to greatness, in the sense that Millet became great in despite of his poverty. Munkacsy has the orientalist's love of magnificence, and an actual need of it as a source of artistic inspiration. As Wagner composed best when seated in a room splendidly upholstered, Munkacsy has a like impressibility to surroundings. He paints best amidst gold and velvet; and rich stuffs and beautiful objets d'art are as stimulating to him as wine is to others. He does not possess the glowing, luxuriant imagination of Delacroix or Rubens. He is a realist; he is at his best with his subjects before him, and when his milieu is in harmony with his tastes. It is certain, for instance, that he could never have painted the gorgeous mise-en-scène of the "Christ" amidst poor or mean surroundings. The pictures which have made him famous, the "Milton" and this "Christ Before Pilate," are the products of his princely days, since he dwells in one of the most sumptuous of Parisian houses, and paints in a studio as beautiful as a page out of the Arabian Nights' dream.

Munkacsy's house is in the centre of the new Parnassus, which of late years has sprung into being as if by enchantment, in the Parc Monceau quarter. Painters and authors, actors and sculptors, have forsaken their classic haunts at Montmartre and the Place Clichy for the art-Canaan which centres about the Place Malesherbes and Avenue de Villiers. The Hungarian painter has bought a large brick dwelling on the latter boulevard. Outwardly the house presents no exceptionally imposing appearance, but inside it is a palace for princes to envy.

The studio proper is situated at the top of the house, and to reach it one passes a noble hallway and several flights of wide stairs, which, in the language of modern artist-upholsterers, are beautifully "treated;" the portières, stained glass windows, eastern rugs and armor forming a mélange of rich, subdued and most harmonious tints.

Upon first entering the studio one is neither conscious of the noble proportions nor of the admirable lighting of this beautiful room. The eye is dazzled by the gorgeousness of the decorations. A carnival of color meets the glance. If the Orient, with the richest treasures of its tints and stuffs, had been poured into Munkacsy's studio, no more thoroughly eastern effect, both in sumptuous splendor and originality of contrast, could have been produced. This is indeed the ideal studio, where profusion seems to beget a most artistic confusion, and where the useful and the splendid combine in unexpected picturesqueness.

The room, large and lofty in width and height, is fitted up in the style of the German Renaissance. There are splendid bits of carving in the great wooden fireplace in the oaken gallery which, five or six feet from the ceiling, runs along the south side of the room, and over the balustrade of which are thrown rare tapestries and Venetian rugs. In one corner of the room stands an antique carved pulpit, the rescued relic of some old monastery. There are also two beautiful twisted columns supporting the lintel of a great doorway, interesting as specimens of early French carving. But the studio borrows its greatest splendor from the eastern stuffs which crowd every nook and corner. Over the Algerian tabourets, the inlaid tables, the divans and ottomans are strewn garments of strange hues and marvelous fashion—Chinese embroidered robes, silvered burnous, Japanese scarfs and caftas stiff with their gold and silver flowers and birds. Even from the ceiling depend delicate crêpes and dainty amber-colored gauzes. Silken draperies screen doors; and Chinese screens of all imaginable colors, dense with pictorial embroideries, crowd every corner of the vast apartment. To relieve the eye, which otherwise would become fatigued before such a world of opulence in color, the walls are dark, irregularly covered with sketches, portraits, ceramics and cabinets. On several of the tables are giant hot-house plants, spreading palms and stately cacti, or tall vases filled with flowers.

On the occasion of our first visit to the studio it chanced to be the painter's reception day. The room was filled with groups of richly-dressed Parisiennes, whose Worth costumes were in curious contrast to the oriental character of their surrounding, producing one of those bizarre effects the late craze for orientalism has brought into fashion. Critics and artists were there also in full force, hovering among whom, in the zeal of her hospitable spirit, was Madame Munkacsy, whose beautiful toilet of peacock plush suggested the plumage of some rare tropical bird. To this bouquet of color was added the rich liveries of lackeys, assiduously passing coffee, gorgeous in their crimson satin waistcoats and gold-embroidered coats. Such a scene might have tempted the brush of Paul Veronese, and one could wish that Munkacsy may be inspired to reproduce on a larger and grander scale than "La Visite à Bébé" and "Les Deux Familles," a transcription of the brilliant splendor of a similar modern scene, which recalls, by its opulence and elegance, the days of Venetian magnificence. The chief topic of discussion was the recently finished "La Fête à Papa," which was standing upon the large easel, and which one veteran critic pronounced to be "La perfection de la coquetterie." Then the talk turned to the "Christ," which was just then the great art sensation in Paris. Munkacsy himself was one of this little group, and listened with much earnestness and interest to all that was said. Then, after a little, when the conversation turned upon the figure of "Christ," and a discussion arose as to the precise meaning to be read in the attitude, he began to explain what he had himself attempted to typify in his creation.

"I wanted to paint a man, not a God. How can one paint a God? It is impossible. Besides, it was the human, not the mystic, side of Christ's character which attracted me. One can only paint what one feels."

This and much more was said with a simplicity and directness which are the chief characteristics of Munkacsy's manner. In conversation especially he possesses this first of personal charms. His simplicity is as unstudied as it is effective in putting others at their ease. Though neither a brilliant nor a particularly fluent talker, the rapidity of his speech perhaps hindered by his use of a foreign tongue, Munkacsy seldom fails to talk freely about what concerns his art. He displays an eagerness and naturalness, when such subjects are touched upon, we are apt to associate with the more youthful period of a man's enthusiasms; but, in point of fact, what artist ever grows old? Munkacsy, so far from being old, has not as yet reached the term of years appointed to a man's complete maturity. He is thirty-six, though both face and figure would suggest the forties; for he has the rounded back of the diligent worker, and the face has the pallor that proclaims a severe strain on the vital forces. The face is itself of the pure Magyar type—high cheek-bones, bulging forehead, prominent lips, and eyes so small but of such tremendous shining qualities that they can alone be compared to the Mongolian. These are not the features of a dreamer nor of an idealist; they belong to the order of genius that gives us the radicals, the creators, the innovators. Munkacsy is all of these, his Magyar blood and ancestry bequeathing to him a heritage of daring courage and adventurousness in his aims and conceptions.

The story of the painter's early life has found its way into print, the various versions of which bear so little relation to the truth that a kind of Munkacsy legend has been invented. Yet the truth is romantic enough to have no need of biographer's embellishments. This truth we were fortunate enough to hear from Munkacsy himself. One morning, happening to call at the studio at an early hour—early, that is, for late-rising Paris—and taking advantage of a tête-à-tête freedom of talk to recount to him an amusing fabrication concerning his earlier career which had lately appeared in a Western newspaper, Munkacsy, after a hearty laugh, said:

"I presume you have never heard the real facts of my life, so many untruths are published; yet the truth is simple enough. My father was a Hungarian tax-gatherer, and I am one of five children. During the Hungarian Revolution he was thrown into prison, as were many others, by the Prussians. He had refused to give up the tax-money which he had in his cash-box, and suffered for his honesty. My mother died when I was quite young. We children were thus left adrift till five uncles and aunts charitably came to our assistance. One of us went to live with each. I was sent to live with an aunt at Czarba. One day a band of brigands entered our house, and, after pillaging and destroying everything they could lay hands on, they beat my aunt so cruelly that she died. I managed to escape. An uncle residing at Arad consented to take charge of me after this event. He was a farmer in a very small way, not rich enough to spend much money on my education, so that when I was ten years old he put me to work at a joiner's, where I spent seven of the most unhappy years of my life. While I was at the joiner's, I fell ill of a fever, and perhaps to this misfortune or chance I may attribute the change in my career. I was sent home to my uncle's to be nursed. The intermittent fever from which I was suffering left me intervals of comparative health. When I was not too ill I used to amuse myself by drawing and painting, and I developed a prodigious taste for writing execrable verses. In fact, I dreamed I was a poet. But fate decreed I was to be a painter; for my uncle, seeing one day some of my crude drawings, thought it just as well to let me have a few lessons—with a view to the joinery business.

"There happened just then to be a clever painter called Szamosi in the town. One day he saw some of my crude efforts and they pleased him. He advised me strongly to give up carpentry and try art. My uncle, of course, opposed the idea, but to no purpose. Szamosi and I left him one morning and went off to Arad, where for some time we lived and worked together, and where I learned of my good Professor the elements and some of the difficulties of art.

"Had I known the difficulties earlier," said Munkacsy here with a grave smile, "I question whether I should ever have become a painter.

"This happened in 1861. Szamosi taught me not only drawing, but literature and history. He was, indeed, as kind as a father to me. People often annoy me by saying that I was the pupil of an itinerant sign-painter, and so on. The fact is, Szamosi (who is still alive and doing well in Hungary) was and is a good painter and an excellent teacher. He is the only master I ever had.

"From Arad I went to Buda-Pesth (where I sent in some genre pictures to the Kunst Verein), and thence to Vienna. I had a hard life of it; working much and making very little. My intention in going to Vienna was to study with Professor Rath, but he died about that time, and I worked for some time alone at the Vienna Academy.

"On leaving it I spent two years at Munich, and thence proceeded to Düsseldorf, where I made the acquaintance of Kraus, and painted my first important picture, 'Le Dernier Jour d'un Condamné,' which, as you know, was sent to the Paris salon and carried off a medal. It was painted, I acknowledge, in the very dark manner with which I am often reproached. It was not until I came to Paris that I began to get rid of this fault. Paris has contributed much to my present success. Indeed, it has widened my views of art and rid me of my tendency to gloom."

It was not in this, but on still another day, that we learned how the painter came by his peculiar name. It was as Michka Liebs that he worked in the joiner's workshop, the latter being the family name; but upon his becoming an artist, he changed Munkacs, the name of the town in which he was born, to Munkacsy, adopting the latter as his artist appellation.

Among modern artists, perhaps none are more untraveled than Munkacsy. His own confession that, except of certain portions of Austria and Hungary, and a few of the Continental art cities, such as Munich, Düsseldorf and Paris, he had seen nothing, even of Europe, was surprising indeed—the more so, since in the "Christ" the grouping of the multitude suggests thorough familiarity and study of Eastern life and character. He has never even been to Italy, except for a single day passed at Venice.

His art has both suffered and gained by this loss. The "Christ," it is safe to say, would never had been given to the world in its present form had the artist had the originality of his conception in a certain measure impaired by a too intimate acquaintance with the masterpieces of Italian religious art. On the other hand, the great painting would unquestionably have gained something in unity, and its defects been the less pronounced, had the painter been enabled to make a study of the great masters a part of his early education.

Michael Munkacsy, in the growth and development of his art and genius, has passed through several quite distinctly marked processes, for his genius is of an eclectic order. It is also of such vigor and scope that its fullest expression could only be attained with the maturity of the artist's powers. These processes can be very easily traced and defined. The works produced in what may be termed his earlier manner were those painted when under the influence of l'école du noir, when, fresh from the Munich and Düsseldorf schools, he had become infected with their tendency to gloom. Munkacsy, though perhaps the most distinctly original artist of the century, has by no means escaped either the art influences or the contemporaneous mannerisms of the time. While of late years no painter has cut his way through the traditions of the school with more superb indifference to their dictates, or a higher scorn of all that fell short of original creation, still, like all other workers, he owes a large debt to his early training. His stay in Munich, and, more particularly, his study under the Munich painter, Kraus, tended greatly to develop his style, and his early "dark" manner is distinctly to be traced to these sources.

The pictures produced during this period—during his days of poverty, obscurity and even want—were "Les Rodeurs de Nuit," "Le Héros d'un Village," "Le Dernier Jour d'un Condamné," etc., being for the most part reproductions of scenes and incidents peculiar to the artist's native country. Coarse, half-civilized peasants, a wild, untamed landscape, straggling, bewildered-looking villages—such were the subjects of his brush in those earlier days, when the memories of his native land were fresh upon him. The chief qualities of these earlier pictures were their realism, the dramatic force displayed, and the capacity of the artist for investing a subject with the charm of poetic feeling. The longing to give utterance to an ardent poetic impulse, which, as a boy, prompted him to seek comfort in the writing of bad verse, in the tragic pathos of these scenes from Hungarian life found its fuller expression. These pictures were poems, in a word—poems of passion, of heroism, and, oftener still, of despair. The most famous of these, "Le Dernier Jour d'un Condamné," which won a medal at the Salon of 1868, is replete with a truly tragical intensity. The picture shows the interior of a dungeon, filled with a gaping, curious crowd of townspeople and peasants, who, in accordance with an old Hungarian custom, which allows a condemned man, on the eve of his execution, to be exposed to satisfy public curiosity, have come to take a look at the prisoner. The condemned man, the very embodiment of a last hope, with peculiar radiance against the blacks and deep browns with which they are contrasted. It is such effects as these which make the picture luminous. But for strong, deep color and a truly rich harmony, one turns from these more radiant lights to the warm tints of the Oriental draperies, to the sober splendor of the high-priest's robes, to the superb cloaks and tunics of the Jewish populace. Never, on a modern canvas, have such an orgie and tints and hues been presented to the eye; all the resources of a true colorist's palette have been exhausted in producing these varied harmonies, these delicate, tender tones, these deep, strong contrasts.

It may be because Munkacsy has reproduced for us, by means of these rich costumes and appointments, something of the accredited splendor of the East, that, in his creation, the Jewish character seems to have found a new expositor. Though the subject is as old as Christendom, we seem for the first time to make acquaintance with that Jewish people who crucified the Lord. No other painter has reproduced, on a single canvas, types so complete and individual as to embody all the complex characteristics of that strange people. Here are the elders, self-complacent, confident, disdainful; here the disputatious doctors; the sensuous Seducers, the arrogant and jealous Pharisees, and, as the very embodiment of the majesty and pride of a people "chosen of God," stands the high-priest, one of the noblest figures ever painted.

And then the people, the passionate, ignorant, excitable people, with their curiously wayward and impulsive natures: one day bearing Jesus in triumph to the city, with palms and branches, as the maker of miracles and the speaker of Divine prophecies, and the next, with furious clamor and the rage of hate, demanding his death as their right. These, in all the extravagance of their importunate anger and unfeeling cruelty, Munkacsy has admirably portrayed. All the varying notes of passion are to be read in these wild gestures, sneering lips and scornful features. Even the accent of pity is not forgotten. Above the mocking, brutal crowd, a little removed, stands the figure of a young and beautiful woman, holding her babe in her arms, eyeing the Saviour with tender, mournful look, as if, in the Divine compassion of her great woman's heart, she would fain save Him who had raised the fallen Magdalens and had preferred Mary to Martha.

But the main centres of interest in the picture are, naturally, the two figures of Christ and Pilate—Christ as prisoner, awaiting his doom, and Pilate in the act of listening to the accusations brought against him. Munkacsy, with fine dramatic instinct, has chosen the moment of conflict in Pilate's mind when, confronted with the undeniable proofs of Christ's guilt from the Jewish standpoint, he is yet unable to justify his own sense of justice in condemning him. This expression of mental conflict is finely rendered. But, it must be confessed, Pilate's face is one of the disappointments of the picture. It is the face of a Roman of the decadence, of the time of Nero and Caracalla, rather than that belonging to the first century of the empire, when the victories and heroic deeds of the republic kept the race still grandly noble. This Pilate is a cruel, licentious, tyrannical dictator, very different indeed from the man the Evangelists have painted for us—the man of subtle intelligence and real largeness of nature, whose "What is Truth" proved at least his belief in it, yet of such credulity he must needs listen to his wife's warning as she had related her dream, and who possessed so lively a conscience he could not bear the stain upon his hands of an innocent man's blood, and when forced to condemn him, washes them publicly.

If Pilate's face does not agree with the generally received conception, the figure, attitude and drapery leave nothing to be desired. The attitude is singularly impressive, being remarkable for its simple dignity. And the drapery is sculpturesque. It has the breadth of fold the Greeks made use of when they wished to depict power.

It has been remarked by some critics that there is no indication in the surroundings or attire of Pilate suggestive of the magnificence and pomp of a great Roman functionary. But pomp may be shown in more ways than one. Simple drapery may be as stately in its way as jewels or cloth of gold; while the very absence of imposing soldiery attending Pilate is but a surer evidence of the existence and stability of his power. The Romans, like the English, ruled less by force and more by prestige. One single Roman soldier pressing back, with disdainful gesture, the encroachment of the crowd, is eloquently suggestive of the degradation, politically, to which the Jewish nation had fallen.

In his "Christ," Munkacsy has painted none of the types hitherto accepted as representative. His is neither the severe Byzantine, nor the mystic Renaissance, nor the sturdy Herculean Christ of Rembrandt's day. They who come to find the embodiment of the God-man in this conception will turn away in disappointment. There is neither nimbus, nor celestial aureole, nor concourse of hovering angels. In this pale, ardent, calm-faced man one seeks in vain for any sign or suggestion of Divinity, of the dual nature of Him who was at once God and man. This strange Jesus is all human—a man, indeed, of like sorrows as ourselves—but no Redeemer of the world, no Saviour sent to die that men might live. It is rather the face of a reformer, a thinker, a radical; a man possessed of a glorious conviction, thrilling with a sense of its importance, and sublimely scornful of an ignorant world that would defeat the purpose of his life. The glance with which he confronts Pilate is marvelous in its expression of these mingled emotions. He gazes at him bitterly but proudly, unflinchingly; for the loftiness of His spiritual nature carries Him to heights of heroism undreamed of by His doubting judge. In the eye—that wondrous, ardent, flame-lit eye—is also to be read the burning zeal of the fanatic, whose fanaticism carries Him into the desert to scourge the flesh, and whose enthusiasm aureoles martyrdom with glory. By this glance He proclaims His superiority over the intellectual finesse of Pilate. And He dominates the crowd of His brutal countrymen by His attitude of superb indifference.

It is because of the modernness of this conception that Munkacsy's "Christ" stands alone. For the first time in art the exegetical Christ of Renan and Strauss, the Christ of modern unbelievers and scientists is embodied in ideal form. Realism has found its painter.

Since the first exhibition of the picture Munkacsy has entirely repainted the head of his Christ. In the first modeling, the human character was even more strongly marked than in its present individualization; which reminds us that it was not in deference to criticism that the original head was altered. For this we have the painter's word. "I had always intended to repaint it," he said once, when we touched upon this delicate point. "There was a touch of—what I can only term vulgarity in the first that did not please me. But—que voulez-vous?—I was tired, overwrought, exhausted, and anxious to exhibit my work. So I sent it away with all its imperfections on its head, resolving to alter it later. The present head has, I think, more nobility, though its general character is unchanged. Yes, it certainly is a man's head. Can we paint a God's? Yes, it is a realistic Christ! Je ne veux plus d'auréole, moi." I could not help replying that he could hardly have found a fitting aureole for this Christ.

Perhaps, had Munkacsy repainted the entire figure, some of its defects would have been less noticeable. Anatomically, the drawing is far from satisfactory. It is difficult, for instance, to believe that actual bone and muscle are hidden by the rigid white drapery which envelops the figure. In attempting to invest his personage with repose, he has made the body of Christ inanimate. Even the drapery gives no hint of motion. And thus the figure, which, from the magnitude of its importance, should be the most impressive among the agitated and impassioned crowd of spectators and actors, becomes in reality the least so.

One of the main defects in the picture, as a composition, lies in the fact that the interest is not sufficiently concentrated. There are in reality two points of interest—Christ and Pilate. The eye wanders hesitatingly from one to the other, and cannot rest on either. This may be accounted for, to some extent, by the fact that the artist, with not altogether happy boldness, has draped both these figures in white, and in whites of equal values. Christ naturally should have been clothed in white, but had Pilate's robe been of any other color historically admissible, the eye would have been insensibly attracted to the proper centre of the composition.

Another most noticeable defect is the prominence given to the ruffianly-looking man, who, with uplifted arms, is giving utterance to the cry, "Crucify him!" The violent action expressed in those wide, outstretched arms and hands greatly mars the unity of the movement in the picture. The crowd is neither sufficiently excited or tumultuous to give an excuse for the introduction of such violence. There is nothing, either in the grouping, action or gesture of the multitude which serves as a crescendo to this loud climax. And Munkacsy has given us, by means of the wide-open mouth and the expanded chest of the man, the impression of a cry so deafening that it must have drowned both the high-priest's accusation and the clamor of the rabble. This figure is, on the whole, offensive; the more so as it destroys, in great measure, the harmony of the composition by its extravagance, loudness, and general obtrusiveness of action.

But criticise as we may its defects and shortcomings, the great picture stands unequaled among modern works of art. It is destined to take its place in the galleries of the future with such masterpieces as Paul Veronese's "Feast of Cana," and Rembrandt's "Ronde de Nuit." Like these, it will be taken as the typical reproduction of the age.

A great French painter, in commenting upon its remarkable qualities and its equally remarkable defects, assigned it its true value when he said: "But what would you have? In spite of all its faults, it is the picture of the country!"

ANNA BOWMAN BLAKE.

THE OLD WITCH IN THE CHIMNEY.

I LIVE in a little old-fashioned house,

Brown and wrinkled and crabbed and low;

It's behind the age, you can easily see,

For the clocks are always slow;

The doors have each some trick of their own,—

There's a turn of the wrist you can learn, if you try,

But you ought to have lived in it all your life

To know it as well as I.

'Twas a moral squint in the builder's eye,—

The panes in the windows are far too small;

There are twists in the very floors; there are beams

In the ceiling and bumps in the wall;

There are queer little cupboards tucked away,

There are fireplaces big enough for ten,

And the old brick oven, so long disused,

Would bake for a dozen men.

You may laugh if you choose, but I give you my word

That doors will ope with no one near;

In the dead of night there are noises heard

That, to say the least, are queer;

They may lay it all to a flapping blind,

Or the creaking limb of a door-yard tree,

But I know there's a spell on all these things,

And it will not let them be.

In a wide half circle on winter nights

We draw our chairs to the glowing hearth,

When a weird long call from the chimney's mouth

Strikes cold across our mirth;

Mixed with sharp sleet and whistling wind,

With the wild white storm we dimly see,

In those winding alleys, steep and blind,

The old witch brews her tea.

'Tis the blackest draught that ever was brewed—

Black with bitter, strange herbs in the pot;

And it's stronger and stronger the longer it's stood,

All seething and bubbling and hot;

The old crone smokes her old clay pipe,

And upward and outward curl the rings;

She steeps her tea, and she nods her head,

And the kettle sings and sings.

The snow purrs soft at the window-pane,

And the cat purrs close to my ear;

I have curled myself up on the rug a while

The purring flames to hear;

I heard the old witch crooning a song—

A song with a charm to keep;

It waked up things that had slept too long,

And it sent me fast asleep!

CHAPTER XL.

CLEANSED FROM BLOOD-GUILTINESS.

"DEAD? Impossible!" was the exclamation of Miss Hunniwell, after a hurried explanation by the marshal. "Who could have killed him?"

"We have felt bound to hold this young man, who was found with the body," said the marshal almost apologetically.

The lady glanced keenly at Martin and asked, with that mixture of command and interrogation which the successful teacher is sure to acquire:

"Who found him with it?"

"Well, I and my deputy—that is, he gave the alarm and we ran to the place and found him supporting this man's head."

"And you—where were you when he called?"

"We were just entering the grounds."

"Just entering these grounds! Why, how long ago did this happen?"

"Only a short time—perhaps twenty minutes."

"And pray, sir, what were you doing on my premises at this hour of the night?"

"I am the United States Marshal for this district," said the official, somewhat pompously.

"Well?" ejaculated the unrelenting inquisitor, as she looked down upon him from the steps.

The moonlight showed a flush upon his cheek as he answered:

"I have a warrant for the arrest of a certain fugitive slave, and was directed by the claimant to meet him here upon the arrival of the train."

"And this young man—who is he?"

"I am Martin Kortright, ma'am," said he, answering for himself, and removing his hat as he did so.

"Ah! I am very glad to meet you," she said, stepping forward and giving him her hand. "You came upon the train in answer to my telegram?"

"Yes, ma'am," he replied.

"And you came out here—why?"

"I was somewhat alarmed by your dispatch, and thought I would come and look at the place without waiting for morning."

"I see; and in so doing you fell among thieves," said the lady severely. "I do not understand what has taken place in my absence," she continued, "but whether this man be dead or alive, this is not a fit place for him to remain. Bring him in."

She had rung the bell on her arrival, and a teacher with a pallid face that told of the terrors that had afflicted the gentle flock at Beechwood during the absence of the mistress, now answered her summons. Miss Hunniwell took the candle from her trembling hand, and, standing beside the open door, motioned to the men to enter. As they ascended the steps she directed her coachman to drive at once for a physician and an officer of the law.

The latter portion of her message was altogether needless. The anger of the good minister had grown into a flame when he learned the gravity of Amy's hurt. How the mistake should have arisen, or whether it was a mistake, he could not tell. The more he thought upon it the stronger grew his suspicion that Hilda was yet in danger. He lost no time, therefore, in letting certain of his neighbors, including the officers of the law in the village, know that a crime had been committed. The fear which he had entertained for a time as to the result of his own action had passed away, and he now only felt a renewed anxiety for the safety of Hilda and the capture of her abductors. The atmosphere of the little village was already charged with explosive material. The presence of the slave-hunters and something of the nature of their errand was well known in the town, and in many a household the evening prayer that night had contained an especially earnest petition for "them that are in bonds." The whole village seemed to rest in anticipation of exciting events. Men and women were awake and eager to know what had happened. Almost before he knew it the good minister found himself returning to the scene of the night's adventure with a band of resolute men, whose action was all the more significant because there were no threats or boasts to be heard among them. The constable had a pistol, or was supposed to have one, but except for walking-sticks and extemporized clubs wrenched from picket-fences or cut with the ever-ready pocket-knife from the overhanging elms that lined the streets, very few of them were armed. As they approached the place where the road leading to the seminary turned off to the left the sound of a vehicle rapidly driven over the frozen ground reached their ears. Then the hoof-strokes of a double team were heard upon the bridge. Some boys who had pushed on ahead of the main company gave the alarm.

"That's them!" "It's Bissett's grays!" "The kidnappers!" and other like cries were heard as the boys leaped the fences and sought shelter from attack. Instinctively the men formed a line across the road, and as the wagon rolled out of the darkness of the covered bridge into the moonlight, Marsden, who was the sole occupant of the carriage, could distinctly see their earnest faces and the hurried preparations that were being made to obstruct his course. For an instant he half-checked the horses in their sweeping trot. Then he saw that it was too late. There was no room to turn. He might burst through. At all events it was his only chance. The obstruction was forty yards away, and once past that barrier it was only twenty miles to the state line. Behind him was—he knew not what of danger. He drew the reins tighter, and gave the lash to the sprightly greys. As he neared the line the men wavered. It was no light matter to stand in the way of the infuriated team. Marsden rose up, lashed the horses, and gave a shrill yell of defiance. Just before he reached the corner a new barrier suddenly arose across his way. Two men had lifted a white picket gate from its hinges, and now held it suspended between them above the roadway. Seeing their purpose, a dozen sprang to their aid. It was impassable, reaching high above the horses' heads, and shifting to this side and that as their course seemed to vary. The only chance was to try and break it down. He headed the horses square against it. The pole burst through the narrow palings. The men who held it were thrown down, but the frame of the gate was against the horses' legs. Their feet were caught between the slats. They stumbled and fell. A dozen hands seized the wheels before they had ceased to revolve. Marsden, thrown forward and half-stunned, was a prisoner before he had time to draw a weapon, and was marched off, with his hands tied, to the town-hall under charge of a trusty guard.

His attempt at escape had failed. After climbing the hill-side a short distance, he had realized the futility of trying to escape in that manner, and stealing back to the road, had sought to use the method which had been decided upon in case of success, without waiting to ascertain any more definitely the fate of his companions.

After this the company, now much diminished in numbers, moved on. Meeting the coachman from the seminary, the minister asked him a few hurried questions, to which the man gave most confusing replies. All that he could gather from him was that some one was dead, or at least badly injured, at the seminary, and he had been sent for the doctor. Directing him where the physician might be found, they proceeded. Before they reached the grounds the carriage passed them on its return. Then they halted for consultation, and it was determined that the better way would be to quietly surround the building, after which the constable and a few others should go forward to reconnoitre. Nothing could be done, that worthy said, until a warrant was issued. This the justice would fill out upon the minister's information as soon as he could procure the names of the kidnappers from the register at the hotel. All they could do in the meantime was merely to prevent the escape of the offenders. So the mob waited in patient silence for the ponderous wheels of the law to move round.

While these things were occurring in the village an equally strange scene had been enacted in the seminary. Following the direction of Miss Hunniwell the men bore their unconscious burden along the hall and into one of the reception-rooms, leaving a row of crimson drops from the door to the side of a low settle on which she directed that he should be placed. Wondering eyes and pallid faces peered over the banisters above at this strange procession. Water was brought and a sponge; and Miss Hunniwell, tucking back her lace-edged sleeves, took the basin and washed the blood from the coarse pale face. As she did so she noted a soft, uncertain breath. The marshal found a dim pulsation at the wrist also. The left temple was crushed and torn. Out of the severed fibres came a slender, fitful stream of red. Martin pressed his finger hard upon a point just in front of and above the ear and it ceased. Then they poured a little brandy down his throat. His respiration became more regular and decided. Then the surgeon came—a gruff, fearless man, with the freedom of speech and positiveness of manner that the old country practitioner gets. He examined the wounded man carefully; tried the skull, to find any fracture or depression; caught up the severed artery and dressed the wound.

"He'll get along," said he grimly, when his examination was completed. "A concussion of the brain with a considerable loss of blood. That's what saved him probably, though it has left him weak. It was a close call—would have killed most men; but these cattle never die when they ought to."

"Can he be removed?" inquired Eighmie anxiously.

"When, to-night?" asked the physician, looking keenly at his interrogator.

"Yes."

"No indeed!"

"When do you think?"

"Well, I should say fully as soon as his employer will be likely to have any use for him."

"I don't understand you, sir."

"You probably will before you are through with to-night's business."

"I am ready to answer for all my acts, sir," said Eighmie somewhat defiantly.

"Oh yes!" sneered the doctor, "we've heard of your Southern bravado before, but you'll need something more'n that this time, or I'm mistaken."

"Come, come, gentlemen," said the marshal, "this is no place to discuss these things. What we want to know and what Miss Hunniwell wants to know is, what we had better do with this man."

"If you ask my opinion as a man," said the doctor savagely, "I would say pitch the carrion out-doors and cheat the gallows by letting him die, before he has a chance to be hanged."

"That is the humanity of which the Yankee is forever prating," said Eighmie sneeringly.

"A fair match for the chivalry of which you boast," hissed the doctor in reply. "If I ain't mistaken you're the man that came here to drag a young girl into slavery after killing her father."

"The man who claimed to be her father was killed."

"Yes, shot in the back without being allowed to surrender."

"But that was in the heat of passion, sir. All our good people regret it now."

"And do you suppose that we have no heat of passion? Damn it, sir!" cried the doctor, white with wrath and striding toward Eighmie, "I'd be very glad to help hang the whole of your hellish crowd to a tree without judge or jury."

"See here, doctor!" said the marshal, stepping between them; "what is the matter? I never saw you in such a mood as this before. I thought you were a moderate, reasonable man."

"Don't talk to me of reason. Everybody knows I've never been an Abolitionist or anything of the kind, but I've seen that to-night that makes me actually blood-thirsty. I'm a law-abiding man, but, as certain as God lives, if the girl dies, I'm ready to make one of a crowd to hang every scoundrel that had a hand in this business higher than Haman."

"Doctor, you are raving," said the marshal, pushing him back.

"Oh, I am, am I?" said the doctor. "Well, let me tell you, sir, I mean every word of it, and I don't draw any distinction between a Southern slave-hunter and a Northern nigger-catcher, either."

"If you mean me, sir," said the marshal angrily, "I came here to perform a sworn duty. I am just as much bound to execute the law as you are to obey it. I have no more interest in this matter than you."

"Except double fees in case of conviction," sneered the doctor.

"I didn't make the law," said the other doggedly.

"No, you only volunteered to do the dirty work that was cut out for you."

"What do you mean by murder, doctor?" asked Miss Hunniwell, laying her hand upon his arm, and looking into his face with anxious solicitude.

"Where have you been to-night, madam?" inquired the doctor, turning sharply upon her.

She stammered, and her face flushed. She was not used to prevarication, and yet she dare not reveal the truth.

"I—I—have—been out with a friend—I have just returned."

"Oh, I see!" he said incredulously. "So you don't know what these gentlemen have been about here at Beechwood in your absence?"

"I can only imagine that it must be something very terrible."

"Terrible? Yes, I should think so. Well, I don't know all about it myself, but I do know that these nigger-hunting gentry have made it just about an even chance whether one of your girls lives to see the sun rise or not."

"Is it Hilda—Hilda Hargrove?" asked Martin, impetuously grasping the doctor's arm as he spoke.

"No, it wasn't Hilda—'twas the other one—the little black-eyed creature that was always with her."

"Amy?" asked the teacher.

"Yes, that's her name."

"But Hilda—where is Hilda then?" persisted Martin, keeping his hold upon the doctor's arm.

"That I can't tell you, young man, if you shake me all night. Perhaps this gentleman can give you some information," jerking his thumb toward Eighmie as he spoke. "Whether they made a mistake, or thought it just as cheap to kidnap two girls as one, I don't know, but I guess they'll have a chance to explain before they've done with it."

Martin turned toward Eighmie, but as he was about to speak he felt the teacher's hand upon his arm.

"Do not be troubled," she whispered hastily; "Hilda is safe."

While this was passing footsteps were heard advancing along the hall. The constable entered, and said:

"I have a warrant for Sherwood Eighmie."

"That is my name," said Eighmie, stepping forward.

"Also," said the constable, "for James S. Barnes."

Eighmie pointed to the wounded man.

"Not able to be moved?" asked the constable of the doctor.

"Not under a week—more likely a fortnight," said the physician.

"Well, come on, then," to Eighmie.

"Wait a moment," said the other. Then, turning to the doctor, he produced a roll of bills, and said earnestly: "Doctor, I don't know how this thing is going to end, but I want you to see that this man is taken care of. He was injured in my service, and I must not desert him."

"Oh, I will see that he is cared for," said the doctor, though he isn't worth it. Give the money to Miss Hunniwell, sir. She will need to get nurses and delicacies. Never mind me. I wouldn't work a bit better for all the money in your purse. After it's all over I'll put in my bill. But you may rest assured that I will do my very best for the poor devil professionally, though, personally, I honestly think no man ever needed hanging worse than he."

THE CHRISTENING OF "AMITY LAKE."

The Colonel steadied his little hand as it poured a wineglassful of water on the soil.

[THE CONTINENT, Vol. II, No. 7, page 218.]

"What he did," said Eighmie, "was at my instigation. I won't shirk any responsibility, whatever the result."

"Well, I will say that is a manly thing," said the doctor heartily, "and I do hope that we have seen the worst side of this night's work."

"Thank you," said Eighmie simply. "I would like to ask a favor of you if I might."

"Anything I can honestly do in your behalf you may rely upon my doing. Professionally, you need have no fear that I will not do my best for the patient."

"It is not that," said Eighmie hesitantly, "but would you mind—the young lady—I 'don't suppose you know how I feel about it. Of course, I am sorry for the hurt she has received, but I would rather die—I would even rather she would die—than have it thought—than have her think—that I would kidnap a free white girl in order to make her a slave."

"Yet you intended to abduct one as white as she."

"Yes, a slave."

"No," said the doctor, shaking his head solemnly; "I can't understand it. To my mind the evil that is done, even if the worst result, is less than the evil you intended. Nevertheless, I will tell Miss Amy how much you regret the mistake, though I doubt if she will understand your feeling any better than I do."

"Perhaps not," responded Eighmie; "yet I should be glad to have her know I did not intend her any harm."

Then they went away, leaving only the doctor, Martin, the mistress of Beechwood and the still unconscious man upon the settle.

It was necessary that the doctor should return, as Amy needed close attention. He had just begun to give directions for the care of Barnes to Martin, who consented to watch with him that night, when the minister entered and declared his intention of caring for the sick man, avowing his own responsibility for his condition. After this explanation, Miss Hunniwell gave Martin Hilda's letter, and he returned to the village only to learn that the shadow which had seemed to lift from his pathway so unexpectedly had only closed about it more darkly than before.

For the teacher this eventful night had still another surprise. As she left the reception-room to go to the chamber a dark form stepped out of the shadow of the stairway and addressed her in tones of respectful entreaty:

"Please, ma'am, will you tell me where our Miss Hilda is, and if she's got safe away?"

"Who are you?" asked the startled lady, in a low, cautious tone.

"I'm Marse Hargrove's ole servant, ma'am. Jason they call me—sometimes Jason Unthank—'kase my ole marster's name was Unthank, you know."

"I have heard Hilda speak of you frequently, Jason."

"Of course yer has, honey. Why I brought her up, mostly—Marse Merwyn an' me—atter the young missus died."

"You knew Hilda when she was a child, Jason?" said the teacher, with a new interest in her tones.

"Knew her! Lor' bress yer, yis. Wasn't I down there in the Indies when she was born? I 'spect I seed her 'fore she was a day ole, an' hain't hardly hed my eyes offen her sence dat time—only when I 'se been off on a v'y'ge with Marse Captain, or something of that sort, yer know."

"Oh, Jason, if we had only known this before, all this trouble and bloodshed might have been avoided."

"Please, ma'am, what's it all about? What's Marse Eighmie an' his crowd a-pesterin' Miss Hilda 'bout, anyhow?"

"They claim she is a slave."

"Who says dat? It's a lie! My Miss Hilda a nigger! Bress her heart, dat she ain't. Jes' let me know who says dat, ma'am, an' ole Jason 'll settle wid him for it. Dam rascals! I couldn't understan' what 'twas all about, but I seed she war in a heap of trouble. So I waited roun', an' when dey tried to carry her off, yer know, I was jis' a gwine ter lay Marse Eighmie out wid a rock when in rushed dat other feller, grabbed Miss Hilda 'way from 'em an' run. Den I was all struck in a heap, an' hardly knowed which one ter lite on; but I knowed that Marse Eighmie an' his crowd didn't mean her no good, an' 'lowed dat 'tother man couldn't be any wuss. Besides, I heard him callin' to her ez ef he wuz friends with her. So I didn't stop to ax no questions, an' when one of Marse Eighmie's men begun shootin' at him I jes' turned in on him myself. That 's the reason yer had to send fer the doctor fer him, I 'spect," he concluded coolly, with a sly nod toward the room where Barnes was lying.

"Hush, Jason, you must not speak so loud," said Miss Hunniwell, herself hardly able to control her conflicting emotions. "Come in here; I must talk with you."

"Yes, ma'am," said Jason as he followed her with the peculiar noiseless tread of the well-trained body-servant, which, without being stealthy, seems always to come and go without any appeal to our consciousness. She opened the door of the little library or office that adjoined her own room. A fire was smouldering upon the hearth, which Jason deftly coaxed into a cheerful blaze. The mistress of Beechwood plied the old servant with questions until fully convinced that he was able to relieve Hilda not only of the fear of enslavement but of the still greater horror of a corrupted lineage. It was with no little difficulty, however, that she restrained his impatience to learn the whereabouts of Hilda:

"You see, ma'am, I'se got ter find her. Marse Captain jes dat las' minute 'fore I jumped abo'd de sloop, when he jes made me put him down an' leave him 'kase 'tweren't possible for both on us ter git off—though I'd a heap ruther staid an' died with him thar, I would, ma'am, an' no mistake—that very minute Marse Hargrove tuk out ob his bosom dis yer package I'se got here,"—striking his breast pocket as he spoke—"an' he says to me, 'Jason, don't you miss givin' dat into Miss Hilda's own han's yourself. It's my last words, my will an' test'ment, Jason; my last blessing to my darling, Jason, which she must have or she won't be happy no more as long as she lives.' An' I swar to him right thar, ma'am, jes' a minute afore I seed him shot dead, dat I wouldn't let no man's nor woman's han' tech dat ar letter till I give it into Miss Hilda's own dear han's; an' I won't nuther. So yer see I'se got ter see Miss Hilda, an' right away too."

The man's excitement had made him forget the better language of his later years and brought the dialect of his youth to his tongue.

"Why didn't you come and give it to her before?" asked the woman tearfully.

"I was afeared to, ma'am. You know this trouble I was in with Marse Merwyn, an' I was afraid de law might take hold on me, yer know. Some of de papers do say we'd all be took back dar to be tried yet—which jes' means hangin' straight out in sech a case yer know. Then thar was Marse Eighmie. I seed him a-hangin' round here, an' I 'lowed he was atter me, never once dreamin' he was tryin' to git my pore Miss Hilda to make a nigger on her. Ef I'd only knowed that, ther' wouldn't been no trouble 'bout him an' his crowd now. Jason would hev settled with the las' one of 'em a heap better 'n he did with dat mean white critter in yon, too."

"Jason, Mr. Amory thinks he is the one that injured that man? He feels very badly about it," said Miss Hunniwell.

"Mr. Amory—that 's the man that thought he was helping Miss Hilda. I remember hearing him speak his name now. He's a perfect gentleman, that man is; but, pshaw! that rock he threw wouldn't a-stopped that low-down cuss a quarter of a minute ef Jason hadn't a tuk a hand in 'bout dat time."

"But you ought to let him know, so that he will not feel so badly. He 's nursing him now, because he thinks it his duty to help restore the man he has injured."

"Certain, ma'am, certain. I'll do that, and I'd be glad to do the nussin', too, after I've seen Miss Hilda, you know. I hain't a doubt I'd do it a heap better than Mr. Amory. I seed him when he come in, an' he don't look like he was cut out for a nuss, nohow."

"But I don't know where Hilda is," said Miss Hunniwell.

"You don't know? Didn't this man, Mr. Amory, take her away in his buggy?"

"No, that was another young lady they got by mistake."

"Then whar has my young mistis gone?"

"I took her away in my carriage just before dark."

"An' yet don't know where she is?" suspiciously.

"Just so, Jason. I took her to the depot, and saw her take the train?"

"Where was she goin'?" asked Jason, picking up his hat, that was lying at his feet, as if about to start in pursuit.

"I don't know," was the answer.

"Don't know? Didn't she tell yer whar she was goin'?" asked the man almost angrily.

"She not only did not tell me, Jason, but she positively refused to do so."

"Den I mus' find her," said Jason, with a long-drawn sigh. "I promised Marse Merwyn, an' I'll do it ef I don't nebber hev any other day's rest while I live."

"But, Jason," began Miss Hunniwell.

"Don't talk ter me; don't talk," said Jason shaking his hand toward her and turning away his head. "I'll jes' keep a-trampin' day an' night till I find dat ar gal—dat Miss Hilda. Dat I will, an' dar ain't no use in talkin' 'bout it. I'm much obleeged to ye, ma'am, but I might jes' ez well be gittin' 'long. Dar ain't no sense in waitin' heah."

He started toward the door as he spoke.

"But where will you go, Jason?"

"Oh, it don't matter—anywhar. P'r'aps de Lord will kinder show me de way for de pore chile's sake. I don't take much stock in de Lord myself, kase it 'pears to me He's mighty onreliable. Take Him up one side an' down de other, an' I can't see ez it makes more 'n about a good average—fair to middlin' ez they say about coting."

"Jason," said the teacher sternly, "you must not speak in that manner."

"Can't help it, ma'am; I 'pintedly can't. What the Lord let that low-down, poor, way-off Eighmie crowd kill Marse Hargrove for?"

"I cannot tell, Jason; but you know He had some good purpose in it, and He will guide you in your search for Hilda if you will only follow where He leads."

"It may be, ma'am, but I don't see ez He 's a-doin' any leadin' now, nor anything else, only mixin' matters up so that it looks as ef they'd never git straight agin."

"That is because you will not wait and trust Him, Jason. You want everything done in your own way."

"I wants dat little gal got outen her trouble. Dat 's what I want, ma'am; an' I wants it done right away, too."

"That is all right for you to wish, Jason; but you must follow God and not try to lead Him. Just think, now. The whole world is before you. You don't know whether Hilda has gone east or west or north or south."

"I reckon you knows which way the train was goin' that she got on, don't yer?"

"I don't even know that, Jason. I was so fearful for her, and so flustered by the danger she was in, that I could do nothing but watch and see that she was safe upon the train, and then close my eyes in grateful prayer. There were two trains at the station. When I looked again both were going out. Which Hilda was on I don't know."

"She's done gone back to Sturmhold, dat's whar she's gone," said Jason, after a moment's pause.

"That's where she has not gone," said the teacher. "You forget that she was hiding—hiding away from Mr. Eighmie, and hiding away from Martin Kortright."

"What's she hidin' from young Marse Martin for?"

"Because she was afraid that—that what they said about her father might be true."

"I see," said Jason, "I see. She was afraid there might be jes' one little drap of colored blood in her veins, an' she'd rather die than see Marse Martin agin ef ther was. I don't blame her nuther—I don't blame her. It's the cuss of Cain, shore, an' it's no wonder that blessed chile should feel like hidin' away when she thought she hed it jes' like ole Cain hisself when he hear de Lord a callin' attar him. Yis, you're right. She's hid jes' ez safe ez a young partridge. Marse Martin'll try powerful hard, but he won't find her—never! Miss Hilda's too peart for dat. She's her pappy all over, Miss Hilda is, only she looks powerful like her ma, pore dear. He won't never find her ez long ez she keeps on hidin'; no mo' will Jason nuther. Ther ain't no give up in that gal more'n ther was in her pa—not a bit. When she's once sot her head on anything she'll stan' to it till the very last. We won't never find her, none of us, ma'am, unless the Lord does take hold an' show us whar she's hid. Pore gal! pore gal!"

The faithful servant sank down upon the floor, thoroughly crushed with disappointment. Miss Hunniwell arose, and, putting her hand upon his shoulder, said:

"There, there, Jason. Don't be cast down. There is a chance, a hope, which we must not lose sight of. She has promised to write to me."

"Yer don't say," said Jason, raising his head. "When?"

"At least within a year. Sooner, if she is in trouble or need of any kind."

"An' will yer let ole Jason know where de pore chile is?"

"Just as soon as I hear."

"Bless God, ma'am, I'll stay right here an' wait. Don't ye want ter hire a boy, ma'am?" said he, with a quick rebound from grief to joy, peculiar to his mercurial race, as he sprang to his feet and bowed laughingly before her, like a slave-boy seeking a home at the Christmas time. Though past middle life Jason retained the activity of youth and like all his race defied the closest observer to determine his age.

"Yes, I do," said Miss Hunniwell, entering into the humor of his request, and catching at once at this means of serving Hilda most effectually. "I want some one to nurse this wounded man, and after that to help about the stable and the house."

"Anywhar, ma'am, anywhar. There's mighty few things Jason can't do, and it'll need a power of work to keep him contented till he hears from Miss Hilda. But there's one thing I'd like ter know, ma'am."

"What is that, Jason?"

"Ef that warn't our Miss Hilda they were tryin' ter git away with, who was it?"

"It was a young lady that occupied the room next to hers," said the teacher, "Miss Amy Hargrove."

"Yer don't say?" exclaimed Jason in astonishment.

"Yes, and the man in yonder shot her, so that there is great danger that she may die."

"Yer don't say?" repeated Jason in open-mouthed amazement. "Yer don't say? An' it warn't our Hilda at all but that other one that was run off with an' hurt. An' yer say she's like ter die, ma'am?"

"So the doctor fears."

"Wal now, ma'am, p'r'aps I might as well take back what I said about de Lo'd a while ago. 'Pears like He must ha' knowed what He war about attar all," said Jason with a peculiar solemnity of tone and manner.

Gilbert Amory walking back to his snug home in the gray morning, with the sense of blood-guiltiness lifted from his soul, uttered the same sentiment in more refined language.

CHAPTER XLI.

THE PROOF THAT HEALETH DOUBT.

JARED CLARKSON was greatly disturbed by the dispatch from Miss Hunniwell—"Come at once for Miss Hargrove's sake." Accustomed as he was to accept responsibility, he had somehow shrunk in an unaccountable manner from the trust imposed on him by Merwyn Hargrove. The sight of the sealed parcel lying in his safe had more than once filled him with apprehension. Every time that he had been required to act under the instructions Hargrove had given him he had done so with peculiar reluctance. It was as if he had a premonition of evil connected with them. More than once he had determined to shift this burden upon Kortright, and but for the invalid's condition would no doubt have done so before this time. Even as it was, he hesitated to comply with the teacher's urgent request, and instead of taking the train at once drove over to Sturmhold for consultation with Kortright, taking with him the sealed package and Hargrove's letter in regard to it.

The two men talked long and anxiously of the events which had occurred, and speculated not a little as to what the trouble that threatened Hilda might be.

"I am sure I cannot imagine," said Clarkson, "nor why they should have sent for me. That they should telegraph for Martin is very natural."

"I suppose to seek your advice because you were her father's friend, and are, in a sense, his representative now," answered Kortright.

"I have thought of that," said Clarkson, "but it seems improbable that her father would have intrusted her with the peculiar character of our relations."

"Well," said Kortright, with decision, "Hilda evidently needs your aid, and you must go, and go at once, too."

"Then, if that is settled," said Clarkson, "I think it best that this parcel should be opened, and I do not wish that to be done except in the presence of another trustworthy friend of the deceased besides myself."

He took the package from his pocket as he spoke. It was indorsed in the handwriting of Hargrove:

"This package will be opened by the person to whom it may be intrusted only when such person shall, in the exercise of a sound and honest discretion, believe that the time has come when it is absolutely necessary for him to know the exact truth in regard to the children of the late George Eighmie and Alida, his wife. If no such occasion arises previous to the marriage of Hilda, or before she attains the age of twenty-one years, it is my desire that this parcel be placed in her hands with its seals yet unbroken.

Signed, MERWYN HARGROVE."

It was sealed with his monogram and the bristling boar's head crest which the old buccaneer had adopted as a boastful emblem of lowly origin and dangerous strength. Clarkson handed the parcel to Kortright, who read the superscription carefully, and remarked doubtfully as he returned it:

"You are sure the time has come?"

"I am very sure," answered Clarkson. "I cannot act intelligently in any matter touching Hilda without the knowledge this envelope contains."

"Perhaps not," said Kortright, "though I don't exactly see why. It doesn't impress me that her present trouble is in any way connected with the Eighmie children."

"Oh, it must be, directly or indirectly, else I should never have been summoned," said Clarkson.

"I cannot understand why you think so," Kortright replied.

"Well, let me show you," said Clarkson, settling himself for one of his favorite monologues. "You know that there were two of these children—the Eighmie children I mean. One of these Captain Hargrove, in conformity with the desire of his half-brother, deprived of her identity, hid, 'transformed' he calls it in his letter. The other he tells us he could not trace. The latter I have found. I am now, as I fully believe, able to lay my hands on the son of George and Alida Eighmie. He having been born before the emancipation of his mother and the second marriage of his parents in this state, even though formally legitimized by the father under our laws, it is somewhat doubtful what his legal status might be adjudged to be. This being the case, I have already taken steps to extinguish the title of the man who recently claimed him as a slave by taking a bill of sale to myself. You see," he added, smiling at his own conceit, "I am getting aristocratic. I come of a slave-holding stock and am now a slave-owner myself. It is no wonder that Southern gentlemen are partial to one having so much in common with them, despite my fearful reputation as an Abolitionist, is it?"

Kortright's only reply was a smile, and Clarkson went on:

"The proof that the young man to whom I refer is the veritable Hugh Eighmie for whom Captain Hargrove sought so long and unsuccessfully, is almost perfect. I had hoped to present him to Hargrove on his return, when, no doubt, he could very soon have made the chain complete. Before the opportunity came, however, he was stricken down in the performance of his duty. Ever since that event I have been in great trouble as to what I ought to do in reference to this young man. He and his sister are unquestionably the true heirs of George Eighmie, unless illegitimate. I am the more troubled because of the fact that I was enabled to identify Hugh by his mother's instant recognition of her son when she had but a passing glimpse of his features, and that, too, by a very imperfect light."

"Indeed, you surprise me!" said Kortright.

"Yes," said Clarkson, "we have been accustomed to regard Alida as a poor, feeble creature, whose wits are not to be relied on, ever since you brought her to my house in the big snow-storm—let me see, now just about ten years ago, isn't it?"

"Ten years and a few days," said Kortright, solemnly shaking his head. "Ah, Mr. Clarkson, there have been great changes in that time."

"Yes, indeed," returned the other, "wonderful changes. It is hardly possible that another decade can bring the like."

There was a moment's silence, full of thoughtful retrospect to these men to whom the sunset of life was drawing near. They were not old men, but the era which they spoke had taxed their lives with burdens and activities no other past had ever known. After a time Clarkson continued:

"Well, as I was saying, we have never looked upon Alida as altogether right in her mind since that time."

Kortright nodded, but made no other response.

"Hargrove himself thought her thoroughly demented even before, and attributed her insanity solely to grief at the loss of her children; but it was not until the recognition of her son in the person of a hunted fugitive, that she came to her present hopeless condition. Since that occasion I suppose she has manifested no evidence of sanity, or even of active intellection, at all."

Kortright glanced uneasily at the door, and said:

"I don't know about that. Would you mind turning the key in the door, Clarkson? I have something to tell you that I would not have Mrs. Kortright know for a good deal."

Clarkson opened his eyes with surprise, but did as he was requested. When he returned Kortright motioned to him to sit down in the invalid chair by the side of the couch so that he could lay his hand upon his knee, and said:

"Do you know, I cannot understand that woman—Alida? She has evidently always been given to hallucinations. No proof could ever satisfy her, for a great while at a time, that Hargrove, who literally sacrificed his whole life to carry out her husband's fancies, was really her friend."

"That," said Clarkson, sententiously, "was because he had no real sympathy with her or her race—at least with the race the taint of whose blood has blighted her life. Besides that, he never reposed any confidence in her."

"Whatever the cause, that was the fact, but it could not be for any such reason that she took an incurable dislike to us."

"Has she done so?"

"Yes, indeed. You see I am such a victim to this rheumatism now, that day and night have lost their normal relations so far as I am concerned. I wake by night and sleep by day, or vice versa, as the case may be. Sometimes I am awake for two or three days and nights in succession, and then perhaps I sleep almost as long. For this reason, I stay here in the library all the time. It's the only part of this great house that ever seemed home-like to me anyhow. I lie upon my couch here, or crawl into my chair, and think or read, sleep or wake, without disturbing any one. Martha occupies the bedroom adjoining, but she is a sound sleeper, and hears nothing unless I call her name. Well, it wasn't long after we came here that I found that this woman, Alida, was a very different creature at night from what she seems to be or is in the daytime. I was lying here on my couch one night when she came in, went straight to that desk there—the one the Captain used, you know—raised the lid, and appeared to be hunting around for something which she could not find. Then she went to the shelves there, took down one or two books, and seemed to be searching through them for something that she expected to find between the leaves. Failing in this, she came here to the grate, warmed her feet one after the other, in the meantime knitting her brows, and seeming to be in great distress, as if unable to recall something she had once known. She paid no attention to me, not appearing to be aware of my presence. Of course I was very much surprised at this manifestation, and fully intended to have spoken of it the next day, but something drove it from my mind, and her visits soon came to be so frequent that I became interested in them, and even looked forward to the night, when my ailment was very painful, with a sort of enjoyment. It was not always the same, this novel entertainment, and I soon found great relief in trying to decipher the causes of her varying moods. By careful watching I came to understand much that she does, or, at least, to form a good idea of what it means to her. She rarely speaks, but now and then uses an exclamation that aids me in arriving at a conclusion with regard to her thoughts.

"It is very strange," said Clarkson. "She is evidently a somnambulist."

"No doubt," assented Kortright, "but do you not see this strange thing beside—the waking woman is weak and silly, almost dead to what is going on about her; but the sleeping woman is active, alert and evidently alive to circumstances, sentiments, antipathies and preferences which are of the past or which she fits into a past which is the present to her. She is not always unconscious of surrounding objects, but always mistakes them, when she does notice them, for something connected with the train of thought she seems pursuing."

"It is very remarkable," said Clarkson.

"The scene with the desk and books is the one most frequently enacted. I have been through the desk again and again, and turned over every book upon the shelf to which she always goes. A queer thing about it is that if I disarrange the papers at the left of the desk she seems at once worried and disturbed, and will not leave it until she has placed the packages back just as they were. Those at the right hand she seems to pay no attention to at all. It is queer, too, that one volume of the set of books she always examines is missing. One time I had them changed and other books put in their places. She was greatly excited thereby; pulled the books out, threw them on the floor, and finally seemed to half awake, or rather to assume her ordinary waking condition. There is this strange thing about her condition, she is most awake when she is soundest asleep. She sees, hears, thinks; but she sees and hears and thinks only with reference to a state of facts that exists in her memory or imagination. The silly, furtive leer she has in the daytime came into her eyes; she looked cautiously at me, and finally stole out on tiptoe, turning every now and then to glare back at me. It seemed to distress her so that I had the books restored the next day."

"You amaze me," said Clarkson. "Do you think it safe that she should wander about unguarded in this manner during the night?"

"Candidly," said Kortright, with an amused smile, "I do not, but what would become of my entertainment if she were confined? I assure you it is of great advantage to me. I always forget my pain while she is here, and usually fall asleep afterward trying to unravel the charades she has acted."

"Have you ever succeeded?" asked Clarkson curiously.

"Oh, yes, indeed; and I have learned some very strange things thereby," answered Kortright. "It was by that means that I discovered her antipathy to my family, especially toward Martin. When I am very bad, sometimes, one of the family will insist upon watching with me, as they say, which usually results in their going to sleep and my watching them. As I am on this side the fireplace," he continued, "they naturally sit on the other, which brings them directly in her path when she comes to lean upon the mantel to warm her feet at the fire and recall what she has forgotten. Martin was the first one she found there one night when he was comfortably sleeping on his watch. When she had peered around the back of my invalid chair in which he sat, in the half-awake manner that any interruption of her wonted routine produces, and seemed to recognize who it was, she became so terribly excited that I really feared she would attack him. However, she left the room without awaking him, and that night, for the first time, returned again. It was perhaps an hour afterward. I had wakened Martin and sent him to bed, on the false pretense that I was more comfortable. When she re-entered the room the impression of his presence was evidently still fresh in her mind. She shook her fist at the empty chair, gnashed her teeth, and then suddenly burst into a laugh. I was afraid she would wake Martha, but fortunately she did not. Then she went through a pantomime that I could not understand, and which yet seemed to have a regular order, and to be connected in her thought with Martin, for at the end she ran quickly to the door, stopped and listened as if fearing pursuit, shook her hand at the chair again, and stealthily disappeared."

"This is really astounding," exclaimed the listener.

"Wait a moment," said Kortright. "The next night, as it happened, Martha had insisted on sitting up with me, and was asleep in that same chair. Alida discovered the intrusion as before. After a while she seemed to recognize my wife's identity, and for a time a look of hesitation, almost tenderness, passed over her face as she stood in the firelight gazing into the placid face of my watcher. Finally she exhibited toward her the same evidences of aversion, however, she had shown toward Martin the night before. As she went out, I made haste to awaken wife and get her to bed, so that I might have a good opportunity to watch Alida's conduct should she return. She did return, and went through the performance of the night before without varying a movement. After this she frequently returned, especially if anything interfered with the usual routine of her first visit, and went through this same mimicry of an event that has evidently left a most vivid impression on her mind, until I have learned to interpret every gesture, and know as well what she is thinking of as if she uttered articulate sounds instead of using this strange pantomime. She sometimes does utter a word or two, but even without that I think I should have solved the riddle finally since the subject of it was most intimately connected with my own life."

"No!" exclaimed Clarkson incredulously. "What is the subject of this strange hallucination, do you suppose?"

"She lives over again her own experience on the night of the burning of the factory and Paradise Bay."

"How can that be?" asked Clarkson; "she could hardly have seen the flames from here."

"She set the fire herself!" said Kortright earnestly.

"You do not mean it?"

"There is no doubt of it. She performs all the acts the incendiary must have performed: turns on the water; sets the fire under the stairway; watches the flame; turns the lever of the waste-gate; flees and turns in to do still another act of vengeance at Paradise Bay."

"Are you sure you are not mistaken?" asked Clarkson. "Is your brain in good working order, or do your own fancies color what you see?"

"I am not fanciful, and I have worked too long over this riddle to question its solution now," said Kortright.

"What could have been her motive?" asked Clarkson.

"It could only have been a blind jealousy of Martin," responded Kortright. "I have recalled since this began the fact of her aversion for him even as a boy. It was probably due to her insensate jealousy of all those for whom Hilda manifested any attachment."

"Well, what is your conclusion?" asked Clarkson after a moment's thought. "Do you think her an impostor?"

"Not by any means," was the ready response. "I am no scientist, but I have heard that the brain is really two brains and that certain parts of it may act without, or even in opposition to, the action of the remainder. Now my explanation is that the woman is crazy beyond all doubt. Every part of her brain is diseased and abnormal; but one part may be said to sleep during the day, and the other, weaker and duller, during the night. During her somnambulistic state the most active and positive elements of her nature are at work, and she loves and hates with all the intensity of her earlier days. I am inclined to think that she acted the incendiary in this half-unconscious state. Only a little while before Hilda had been home for her vacation. The young people had been together here a good deal, and had probably been very lover-like. This had fired her weak brain to frenzy, and had intensified all her former hatred for my son."

"What is her feeling toward you?"

"She has never seemed to recognize me fully. I could not account for this at first, but finally concluded that it was because of my reclining position on the couch. Then, again, I have sometimes thought that she half mistakes me for Hargrove, who was himself accustomed to occupy a couch here in the library a good portion of the time instead of the bed in the room adjoining. Indeed, it was that fact that first suggested to my mind the advisability of doing so myself."

"You think she has sane and lucid intervals, then?"

"Well, I would hardly want to say that, but I think she has intervals when certain past facts are very clearly recalled to her memory," answered Kortright.

"Ah! that indeed," said Clarkson meditatively, as he rose and pressing one hand upon his neck threw his head quickly back as if to relieve an accustomed pain. Then he walked up and down the room in deep thought, his hands behind him and his head bowed on his breast, but with a step as nervous and elastic as if the years had not touched his frame nor care bowed his spirit. Kortright, chained to his pillow by disease, followed the footsteps of his friend with a look akin to envy. Presently he stopped at the foot of the couch, and looking down at the wan, keen face before him, he said:

"Squire Kortright, do you know it is very strange that we should come to speak of this woman and her mental status at this time?"

"Why so?" asks the other.

"Because," answered Clarkson, "it is the strength of one of her impressions that makes me feel it incumbent upon me to open this package."

"How is that?" asked Kortright, with a languid interest.

"Do you know that she has always claimed that Hilda is her daughter?"

"Oh, yes," said the sick man, laughingly; "everybody here knows of that crazy notion. She even goes farther, and declares that her name is Heloise—sometimes Heloise and sometimes Marah. It seems that her own child was known by both of these names—the first bestowed by the mother, and the latter by the father, who, at her birth, had begun to taste the bitterness of his folly. In her quieter days she will stand gazing at Hilda's picture, painted when she was a child, you know, and will go into a fearful rage if any one calls it Hilda."

"Well, Kortright," said Clarkson firmly, "I believe her."

"You believe her? You believe what? I don't understand," said Kortright, with a puzzled expression.

"I believe that Hilda is Alida's child!"

"The devil you do!" exclaimed Kortright, springing up with an alacrity he had not known in many months, and gazing into Clarkson's face in unfeigned astonishment. "I beg pardon," he said presently; "I haven't used such a word before in forty years, but will you allow me to ask, Jared Clarkson, if you are insane as well as Alida?"

A flush passed over Clarkson's face which Kortright was too much amazed to note. There had been rumors at one time and another afloat in the community that the brain of this gifted man was at times somewhat disordered. The inquiry of Kortright was therefore a barbed arrow, which struck home all the more surely because it was evidently not intended to do mischief.

"Nevertheless," he answered quietly, "I do believe it, and have long believed it. Alida has always asserted it with the utmost positiveness, and, so far as I know, Hargrove never denied it."

"Denied it? Of course he never did. Would you think it necessary to deny a crazy servant's claim to one of your children? The thing is too ridiculous even to be laughed at!" exclaimed Kortright with indignant scorn.

"And yet I do believe it," persisted Clarkson. "You must admit, Mr. Kortright, that it is hardly an argument to compare one of our quiet households with one so full of mystery as this at Sturmhold."

"Mystery? Yes, mystery enough; but none of his making, Mr. Clarkson. He was a man as open as the day save where others were concerned—so simple and faithful that he never once thought of peril to himself or his child in the trust he undertook for the sake of that miserable, slack-spirited half-brother that was enslaved by this woman's pretty face."

"You are warm in your praise, and it is commendable that you should be," answered Clarkson; "but if what you say is all true, why was Hilda so constantly mixed up with this mysterious trust? First, she is provided for by the contract with you. Why should that be when his will made her his sole heir?"

"That is easily explained," said Kortright.

"Explained! Oh, yes, I know. But why the need of explanation?" demanded Clarkson. "Then, too, this very parcel is to be delivered into her hand, under certain contingencies."

"Of course, in order that she may continue her father's watch-care and benefactions, no doubt."

"That is the most reasonable explanation that can be given, if we exclude Alida's claim," said Clarkson; "but the fact is that no explanation—no hypothesis of a probable cause—nothing but the plainest and barest proof can prevail, in my mind, over the maternal instinct of this woman, who, at all times, whether sane or insane, has steadily and stubbornly asserted the fact."

"Well, then, in Heaven's name, break the seal and have the proof!" exclaimed Kortright, pointing to the envelope on the table.

Clarkson lifted the envelope with a trembling hand.

Taking a sharp knife from his pocket he carefully cut around the seals, leaving them still unbroken, and after opening the whole length of the packet, drew forth two smaller parcels from within. He read aloud the indorsement of the first :

"To be delivered to Hilda, without delay, whenever the accompanying package is opened and examined by any person authorized so to do. M. H."

"That looks a good deal as if Hilda and the other were one and the same, doesn't it?" said Kortright in a sneering tone.

"Wait," said Clarkson, as he raised the other and read the superscription :

"The papers herein contained will sufficiently establish the identity of the daughter of George Eighmie and Alida, claiming to be his wife. They are all originals.

(Signed) MERWYN HARGROVE."

"Open it! open it!" Kortright exclaimed impatiently.

Clarkson did so and drew out a bundle of papers. Hastily glancing at the flings on the backs, he opened them one after another. At first his face showed only surprise. Then it grew pale.

"Well, what is it?" asked Kortright, reaching out his hand.

Jared Clarkson made no answer, but extended the papers to him, and sitting down by the table, buried his face in his hands. A sob that was almost a groan escaped him. Whether his conjecture was right or wrong, what he had found occasioned him only sorrow.

Harrison Kortright took the package, searched about the pillow for his glasses, put them on and looked through the file of papers carefully, one by one. There were ten of them—all alike.

"Pshaw! what is all this nonsense?" he said at length; but his hand trembled and his voice quavered as he spoke.

The papers were term-bills, and read :

"CAPTAIN MERWYN HARGROVE,
In acct. with Beechwood Seminary,
To Board and Tuition of Hilda Hargrove."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

LIGHT PURSES ABROAD.

IN these days everybody wants to "go abroad," from fashionable "Mrs. Gill," who is so "ill"

"That nothing will improve her,
Unless she sees the Tulleries,
And waddles through the Louvre,"

to the country school-mistress, the sore-throated minister and the perennial bride and groom. How to go is a popular question every season, and I purpose giving definite instructions that will enable four ladies, under certain conditions, to travel for nearly five months in England, Scotland, France, Belgium, Germany, Switzerland and Italy, having everything essential to comfort, and spending only six hundred dollars, exclusive of their steamer tickets. The writer knows whereof she affirms, for she was herself one of four ladies who made the trip a year or two ago. Four is the best number, easily managed, easily accommodated in one carriage, in two rooms; four divide the expense nicely—more make a "crowd"—fewer are likely to be lonely. It is well if one be a "madame," but if all are single, the party should not be too youthful. Each lady must be intelligent, good-natured, quick-witted and healthy. Some of the party should be able to speak French and German, and to understand both these languages when spoken. Women unaccustomed to travel, to human nature, to using money judiciously and to keeping an account of the same, ought not to join in the undertaking. When four suitable persons are agreed, it is best to map out a route, to study distances, dividing up the time to the places. Changes can be made later; forethought saves money and prevents vexatious mistakes. Read a little on art, architecture and what you expect to see of historical interest. Don't cram an excited mind all at once with that which you can learn in travel with keener enjoyment. Goethe says: "It is only in Rome you can prepare yourself for Rome." Carry across only one guide-book (we liked Appleton's). This, with local ones everywhere sold in Great Britain, will be enough until you buy "Baedeker" on the Continent as you go. Get without fail a list of good lodgings or "pensions" for all large cities where you stay long. Secure in time staterooms on a first-class steamer. In buying the four tickets one can often get a large reduction from printed cost. Have your six hundred dollars in a letter of credit; keep it in a small silk bag hung around your neck, out of sight of course, and never put it anywhere else, or some day a ladylike pauper in Paris may be weeping for the fortune a London chambermaid has swept into the fire. Take five dollars each in English silver for steamer fees—enough, unless you require continual waiting upon. Secure nice rooms for your return passage when you land in Liverpool.

Now, the outfit. A steamer-chair for each person, and two moderately large trunks for the four. Arriving in Liverpool, you will leave your trunks there with your heavy wraps and everything carried merely for steamer use. Wear on the voyage a very warm dress. Leave it with your wraps, and start from Liverpool in a fresh traveling suit, plain, dark and handsomely fitted. If you can get along with but one heavy garment, an ulster is enough from May to October; in warm days it is easily strapped—everything superfluous causes sinful emotions. Shut up your bonnet from the dampness during the voyage. Let it be neat, close, pretty, but not large or wild in style, or you will hate it later. Have soft, warm head-gear for deck wear. Carry in a small compass remedies for ordinary ailments—for that particular one to which you are subject. It may be neuralgia. You will have an attack forty miles from a drug-store if you do not take precautions. Now comes a test of common sense; but rest assured if you follow the advice here given, you need never look travel-stained or untidy, but always can be well-dressed. Let each lady buy a strong, good-looking leather bag, such as is sold for about six to eight dollars. It has two compartments and a sort of portfolio between. It holds all one need carry for the trip, goes everywhere with one, and costs next to nothing as luggage. It is always seized by the omnipresent porter, who lifts it off and on cars or runs with it to carriages for a few pennies. Times without number one man has snatched up our four, stowed them under car-seats or over our heads, and been off helping bewildered tourists hunt lost trunks—to find them after every good seat was taken. Our clean collars were admired and our ease-taking envied by many a worried countrywoman. Each of these bags will hold four changes of under-clothing (washing is done everywhere at short notice), one nice black silk dress (with few ruffles to be tumbled), and one stylish all-wool dress—you start with a new dress, so these, beside the one left for the steamer, will prove all-sufficient; slippers, an extra pair of walking-shoes, pretty breakfast sacque, and all other small articles required. For the steamer you want a loose flannel wrapper to wear at night, and if ill in the daytime. A light canvas school-bag carried on the arm is a fine catch-all. It holds guide-books, gossamer cape, and “tag ends,” which refuse to go in big bag as you journey, but for the sake of looks as well as convenience don’t get four just alike. Have a light umbrella, as small as is reasonable.

Go to Northwestern Hotel on landing, it is close to the trains, make your plans, draw ten pounds each to see “how far it goes.” Don’t be alarmed when you find that the first month’s expenses foot up more than you expected. Rest, drive out to Sefton and Prince’s Park if the sun shines. At night sleep; never travel at night if you want to enjoy the days. Next day, Chester; in the afternoon go to Leamington. Early next morning hire a carriage (a bit of extravagance that will pay) to take you for the whole day to Warwick, Kenilworth and surroundings, leaving you at Stratford-on-Avon for supper at “Red Horse Inn.”

Now as to hotels, fees, fares. Always go to first-class hotels when you go to any. In large cities patronize lodgings or boarding-houses. Do not hesitate to say that you want comfortable, low-priced rooms. They will be nice, but on upper floors probably. The “madame” and one lady can go up and see before closing the bargain; understand just what is included in the agreement—lights, service, etc. If too much is asked explain why you are not suited; if no reduction is made, a new arrangement will be proposed probably as good as the first. Fee persons who do anything for you, but not all who “stand and wait,” without it being true that they “also serve.” Begin with fees that seem small to you; if they are not large enough you will speedily find it out. Pay as a party, not as individuals; you cannot be lavishly generous, you need not be mean. Without a system in regard to your expenses adopted at the outset, in a few days you will have wasted time, and, in making change, have borrowed, lent and innocently swindled one another. We appointed each week a “Peter,” so named because of a stone in Melrose Abbey, on which is written: “Pray for the soul of Peter the treasurer.” Peter must carry the biggest purse; into it let each person put a pound every time funds run low, and out of it let Peter be constantly paying all common expenses. Let another of the party carry the tough “fee purse,” kept also replenished by taxes paid in the small coins always wanted in a hurry. Insist that each lady shall keep an exact account of her personal expenditures, and let Peter report nightly. Don’t borrow and lend small sums, unless it is unavoidable. Take your meals regularly, and eat plenty of nourishing food, but you cannot order recklessly everything you may happen to fancy on the bill of fare, if you are to go economically. At noon you will rarely be near your hotel. There are almost always to be found quiet, cosy places, as in Warwick, where, in a pretty bake-shop, a pleasant woman provided a chop, hot tea and delicious cakes and pastry served in a coffee-room for half the hotel price. There are similar places in Scotland. When you can, without doing anything singular (as in many hotels), avoid a table d’hôte dinner, and order one simpler, but just as satisfactory, for yourselves; you fare as well, and, in the long run, save money.

From Stratford-on-Avon we went to the English lakes, stopping at Manchester for a night, and buying Cook’s tickets for that district. They save trouble about stages and connections with boats. Make frequent stops; don’t forget St. Martin’s Church, at Bowness, and the ramble from Ambleside to Stock-Ghyll-Force. When past Keswick don’t hurry that so you cannot stay in Carlisle long enough to see the cathedral and the castle, but get yourselves to Glasgow in about ten days from Liverpool. Run down to Ayr. We tried Caygill’s tickets from Glasgow to Edinburg, stopped at Dumbarton to visit its ruined castle, and on through the Scotch lakes and Trossachs to the Bridge of Allan, a lovely place in which to spend Sunday. Plan to get into such nooks on Sunday. Policy, if not principle, will prompt wise travelers to rest from all the labor of sight-seeing on that day. Stirling Castle Monday, and on to Edinburg; four or five days here, with one for Melrose, Abbotsford and Dryburgh; then on to London, with brief stops at York, Durham and Peterborough for the cathedrals. When you are in Liverpool write to several boarding-houses or lodgings in London, have answers stating terms sent to await you at Edinburg, then you lose no time hunting for a home, having already selected one of which you know something. We boarded for one dollar and a half a day. Plan London sight-seeing systematically. Take the places nearest together in succession; heavy work half a day, lighter the other half. Visit, without fail, Hampton Court and Kew Gardens; go back on the Thames to London Bridge. Go also to Windsor, and save a day at least for Oxford. Two weeks this time for London, a few days on return. Here we bought of Caygill, 371 West Strand, tickets for the next two months’ travel, with hotel coupons for about one-third of that time. Experience proved that we were wise in doing this. It takes time and practice to explain at a foreign ticket-office just what “billet” you want, to understand the rapid information of the agent who is talking volubly to others and rattling down change in francs, florins or lire. You will often make mistakes and lose money in these linguistic exploits. With one book of tickets we were never perplexed or hurried; we lost no connections; found Caygill’s horses and carriages always exactly as represented—excellent. His couriers are frequently to be found at the hotels that he recommends, and they were prompt to render us important services with the utmost courtesy. Sometimes we could order nice rooms and meals for a little less than we paid for the coupons, then we saved his coupons for another hotel, where it would be more economical to use them than to settle our own bills with money in hand. As a rule, we used them in the most expensive hotels, and never with any dissatisfaction. Going by Folkestone and Boulogne to France the Channel passage is short, and it may be sweet, or it may be the most demoralizing experience of your life. Once we found it a mill-pond; once—words fail. A delightful month in Great Britain is ended, but in no other month will you spend as much money.

In Paris, as in London, avoid a hotel. We had a delightful pension, with every comfort and attention, for eight francs ($1.60) a day. Spend about eleven days this time in Paris, then leave for Brussels, Antwerp, Aix-la-Chapelle and Cologne—about a week for these. You will be frequently hiring carriages, for in general it is best to ride between points in sight-seeing. Walk wastes time and saves only a little money at the cost of too much fatigue. Riding is rest and enjoyment, while it shows you a city as you cannot see it on foot. If a polite hotel-clerk calls your carriage and settles your bills you will pay what the polite clerk and the cunning driver fancy that rich Americans (rich, of course, because Americans) ought to pay. The affair will be so genteelly managed you will shrink from a protest. A wise, simple plan is to put on your hats and go out for a stroll. In a minute or two, if you do not attract drivers as so many separate pots of honey would attract flies, you will find plenty of cabs at a near stand. Ask for the printed rates, which the cocher often hides, and be sure to tell whether you take the carriage by the hour or the course. These drivers are usually very intelligent, and can suggest places well worth seeing; but for ours in Brussels we should have forgotten Antoine Wiertz's strange museum, or rather gallery. One never begrudges them their expected "pour faire." It is necessary to be clear-headed and quietly firm in all business matters. Europeans are so invariably polite, even in attempting impositions, or when caught in them, that an angry American, waxing uncivil, never appears to good advantage.

Long before this point in your journey you will have met agreeable traveling parties, and will perhaps continue to meet them, forming pleasant acquaintances. Be friendly, enjoy them, but keep yourselves a distinct party of four. If you do not do this, little difficulties and dissatisfaction will arise. You may have to keep explaining what you can or cannot afford to do, or be led into little extravagances that you will regret. You are not traveling in a style that you need be ashamed of, but you will come in close contact with tourists, seeing no more, doing no more, learning, enjoying no more (very likely less), yet who are spending two francs to your one. If they are sensible, and find out your affairs, they will regard you with unmixed admiration. If they are "shoddy," put a hotel between yourselves and them.

Speaking French and German, and having Baedeker, you will need to hire no guides to show you around cities. Local guides are always in palaces, ruins, etc., explaining everything for a reasonable fee. One of our party had sufficient knowledge of Italian (easily acquired) to hire cabs, to give directions, and to ask necessary questions. Another dropped into a new city as a cat enters into a familiar haunt. With her maps she could pilot us anywhere. Half an hour's study, and she learned Paris. Rome she entered as if she had left it a week before. But if one has not this quickness, just to call a driver, to say Louvre, Dom or Borghese Palace, as the case may be, is enough. You will be taken to the place mentioned.

The currency of the different countries is soon learned; but avoid taking small coin of one country into another. Taking florins from Prague to Munich, we were forced to change them for marks at a considerable loss in exchange. A good way to manage is to have each lady draw unequal amounts at the bank—one rather less than she calculates she may want, another more; then, on leaving the country, the one with the overplus can pay it out on the bill of any who fall short, and all be rid of small coin. Italian paper money is useless out of Italy. Try to spend your last lira before leaving there; but if you have a small amount left over, you can enclose it in a letter to Carlo Ponti, Piazza San Marco, Venice, and for it have nice photographs mailed to your address.

But you are not near Venice yet. Starting perhaps about noon from Cologne, you glide up the Rhine, stopping at Königswinter for a climb to the Drachenfels and a good night's rest. Coblenz next day, visiting Ehrenbreitstein. Early next morning start for Mayence, seeing now the finest part of the river. Next day by rail to Baden-Baden. Two days here, with some little excursions; a day at Heidelberg, then Frankfort, Eisenach and Weimar (brief stops in these last, merely to see chief objects of interest); Berlin, four days; one for Potsdam. Don't go away without seeing Charlottenburg. Then three days for Dresden; a day in Prague, the quaintest place seen yet—cathedral, bridge, Wallenstein's Palace, Jews' quarter, a singular old synagogue, and weird old cemetery. Our driver talked only Bohemian—we, polyglot, with signs and wonders in the line of gestures, yet there was mutual delight and entire satisfaction with the means of communication. You find out "what's in a name" at such times. It was a very red-letter day. Plan to reach Munich about the end of your second month from date of landing. A week here, and a little trip to Innspruck. Across Lake Constance to Zurich and Lucerne, the Rigi Culm; by boat to Alpnach over the Brunig Pass; Lake of Brienz to Giessbach, and excursions; Interlachen, Berne, Fribourg (concert in cathedral at evening), Lausanne, Lake Lemman; stop at Chillon Castle; Martigny at night. Take Noir Pass to Chamouni, reaching Geneva about the end of the third month.

You may now have come to the end of tickets bought of Caygill or elsewhere, and are about to enter Italy, where there is a paper currency in use. Buy enough of it to get you as far as Turin after you cross the line. There, by exchanging gold for what you will need of this paper in Italy, you get a premium from gold. It is better to buy in Italy the round ticket for Italy, but you must know which ticket you want—there are many. Decide at what cities you will stop, the route to be taken, and, if you cannot state all this explicitly and rapidly in French or Italian, understanding everything said in return, you will do well to get some intelligent person from the hotel to buy it for you. One of Caygill's couriers happening to be at the Hotel Feder, saved us all trouble. Turin, two days; Milan, two; Verona, two; Venice, four; Florence, six; Rome, ten; Naples, four. Come back to start from Rome about the end of the fourth month: a day for Pisa; for Genoa, two or three; a night at Turin; leave early in morning for Aix-les-Bains, a charming watering-place, with most exquisite scenery and old Roman baths. From this place to Paris you have the longest ride by rail of your whole trip; but nearly all the way you must go "first-class" (there is no "second-class" on fast train), and if you have a compartment marked "Dames Seules" (ladies alone), you are very comfortable, getting into Paris before midnight. You have now two weeks to divide between Paris and London before leaving Liverpool for home. You may, of course, have already devoted a part of this time to any other places, as Rome or Florence—the programme is elastic.

Any other route covering as much ground can be taken, but this particular one has been tried and found easy and delightful. If you wish to go only half as far and stay longer your money will "hold out." To live in a single foreign city is much less expensive than to go continuously from one to another. But some one may ask: "Why not join a large party and have all arrangements made for you?" We met several "personally-conducted tours." One was a party in the Alps of thirty people—thirty more had squabbled with these, and gone on ahead. In all the days of our lives we never before saw so much human nature to the square inch. There was a ravenous clique made up of those who had not had enough to eat since they started. There was the scornful clique, who said these last were "piggish." There was a virtuous, shocked clique, who exposed the follies of a youthful clique. There was the naughty ringleader of these youthful few who rashly declared that these censors were "sour old maids and deceitful widows." One of the special couriers said to us privately: "I am not mad, but soon shall be," or something to that effect. Again, like an invasion of locusts, one hundred tourists once swept by us in a palace at Munich. A guide at the head told his story to about twenty who could hear; the rest elbowed one another or yawned in ignorance or indifference. At Geneva a long-suffering hotel clerk, on seeing the end of another troop, exclaimed: "Good heavens! don't I dread them when they come in droves!"

Look carefully over all bills before you pay them. It is surprising how many mistakes are made in hotels, and more surprising that they are never to your advantage. Have the bills brought to your room before you are in the hurry of immediate departure, and where you remain long in one place have frequent settlements. One remark more: do not start with any person whose disposition and habits are not well known to you. One selfish or jealous or hot-tempered or sulky individual will ruin your comfort and pleasure. The right four must be a little careful not to "pair off" exclusively, but to keep up the esprit de corps. If A and B have best rooms or best seats on Monday, see that C and D have the best on Tuesday. Don't criticise or "talk one another over" unless by way of praise. Each will probably develop a talent for helpfulness, and will like it to be appreciated. Each one may (being human) betray some weakness; then remember wise old Thomas à Kempis: "If thou canst not make thyself such an one as thou wouldest, how canst thou expect to have another in all things to thy liking?"

PIERRE QUATRIÈME.

MISS HILDRETH.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

"I MUST have a peacock, John," said Miss Hildreth, as she met her man-servant on the lawn. "He would look so finely on the balustrade, with his feathers spread or trailing them over the green sward. I really must have one, John."

"They be an awful nuisance, marm," demurred John. "They'd never stick to the balustrade. They be as hard to manage as children, an' that's a fact."

"They keeps up an awful squalling, miss," put in Jane, the maid, when the matter reached her ears. "They'll be worse than Miss Noyes' guinea-hens, and Miss Dunn's parrot, or them children of Parson Miller's—I never did see such neglected plagues as they be," she added irrelevantly. "I wonder their mother don't rise in her grave. But the poor man—what does he know of the care of babies, with his sermons and his prayer-meetings, and his parochial visits and his poor? He's off to this wedding or that funeral, or he's reading the Word to the sick and blind. It's a shame there's no women folks, but hired help, to look after 'em. I see him myself one day a-tidying of them up, and pinning on their clean collars wrong side out and upside down. I s'pose he was thinking of free-will and election, like as not."

"I wish him joy of them," said Miss Prudence. "I prefer the peacock."

The first night after the peacock's arrival, however, Miss Prudence never closed her eyes, or the bird his mouth, so to speak; but when he pranced across the lawn in the morning light, Miss Prue thought she would rather lose her sleep than the sight of so much beauty.

"Miss Dunn says she'll have to lay in a stock of chloral and bromide, if you're going to keep the peacock," Jane reported; and Mrs. Noyes herself dropped in to suggest that he could be killed and stuffed.

"He'll be quite as decorative," said she, "without disturbing the neighbors."

Every two or three days a small urchin would appear with the bird in tow, and remark demurely: "Your peacock strayed over to Dickens', and I've fetched him along home," for which civility sundry pieces of small change would be disbursed.

"And who are you?" she asked, when the same youngster had performed the same benevolent service some half-dozen times.

"I? Oh, I'm Parson Miller's boy."

"His son?"

"Why, yes 'um—I reckon so."

"I shall have to shut him up," said Miss Prue. "His traveling expenses will ruin me."

By this time the poor bird had lost most of his fine tail-feathers in the process of being run down by the Miller brothers and their contemporaries, and presented a ragged appearance which went to its owner's heart. So he was shut up in a temporary pen till he should learn better ways; but Miss Prudence, going to look after him one afternoon, found the two Millers inside the pen, chasing him about to display his plumage, while their little sister stood outside and clapped her hands, and a crowd of other children stood peeping between the slats.

"What are you doing, children?" she cried.

"Oh, we've been reading about peacocks, and they need exercise," vouchsafed the eldest Miller.

"It seems to me that you need a stick," said Miss Prue.

"Father don't approve of whipping," chirruped the youngest; "do you, father?"

And Miss Prue lifted her eyes and met those of the Rev. Austin Miller, which wore a startled, perplexed expression, while the color palpitated across his pale face.

"My children have annoyed you," he said, with the hesitating tone which begged to be gainsaid.

"They have only annoyed the peacock," answered Miss Prue, dropping her gaze, and flushing rosy red in her turn.

"I came in search of these rogues," he went on. "Bridget was sure they were in some mischief—I did not expect to find you."

"No, of course not," said Miss Prue, in a voice studiously matter-of-fact.

"I have read somewhere," the Rev. Mr. Miller pursued, "that the only real happiness which ever arrives to us, springs up quite unexpectedly in our path—it is not the result of search. I dropped the thread of my sermon, against my will, at a critical point to pick up these little folks. I have my reward."

"You are very easily satisfied," returned Miss Prue, in the same remote voice. She was hardening her heart against the persuasive tones which had once been like the music of the spheres to her.

"No, I am not easily satisfied. I have never been satisfied with myself—with some hasty actions of my own, I should say. Miss Prudence, you have never forgiven me?" he spoke half-questioningly, as if he would fain be contradicted.

"I never thought of it as anything to forgive," she said, and her voice melted and broke a little in spite of herself. "It was so long ago," a little proudly, as if she would not let him suppose that it signified. "I see now that fate or Providence was kinder to us than I believed. I don't think I was intended for a domestic life," as her eyes fell upon the three harum-scarum children in their torn frocks and mischief—the children who might have been her own, but for their mother's double-dealing.

Austin Miller smiled a little sadly as his glance followed hers.

"They are torments to the neighbors, I fear," he said; "but they are all the comfort I have," holding a hand to them. "Come, children, make your bow to Miss Hildreth, and tell her you are sorry."

"But we are not a bit sorry," said little Amy. "The peacock is so beautiful, we are glad we comed. We mean to do it again."

"Truth is no longer at the bottom of a well," said Miss Prue, with a real smile dimpling her face as she said good-by.

If Deacon Brickett could have seen the manuscript of Mr. Miller's sermon as he reflected in his study that evening, he would have supposed that the words, "Come again, dear dream," scrawled on the margin, referred beyond a doubt to the dream of Jacob when he saw the angels of God ascending and descending.

"Them there Miller boys be enough to drive you to glory, an' no mistake," declared Jane, a few weeks later. "I wouldn't be their mother—no, not if you'd give 'em to me."

"They're not mine to give," said Miss Prue. "What have they done now?"

"Done? They've gone and broke the pea-hen's eggs, to see the little peacocks, sure 's you're alive. They expected to find 'em full-fledged, long tail and all. Amy's gone home crying."

"And where are the boys?"

"Mr. Miller, he's going to send 'em to bed without their supper, and serve 'em right. Their mother's shirked all the bother of 'em, sure enough!"

"Without their supper—poor things!" cried Miss Prue. "Why, it's only three o'clock of a summer's day. I remember when I used to be sent to bed by daylight when I was little and naughty, and it always seemed to me a horrible injustice. Jane, run over to the parsonage, and tell Mr. Miller he will do me a favor if he will—"

"Baste 'em soundly," put in Jane.

"Jane! how inhuman! He will do me a favor if he will let them off this time."

"Now, Miss Prue, if you'd write it yourself—sure 's you live—excuse me, miss—but I ain't got the face to carry that there message." And it so happened that the Rev. Austin Miller found himself dreaming over a perfumed note, in his study, while his sermon on "The Mistakes of a Christian" lay forgotten before him—dreaming of the first note he had ever received from Miss Prue, fifteen years or so ago, the words of which started out from some hidden corner of his brain where they had been sleeping unknown to him; dreaming of the dewy evenings in the rose garden of the old parsonage, where he studied Divinity and she taught the children their A B C's; of moonlight nights on the river together, and spring mornings in the woods hunting for the first wild flower; of Sundays, when they sang together in the choir; of their stroll home through green, sweet-scented lanes. The thousand and one dear hours they had spent in each other's company passed before his mind's eye like some beautiful panorama. He wondered if, indeed, he was the hero of those dreams, if he had ever been so happy. The first parting, the first estrangement, wrung his heart anew, as if they had happened only yesterday. What a foolish thing their little quarrel looked like to-day, seen by the light of years and knowledge—such a trifle, but with such large results! Yet he had been the first to make an overture toward reconciliation, thank God! If she accepted his overture she was to write and say so; but no word had come to him in reply. What days and hours of dark suspense lifted their shadows before him; how the whole world had seemed bleak and unprofitable without her! And in a season of weakness, when his wounded heart could bear no more, he had accepted the sympathy and comfort nearest at hand, and had finally married Letty Carew, because she loved him, only to wake up one day to find that he owed all his unhappiness to her. Miss Hildreth had indeed answered him, had given Letty the letter to mail—they had been intimate friends in those days, intrusted with each other's heart-beats—and Letty had detained the missive that would have healed the breach. How did he know this? Years after it tumbled out of a drawer of old letters, and confronted him with its familiar address. Miss Carew thought she had secured herself for all time by burning Prue's letter, but she had tossed the wrong envelope into the grate. Austin Miller had lived his sorrow over again after this discovery; he had waked with it and wrestled with it without getting nearer happiness, and had long ago made up his mind to do without it. But he had thought it due to Prudence Hildreth to send her word that by an accident her letter had come to hand five years too late; he said nothing of Letty's share in the matter, but Prudence understood all. These memories had been revived by Prue's hasty note asking him to forgive the children for breaking up the pea-hen's nest! Her children, too! He was at the point of carrying the note to his lips, when his eye fell upon his sermon, "The Mistakes of a Christian," and lest this should be one of them, he threw it into the waste basket. He looked at the clock; he had been idle two whole hours. "Of what was he thinking?" he asked himself; "where was he drifting? an anointed priest, the example and counsellor of sinners?" At least he could go and thank Prue with a clear conscience; as for the children, they were already in bed, technically speaking, and having such a capital pillow fight that they agreed to get into mischief every day of their lives, and be punished.

After that Mr. Miller often found himself dropping in, on one pretext or another, at The Elms; to ask Miss Prue to play over the air of some new psalmody, that he might join in the congregational singing; to lend her the latest volume of religious thought; to beg advice about the children. Sometimes he came bringing those unruly infants, with their brown hands full of peacock feathers and their little hearts full of impenitence. They and the peacock were now the best of friends; he ate from their hand and endured their petting, which was much like punishment, with heroism; if he stayed away they hunted him out and brought him home in triumph.

"Those children might as well live here," said Jane.

"And their father, too," added John.

"Not a bite of sweetbread can I keep in the larder; and when they tears their frocks they goes straight to Miss Prue, and she mends them before Bridget scolds 'em, just as if they 'd be her very own."

"A fine stepmother she 'd be making," observed John. "They do be saying in the village that it 's her cap she is setting for the parson."

"That 's just the way of the gossips! If a man takes to a woman it 's always she that is a-setting of her cap for him. The parson ought to ask 'em to pick out a wife for him and suit themselves."

"And then there 's others who says it 's her money," persisted John, who, like a fair historian, was bound to state both sides; "an' that he come here a-purpose to marry her."

"A great deal they knows about it," cried Jane. "I heered him tell her, with my own blessed ears, that when he was called to this 'ere parish he never dreamed that she lived here. They must hev knowed each other, you see, when they was young, afore Miss Prue came into her great-uncle's property, and came to live at The Elms; for I hear 'em talking now and again of folks that don't belong hereabouts. And she says, 'Do you remember the day we went hither and the day we went yon?' And he says, 'I remember, I remember,' and looks away from her face. I thinks, myself, he must have been an old beau of hers. I sees 'em together a heap, you know, bringing in the tea things, and the lamps, and pottering 'round—"

"At the keyhole," laughed John.

"And I 've never found 'em love-making onct, though I steps quiet-like, John, as you know, and it isn't like opening a door to push the portière aside."

It is true the Miller children were a great deal at The Elms, and gave their father frequent excuse to follow them; and it is true there were few congenial souls in the parish or village, and what so natural as that he should see more or less of his pleasant neighbor, with whom he could journey back to the past. Indeed, they never talked of to-day or to-morrow; it was always yesterday whose praises they sang, whose skies they extolled, whose pleasures they coveted. He was nothing like a lover, to be sure, except in preferring her society, and yet it was a happiness to Prue to see him there, to know that he would come to-morrow. It was toward night, one summer day, that Miss Prue, looking out on the lawn, where the shadows of the leaves were dancing, saw Mr. Miller—no unusual sight—coming toward her door. He had been out of town a whole week on business; Bridget had confided to Jane that he had "gone away suddin', after a telegraph in a yaller wrapper come for him;" but he had been at home several days without darkening, or, to express her feelings better, illuminating Miss Prue's door. Naturally, she wondered what his errand had been; if he had had a call to leave the parish; and at that thought her heart stood still.

"You have been away," she said after the first greetings.

"Yes. I hope you did not suffer from an invasion of young Millers during my absence."

"We met, but we missed you," she admitted. "I hope your vacation was a rest and recreation to you."

"My journey was not a pleasure trip, Prue," he said. "My wife died suddenly at the asylum on the fifth of the month—"

"Your wife!" gasped Miss Prue. "Your wife—died—on the fifth of the month! I thought—Austin—Mr. Miller—I thought she had been dead years and years!"

"I thought you knew," he returned. "I supposed everybody had heard of it; it was too sad a story to rehearse often or needlessly. It was in all the dailies at the time. You must have been abroad then. Amy was in her cradle when Letty left me—eloped with her music-teacher. Two years ago she went to the asylum, mad as Hamlet. Prue, Prue," he cried, "do you think I have hidden anything from you? Is not the loss of fifteen years of happiness enough? Shall her ghost divide us still?"

"And I have been loving another woman's husband all this time," she said, moving away from him. Heaven only knows how far her Puritan conscience would have carried her, but just then Jane burst into the room, crying:

"It's little Tom Miller—the peacock fell into the river, and Tom jumped in to save him—and the bird 's safe—but Tom—the cramp took him—John 's brought him up the bank—"

And then Jane fainted away. It was hours before consciousness returned to Master Tom, and weeks before the roof of The Elms could be exchanged for that of the parsonage, owing to a fever which succeeded. Mr. Miller and Miss Prue passed many a watchful night at his bedside, and many a day of sickening dread; but it was a year and better before Miss Hildreth could forgive herself for having loved another woman's husband and before a wedding which had been belated fifteen years, took place at The Elms.

A SONG.

TO-DAY from the south came a flight of hours,
Of golden hours with welcome wings;
And where they passed grew fragrant flowers,
And the sunbeams laughed on a thousand springs.

And maidens forgot to be shy and cold
When they heard the birds, when they saw the flowers,
And many a secret love was told—
Because of a flight of sunny hours.

The gnarled trees on the windy hill
Put forth a wonder of radiant white;
The meadow, yesterday bare and still,
Was suddenly filled with the birds' delight.

THE question "What shall be done with the next-door baby?" has at last been answered. It shall be incubated. Even the next-door parent could not object to this remedy, since it is primarily designed for the benefit of the infant, and the delightful results to the neighborhood are purely incidental. The formula for the prescription comes from France, where it has been tested with the most gratifying success by Dr. Tavernier, who must hereafter be reckoned one of the world's greatest benefactors. Under his ingenious process sickly children become healthy, and discontented ones cease to complain. There is no more walking with them at night, and that regular see-saw of the rocker which penetrates partition walls, and becomes thunder when executed on the floor overhead, can, with stage-coaches and bob-wigs, pass into the bygone. There need be no anxiety about teething, no disturbance because of colic; the incubated infant attends to these matters for itself, and emerges from the incubator fully equipped for childhood's trials, having had no experience of a baby's tribulations. The incubator itself is a very simple affair. It is a box covered with a glass slide, and kept at a temperature of eighty-six degrees by means of hot water. This is placed in a dark room, and the child is provided with a nursing bottle. Here, in that serene contemplation, dear alike to Buddha and to infants, it passes the early months of its existence. No one trots it, no one bangs it on the back, nor holds it so that its loose, unbalanced head rolls helplessly from side to side. The light does not shine into its winking eyes; it is not tortured by stiff embroidery nor thrown into fits by pins. Under such beneficent influences it thrives as a young animal should. It comes out strong of limb and ready to walk, and has outgrown its little bed. It has escaped so much that it has accumulated a reserve fund of staying power, and meets childhood with equanimity. It soon learns to talk, and when it comes into the family circle it is still an infant, but it is reasonable—it is jolly. It has no sad recollections, no suspicions and sudden alarms. Its relations have taken no advantage of it, and it knows nothing of the mortification of being put on exhibition and praised by the false neighbor. The experiments of Dr. Tavernier have been on a large scale, and he has had at one time three hundred and sixty infants reposing in their little ovens. In the Foundling Hospital, where he made his experiments, the confusion of a bedlam was succeeded by the serenity of a Quaker meeting. The babies averaged the age of eight months, and the weight of sixteen pounds. Puny, sickly, cross, they went to their little beds; they drank from their bottles, they slept, they meditated, they threw their arms and legs about; they had new views of life. They stayed in this seclusion six months, and came out heavy and strong. One had died, one had been reclaimed by repentant parents, but the three hundred and fifty-eight remaining charged into the rooms like children of three years. They experimented in motion, and in a week were on foot walking. They began to talk, and when a select committee of twelve, appointed by the French Government, went to investigate this astounding discovery who can doubt but that they could have given it intelligent verbal testimony?

One of the beauties of this experiment lies in its simplicity. There is nothing expensive nor difficult in the arrangements. The warm little box would not cost as much as a silver rattle; there need be no nurse on constant duty; the coat and cap, the numberless dresses are supplanted by a little wrapper; the carriage is not needed; the mother can go into society, and, no longer on spasmodic guard, can give her husband her society in the evening. His slumbers are unbroken either by wails or soothing, and the incubated infant is a well-spring of pleasure, a perennial joy.

BEFORE deciding upon the publication of the advice given in this number of THE CONTINENT to would-be European travelers who are blessed with slender means, the manuscript was submitted to a lady who has "done" Europe under very different conditions from those indicated in the paper referred to. The original letter lies on the editor's desk at this moment, in the familiar handwriting of an author well known to the English reading public:

"I think the article has enough common sense and general information to make it valuable—say to school-mistresses on a vacation, or any one who is willing to travel in this rigid way, limited as to baggage and careful of every shilling. As there are plenty of such people, strong, resolute, and able to work hard and fare not too well, and live in bags instead of trunks, and ride backward in carriages half the time, it might be worth while to publish the article, to inform such people how to do it. I couldn't and wouldn't do it. I should far rather spend all the time in one foreign country, unless I could travel what I call comfortably. I don't mean that I should wish to employ a courier, stop at the grandest hotels, or travel luxuriously; but I should not be contented to follow a plan like this. I should have said it would be impossible to do it even as here described, on the money the writer mentions; but I suppose, having tried it, she knows. I could not do it. I don't know why she says cochers hide their printed tariffs. They always hand one to me in Paris without asking, and in London they are conspicuously posted on every cab. I should think three hours, instead of two days, enough for Turin, unless one stopped to rest there; and I should not think four days enough for lovely Venice. But these are minor details. For a cheap trip, it would be a good deal wiser and cheaper to go to Glasgow first by the Glasgow line, and make the journey from Glasgow to Liverpool, beginning at the Glasgow end. But I always go to Liverpool, for I prefer the lines that go there. I hate railway carriages labeled "Dames Seules." They are usually crowded with cross women and tired children. I always take my chance in a mixed company."

This matter of economical traveling abroad is not, however, so impossible as our correspondent seems to think, even to people who know what luxuries are and how to use them. The writer hereof could name members of a proud old Bostonian family who, not long since, varied their experiences of seeing Europe en grand seigneur by limiting their impedimenta to hand-valises and shawl-straps, much in the manner described by our author. Their verdict was that it is by far the best way to go. The millionaire of the period, making the tour of the world in his magnificent steam-yacht, is to us far less a worthy subject of admiration than the group of poor teachers, authors or artists seeking culture and relaxation at the least possible outlay. Their hundreds have at least been earned in the honorable ways of industry, while in most cases the millions are tainted with the crooked ways of Wall Street speculation. The school-mistresses have our benediction, and we wish them a pleasant trip.

It is not altogether a comfortable thing to know that the manufacture of dynamite, nitro-glycerine and their numerous explosive cousins may be effected with a comparatively small amount of chemical knowledge. A few receptacles of glass or earthenware, the necessary chemical constituents and some simple formulas, are all that is required to enable, let us say, an Irish patriot to prepare a package of nitrated alkali capable of shattering Windsor Castle or the Houses of Parliament "from turret to foundation-stone." There is no use in ignoring an engine which may be used most effectively by others than Nihilists and Irreconcilables. Why should not reckless desperadoes explode these terrible agents of destruction beside bank-vaults or private stores of valuables, in the hope of securing plunder enough to pay expenses during the confusion and ruin wrought by the blast? The mere sacrifice of life causes such men not a moment of hesitation, provided the chances of being found out are reduced to a minimum. Society will sooner or later have to do something in self-protection against the manufacture and use of these agents. It would be impossible to frame a law too stringent in this regard. When a lunatic can carry in his pocket a charge sufficient to wreck the largest building, it is time to render the unauthorized manufacture, or even the possession of such explosives, a state prison offense.

PERHAPS it would be well for those of our fellow-citizens who consider it patriotic to assault the "heathen Chinese," pull his cue, and otherwise maltreat him, to know that this sort of thing has now become the subject of diplomatic correspondence. Two Chinamen, peaceable sojourners in a town of Georgia, were roughly handled some weeks ago, and in their stupid Chinese fashion, instead of being thankful to escape with their lives and scalps, straightway entered a complaint with their minister at Washington, as if they actually had rights which Caucasians were bound to respect. The difficulty about this business is that the Chinaman as a general thing never gives provocation save in the mere fact of being a Chinaman. If satisfactory amends are not accorded to the Celestial Government by that of the United States, it is difficult to see why reprisals should not be made on the persons of Americans resident in China.

WHEN in the recently published volume, "The Friendships of Mary Russell Mitford," the reader of the charming correspondence recorded there found, toward the end of the volume, a report of a conversation held with Carlyle by Mr. James T. Fields, the last remnant of patience vanished. They had met at dinner, and Carlyle asked:

"Isna there a place called Concord near ye? What like is it?"

"A pretty little New England town," was Mr. Fields' answer, "of no political importance, but lively and pleasant as a residence."

"Pretty! lively! Ye ken I had fancied it to be a dull, dreary place, wi' a drowsy river making believe to creep through it, slow and muddy and stagnant, like the folk that inhabit it."

Here would seem to be a disloyalty not only unexpected, but well nigh infamous, toward a man who for years had, according to his own saying, represented to him the clearest comprehension he had ever received. Yet it proves only the phrasing of a little keener dyspeptic twinge—the snarl and snap of a passionate, ill-regulated temper under perpetual physical suffering. Certainly no hint of deprecation enters the long correspondence.

If no other office were served by the two volumes before us, its reconstruction of much of the old thought of Carlyle would be a boon. There are passages that may stir up rancor, and there is the hoarse and familiar shout for silence that occurs at periodical intervals wherever and whenever Carlyle uses a pen. There is the same morbid self-pity and the same selfishness at which one is suddenly aghast, but it becomes more and more certain as one reads that these are, after all, bodily accidents—the acrid, disputatious Scottish temper being in part responsible, but dyspepsia chiefly and always, warping judgment and perverting testimony. And certainly his capacity for deep and true affection exceeded that of Emerson, who is always the remiss one when the correspondence languishes, and who never apparently wrote on the impulse of the moment, but made a first draft and then copied and elaborated. He was a faithful and appreciative friend, but too cool and serene a nature to give even a suggestion of the ardent, glowing feeling Carlyle now and then poured out, and that, when it came, was compensation for much bitterness and even injustice.

The letters number one hundred and seventy-three, and for the first volume are chiefly a record of Emerson's very earnest attempts to secure both renown and what was fairly due to this friend over the sea. There are great squabbles with various booksellers, whose piratical tendencies excite the wrath of both men, and whose characters are summed up in English of no uncertain sound. It is Carlyle whose wrath is fiercest, and objurcation has place in every letter—if not for booksellers, then for book-makers, and the whole human race in general. There are bits of Emerson's home-life, very lovely in tone; an amusing interlude on Indian meal, its virtues and possibilities, and much discussion as to Carlyle's frequent proposals to visit America, which Emerson urged always from the beginning of the acquaintance. There are glimpses of many distinguished men and women, judged and summed up by Carlyle with an incisiveness amusing always, but rather dreadful to the subject. Carlyle seldom loved without many mental reservations, John Sterling and Emerson being almost the sole exceptions to this rule, while Emerson had none; but while seldom or never showing passionate devotion, yet gave a quiet and considerate affection more satisfactory perhaps than a more tumultuous one. He is a fearless critic, too, and writes of the "Sartor":

"I have now received four numbers of the 'Sartor Resartus,' for whose light thanks evermore. I am glad that one living scholar is self-centered, and will be true to himself, though none ever were before. . . . And it is good to have a new eye inspect our mouldy social forms, our politics and schools and religion. . . . Evermore thanks for the brave stand you have made for Spiritualism in these writings. But has literature any parallel to the oddity of the vehicle chosen to convey this treasure? I delight in the contents; the form, which my defective apprehension for a joke makes me not appreciate, I leave to your merry discretion. And yet did ever wise and philanthropic author use so defying a diction? As if society were not sufficiently shy of truth without providing it beforehand with an objection to the form. . . . I look for the hour with impatience when the vehicle will be worthy of the spirit—when the word will be as simple, and so as resistless, as the thought—and, in short, when your words will be one with things."

Hardly a page but affords some choice sentence for quotation. Friends of each come and go, received by Carlyle well or ill according to the mood of the moment, and their effect upon him being described in sentences that are often masterly summaries of character. We have great reason to be grateful for the beautiful volumes, which owe much to the careful editing of Mr. Charles Eliot Norton, and which include two portraits, one of Emerson, from a drawing made by Powers in 1857, and of Carlyle, from an old daguerreotype of earlier date.

EVERY one who enjoys the quiet, delicate humor of Mr. Charles Dudley Warner—and who does not?—will be glad to think of him as the future editor of "The Drawer" in Harpers' Magazine.

HENRY HOLT & Co. publish "A Story of Carnival," by Miss Mary Hoppus, author of "Five Chimney Farm," and one of the most promising among the younger women writers of England. She is said to be a reserved and gentle woman, whose chief interest is in the spiritual side of human nature.

THE editors of Texas Siftings, which has taken its place as a paper holding some of the most amusing specimens of American humor, will publish the story which has been running for nearly a year under the title of "Through Texas on a Mexican Mustang." It will be a book of over six hundred pages, with some two hundred illustrations, and will be sold only by subscription. It will be published by S. S. Scranton & Co., Hartford, Conn.

MR. C. G. BUSH gives an amusing half hour to all who look over the illustrations of "Our Choir, a Symphony," inclosed in a folio in which every phase of experience in choirs finds record. The verse is as shockingly bad as the verse of librettos is usually allowed to be, but the drawings will atone for deficiencies in this respect, though it is doubtful if there is interest enough in them to insure a second opening of the book. ($1.25; G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York).

ONE of the most intelligent, as well as sympathetic criticisms of Walt Whitman's work, as a whole, has lately been made by Mrs. May Cole Baker in two of the March numbers of the Washington Republic, a weekly which deserves to be better known, the grade of work it contains being far beyond the average. The poet's weak points are noted, but the writer holds the conviction shared by many, that apart from one or two very serious defects, he certainly represents a power and force which give him the first rank among American poets.

ALFRED DOMMETT, whose "Christmas Hymn" has been chosen as the subject for the prize illustrations to be given in Harpers' Magazine for December, 1883, was born in England in 1811, and lived for many years of his life in New Zealand and Australia. Robert Browning is understood to have referred to him in his poem entitled "Waring." The hymn in question, the first lines of which are:

"It was the calm and silent night!
Seven hundred years and fifty-three
Had Rome been growing up to might,
And now was queen of land and sea," is the only production of his that ever excited general attention.

THE Irving number of The Critic was one of the most brilliant of that always brilliant journal. One of the most interesting glimpses of Irving is given by Dr. Holmes. "I could hardly believe," he says, "that this slight, delicate, gentle invalid was the same man who wrote the rollicking chapters of 'Knickerbocker.' It could not be that this was he whose stories I used to read by the light of the 'astral lamp' in the short evenings of boyhood when I went to bed with the lamb—whose books I could never open without their bringing a smile to my lips or a tear to my eyes. I wanted a mental stereoscope to bring the figure before me and my ideal portrait of him into a single image. I came away knowing that I had seen him but not believing it. A sweet, placid, benignant old man, a monument of himself with its inscription faint yet still legible."

THE Lenten lectures delivered by the Rev. Morgan Dix appeared in book form the morning after the final one had been given, under the title of "The Calling of a Christian Woman, and Her Training to Fulfill It," an example of hasty book-making seldom equaled. In justice, it must be said that they were not intended for publication, but took that form because of the indignation and excitement occasioned by each in turn. Whatever may be thought of Dr. Dix's premises or conclusions he is at least very sincere. In the midst of an ignorance that would seem almost to be willful, and of an assumption that puts some of our noblest thinkers in the wrong, he is sometimes right. But the book has the flavor of the Middle Ages, and its principles, if carried out, would bring us speedily to the condition of those days. (12mo, pp. 175, $1.00; D. Appleton & Co., New York).

No more delightful reminiscences have ever been given to an American public by an American than those recorded in "Figures of the Past, from the Leaves of Old Journals," by Josiah Quincy, of the class of 1821, Harvard College. The papers appeared chiefly in the New York Independent, and were prepared for issue in book form a few months before Mr. Quincy's death. They were written after he had passed his eightieth birthday, but there are no symptoms of age or decay of faculties in the genial memorials, which date back to the days of cues, powder and knee-breeches. Mr. Quincy's relationship through marriage to the Adams family gave him opportunities of specially intimate intercourse, and his impressions of John Adams the elder are quite in harmony with those received from the recent life of Adams in the "American Statesmen Series." The old "Phillips Academy," at Andover; "Harvard, Sixty Years Ago;" the various chapters on Lafayette, are all invaluable contributions to history, and his reminiscences of Webster are a delightful record, good to read in a time when a certain detraction seems the order in speaking of the great statesmen. To begin with John Adams and end with Joseph Smith and the Mormon Question, covers every phase of progress the century has known, and if the book were doubled or trebled in size it would still be welcome as a record in which there is not a shadow of malice or detraction, even when judgment is most fearless and uncompromising. THE admirers of mosaic pictures will read with interest the following account of how they are made: The enamel is of a kind of glass, colored with metallic oxides, and it is so fusible that it can be drawn out into threads, small rods or oblong sticks, of varying degrees of fineness, slightly resembling the type used by compositors. These polychromatic rods are kept in drawers, properly numbered, so that the artist always knows to which case to repair when he requires a fresh supply of a particular tint or tints. When a picture is commenced, the first step is to place on the easel a slab of marble, copper or slate of the size fixed upon; and this slab is hollowed out to a depth of about three and a half inches, leaving a flat border all around which will be on a level with the completed mosaic. The excavated slab is intersected by transverse grooves or channels, so as to hold more tenaciously the cement in which the mounts of enamel will be imbedded. Then the hollowed slab is filled with "gesso," or plaster of Paris, on which the proposed design is accurately traced in outline, and usually in pen and ink. The artist then proceeds to scoop out a small portion of the plaster with a little sharp tool. He fills up the cavity thus made with wet cement or "mastic," and into this mastic he successively thrusts the "spicula" or the "tessera," as the case may be, according to the pattern at his side. In the broad folds of drapery or in the even shadows of a background or a clear sky, his morsels of enamel may be as large as one of a pair of dice; in the details of lips or eyes or hair, or foliage, or flowers, the bits of glass may be no larger than pins' heads. The cement or mastic is made of slaked lime, finely powdered Tiburtine marble and linseed oil, and when thoroughly dry is as hard as flint. Sometimes the mastic which fills the cavity is smoothed and painted in fresco with an exact replica of the pattern, and into this the bits of glass are driven, according to tint, by means of a small wooden mallet. If the effect produced offends the artist's eye, he can easily amend the defect by withdrawing the offending piece of enamel and driving in another while the cement is still wet; and by observing proper precautions it can be kept damp for more than a fortnight. When the work is completed, any tiny crevices which may remain are carefully plugged or "stopped" with pounded marble, or with enamel mixed with wax, and the entire surface of the picture is then ground down to a perfect plane, and finally polished with putty and oil. Byzantine may be broadly distinguished from Roman mosaic by the circumstance of the surface of the former being left unground and unpolished, save where there is burnished gold, thus leaving an irregularity of surface productive of great vigor of effect. A mosaic picture of the Byzantine style can at once be recognized as a mosaic, even if it be hung at an altitude of a hundred feet from the ground; but a perfected mosaic picture after the Roman manner might easily be mistaken, even at a very short distance, for a very elaborately finished and highly varnished painting in oils.

MR. FELIX L. OSWALD, speaking of a domesticated sloth, says: "Though fed daily by the same hands, the old pensioner still fails to identify his benefactor, or to recognize his obligations in any way. To his ear the human voice in its most endearing tones is a grunt et præterea nihil—you might as well appeal to the affections of a cockroach. You may frighten a pig, a goose, a frog, and even a fly, but you cannot frighten or surprise a sloth. On my last trip to Vera Cruz I procured a pair of black sloths, full-grown, and in a normal state of health so far as I could judge; but, after a series of careful experiments, I have to conclude that their instinct of self-preservation cannot be acted upon through the medium of their optic or acoustic nerves. They can distinguish their favorite food at a distance of ten or twelve yards; and the female is not deaf, for she answers the call of her mate from an adjoining room; but the approach of a ferocious-looking dog leaves her as calm as does the sudden descent of a meat-axe within an inch of her nose. The male witnessed the accidental conflagration of his straw couch with the coolness of a veteran fireman. War-whoops do not affect his composure. I tried him with French-horn blasts and detonating powder, but he would not budge. One of my visitors exploded some pyrotechnic mixtures of wondrous colors and odors, but the sloth declined to marvel." Of another pet, a young Siamese monkey, the author says: "His conduct, under circumstances to which no possible ancestral experiences could have furnished any precedent, has often convinced me that his intelligence differs from the instinct of the most sagacious dog as essentially as from the routine knack of a cell-building insect. His predilection for a frugal diet equals that of his Buddhistic countrymen, and I have seen him overhaul a large medicine-chest in search of a little vial with tamarind jelly. He remembered the shape of the bottle, for he rejected all the larger and squarer ones, and, after piling the round ones on the floor, began to hold them up against the light, and subdivide them according to the fluid or pulverous condition of their contents. Having thus reduced the number of the doubtful receptacles to something like a dozen and a half, he proceeded to scrutinize these more closely, and finally selected four, which he managed to uncork by means of his teeth. Number three proved to be the bonanza bottle, and, waiving all precautions in the joy of his discovery, Prince Gautama left the medical miscellanies to their fate, and bolted into the next room to enjoy the fruit of his enterprise."

THE importance of preserving and cultivating our forests is clearly set forth in Superintendent Colvin's report on the Adirondack survey. "That the precipitation of rain is," he says, "greatly influenced by the presence or absence of forests, is no longer questioned among scientific men. It is nowhere claimed that the total amount of annual rainfall is changed by the destruction of forests in particular localities; but that a more desirable, uniform distribution of the rainfall throughout the year is secured by the retention in elevated districts and upon the fronts of the mountains of the dense growth of evergreen timber, whose shade protects the deep, spongy soil from the rays of the sun, preventing evaporation, and securing the more or less perfect condensation of the warm, moist breezes entering the cold forest. I say cold forest advisedly, for the researches of Ebermeyer, Professor of Forestry in Bavaria, based upon five years' observations at numerous points in that kingdom, prove as the results of more than five thousand observations that the mean annual temperature of the soil in the forests he examined is twenty-one per cent lower than in the open fields, and that the mean annual temperature of the atmosphere of the forests is ten per cent lower than that of the fields. With such a difference in the temperature between forest and clearing, the most ordinary knowledge of the laws governing the condensation of the moisture of the air suffices to render intelligible the cause of the frequently observed formation of a cloud when a warm, moist wind strikes against a cold, forest-covered mountain-side. That a cold surface of rock without forest will condense the moisture of the air we are aware, but the conditions for condensation are best conserved when Nature's refrigerator, the dense evergreens and sphagnum (moss), present their chill caverns to the breeze."

A CURIOUS snow-storm is described by a correspondent of the Scientific American as occurring in Connecticut late in the winter, when "the snow presented a novel and striking appearance. During the previous night about two inches of light snow had fallen, while there was a fresh southwesterly breeze, which afterward changed to north-west, and the morning was beautifully clear. The surface of the snow, where the land was not very uneven or much inclined, was strewn with snow-balls, varying in size from about nine inches through down to very small ones. Some were nearly spherical in general form, but nearly all were merely rolls of snow, funnel-shaped at the ends. These rolls, at the circumference, measured about the same (or a little less) in length as in diameter. There were many over nine inches through, and myriads of small ones. The surface of the snow was marked with shallow furrows as the snow-balls were formed, showing the changing direction of the wind. The balls were of sufficient consistency to be handled carefully." The same phenomenon was noticed in other localities. On the campus of the University of Rochester, New York, the ground in the early morning was covered with snow-balls, strewn about in the most fantastic manner. It seemed evident that they had fallen with considerable impetus, and rolled for some distance, gathering snow as they traveled, for there was a trail, sometimes several feet long, leading to each ball. Such phenomena as are here described are of not infrequent occurrence, but the conditions must, of course, be exactly right as to temperature, moisture, etc.

MR. J. G. GRENFELL, in Nature, gives the following instance of intelligence in bears: "In the Clifton Zoological Gardens there are two female Polar bears between two and a-half and three years old, which came here quite young. One of these shows remarkable intelligence in cracking coconuts. A nut was thrown to-day into the tank; it sank a long way, and the bear waited quietly till after some time it rose a little out of her reach. She then made a current in the water with her paw, and thus brought it within reach. This habit has already been noticed several times in Polar bears. She then took it on shore and tried to break it by leaning her weight on it with one paw. Failing in this, she took the nut between her fore-paws, raised herself on her hind-legs to her full height, and threw the nut forward against the bars of the den, three or four feet off. She then again leaned her weight on it, hoping she had cracked it, but failed again. She then repeated the process, this time successfully. The keeper told me she employed the same method to break the leg-bone of a horse. That this is the result of individual experience, and not of instinct, is clear from the fact that her companion has not learned the trick of thus accomplishing his purpose, nor could this one do it when she first came."

FROM the great importance of the cinchona alkaloids and their extensive use in medicine, it is exceedingly desirable that we should be able to make quinine artificially. This has not yet been done, but, with a view toward it, extensive researches are being made into the constitution of the cinchona alkaloids; and Skraup finds that all the four cinchona alkaloids—quinine, quinidine, cinchonine and cinchonidine—when oxidized with potassium permanganate yield formic acid, and a base apparently related to phenol or carboic acid. Other modes of oxidation exhibit a relation between quinine and cinchonine. Cinchonine has been prepared artificially by treating a mixture of nitrobenzol, aniline and glycerol with sulphuric acid. In its physiological properties it exhibits a certain relation to quinine; and, like it, reduces the temperature in fever and lessens or prevents putrefaction. It is said to differ from quinine in not producing giddiness, or ringing in the ears, and to have very little action on alcoholic fermentation.

RATHER a curious lot of figures is brought together by Dr. Gill, of the Illinois penitentiary, showing the death-rate in the principal state prisons of the country. The most astonishing variations are shown. Thus, among New York prisons, while at Sing Sing the yearly deaths from 1000 inmates number a trifle less than 7, at Auburn there are 12, and at Clinton over 20. The lowest rate is 3, in Wisconsin, and the highest 77, in Mississippi. The practice of hiring out convicts to work in mines and upon railroads causes frightful death rates in several Southern States; but the New Hampshire figure is 48, for what reason does not appear. The rate in Massachusetts is 15, in Maine 15, in Vermont 25, and in Connecticut 15; Pennsylvania has 6 in the west and 14 in the east district, and the rate is generally very low in the states of the Northwest.

THE influence of temperature has been applied by Dr. Taylor to the explanation of vernal floras. Species that bloom early are frequently identical with, or closely related to, Alpine species of the same latitude; and these, as is well known, bear a similar relation to Arctic species. Arctic and Alpine floras are commonly explained as remnants of the post-glacial flora, which have survived in consequence of the protection afforded by the cold of high altitudes or latitudes. Spring flowers it is claimed receive similar protection by their time of flowering. It is a suggestive fact that when our early flowering species also occur at high elevations, or farther north, they bloom much later than with us.

IN an item published some time ago in these columns, reference was made to the attempt to breed ostriches in California. The question as to whether or not such an undertaking will be successful seems settled by what has just occurred at Woodward's gardens, San Francisco. One of the female birds at that resort has begun laying eggs, and bids fair to continue in the work for some time. She laid one on Tuesday and the next on Thursday. One of them weighs three and a half pounds, is four and a half inches in lateral diameter, and seven inches in longitudinal diameter. The ostrich lays every alternate day until she has ninety eggs collected.

THE old female hippopotamus presented to the Zoological Society of London, in 1853, by the Viceroy of Egypt, died in the gardens on the 16th of December, after having for some time past exhibited manifest signs of old age. Her mate died in 1877, after having lived twenty-seven years in the gardens. It is thus evident that about thirty years is the extreme limit of hippopotamine existence, as it is not at all likely (judging from the state of the teeth and bones) that either of these animals would have been able to support existence so long in its native wilds as under the favorable circumstances in which it lived in the Regent's Park.

IN Russia the sunflower is extensively cultivated for the oil its seeds contain. The oil is palatable, clear and flavorless, and is used for adulterating olive oil, being exported from St. Petersburg to the shores of the Mediterranean Sea. Next to poppy-seed oil, sunflower oil burns clearest and longest, so that the peasants apply it to household purposes. From the stalks of the plants they also make a good quality of potash, and the residue of the seeds, after the oil is extracted, is made into oil-cake.

S. A. LATTIMORE

THE PELICAN'S COURTSHIP.

KING and Queen of the Pelicans we—
No other birds so grand we see;
None but we have feet like fins,
With lovely leathery throats and chins.

CHORUS—*Ploffskin, pluffskin pelican Jee,
We think no birds so happy as we!
Plumpskin, ploskskin, pelican Jill,
We thought so then, and we think so still.*

We live on the Nile—the Nile we love;
By night we sleep on the cliffs above;
By day we fish, and at eve we stand
On long, bare islands of yellow sand;
And when the sun sinks slowly down,
And the great rock-walls grow dark and brown,

Where the purple river rolls fast and dim,
And the ivory ibises starlike skim,
Wing to wing we dance around,
Stamping our feet with a flumpy sound,
Opening our mouths as pelicans ought,
And this is the song we nightly suort:

CHORUS—Ploffskin, pluffskin, etc.

Last year came out our daughter, Dell,
And all the birds received her well;
To do her honor a feast we made
For every bird that can swim or wade—
Hérons and gulls and cormorants black,
Cranes and flamingoes with scarlet back:
Plovers and storks and geese in clouds,
Swans and Dillbury ducks in crowds—
Thousands of birds in wondrous flight—
They ate and drank and danced all night;
And echoing back from the rocks was heard
Multitude echoes from bird and bird.

CHORUS—Ploffskin, pluffskin, etc.

Yes, they came; and among the rest
The King of the Cranes, all grandly dressed.
Such a lovely tail!—its feathers float
Between the ends of his blue dress-coat—
With pea-green trowsers all so neat,
And a delicate frill to hide his feet—

For, tho' no one speaks of it, every one knows

He has no webs between his toes.

CHORUS—Ploffskin, pluffskin, etc.

As soon as he saw our daughter Dell,
In violent love that Crane-King fell,
On seeing her waddling form so fair,
With a wreath of shrimps in her short white hair;

And before the end of the next long day
Our Dell had given her heart away.
For the King of the Cranes had won that heart

With a crocodile egg and a large fish tart;
She vowed to marry the King of the Cranes,
Leaving the Nile for stranger plains,
And away they flew in a gathering crowd
Of endless birds in a lengthening cloud.

CHORUS—Ploffskin, pluffskin, etc.

And far away in the twilight sky
We heard them singing a lessening cry,
Farther and farther, till out of sight,
And we stood alone in the silent night.
Often since, in the nights of June,
We sit on the sand and watch the moon.
She has gone to the great Grombolian plain,
And we probably never shall meet again.
Oft in the long still nights of June
We sit on the rocks and watch the moon;
She dwells by the streams of the Chankly Bore,
And we probably never shall see her more.

CHORUS—*Ploffskin, pluffskin, pelican Jee,
We think no birds so happy as we!
Plumpskin, ploskskin, pelican Jill,
We thought so then, and we think so still.*

THE YOUNG LAWYER'S TOILET.

A SOUTHERN STATESMAN.

IN the year 1876, Mr. James Harper, of Harper Brothers, met me on Broadway, and said: "Mr. Cleveland, the telegraph reports that Mr. Stephens is expected to die in Washington. Write me a sketch as quickly as you can, and Mr. Alden will pay you." A rather hurried sketch was prepared, but in no special anticipation of an occasion for its immediate use.

Some months later I was in his office, and Mr. Harper, recalling the interview, said: "You have the advantage of us—Mr. Stephens did not die, after all."

"I did not expect him to," was my reply; "he will outlive you, and possibly myself." The former prediction was verified. An absolutely pure and almost holy life, and a mind forever at rest in calm integrity, are elements well able to combat disease.

Few have been the visitors to Atlanta, the hill capital of Georgia, who have not made a pilgrimage to Mr.

Stephens' hospitable roof, much to the sacrifice of his valuable time. No man of his eminence did I ever meet who was so accessible. When summoned to London in 1871-72, to give information in the Alabama case, I found it difficult to get access to the lords of the Foreign Office, even with Mr. Gladstone's letter of direction in my hand; nor shall I soon forget the horror depicted in the faces of the underlings when I first visited Mr. A. T. Stewart without an appointment. But no man, woman or child was so humble as to be turned from the late Mr. Stephens' door. At my last visit a colored elder in the Northern Methodist Church was seated by him, waiting for an autograph presentation of one of the many books he has written, while at the door as I came out were two workingmen, with the marks of their labor fresh on their clothes, but sure of a welcome from "our Governor."

Leaving a car of one of the eight railroads which radiate from the town like the spokes of a wheel, or going from one of the hotels which suggest the North in bigness, or from a hospitable private house, the stranger or the friend was wont to ask for Peach-tree Street—so called not because it has very few peach-trees on it, but from a historic creek of that name which crosses it. Above the first Methodist Church there is an imposing mansion, which turned out to be not the executive mansion, but a school. However, a two-story brick house opposite, in a yard with fine shade trees, and a fence and porch that speak well for the economy of the legislature, is the place sought. Sometimes one of the old staff of the preceding governor answered the door-bell and held out a silver salver for a card, but usually it was one of the young negro body-servants of the old commoner, who let you in with as little ceremony as the sage of "Liberty Hall" would himself have shown. Handsome parlors, with well-worn furniture, were to the right and left, but one esteemed himself fortunate if at once admitted to the sanctum sanctorum, the working den, containing a bed, a table, a lounge, some chairs, and a roller-chair.

In the chair you might have seen a man who did not at all impress you as small. His once light-brown, or rather sandy, hair, lately grew very white and thin. His face during his later years was less wrinkled than one might have expected, and it was more in the lower part of the face and in the expression of the mouth that marks of his age appeared. He was seventy-one years old on the eleventh day of February, 1883. His form was always slight, with long limbs, but the lack of proportion was not very noticeable. When standing with his crutches there was still the commanding mien which so instantly drew all eyes rheumatism. The lameness which affected him near the close of his life was by many erroneously attributed to the fall of a heavy gate. He did indeed have a struggle with an unhinged one, but it did not appear at the time to hurt him. It was only a coincidence, he thought, that on the same night he was seized with a terrible attack of acute rheumatism, and that afterward he was compelled to speak from his chair. It was to his five months' imprisonment that, in his Macon speech of the present year, he attributed his disability to do more than to exercise for an hour in his room. His own people rather gloried in the infirmities over which the mind so triumphed, and he was at times spoken of as "the brain on wheels." His fine dark eyes retained to the last, much of that splendor which was the source of so much literary and poetic inspiration; and, with a somewhat intimate acquaintance with him, extending from 1859, I am not able to say if the scribblers are right who say they were black. I am rather inclined to call them a dark-brown.

Mr. Stephens derived his first name, Alexander, from his grandfather, who was one of the adherents of Edward the Pretender, and, after the defeat of his cause, at the battle of Worcester, about 1745, he came to this country and found sanctuary with the Shawnee Indians. Later he served under Colonel George Washington in the French-Indian war, and arose to the rank of captain in the Pennsylvania line during the Revolution. After that war the family settled on Kettle Creek, in Wilkes County, and then removed to the part now made into Taliaferro County. This old homestead contains the Stephens graveyard (see page 585), and in the left foreground is a heap of stones, once the chimney of the log cabin in which Alexander H. Stephens was born, on the eleventh day of February, 1812. Thus he was in the House of Representatives when he arose, while Senators deserted their chamber to see and to listen. His confinement in a damp casemate at Fort Warren, in Boston harbor, which began on the twenty-fifth of May, 1865, and continued until the eleventh of October in the same year, greatly aggravated a life-long tendency to seventy-one years old and twenty-one days when he died. The logs of the cabin he was born in now form the walls of one of the negro houses on the plantation; and the two-story frame house, built later, at a time when the cabin was used for the kitchen, was moved to another plantation on his father's death, and is now the dwelling house there. The substantial granite wall hides the graves, and the body of the statesman will shortly be removed to this his chosen resting place, where his kindred sleep. The mother of Mr. Stephens, Margaret Grier, was the sister of the compiler of the famous "Grier's Almanac," who made fame and fortune by exactly predicting a severe spring frost in 1836. Justice Grier, of the United States Supreme Court, was also a kinsman. His father, Andrew B. Stephens, was simply a good farmer. The half-brother of the late Governor was Hon. Linton Stephens, late of the Georgia Supreme Court; and his nephew, Colonel John A. Stephens, who, with the orphan children of Judge Linton Stephens, inherits the property, was a lieutenant of regulars in the Confederate army, and is now Adjutant-General of Georgia. His (Governor Stephens') mother died when he was an infant, and his father in his thirteenth year, twenty-sixth May, 1824. His inheritance from the estate was four hundred and forty-four dollars, increased by two hundred more from the estate of his grandfather. His uncle, Aaron W. Grier, then gave him a home, and the interest of his patrimony at eight per cent, clothed him and sent him to school. Mr. Charles C. Mills, his Sunday-school teacher, and Rev. Alexander Hamilton Webster, pastor of the Washington, Wilkes County, Presbyterian Church, took a fancy to him, and he was put at the high school taught by the latter. They also secured a loan from the Southern Home Missionary Society to complete his education at the State University, then Franklin College. It was in gratitude that he took his middle name, Hamilton, from this clergyman, and not from the statesman. He intended to study for the ministry, but changed his mind from repugnance to the theological idea of a vindictive God, and being trusted with his own money, repaid his debt. Mr. Stephens believed in future punishment, but not in any sense save as the inevitable effect of sin. He also lived and died in the firm conviction that the merits and righteousness of Christ could alone avail to remedy this effect of the wrong that all men do. Probably if he had applied for the ministry he would have been found orthodox in the modern sense, and accepted; and he remained to the last an honored member of the Presbyterian Church. What money he needed to complete his studies was borrowed from his older brother, Aaron G. Stephens—father, I think, to his heir, Colonel John A. Stephens. He graduated with honor in 1832, and taught school in Madison, Georgia, until he paid this and all other debts. His health was feeble from infancy. Having prepared for college in nine months at school, his preparation for the bar was as rapid. He began to study law twenty-sixth of May, 1834, and was admitted to practice twenty-second of July, in the same year, with no preceptor.

There was a magnetism in his kindly hand pressure, which disinclined one to particular analysis, and of which all were conscious, from the grown people who crowded to shake hands with him on his public appearances, to the dear little girls and boys who used to beg to come with mamma and see Mr. Stephens. While he enjoyed little reward in wealth, and less than he has deserved in station, one could never be with him without feeling that virtue had in him "its own exceeding great reward." I use "virtue" in its primary sense of manliness, for thus it fits this exceedingly manly man. In his Atlanta speech of 1882 he said: "I was better pleased and gratified with a remark I saw recently in a Philadelphia paper than with all the other squibs about myself. Referring to the nearly forty years I had been in the public service, it said in all that period I had neither grown rich nor fat." In parenthesis, let me say that he weighed eighty-four pounds in his stockings when he began the practice of law. His net weight shortly before his death was ninety-eight pounds, or one hundred and eight pounds in heavy clothes. He continued: "When I went to Congress I made a solemn covenant with myself, signing it the day before I took the oath of office, to this effect: 'Except my pay, I will never make a dollar in Washington city while a member of Congress.' Thus I served my constituents faithfully. I have collected thirty-five thousand dollars at one time before the Post-Office Department, and sent it to the contractor. He returned me five per cent of it. I told him I could not take it, and did not. He was astonished, and said that others did so when employed as lawyers before the departments. I only told him of what had been my uniform course. I have collected for others, I suppose, half a million of dollars, and I would never take a cent of it. All I did there I did in my public capacity, not even attending the Supreme Court when the House was in session. I have attended there in vacation, but never would I make a dollar when Congress was in session." Replying to a question as to the fraudulent Bullock bonds, he said: "My past life is a sufficient guarantee against any such imputation or suspicion of my connivance with them, else life is not worth the living."

There were, when he so spoke, thousands of persons in the state anxious to destroy him politically, yet in all America not a voice or pen could be found to contradict him. This writer knew of a large fee being offered him to appear before the Georgia Legislature at the session of 1865-66, to procure for the banks of the state similar equitable relief to that granted to private citizens. This was on account of the war having destroyed securities. He was himself a sufferer from like causes, and in need, but upon being elected to the United States Senate, he promptly relinquished the fee. It was but the shadow of an office, for the passions of 1866 were too high to permit the Vice-President of the Confedesion; upon his face were none of the deep lines of cunning, avarice and hate.

I feel that I can confer no greater boon upon the generation to come—the youth of America, who see in every paper, who hear in every speech, and often in sermons, too, something to the dispraise of the rulers of our country—no greater boon, I say, than to point to this man, covered with years and honors, turning on the brink of the grave to challenge forty years of public gaze and inspection to convict him of a single public wrong or private iniquity.

Yet this was not one of the titled aristocrats of England, whose coronet and title-deeds date from the Crusades; whose wealth is too great for a bribe to tempt him, whose ancestral shield, marked pro Deo et patria, compelled the bearer of it to feel noblesse oblige. True, his grandfather was a cavalier of the friends of the Stuarts, a captain in the ranks of Washington; true, that among his maternal relatives was at least one eminent scientist and a justice of the United States Supreme Court; but his father was a poor farmer, who died in his son's thirteenth year. The mother—usually the guardian angel to shield from sin—died when he was an infant. He had need of Christian kindness to begin his academic and collegiate education, although he faithfully and punctually repaid every dollar; and one or racy to sit in Federal councils; but he could not have even a shadow where integrity was involved. This it was which made the saintly and benignant look upon his aged face, not uncommon to clergymen of peaceful lives, but rare among those used to political strife. Upon his front were none of the thunder-scars of pas-two incidents of his young manhood, when sickly, poor, and liable to all the temptations of the young, will show how real was the spirit of integrity within him, and how good the stuff of which he was made.

There were not half a dozen cases returned to the term of the court when he began to practice. His small size and evident ill-health turned even appearances against him. There was then a shoe factory at Crawfordsville—his chosen home then and since—and as young Stephens passed briskly one of the negro workmen suspended the cup from which he was about to drink, and asked:

to walk. Pride prevented his asking the loan of a horse in his village, Crawfordsville. He had none of his own, and he did walk to the house of Aaron W. Grier, his uncle on his mother's side, ten miles, or nearly half his journey. This uncle had almost taken the place of the dead father, and he readily loaned him the horse. It

Alexander Stephens

(FROM A RECENT PHOTOGRAPH.)

"Who is dat little fellow what walks by here so fast dese mornings?"

Another answered: "Why, that's a lawyer, man."

Then followed the irrepressible negro guffaw, and a third was heard to say:

"A lawyer! Lawyer, indeed! You say dat! Dat's too good!"

This, with other things which he knew of, made the future seem dark enough. But he lived on six dollars a month in the frugal country way, blacked his own boots and made his own fires. Yet he so loved his home as to refuse an offer of an immediate competency if he would go away.

Judges and lawyers of the State Superior Courts "rode the circuit," and the next court session to his own was held in the town of Washington, Wilkes County. Here he had been a schoolboy, paying his way with a loan not long since repaid. No railway or stage line then existed between the towns, and it was too far may be said that he had carried a change of clothing in saddle-bags over his shoulder, and that his walk was at night, to avoid the heat of a July day. He often spoke of the lonely feeling he had resting upon wayside stones in the darkness, and wondering if it was a type of lasting darkness in the future. But he had a half-night's rest in a soft bed, and on the next day he rode to court.

Nearing the town of Washington, he thought best to enter as free as possible from the grime and dust of his foot-journey. A pine thicket was his dressing-room, and probably a stream of water and his handkerchief the toilet conveniences. His saddle-bags contained, with a clean shirt, a pair of thin white cotton pantaloons. They were suited to the climate, and when starched might be taken for linen. Taking off the somewhat worn clothes he had walked in the night before, he put on the clean ones, and made his first state entry as a young lawyer seeking practice. He found it, and made four hundred dollars in that first year. But whatever his success in that first practice away from home, he was prudent, for on leaving the town, and in anticipation of walking ten miles from his uncle's house to Crawfordsville, he dismounted and put on his soiled clothes to save the best he had for times of need.

Yet he had won his first law case, in ten days after being a lawyer, and refused the fifteen hundred dollar temptation to a city, saying to his home ties, like Ruth to Naomi: "Entreat me not to leave thee, to return from following after thee."

This is the man who resolved to devote his life to principles, from a childhood that held no hope save the providence of God for the "upright in heart," and who could say in 1882: "Well, I never made any departures. I never departed from principles—I NEVER SHALL!"

He had the courage of his convictions. This was evinced in his first race for the legislature, for he opposed a county vigilance committee which was proposed, and the administration of lynch law. He was also opposed to the doctrine of "nullification," in which many then went far beyond John C. Calhoun, and which the strongest men in his county advocated. The same firmness was demanded in his course on the admission of Texas, for Henry Clay, his party leader, was against him.

At the time of the Clayton Compromise of 1848, this independent course almost led him to martyrdom. He had moved to lay the measure on the table, i. e., kill it, and he succeeded in Washington to be met by execrations at home. At that time only seven Southern Congressmen had voted with him. It was reported to him that a large and powerful man had denounced him as a traitor to the South. He made some remark to the effect that he would slap any man's face who so said. Meeting the man, the charge was denied. On second thought, the man was not satisfied, and, having prepared for an encounter, he met Mr. Stephens and demanded retraction of his words. Mr. Stephens had an umbrella, the other a knife. The man of small size having refused to retract, several cuts were made at him and parried with the umbrella. At last, by superior might, the assailant threw him down, and a cut at the heart would have been fatal had not the blade partly closed. Another blow passed between two ribs, severing a small artery. Then, with left hand, on the forehead of the prostrate one and knife raised in his right, the bully said: "Retract, or I will cut your throat." Stephens said: "No, never!" As the knife descended, he caught the blade in his right hand and the elbow with his left. In this final struggle, the blade twisting in his right hand, the two got to their feet and were separated. It may be added, strange as it may seem, that the two afterward became friends. The skill of Dr. Hitchcock, of the United States Army, alone prevented death from the wounds received during this encounter. This was in Atlanta, September 4th, 1848. The tendons of some fingers and of the thumb of the right hand were severed. Young readers can now examine the later writing of Mr. Stephens, and know that it is not due to age or carelessness, but to his fearless adherence to principle. His secretary wrote his official letters, but Mr. Stephens signed all state papers.

This writing used to cause him some trouble. Once he wrote for "two Dagon plows." He got two dozen of another sort. Again, for "fifty pounds of rice," and received fifty pounds of ice. No really serious mishap ever resulted from these errors.

On the fourteenth of September, 1848, ten days after the encounter described, there was a vast mass meeting of ten thousand persons in Atlanta to ratify the nomination of General Zachary Taylor for the Presidency. Mr. Stephens was asked to show himself on the stand, and, to prevent accident, the horses were removed, and the enthusiastic populace dragged the carriage. His appearance in the column of the procession drew shouts and tears alike beyond description. Senator Berrien spoke, but the people wanted to see Mr. Stephens, and when he arose, slight and emaciated, as if from the dead, there was such a scene as Georgians never saw before or since.

He only arose, he said, to acknowledge the greeting, and could not speak, but would give an anecdote. It was of an elderly soldier, one of the famed Doniphan Regiment, discharged in Mexico from the hospital almost naked, and unable to satisfy his own hunger or to reach his family and distant friends. A generous New Orleans merchant took him into his store, clothed him, fed him, and, giving him the means to reach his family, asked: "Now, is there anything more I can do for you?" The grateful soldier said "No," and took leave. After going some distance he paused, and then retraced his steps. On entering he met the inquiring gaze of his benefactor, and said: "I told you there was nothing more you could do for me. I forgot; there is one thing more you can do." "What is that?" cordially asked the merchant, taking the hand of the war-worn veteran. Said the soldier: "You can vote for old Zach. All I ask of you is not to forget to vote for old Zach." With heart full of gratitude, he went his way. "Now," said Mr. Stephens, "all I have to say to you is, don't forget to vote for old Zach!" He then resumed his seat amid such a shout as proclaimed full assent.

He recovered and canvassed the state, which gave General Taylor a handsome majority. Edward Everett, Hon. John J. Crittenden and others sent their congratulations, for the "dead Douglas," or the reported dead, carried the field.

It is said that Rome decreed a statue to her patriot, Fabius, because, in the time of peril, "he did not despair of the republic." The great Tully said in the days of Catalina: "It should even be written on the forehead of each one what he thinks of the republic." Mr. Stephens recently said: "Our complex government, state and federal, constitutes the best government in the world." Then followed in his Atlanta speech, in about the space of half a column, the best compendium ever given of what our system is, closing with the words of Jefferson in 1800: "The Constitution is but a chain to bind the rulers of the people."

In these days, when again the purple seems likely to be put up at auction, and only the dispersal of the legionaries to their homes in 1865 prevents the near parallel to the times and the luxuries of Imperial Rome, it is pleasant to be reminded that the sires of 1776 and the framers of the Constitution of 1787 were for principles, not men nor power. Pleasant to know that in all parties and in all the states there are patriots who remember that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," and that rulers and legislators are public servants. Still may they be. Then shall in all our western world—

"Still justice, truth and righteousness prevail,
While plenty crowns the hill and fills the vale;
Still sages hold on high the Moses rod,
Which guides to glory as it points to God!"

To tell of his success in Congress would be to recite the history of America since 1844. He had the grand courage, when faced by a report of a committee in Congress that seemed to involve his right to his seat, to oppose the committee and hold their report unconstitutional. He said: "I do not think the election constitutional, but if you hold that it was, then my people say I am the man they have sent." The admiration of John Quincy Adams for him seemed then to begin, and a poem from the old statesman to the new one exists in Mr. Stephens' album. The following is an exact copy of it, recently made by his permission:

"TO ALEXANDER H. STEVENS, ESQ., OF GEORGIA.

H. R. U. S., 14th June, 1844.

Say, by what sympathetic charm,
What mystic magnet's secret sway,
Drawn by some unresisted arm,
We come from regions far away?

Congress. After a noble apostrophe to the Union and its glory, he said: "It is for us and for those who come after us to determine whether this grand experimental problem shall be worked out." He had before spoken of the astonished philosophers and crowned heads of Europe gazing at it in awe. This success, he said, was to be "not by doing injustice to any, not by keeping out any particular class of states, but by each state remaining a separate and distinct political organism within itself; all bound together for general objects under a common head, as it were, 'a wheel within a wheel.' Then the number may be multiplied without limit. Then, indeed, may the nations of the earth look with wonder at our career, and when they hear the noise of

"VOTE FOR OLD ZACH!"

From North and South, from East and West,
Here in the People's Hall we meet,
To execute their high behest
In council and communion sweet.
We meet as strangers in this hall,
But when our task of duty's done
We blend the common good of all,
And melt the multitude in one.
As strangers in this hall we met;
But now with one united heart,
Whate'er of life awaits us yet,
In cordial friendship let us part.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
of Quincy, Mass."

Mr. Stephens was always a States Rights man, but never a Nullifier. His last speech in the old Congress was on February 12th, 1859. The Southern members were opposed to the admission of Oregon as a state, because that being a free state, would lessen the preponderance of the South and of the pro-slavery party in the wheels of our progress in achievement, in development, in expansion, in glory and renown, it will appear to them not unlike the noise of great waters—the very voice of the Almighty—Vox populi, vox Dei!"

A story of that time, illustrating the narrow line between the sublime and the absurd, has probably never before been printed. Henry Clay's old room at the National Hotel was on the first floor on the northwest corner, and, after his death, Mr. Stephens occupied it during most of his Congressional career. After the great Oregon speech, in which the members had joined the galleries in prolonged applause, Mr. Stephens went to this room, and on the way overheard a person who had been present describing the speech of the day in Congress.

"Ah," said he, "you should have seen him, with his slight form quivering, yet erect like a steel rod, and his shrill voice ringing through the hushed hall in that grand climax—'Vox populi, vox Dei!' Oh, it was fine!"

"LIBERTY HALL" DURING THE WAR.

The other fellow, who had not heard it, was a little bored, and said:

"Y-e-a-s, no doubt; but I'll bet ten dollars you can't tell what 'Vox populi, vox Dei' means."

"Yes, I can—put up your money," was the reply.

This little formality seemed to be effected, and the doubter said:

"Now, what is it in English?"

"Why," said the enthusiast, "It means, 'My God, my God! why hast thou forsaken me?'"

"The money's yours," said the other; "but I didn't think you knew."

In 1859 he retired from Congress, and his farewell speech, July 2d, 1859, is worthy to frame with the farewell words of Washington. In 1845, in his Texas speech, he had said: "I am no defender of slavery in the abstract—liberty always had charms for me." In his farewell speech he said: "If slavery as it exists with us is not the best for the African, constituted as he is; if it does not best promote his happiness and welfare, socially, morally and politically, as well as that of his master, it ought to be abolished." His later words about the rock "impregnable as truth," and the "Corner-Stone" speech did not contradict these words. His letter to his biographer, written on the eighth of April, 1860, in reply to a proposal to use his name for President at the Charleston Convention, was as full of the spirit of self-denial and of obedience to the will of the people as his whole life had proved. But it was not until he stood by Senator Douglas in Atlanta, later in the year, that he knew how near Mr. Douglas had been to withdrawing his name for President in favor of Mr. Stephens. On November 14th, 1860, Mr. Stephens made his noble effort before the Georgia Legislature to stay secession and save the Constitutional Union of our fathers. How and why he failed, and how the South lost hundreds of millions in property because he failed; how we still decorate the graves of that useless war; how we lost our majority in Congress, and have only just recovered it under Mr. Stephens' leadership and upon Mr. Stephens' plan and direction—this is recent history.

In leaving Washington in 1859, he was seen looking silently back from the Potomac boat at the swelling dome of the Capitol. On being asked his thoughts, he said:

"I was thinking that when next I see that dome I shall be a prisoner of war."

He did so see it, in 1865, from a similar river-boat, as he was on his way to Fort Warren a prisoner.

On the twenty-second of February, 1866, after release from prison, he spoke to the Legislature, saying: "We should accept the issues of the war and abide by them in good faith." The New York Tribune quoted largely from it. One paragraph about the negroes was this: "Ample and full protection should be secured to them, so that they may stand equal before the law, in the possession and enjoyment of all rights of personal liberty and property."

The end of Mr. Stephens' life, long anticipated even by himself, came most unexpectedly at last, when he was congratulating himself on unusually good health.

In his last political speech he put himself on the platform of the Supreme Court of the United States as indicated by the words: "This is an indissoluble union of indestructible states."

His last public appearance, and the only one after his inauguration as Governor of Georgia, in the autumn of 1882, was on the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the landing of Oglethorpe in Savannah, and the founding of the city and the state.

The funeral services of Governor Stephens attracted to Atlanta a vast crowd from the surrounding country, composed not only of the best-known people in the state, but of poor whites and negroes, who loved his memory. As I stood in the Senate Chamber while the remains lay in state, an affecting incident took place. Aleck Kent, Mr. Stephens' body-servant, came in, and two women with him. One was a woman who lives in Atlanta, but the other had just come from Crawfordsville on the afternoon train. She was deeply affected, and wept freely as she stooped over the cold form of him she loved so well. It took but a moment to identify her as Dora Stephens, one of Mr. Stephens' servants. When she was spoken to, she clung to the hand held out to her, and said, amid hysterical weeping, "Oh, he is gone, he is gone—and who will take care of me now?" When more calm she said that the rest of the family were sick, and unable to come as they wished. The two colored women then left the chamber with Aleck.

On the day of the funeral, as one of the finest of the Atlanta colored military companies guarded the curbstone line, a gray-haired colored woman of about sixty years stood crowded between them on the Custom House corner, and almost pressed into their ranks by the surging crowd of whites and blacks. She said to me: "'Fore gracious, honey, I is come seven miles afoot to see Marse Aleck once more, and I 'se been here dese two hours, and I 'spect ter stay till night but I sees him." Her chance was that of one old woman among a hundred thousand younger, and she only saw the plumes of the hearse and the eight horses that bore her friend and master to the long rest which brain and body had so worthily earned.

THE LAST RESTING PLACE.

AT DAWN.

I

I HEARD the angels singing at the dawn,
While the cool mist of morn lay still and gray,
Cov'ring each rounded hill and dewy lawn—
A close-drawn veil between the night and day.

II

Anon it rose like to a shrouded saint—
The morning wind came up along the stream,
Bearing o'er hill and vale the echo faint
Of their sweet song, low heard as in a dream.

III

The weary watch is o'er.
The night hath flown
And passed for evermore
Far o'er the azure floor
Of heaven blown.

IV

The golden light of day,
God-given, strong,
Pierces the shadows gray,
Which fade and flee away
The earth along.

V

So shall all idle fears
Born of the night;
Sorrows of days and years,
As the loved light appears,
Take them to flight.

VI

It ceased; the lingering echoes died away
In a low-murmured cadence, mystic, sweet,
As the sea murmurs in some quiet bay
Over the sands where shore and ripple meet.

J. A. RITCHIE.

SOME PEOPLE AND SOME OTHER PEOPLE.

BY ANNA FARR.

THE Reverend John Peter Paul Smith was a Methodist minister. He had been several years in the itineracy, and had saved five hundred dollars of his meagre salary. With this sum snugly deposited in bank, Mr. Smith began to indulge dreams of matrimony, and no right-minded person could blame him for it.

The future Mrs. Smith had been duly selected, and it was decided that they should be married just before Conference, and take their wedding-trip in an excursion to that meeting.

Let it not be insinuated that the Rev. John Peter Paul was influenced in this decision by a laudable desire to save expense. The newly-wedded pair were very independent in their feelings—as they well might be with five hundred dollars in bank—and they proceeded at once to the best hotel in the town, and paid their bills without even hinting at reduction on the score of the ministerial profession.

Mrs. Smith had never attended Conference before, and she enjoyed it amazingly. She was made much of, as was quite proper in consideration of the fact that she was a bride. The hospitable people of the town took kindly to Conference, and a succession of dinners and teas was given to the members. Brother and Sister Smith were especially mentioned in all these invitations, and they kept up quite a round of this mild dissipation. Sister Smith made such a decidedly good impression on the minds of all who met her, that Mr. Smith was often and warmly congratulated on his choice.

At length the important day came when the appointments of the Presiding Elder were to be read. The sisters were grouped anxiously together, waiting to hear their fate for the next year. Sister Smith sat with them. After several appointments had been read which seemed to give great satisfaction, Mr. Smith heard his own name announced:

"John Peter Paul Smith, Noxet."

"Too bad! Too bad!" chorused several of the sisters in one breath.

"I am glad I am not in your place, Sister Smith," said a lady in brown dress and bonnet, extending a sympathetic hand.

"Why so, Sister Jones?"

"Because they have such queer people in the Noxet Church," replied Sister Jones.

"Oh, is that all?" answered Mrs. Smith brightly. "I think we can get along with them for one year, at any rate."

Mr. Smith was commiserated by his brethren for the blank he had drawn in the distribution of ecclesiastical prizes. But he did not pay much attention to their croaking. To tell the truth, it seemed to him that any place would be delightful where he could enjoy the constant society of Mrs. John Peter Paul. He was young then, and new alike to ministry and matrimony.

It was two weeks after the close of Conference before the minister and his wife were ready to start for Noxet. They spent this time with Mrs. Smith's mother, and while there they packed and forwarded several boxes of bedding and household goods.

The Noxet people had shown themselves wise in one respect at least. They owned a good parsonage, and had furnished it comfortably at their own expense with everything but bedding, china, silver, and such things as all families prefer to provide for themselves. When Mr. Smith heard of this parsonage, he was decidedly prejudiced in favor of Noxet, notwithstanding the doleful predictions of the brethren.

Behold, then, on a bright June afternoon, the Rev. J. P. P. Smith and wife on their way to Noxet. They had only fifty miles to travel—the whole distance by rail. The town was in the interior of the state, and in a region that had not been settled until a comparatively recent date. As they neared their future home, they looked anxiously at every varying feature of the landscape. Certainly the country was becoming more primitive and the houses plainer and farther apart, yet it was evidently a rich farming region, and there were no indications of poverty or lack of thrift. They were, on the whole, favorably impressed with all they saw.

The train was an "accommodation," and so exceedingly accommodating that it stopped often and everywhere. It was nearly dark when the conductor came into the car and announced:

"Next-stop-Noxet!"

Mr. and Mrs. Smith at once began to collect their various belongings, and make ready for leaving the train. It drew up, with a very wheezy puff, before a rude little station. No one alighted save the minister and his wife. Several men were standing on the platform, as usual at these little stations. The baggage was thrown off the train and it pulled away. Then one of the men stepped forward briskly, and said:

"Mr. and Mrs. Smith, I presume?"

"We are," replied Mr. Smith.

"And I am Mr. Mason, one of your members. Glad to see you, sir," shaking hands with his new pastor. "And you, too, ma'am," repeating the cordial handshaking with her. "Come right this way and get into my wagon. I'll attend to your baggage, and then I'll take you straight up to the parsonage. Our people are all there waiting for you, and I reckon supper is about ready by this time."

Mr. Smith helped his wife into the wagon while Mr. Mason went for the baggage. The men who were standing near assisted him in bringing the trunks to the wagon.

"I like him, at any rate," whispered Mrs. Smith.

"So do I," replied her husband.

The town of Noxet was small, and it took but a few minutes to reach the parsonage. It was quite too dark to form any opinion of its surroundings, but every window of the house was brilliantly lighted up, indicating a large company. Mrs. Smith felt a little shiver of dread, when Mr. Mason lifted her from the wagon, at the idea of meeting so many strangers. But if the minister's new wife had any one qualification for her difficult position, it was that of being equal to any emergency; so it was with a composed manner, though somewhat flushed face, that she followed her husband into the house.

They were met at the door by a woman with a small shawl over her shoulders, notwithstanding it was a warm June evening, and having her face tied up with a white handkerchief.

"Come right this way, Brother Smith and Sister Smith, and I'll take you up to your room. We thought mebbe you'd like to wash and fix up a little mite before seeing all the people. Just as soon as you are ready, you can come down to the parlor. I must run down and attend to things." And she departed.

Each gave an amused glance at the other as the door closed behind her.

"It is getting interesting, my dear Paul. Do make haste, and let us go down and see the rest of them," said Mrs. Smith, as she brushed her brown hair.

She hastily dressed herself in a black silk, so plainly made that it could not provoke criticism on the score of extravagant display, and then she pinned a lace collar around her neck. She had a pretty good idea as to what her style of dress was expected to be.

They were met at the door of the parlor by Mr. Mason, and by him introduced to several men who were grouped in the middle of the room. "Class-leaders and stewards," he explained. These, in turn, introduced them to the people as they flocked around. In the confusion of the crowd it was impossible to remember any name in connection with the person to whom it belonged. The woman who had welcomed them to the house was introduced as "Sister Loone," and the name struck Mrs. Smith as eminently appropriate to her general appearance.

When Sister Loone, who seemed to be very active, announced that supper was ready and invited them out into the large dining-room, Mr. and Mrs. Smith took their places at the table with a very comfortable home feeling. This was, perhaps, in part owing to the fact that the table was set out with their own china and silver, which the ladies had unpacked.

Such a supper! There was the greatest profusion of everything, nicely cooked and appropriately served. Noxet people certainly knew how to live well.

Directly in front of Mrs. Smith, as she sat by her husband, half-way down the long table, was a pyramid loaf of fruit-cake, at least eighteen inches high, and elaborately iced. While they were eating supper a very sweet-looking woman came up behind Mrs. Smith and whispered to her:

"That fruit-cake is not to be cut. I baked it especially for you, but the ladies said it must go on the table, to make the table look nicely. It will keep a long time, and I know you will have so much to do for a while, that it will come handy to have some cake in the house. There is plenty for this evening without it."

"It was very thoughtful of you," replied Mrs. Smith.

Tableful after tableful sat down and were bountifully fed. Still the cake remained uncut, a conspicuous feature of the feast. Mr. and Mrs. Smith were very busy forming the acquaintance of the people until some of them began to leave, and then Mrs. Smith thought it proper to take her place as hostess.

She was trying to find a lost basket for one of the guests, when Mrs. Loone, who seemed to be everywhere at once, said:

"Now, Sister Smith, don't give yourself one mite of trouble. I'll attend to everything before I go."

"You are very kind," replied Mrs. Smith.

"Awful kind, ain't she?" said a sepulchral voice in the pantry, near which they were standing. Mrs. Loone did not hear it, but Mrs. Smith did.

"Why didn't your daughter come to-night, Sister Loone?" asked a lady who was packing her basket with the dishes she had brought.

"Well, she's got the spine. The doctor said so today. It's in her back, and hurts her awful."

Just then a half-grown girl, poorly dressed, came in with a large empty basket in her hand. Mrs. Loone took the basket into the pantry, and in a few moments brought it out filled and covered with a napkin. Several ladies gave each other significant glances, which did not escape Mrs. Smith.

Mrs. Loone bustled around, carrying the things from the table into the convenient and capacious pantry. As she went back and forth she explained to Mrs. Smith that she did not want her to have any trouble about clearing up in the morning.

The half-grown girl came back at this juncture with her empty basket.

"That's my bound-girl, Sister Smith. She's taking my things home." And again Mrs. Loone disappeared in the pantry with the basket.

"Just hear that woman!" said one sister to another. "She didn't bring a blessed crumb!"

All the same, she sent home the basket again and yet again, and then she departed herself, with an injunction to Mrs. Smith not to worry about things in the morning, for she would be around and straighten up.

The Rev. John Peter Paul and his wife were too tired to talk much after their last visitor departed. But Mrs. Smith was a thrifty little body, and curiosity prompted her to look into the pantry before she retired, and see what had been left her for future use. She found plenty of fragments of bread, a little cold meat, but not a scrap of cake of any description. The pyramid of fruit-cake had utterly and entirely vanished.

"'Twas ever thus," she said to Mr. Smith, who stood at the door with a candle in his hand, to shed light on her investigations. She began to comprehend the meaning of the oft-returning basket, and the significant glances she had intercepted.

The next morning she was awake bright and early. In fact, the novelty of her position had kept her awake the greater part of the night. She concluded it might be well enough for her to attend to clearing away the remnants of the feast herself, and not to wait for Mrs. Loone. With this laudable intention, she went down to the pantry, and a close search resulted in the finding of various packages of tea, coffee and sugar snugly hidden away. It occurred to her that there could be no objection to her removing the packages, and she accordingly transferred them to a china-closet.

She took some butter, jelly, preserves, pickles and a pie or two that she found and placed them in the china-closet also. Then she managed to get up a very nice breakfast from the remnants of the reception supper, and Mr. Smith was just asking a blessing when Mrs. Loone walked in, without the ceremony of knocking.

"Good morning, Brother Smith. Good morning, Sister Smith. I've had an awful night of it with my neuralgic, but I said, says I to Mr. Loone, 'I'll go right down to the parsonage and help Sister Smith clear away.' You just set still at your breakfast, and I'll go into the pantry and red up," and she whisked into the pantry, basket in hand.

Mrs. Smith heard her moving dishes and tin pans, and she could imagine the unsuccessful search that was going on. Presently Mrs. Loone came out.

"Has any of the ladies been here this morning, Sister Smith?"

"No one."

A mystified look came into the face that was still tied up with the white handkerchief, but evidently Mrs. Loone did not consider it prudent to ask any more questions.

"Well, I guess I'll go home. I've got the neuralgic so bad, and Mag—she's my daughter—she has the spine, and I've got a big family of boarders, and nobody but my bound-girl to help me. Good morning."

"Boarders," thought Mrs. Smith. "John, dear, I think Mrs. Loone understands how to provide for a family," but she did not give him her reasons for this belief. She would not prejudice him against any of his people.

Months afterward one of those same boarders informed Mrs. Smith that they were still occasionally treated to a piece of fruit-cake, which had been an undreamed-of luxury previous to the evening of the reception.

The parsonage was soon in prime order. Mrs. Smith made a notable little housewife. Her husband found he could safely trust in her prudent management, and he left pecuniary affairs pretty much in her hands, and gave himself unreservedly, heart and soul, to his own proper work. One bright morning, a few weeks after their arrival in Noxet, Mr. Smith started out to call upon some of his parishioners. He left Mrs. Smith singing at her work, her busy hands deftly putting some finishing touches to the parlor, which already was as bright and cheerful, it seemed to the happy young minister, as room possibly could be.

There was a subdued rap at the back door, and Mrs. Smith hastily stepped down from the chair on which she was standing dusting off a picture frame. Opening the door she saw a stranger, dressed like a farmer, who introduced himself as "Mr. Gray, one of the stewards." Mr. Gray had fair hair, mild blue eyes, a face that was exceptionally child-like and innocent in expression, and a voice wonderfully soft and musical. Mrs. Smith's heart warmed to him at once.

"Sister Smith, I dare say," he added after introducing himself. "Is Brother Smith at home?"

"No; he has gone out for the morning."

"Oh, I am so sorry! I wanted to see him; I wanted very much to say to him that I am sure our church is going to prosper under his ministry. Our people are all delighted with him; and Noxet people are not very easy to please, either."

Mrs. Smith was more than delighted with the man who so thoroughly appreciated his pastor. Her manner was cordial, and her face glowed with pleasure.

"By-the-way, Sister Smith, I thought, as you were just commencing housekeeping, you would need some wood, and I have a load of nice dry hickory out here that I have brought for you."

"You have? How thoughtful and kind!" said Mrs. Smith gratefully.

"Where shall I put it, Sister Smith?"

"In the wood-house, please."

The wood was very speedily unloaded, and Brother Gray came to the door once more. His heart seemed so full of joy at the prosperity of the church, and of love for the new pastor who was doing such efficient service in Noxet, that he seemed unable to tear himself away. After many kind messages for Mr. Smith, he said:

"I really must be starting home. Sister Smith, if it is not too much trouble, will you please give me a receipt for the wood, putting the value at two dollars and a half? Hickory wood is selling for three dollars a cord, but as I pay two dollars and a half each quarter, and don't want to be mean with my pastor, we will just call it two dollars and a half, and that will make us even."

Mrs. Smith wrote the receipt and Mr. Gray went away. She thought she would go out and take a look at her purchase.

"Is it possible that little pile can be a cord?" she queried to herself. Such wood as it was, too! Knots, crooked sticks, limbs of dead trees, and not a single good stick of wood to be seen!

She saw she had been cheated in quality, and she determined to assure herself in regard to the quantity. She piled it up as well as she could, and then went into the house for the tape measure.

Mr. Smith had just returned. "Oh, John, come and help me measure this load of wood," and she told him of her purchase.

"Now, John, you know a cord of wood is four feet wide, four feet high and eight feet long." They measured the pile and found there was less than one-third of a cord! She had paid the mild-mannered, affable Mr. Gray three times what the very best wood could have been bought for on the street.

She did not repeat to her husband the pleasant things Mr. Gray had said about him. They all seemed to have lost their value after the little wood transaction.

When they had been in Noxet about a month a notice was handed to Mr. Smith, one Sabbath morning, inviting all the ladies of the congregation to meet that week at the house of one of the prominent members to reorganize the sewing society. Mrs. Smith was delighted to hear this notice. The church needed some repairs, and this seemed such a good way to raise funds for that object.

The ladies met promptly, exchanged pleasant greetings, and sat around in mute expectancy.

"Who is your president, Mrs. Loone?" asked Mrs. Smith of that lady, who still had her head tied up, and seemed to have a chronic "neuralgia."

"We haven't none now, Sister Smith. Sister Porter—she was our last preacher's wife—she was president till she went away. You'll have to be president now, Sister Smith."

"Oh, no; you must elect some one older than I. Who is vice-president?"

"Sister Mason."

Then Mrs. Smith suggested that Mrs. Mason call the ladies to order. This was done, and Mrs. Mason told them their first business was to elect a president to fill the vacancy caused by the removal of Sister Porter.

"Will some one please nominate?"

"Sister Smith! Sister Smith!" was the response on all sides.

"I second the nomination," came from a corner.

"All in favor of Sister Smith please say 'Aye.'"

There was a general "Aye."

"Sister Smith is elected unanimously," said Mrs. Mason.

Mrs. Smith told them she should much prefer that some one older and better acquainted with them and their ways of working should take the place.

Up spoke Mrs. Loone: "No, Sister Smith; that's what a preacher's wife is for."

Seeing it was expected as a matter of course that the pastor's wife should be president of the sewing society, Mrs. Smith, with quiet dignity, accepted the position. She made a neat little speech, giving them her ideas in regard to the best way of running the society, and telling them she expected all to assist her in her new and untried duties. They listened with great deference, and Mrs. Smith began to think the office rather pleasant, after all.

But if she indulged the idea that her position was simply an ornamental one, and that all she would have to do would be to preside in her chair of state at the fortnightly meetings of the society, she found herself very much mistaken. There was not the slightest intention on the part of any one that Sister Smith should be carried to the skies on flowery beds of ease. The office meant business. It meant leaning over a table and cutting out shirts a whole afternoon at a time. It meant stitching bosoms and making button-holes. It meant ripping out all the poor work and doing it over again. Last, but not least, it meant finishing all the work that was promised at a given time, but that no one else felt at all responsible for.

Mrs. Loone once said, very pointedly, when the question was asked, "Who will take home this work and finish it?" "Let them as has neither boarders nor babies do it." And Sister Smith took the garment and finished it some time during the night.

One day several of the young ladies in the society were making night-caps of Swiss muslin, embroidered in tambour stitch, as was the fashion then and there. Mrs. Smith had drawn the patterns and taught the stitch to the young ladies. Their needles and tongues were flying swiftly, when all at once there was a sudden hush in the room. Mrs. Smith looked up from her work and saw an elegantly-dressed, stylish-looking lady just coming in. There was a suppressed whisper of "Mrs. Grimshaw! Mrs. Grimshaw!" but no one rose to welcome her. With true courtesy Mrs. Smith went forward to welcome the stranger.

"This is Sister Smith, I presume. I am staying with a friend for a few days, and am to leave town to-morrow. I heard you were trying to raise some money to repair your church, and, as I like to aid in every good work, I thought I would come in and see what you have for sale."

Mrs. Smith was pleased, and politely led her around the room and showed her the different kinds of work they were doing. When they reached the group of young ladies Mrs. Grimshaw paused.

"Let me see what you are making here. Night-caps, indeed. Why, they are lovely! Let me take one, please," and she held it up in her jeweled hand and carried it to the window for critical examination.

"It is exquisitely done. I wish it was finished. I would like two of them very much."

"We can soon finish two," said Mrs. Smith.

"But I leave to-morrow afternoon."

"You can have them at noon, if that will do."

"Oh, charming! I do not go till three. Please send them to my nieces, where I am visiting."

The velvet-clad lady, whose solitaire diamond earrings alone would nearly have built the Noxet Church, went away with a graciously benevolent smile on her face. Then all tongues were unloosed. The ladies made haste to tell Mrs. Smith that Mrs. Grimshaw lived in Boston; that she had no end of money, and came once a year to visit her niece.

"Well, she shall have those caps if I have to sit up all night to finish them," said Sister Smith enthusiastically; and she thought, with a glow of pleasure, how the building fund would be enriched by Mrs. Grimshaw's contribution. "But what price shall I ask for them?" said the practical president.

They had already sold several at fifty cents apiece. But they unanimously concluded that Mrs. Grimshaw would not even ask the price, as the caps were merely a pretext for a generous donation to the church.

"They say she is a Unitarist, too," said Mrs. Loone, who had a fatal facility for manufacturing and misapplying words.

"A what, Sister Loone?" asked Mrs. Smith.

"A Unitarist. All them Boston folks are."

Mrs. Smith took the caps home to finish, and also some narrow thread lace that had been given to the society. The ladies thought it no more than right to trim the caps with the lace, and thus show their appreciation of Mrs. Grimshaw's kindness.

Mrs. Smith sat up till after midnight. She would have finished the caps before retiring, but Rev. John Peter Paul woke up as the clock struck twelve, and saw her lamp burning.

"Are you still sewing?"

"Yes, Paul."

"Well, I am not going to let you spoil your eyes for this church, or any other. You married me, not the Noxet Church, and I want you to put your sewing up and come to bed."

Mrs. Smith dutifully obeyed, but she rose with the first streak of dawn. At noon the caps were done and she took them herself to Mrs. Grimshaw. That lady looked them over very closely, and asked:

"What is the price?"

"We have sold some without lace for fifty cents."

"I presume this lace was given the society? You did not buy it?"

Mrs. Smith had to acknowledge it had been given to the society.

"Of course, then, you cannot ask extra for the lace. Here is a dollar for the caps. Excuse me, I must finish my packing." And she left the room.

As a veracious narrator of facts, I am sorry to have to record that Sister Smith did not throw the two silver half-dollars after the retreating form of Mrs. Grimshaw. But she was young then and was rather overawed by the magnificence of this aristocratic Bostonian.

As she walked rather dispiritedly homeward, she reflected that perhaps, after all, some Bostonian "Unitarists" could give points to some Noxet Methodists.

NAPA VALLEY, CALIFORNIA.

FAIR is the valley of the blue and gold!
Above, shine skies of amethystine hue,
While far and near, impearled with morning dew,
The golden grain springs from the fertile mould.
Close by a stream which winds from far away,
The lovely city of the wood-nymphs lies,
By Flora almost hid from mortal eyes;

And far to south the white sails speck the bay.
Here, St. Helena proudly holds her sway,
And woos soft breezes from the western sea;
While health and peace and joy her will obey,
And learning, 'neath her sceptre, bends the knee.
Here, traveler, rest and make life's sunset sweet.
The Eden-land of earth lies at thy feet!

CLARENCE T. URMY.

THE WEDDING VEIL.

BY HESTER M. POOLE.

[Travelers in Japan describe the Japanese maiden's wedding-veil as a long, flowing piece of gauze, white, and soft in texture. It is used but twice—first for a bridal-veil, and again when it serves as a winding-sheet.]

WEAVE ye the veil, O maidens ! sing and weave !
 Let your swift shuttles fly !
 Nor may one nimble finger dare to leave
 A flaw within the ply ;
 Like her pure life, the web must not receive
 Or faintest stain or dye.

Weave ye the veil, O maidens ! weave and sing !
 Let strains of joy arise !
 In chorus chant the hymeneal ring,
 Let all the glad surprise,—
 The shy, sweet joy to see so fair a thing—
 Well up within her eyes.

Sing of the happy lover, proud and free !
 Its folds when first he sees,
 So snowy white in graceful witchery
 On the caressing breeze.
 The moonbeams, sleeping in their purity,
 Are not more fair than these !

Sing of the rounded days that glide away
 From rosy-fingered Time,
 Who counts the laughing hours like buds of May,
 Each opening in its prime ;
 They show a heart of rose too sweet to stay
 Within this fitful clime.

Weave ye the veil, O maidens ! Soft and slow
 Your strains may echo here !
 Twine strong the thread, and firm the weft let go,
 To last full many a year ;
 The bridal robe, with all its graceful flow,
 Must drape the funeral bier.

Weave ye the veil in silence ! Holy Love
 Shall cast its tender spell
 O'er the souls passing to that home above
 Where all true hearts do dwell !
 Weave for two bridals ! Death can only prove
 A second wedding-bell.

BELINDA.

BY RHODA BROUGHTON,

Author of "Good-by, Sweetheart!" "Red as a Rose is She," etc., etc.

PERIOD III—CHAPTER IV.

"HE was not far wrong," says Sarah dispassionately, "though I am afraid that it was scarcely in a brotherly spirit that he said it; I am eminently well able to take care of myself!"

It is next morning, and the girls are beginning the day with a preliminary saunter round the narrow bounds of the little garden, and the newly-mown tennis-ground. They are very small bounds, but within them is room for undried dew; for a blackbird with a voice a hundred times bigger than its body; for a guelder rose, a fine broom-bush, and a short-lived lilac. What more would you have? Beneath one Turkey-red sunshade they stroll in slow contentment along.

"I have no foolish false pride," continues Sarah complacently; "when I realized that I was left behind, I saw that the only thing to be done was to make some one give me a lift home; they did not much like it at first, but they were very glad afterward, when they found that they had 'entertained an angel unawares!'"

"And how did they find out that they had?" asks Belinda dryly.

"They were delighted with my conversation," rejoins the other importantly; "I could not have done it if you had been by," breaking into a laugh; "but I talked about the Higher Education of Women!"

Belinda joins in the laugh; nor is there any evidence of her mirth being less spontaneous and bubbling than her sister's. Ahead of them the little dogs are frisking. At least, to speak more correctly, Punch is. What little frisk time and fat have left to Pug has been stamped out of her by mortification at Punch's reappearance on the scene. When you are no longer in your first youth, there is really not much amusement in having one of your hind-legs continually pulled, mouthed, and facetiously worried from behind.

"And you," says Sarah, standing on tip-toe to reach a lilac bough, and rub her face luxuriously against it; "how did you get home?"

A red sunshade always diffuses a glow over the face beneath it.

"Oh, I walked," with an assumption of inattention.

"Alone?"

There is a second's hesitation before the answer comes. Belinda is naturally veracious; but after all, there is nothing incompatible with literal veracity in answering:

"Yes, alone."

"Were you not frightened?" asks Sarah.

Her tone is careless; but she has loosed the lilac bough, and her shrewd eyes are—perhaps accidentally—bent upon her sister's.

"Frightened!" repeats Belinda, with an impatience that seems out of proportion to the occasion, eagerly following her junior's example, and thrusting her hot cheeks among the cool and sugared lilac-clusters; "what a silly question! why should I be frightened? what was there to be frightened at?"

But to this heated inquiry Sarah makes no answer; a reticence which causes a feverish misgiving to dart across Belinda's mind. But no! her sister's room looks toward the back. Sarah has an eye like a greyhound, an ear like a stag, and a nose like a truffle dog, but even she cannot see and hear through deal boards.

"I must leave you to your own devices this morning," she says, changing the subject with some precipitation; "you must amuse yourself as well as you can till luncheon-time."

Sarah lifts her eyebrows. "Do you mean to say that you intend to take three hours in ordering dinner?"

"Ordering dinner!" echoes the other ironically; "ordering dinner indeed! did you ever happen to hear of Menander?"

"Never."

"Nor of his Fragments?"

"Never."

"Nor of his notes, Philological, Critical, and Archæological?"

"Never."

"Happy you!" says Belinda dryly, beginning to walk toward the house.

"If I were you," cries Sarah irreverently, calling after her, "he should be in still smaller 'fragments' before I had done with him."

Belinda laughs.

"Bah!" she says; "it is all in the day's work; perhaps it is better to have too much to do, like me, than too little, like you."

There is such a strong tincture of cheerfulness in the tone with which she speaks, it differs so widely from the dogged submission of yesterday, that Sarah eyes her suspiciously.

"You take a rosy view of life this morning," she says, with a streak of sarcasm.

Belinda changes color.

"It is a matter of weather," she says quickly. "I am very much influenced by weather; you know that you always used to say that I was a Weatherglass!"

But is it a matter of weather? Is it the weather that sends her humming with irresistible gayety to her desk and Menander? Spring-time, it is true, is exhilarating; morning is exhilarating; life's morning is exhilarating; why, then, should she not be exhilarated? But is it of these three innocent stimulants only that she is drinking? There must be something different from her wont in the very quality of her step as she enters her husband's study, for he looks up.

"You are late," he says briefly.

"Only three minutes," she answers pleasantly; "and I will make it up at the other end."

She seats herself at her escritoire, forcibly and with difficulty swallowing down the end of the tune that she has been singing to herself, under her breath, all the way up stairs. Even the very room—the hated task-work room—looks different from what it ordinarily does. Usually it is quite sunless; but this morning a long, slant dart of gold has squeezed itself in, taking no denial, and on it how the dust-motes are dancing! Must everything dance to-day?

The Professor, at least, is an exception to the general rule. He shows no signs of any wish to dance. While dictating, he is in the habit of walking up and down. She knows the exact square in the carpet from which he will start, and that at which he will pause and turn. He has begun his diurnal course; but there is a moment's interval before the first words of the first sentence leave his lips.

She pauses, pen in hand, awaiting them; and as she pauses, following him with her eyes, a feeling of genuine and potent compassion passes through her heart and brain.

"How dreadful to be old! How hideous to be ugly, cantankerous, unloved!"

"I think," she says, under this impulse, speaking in a gentle, hesitating voice, "that I owe you an apology for my rude speech about you to Sarah, after dinner yesterday. I dare say," laughing nervously, "that you have forgotten it. I am sure it was not worth remembering; but, at all events, it makes me easier in my mind to tell you that I regret it."

The intention of this speech is excellent; as a mere question of judgment and tact, it is doubtful whether it had not been wiser to have let her stinging jest lie, without resuscitating it even to repent of it.

The expression of his face shows whether or no he has forgotten it.

"I think," he says aridly, "that since we are already late, we had better keep to the subject in hand."

For a moment or two she bows her crimsoned face and bitten lips over her desk, in furious annoyance at having laid herself open to this self-inflicted humiliation. But, ere long, her serenity returns. It is only wounds inflicted by those we love whose sting lasts.

After all, she has done her part—she has made the amende. Of what least consequence is it how he has taken it? But her compassion is dead. He may look as old, as pinched, as bloodless as he chooses. No smallest throb of pity stirs her heart again; nor does any other word, unrelating to the subject of her labor, cross her lips.

Through all the fresh bright morning hours he travels from his one carpet-square to his other carpet-square, elaborating careful, classic phrases as he goes; and she, in docile silence, follows him with her pen.

The sun soars high; the drowsy flies inside the shut window make their futile journeys up and down the pane. The swallows sweep across outside, bells ring, butchers and bakers drive up and drive away; but not one of these distracting objects does she allow to beguile her for one instant of her toil. She will do her task-work conscientiously, thoroughly, wholly, so that hereafter neither he nor she herself may have anything to reproach her with; and then, when it is ended—she allows herself one long breath of prospective enjoyment—why then the sun will still be high; the swallows will still be darting; the lengthy May afternoon, with probabilities too bright to be faced in its green lap, will still be hers.

And, meanwhile, how well the pens write! how clear her own apprehension seems! She has even suggested a verbal emendation or two, which his nice ear has accepted. How quickly the morning is passing! Can it indeed be a quarter to one that the college clocks are striking? After all, there is no great hardship in being amanuensis to a savant afflicted with weak eyes; it is a great matter to be able to be of use to some one!

She looks up, smiling rosilily; if not forgetful, forgiving, of her former snub.

"We have done a good day's work!" she says congratulatingly. "You have been in vein this morning."

"It is fortunate if it is so," replies he grudgingly, "for we have large arrears of work to make up."

"Have we?" she says, a little blankly, rubbing her cramped right finger and thumb; "but—but not to-day?"

"And why not to-day?" rejoins he firmly. "I have promised that my 'Essay upon the Law of Entail among the Athenians' shall be in the printers' hands by to-morrow, and it is therefore necessary that the proofs should be corrected before post-time to-day."

"Not to-day!" cries she feverishly; "not to-day!"

The smile and the short-lived roses have together left her face. She looks fagged and harried, but obstinate.

"And why not to-day?" repeats he, regarding her with slow displeasure.

"You forget," she says,—"you seem to forget that we have a guest."

"She will, no doubt, provide herself with amusement," replies he disagreeably; "she will, no doubt, amuse herself perfectly without your aid."

"And I?" she says in a low voice, turning very white, and looking at him with concentrated dislike (is it possible that she could ever have pitied him?) "how am I to amuse myself? does it never occur to you that I, too, may wish to be amused?"

"I put no impediment in your way," he answers frostily; "you are at liberty—with the exception of the hours during which I am compelled to claim your services—to choose your own pursuits, your own associates."

"Am I?" she says, hastily catching him up, while the dismissed carnation color pours in flood back into her cheeks again. "You give me leave?"

He looks at her with such unfeigned and unadmiring astonishment in his cold eyes, that she turns away in confusion.

"How long will you want me for?" she asks faltering; "how many hours will the correcting of these proofs take?"

"It is impossible to say, exactly," replies he, tranquilly leaving the room; satisfied with her acquiescence, and indifferent as to the spirit in which that acquiescence has been given.

The afternoon is three hours old, and Belinda still sits at her desk. The dew is dried, the long sunbeam has stolen away, but though it does not cheer her by its visible presence, she is aware, by the augmented heat of the close room, that the sun is beating hard and hotly on roof and wall. And on these thinly-built houses it does beat very hotly. At her side lies a heap of corrected slips, but before her is piled another, scarcely less bulky. She has been at work upon them for an hour and a half, and still she sees no end to her toil. Her head aches with long stooping; she has inked her tired fingers, and her eyes are dull and dogged. Now and again the door-bell ringing makes her give a nervous start. Is it come again—that time of strained continuous listening? those twenty-one months, during which all her life-power seemed to have passed into her ears?

It is the hour when visitors may be with the most probability expected. But is there not also a probability that they may be sent away again? Sometimes, when harder worked or gloomier spirited than usual, she has bidden her servant deny her. Is it not but too possible that, seeing her close slavery to-day, that servant may take upon herself to conclude that such is her mistress's wish now also?

The idea throws her into a fever. She does not listen. She makes an unaccountable mistake. Again the bell rings. Is it her fancy, or has this ring a different sound from the former ones? Is there in it a mixture of violence and timidity, as of a person who had had to screw up his courage to ring at all in the first instance, and had then overdone it?

She writes on mechanically, dully aware that her husband is rebuking her for the illegibility of her last words. Even if the moral blows he is giving her were physical ones, she would feel them none the more.

The door opens, and the servant enters, with a man's card upon a salver. She scarcely needs to glance at it to tell that it is his; but for a moment her pale lips cannot frame the question that has sprung to them: "Has he been sent away?"

"Is he gone?" she asks, stammering, taking the card, and, with a senseless, involuntary movement, hiding it in her hand.

"I told him that you were engaged, ma'am," replies the maid apologetically; "but he asked me to bring you this card. Shall I say that you are engaged, ma'am?"

The Professor looks up, cross at the interruption, to give a brief "Yes;" but his wife strikes athwart him.

"Show him in," she says, with precipitate decision. "Say that I will be down directly; tell Miss Churchill."

She takes up her quill again, as the servant leaves the room, but apparently her hand shakes to a degree that is beyond her control; for in a moment a great blot has defaced the printed page.

"Pray be careful!" cries her husband fretfully. "You have a hair in your pen."

"She throws it down, and takes another. The room in which they are sitting is over the drawing-room. Evidently he has been ushered in, and Sarah has joined him; for there is a murmur of voices. What are they saying? What are they likely to be saying?"

"You have spelt allegorical with one l!" says the Professor, in a voice of resentful wonder.

"Have I?" she answers, bewildered and inattentive.

"And how many ought it to have?"

The voices have grown more distinctly audible. They have left the drawing-room; it is obvious that Sarah is taking him out into the garden—the pleasant, little, cool garden, with its blackbird and its broom-bush, and its bees. She draws a hot, long, envious breath at the thought.

"A child of five years old would have been ashamed to perpetrate so gross a blunder!" resumes he, taking the sheet from before her, and indignantly holding it up for reprobation.

She heaves a heavy, furious sigh, and a sombre light comes into her great, gloomy eyes. From the garden is heard a peal of laughter. Sarah is always laughing. It is well to be merry sometimes, but Sarah is too much of a buffoon.

"In errors so palpable, it is difficult not to see intention," continues he, exasperated by a silence that is so plainly not repentance—a silence which she still observes.

Another burst of laughter from the garden—not Sarah's this time; a man's wholesome, unfeigned mirth. He, too, can laugh, can he?

"I should really be disposed to recommend a return to the writing-master," says Mr. Forth, still ironically, regarding the blurred page.

For all answer, she rises to her feet, and throws her pen with violence down upon the floor.

"Your machine has broken down for to-day," she says, with a pale, rebellious smile. "Legible or illegible, writing-master or no writing-master, I will write not one word more to-day!"

BENEATH THE WILLOWS.

I

BENEATH the willows stood my love,
And it was June;
And white beneath, and green above,
The little merry leaves did move
In rustling tune.

How fair she seemed, the while she dreamed,
And did not stir!
Around us hummed the drowsy bees;
Above us waved the willow trees;
Oh, blest we were!

"The willow trees are happy trees,"
My loved one said.
"And we will plant them round our home,"
I asked, "when the glad days are come?"
She bowed her head.

II

Again beneath the willows stood
My love and I;
And cold November swept the wood,
And shadowed with a dreamy mood
Were earth and sky.

A tiny grave lay at our feet—
Alas, how small!
And on its frozen bosom beat
The drifting willow leaves and sleet—
So sad a pall!

"Oh, mournful trees are willow trees!"
My loved one said.
And lower o'er the little grave
The drooping branches seemed to wave,
And shroud the dead.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE EFFECT OF A SIDE LIGHT.

Hilda rode out of the station unconscious of the direction she was taking—not knowing nor caring whither she went. She was going away hardly expecting ever to return. The cloud above her seemed impenetrable. She could not keep the touch of her old life. She must bury herself. This was her only refuge, not so much from the danger of enslavement as from the scath of scorn and debasement. She did not know where or how it could be done. She only knew that she must flee away from present peril. She must have opportunity to transform herself—to bury her identity—to begin a new existence.

It was a foolish notion, but Hilda did not know the world. She only knew what she wished to do, and like the father of whose name they sought to rob her, she counted not the obstacles. She looked out of the car window, saw the fields and woods fly past, in the weird winter moonlight. Surely she was safe. The desert of life would hide her. She did not hear the conductor when he came through the train, and, spying a new face, stopped at her seat and said:

"Ticket!"

She only saw the white, ghostly world without, flying by and standing sentinel between her and a dreaded fate.

"Ticket!" touching her shoulder lightly.

She started, turned and glanced up at him quickly, as if she thought he suspected her. She wondered if they could telegraph ahead and have her detained at the next station. She had heard of such things being done in case of criminals. She wondered if she would be considered a criminal because she was fleeing from the law.

"Ticket!" repeated the conductor, extending his hand.

"I—I forgot to get one," she said faintly. Then she caught nervously at her pocket-book and handed him a bill.

"Where to?" inquired the official, bending down an ear.

Where, indeed? She had no idea where she was going or which way the train was moving. She stammered, flushed, and was sure she was betraying herself.

"Straight through?"

She bowed her head. He had a roll of bills between every two fingers of his left hand for convenience in making change—ones, twos and fives, all separate. He thrust the ten-dollar bill she had given him into his vest-pocket, gave her a two, a one, and some change, handed her a check for Boston, and went on. She was rather pleased with her destination. By-and-by the horror began to wear away. The danger from which she fled was momentarily receding. She began to feel more comfortable—almost bold. After a time she slept, but uneasily, and with frightful dreams. As the sun rose they came into Boston. The city was still asleep. The hoar frost was thick upon roof and spire, and the sunshine gilded every pinnacle. She took a carriage to the Revere. How bright and clean the crooked, rough-paved streets seemed to her. This was Boston—the seat of culture and the cradle of liberty. What a mockery it seemed to her. The blue smoke rose sharp and clear against the sky from thousands of happy homes, but she was a fugitive. Against a cloud to the northeastward she dimly saw the top of a gray column once. She guessed that it was the monument on Bunker Hill, and there flashed through her mind all that it commemorated. The city was very proud of that gray granite shaft. The commonwealth boasted itself the possessor of the blood-stained soil on which it stood. The nation pointed to it as a memento of the struggle that gave it birth. The world accounted it a pillar of liberty—the memorial shaft of a new civilization. Yet under its shadow she was a fugitive, fleeing from bondage and degradation.

"Revere House, ma'am!"

The driver opened the door, and stood waiting for his fee. A servant came and took her modest bag. She was ushered into the reception-room—narrow, stuffy, with furniture that seemed as if once it had been new. The servant placed her bag on the table, and asked if she would have a room. She turned to look out of the window upon the funny triangle that is called a square in Boston. The clerk came and inquired her name. She started, flushed and paled. Her name? What was it? What should she say?

The clerk waited. He thought he had startled her by his abruptness.

"I beg pardon, ma'am—what did you say was the name?"

"Oh, yes; my name, of course." She smiled, opened her portemonnaie, and seemed to be seeking for a card.

"Well, never mind. Louise Amis, Springfield."

"Miss?"

"Of course," with a smile.

"A-m-y?"

"No—A-m-i-s."

"Oh, yes—Amis. Any baggage?"

"Not now. I shall be here only a short time. Will you let me know the precise address of Miss Fanny Goodwin? It is somewhere on Rutland Square, but I have forgotten the number."

but another. She laid down upon the bed to think. She did not know that she was at all fatigued but hardly had her head touched the pillow when she fell asleep wondering even in her dreams how she could be an outcast in a city founded as a refuge and consecrated to liberty and equality.

PARTNERS.

"I'll do it, Captain!" said Kortright, sitting up and reaching out his hand.

[THE CONTINENT, Vol. II, No. 31, page 311.]

"An acquaintance?" asked the clerk carelessly.

"A school friend."

"Indeed!"

He started off. Just as he reached the door she called him back.

"How very stupid of me!" she said, "I suppose you want pay for your room in advance?"

"That is our rule where guests have no baggage," politely.

"I ought to have known; but I never traveled so far alone before," she said innocently and truthfully.

She took out her portemonnaie, carelessly showing it to be well lined with bills—thanks to Miss Hunniwell's foresight. She gave him twice as large as he asked. He went away, and the servant came and showed her to a room. Her first lesson in dissimulation was over. She was safe, and had time to breathe before taking another step. She read the morning paper. There was a brief notice of some excitement in Blankshire by reason of an alleged attempt at kidnapping. There were not more than ten lines, and only a vague allusion to herself. It seemed strange that what was of such importance to her should be of so little moment to the world. She ate her breakfast, went out and wandered about the narrow streets, bright and quiet, with the Sabbath hush upon them. She saw Faneuil Hall, the Common, the quaint old graveyard full of headstones whose names are an epitome of history. She wandered into a church. The notes of the organ soothed her. The accents of a grand old hymn whose echoes seemed burdened with greetings of good cheer from the brave hearts of the past strengthened and consoled her spirit. Then she returned to her room in the hotel with a dazed, unreal feeling, as if she were not herself

When she awoke the day was already declining. A boy was calling an "Extra." She looked out and saw the crowd buying with avidity. She opened the window and listened. "All about the kidnapping!" she heard him cry. She called a servant and procured a copy—a small, square sheet printed on one side only. Could it be that her flight was sufficient to stir the drowsy Sabbath quiet of the city? Had fate pursued her so quickly? Would not the world give her sanctuary in its great throbbing heart? Must she indeed flee into the wilderness? Sure enough, it was all there. The world had waked to the terror that haunted her life. She read it all—a whole column by telegraph, with staring head-lines, and another of editorial remarks. She read all about herself—some of it truth and some of it queer conjecture. Her father's life and death were commented on. Her position, supposed wealth, accomplishments and beauty were all stated. The description given was very accurate. She almost feared she might be recognized. Then she read—what was this? Amy, Mr. Amory, Martin! Wounds! Bloodshed! Great excitement! Talk of lynching! Jared Clarkson to arrive to-morrow!

Her head swam as she read, but she still read on to the end. Then she bathed her hot face, combed her hair, putting up the curls she had been accustomed to wear, and throwing it out upon each side by the use of puff-combs which she had never used before. She was Merwyn Hargrove's daughter still, she said to herself, and she would not flinch from anything that might impend. She surveyed herself in the glass, and smiled at her own apprehension as she read over again the concluding statement in regard to the events described: "It is believed that Miss Hargrove has fled to Canada" or is still hidden in the vicinity. Her complete disappearance is certainly a mystery."

When she went down to dinner her flushed cheeks and bright eyes enhanced her usual charms. More than one glance of admiration followed her as she was shown to a seat. The tables were full. Two gentlemen and a lady sat at the one with her. The gentlemen were reading the little "Extra" and discussing the news from Blankshire. A great many in the room seemed to be engaged in like manner. She heard some at a table back of her talking upon the same subject. At first she was frightened. Then she saw that every one was too absorbed in the event to suspect her of being one of the actors in it.

"This is horrible!" said the young man who sat opposite.

"It is a very aggravated case, as far as concerns the rank and station of the intended victim. Otherwise it is no worse than a hundred cases that have occurred under this infamous law." The speaker was a gray-bearded, grave-faced man who sat at the end of the table.

"Well, I am glad the girl got away, anyhow," said the young man.

"So am I," said the lady heartily.

Hilda felt her cheeks burn and tears come into her eyes. She wished they knew how grateful the fugitive was for their sympathy.

"And I am very sorry," said the grave elderly man in a soft, earnest tone.

Hilda started and turned a pale, frightened face toward him.

"I beg your pardon, young lady, I am not so cruel as you think me."

The color came back to her face, and she bent her head over her plate to hide her confusion.

"Yet I cannot but regret," he continued, "the escape of the kidnappers' intended prey. I know enslavement would have been unutterably sad to her, but it is only by such shining examples that the nation can be awakened to the enormity of slavery. What I say seems heartless, no doubt, but I verily believe that the application of this infamous law to just such a case as this would do more to arouse the land, to awaken conscience, to weaken slavery and promote the cause of liberty, than the return to bondage of a thousand men and women who have fled from oppression, and are at the best only toilers who have rebelled against an untoward fate. In this case it is different. We see one snatched from a home of luxury, from the most polished society, from friends and love, and sought to be thrust into nothingness. I admit that it would be terrible to her—death itself would be preferable—but I certainly believe that her sufferings would be worth ten thousand lives in the beneficent results that would flow therefrom. We mourn the virgin martyrs of the arena and the catacombs, but none the less we know that their blood was in truth the seed of the church, and thank God that it was shed. I meant the young lady no harm, but I wish the slave release from bondage. The loss of one life is as nothing to the evil that keeps a race in degradation."

Hilda gazed into the soft gray eyes, and seemed to feel a new light in her soul. As she listened to his words she forgot all feeling of apprehension for herself. She gazed at him in a fixed, absorbed manner, which he mistook for inquiry, and resumed, addressing himself unconsciously to her, while the others listened with respectful attention.

"You see," he said thoughtfully, "the world is ruled by great examples. Influence is only the power of example; but if the example be petty the influence will be weak. Religion itself is but the force of the highest example. The power that thrills the life of eighteen centuries is not the word of God. The Logos of the Apostle was weak and vain until it was framed in the life of Jesus Christ. The cross and the crown of thorns gave vitality to Christian truth. Without the MAN Christ Jesus the written word would have been naught to us. The sacrifice of Virginia overthrew the tyrant. Jeanne d'Arc led and triumphed through the unfearing intensity of her devotion. Always it has been an example that has moved the world forward and overthrown evil. By-and-by slavery will demand a sacrifice—so notable, so cruel and so needless—that the whole land will be smitten with horror, and the institution will disappear in the blaze of public wrath. It is not abstract truth that moves men's hearts, but always the concrete. This young woman's father might have been a shining example, and his death would have done a vast injury to slavery, but no one seemed to understand just the cause of it. While he seems to have been bitterly opposed to slavery he was yet animated by a feeling of angry defiance, rather than of sacrificial offering up of himself for the good of another."

"I think he was animated by a sense of duty and of honor," said Hilda quietly.

"There can be no doubt of that," rejoined the stranger, in the same persuasive tones, and with the same clear light in his great gray eyes; "but a sense of duty may impel to acts which, although meritorious, are yet not impressive. I may eat my dinner from a sense of duty, but others will wait for an appetite before they follow my example. Honor, too, is apt to be tainted with selfishness, and it is only the example of self-sacrifice that lives and moves the world to noble deeds. This man—what was his name?"

"Hargrove," said Hilda absently.

"Yes, Hargrove, Merwyn Hargrove—I remember seeing him once a few years ago—was of the type that heroes are made of, but he was too self-bounded, too oblivious of the world outside of the tasks he seems to have set himself to accomplish, to make a good martyr. He perhaps released more slaves than any man living, and actually sacrificed more money to do it than any Northern philanthropist has ever thought of doing. He did his work thoroughly, too. He took the slaves to Hayti and purchased for them there a tract of land of which each had his due share in fee. He freed them, and provided for their safety and support. At the same time, he did this, not because of his love for the slave, nor even because of his hatred for slavery—though that was no doubt intense—but for some reason noble and chivalric enough perhaps, but applicable only to himself. He was a hero, but not a martyr."

"A hero but not a martyr," murmured Hilda. "You may be right."

"The distinction is a fair one," continued the stranger. "Moreover, the martyr will yet appear. The encroachments of slavery are daily coming home to our northern life. The blood that furnished martyrs under Bloody Mary runs in our veins, and the day is not far distant when the Martyr will appear. He will testify of the truth in such a way that all men will believe."

"I think I know the man," she said absently.

The stranger gazed at her a moment in silence, and then remarked slowly and solemnly:

"I also have seen one whom I have sometimes thought might bear testimony of the truth for us all. Whether one shall suffice, or shall only be a forerunner of many whose blood must purge away our sin, God knoweth."

"Why do you say our sin?" asked the younger man.

"Because," replied the other, "it is ours. We make a grave mistake when we seek to cast the blame of slavery on the South. A cancer does not belong to the limb on which it appears, but to the whole body that suffers from the poison that it generates. We of the North are even more responsible for the evils of slavery than they of the South, because we perceive and admit them and they do not."

"But do they believe it right?"

"Unquestionably. They not only believe it right, but they believe it to be the only way in which the two races can co-exist upon this continent."

"But why should they attempt to get hold of this young lady in this manner? Her friends would no doubt have raised more money than she is worth as a slave."

"You forget that Hargrove was a very wealthy man.

rather glad to be recognized. Her fear seemed so petty and foolish. She blushed as she tried to fancy what her father would have thought of her cowardly flight. But he should have no more cause to blush for her. She felt the blood of the Hargroves coursing through her veins, and she would show the world that she was her father's daughter and worthy of his name, as he had said in his will. When the meal was over, she went to her room to think of the future in the new light the hour had cast upon it.

CHAPTER XLIII.

THAT NOTHING BE LOST.

SOME of the events that occurred in and about Bloomingdale during the week that followed the attempted abduction are worthy of record, though they may not seem directly to concern the chief characters of our story.

THE VINDICATION OF THE LAW.

"I will die," he said, in answer to the master's look of triumph, "but I will not be a slave."

[THE CONTINENT, Vol. II, No. 40, page 299.]

This is probably an attempt to induce her to release all claim on his estate."

"Indeed!" said the young man in surprise.

"I merely judge that from the fact you have mentioned; but if she is Hargrove's daughter, they have made a mistake."

"You knew him?"

"No, but I have heard Jared Clarkson speak of him more than once. He came of fighting stock, and if she has his blood they may have caught a tartar."

"I hope the Lord they have!" said the young man fervently.

"So do I," said the lady earnestly. "They might have waited till she was out of mourning for her father, anyhow."

This feminine view of the situation provoked a burst of laughter, in which Hilda could not help joining despite the sad thought it evoked.

Then the conversation drifted off into other channels. Hilda finished her meal without feeling any fear of detection. Indeed, she thought she would have felt Beechwood Seminary was in a tumult after the enactment of a double tragedy at its very doors. The crimson drops along the hall and down the steps were cleansed without delay from the polished ash, but in a hundred tender hearts they were ineffaceably fixed. Not a slippered foot crossed where this line of horror had been without a thrill of fear. The broken ladder, the battle-ground beneath the window, the blood-stains in the steep wood-road, the recollection of the companion who had been ravished from their midst, just missing a bloody death; the mystery surrounding the fate of that other schoolmate, who had vanished out of their life and left no trace—these were too fertile themes for girlish imagining to permit the routine of task and recitation to go on from day to day with any profit. Indeed, the principal was soon convinced that it would be at the risk of very serious peril to the health of her pupils should they remain during the balance of the term. The nervous strain to which they had been exposed began almost immediately to show itself on some of the more susceptible of them. The conscientious teacher did not hesitate an instant when the health of her pupils was set over against her own advantage. Within a week the shivering brood were scattered to their homes, and the tragedy of Beechwood was rehearsed over and over again at a hundred distant firesides by pale-faced narrators, who shuddered as they boastfully declared, "I was there, you know." There were none left at the seminary save a few scholars whose homes were most remote, two or three teachers, the slowly-recuperating invalid and his dusky nurse. For the first time in a quarter of a century the routine of Beechwood was broken up. In the midst of term-time its halls were silent. The vacation antedated the Christmas holidays that year by almost a month. To each of her patrons Miss Hunniwell forwarded a brief statement of the causes which led to this decision on her part, discounting the term-bills which she sent out in accordance with the abbreviation of the school-year resulting therefrom. In a vain attempt to hold what it deemed its own, Slavery had thrust its ghastliest shadow into a hundred households. Every family altar seemed violated by the invasion of Beechwood. The sanctuary of the vestal virgins had been invaded. The treasury wherein a hundred families had placed their most priceless jewels had been broken, and one had been reft thence by force. Many a mother shuddered as she pressed her loved one to her bosom, and thought that she might have been the victim. Many a father's look grew stern as he considered the danger his child had shared, and uttered to himself again the question which the prophet of the prairie had propounded to his countrymen, "All free or all slave?" Many a brother's heart was consecrated by the blood of one innocent beautiful victim to do knightly service against the monster that lived on human lives.

Upon the second day after the abduction Jared Clarkson arrived in the little village. The excitement, which was already intense, was greatly heightened by his presence. He seemed worn, depressed, disheartened. To the swarm of friends and co-workers in the cause of liberty, who crowded around him and hailed his coming with delight, his language and manner were most unsatisfactory. He had come solely upon private business, he said. Instead of gladly lending his presence and eloquence to give éclat to a demonstration intended to improve the occasion and deepen the anti-slavery sentiments of the community, he pleaded fatigue, headache and important and burdensome engagements. He finally compromised with the committee by agreeing to attend the meeting if not asked to speak. To this they readily assented—a compromise made only to be broken. The result was a speech so full of sorrow and despair that they who heard it wondered if they really were listening to that ever-jubilant prophet of victory whose optimism nothing had been able to daunt until that hour. They knew not that Jared Clarkson spoke with a burden of sorrow he had never known before—a burden to which he dared not refer lest some unguarded expression might enhance the woe of an innocent victim. He knew full well the curse that rested over the fugitive girl. To him all classes and conditions of men were alike. To him the Gospel message had come with the force and vitality it bore in that earlier time, when, in one day, it melted the chains of five thousand bondsmen of a noble Roman. Race or color were no disabling conditions of his favor. He knew that there were some like him—but, oh, so few! He well knew that if the One Divine should come to earth clad in the livery of a dusky skin, while there were thousands, aye, millions, who would give Him charity—the dole of condescending pity—there were almost none who would or could make Him welcome in home and heart. He knew—none better than he—how the brand of color made its possessor an outcast in the land of his birth. He knew how it barred the way to rank and station and opportunity—how it paralyzed the hand of friendship and blighted the heart of love. He knew, too,—oh, the bitterness of that knowledge!—how his heart burned as it throbbed against the papers in his pocket—for he dared not part with them lest another should learn the fearful truth. He knew that, somewhere in the dark, cold night, somewhere in the cheerless, crowded, crushing world, Hilda, the child of luxury and love; Hilda, petted and beautiful and bright; Hilda, the daughter of the dead friend, who had trusted him with the cursed secret of her birth, in order that he might shield her from sorrow and harm; Hilda, his ward in Heaven's Chancery, was fleeing none knew whither or to what—refuge or death! No wonder that his voice faltered. Of all the slaves the earth had known there was but one that lived in his memory in that hour—the one for whose safety he was surety to a dead friend. No wonder his brain throbbed with agony! No wonder his heart was bursting with despair! The woe he was charged to mitigate it was beyond human power to assuage. Already it had borne fruit in the heart of its victim. The leper had fled into the wilderness, crying back with the agony of blighted hope and shattered love, "Unclean! Unclean!" Is it any wonder that he forgot slavery in pity for the one slave whose life was in his hands? The prophet of denunciation forgot to curse, and uttered only a wail of hopeless woe. The public were disappointed. His friends were disgusted. They had come for blood, and received instead only an oblation of tears!

Martin Kortright was disappointed also. He had waited, chafing like a caged hyena for two days, because a telegram from his father bade him wait until Jared Clarkson came. Already he had lost a day in the search to which his life must be given. He felt strong and confident. There were two things he would do. He would first disprove the lie. His Hilda—his love, his lily—he had no fear of stain upon her birth. He would trace her lineage. He would prove her purity. And, when that was done—ah! then he would find her, would give the record into her hand, and offer up his life for a kiss—a smile—aye, for the bare knowledge that she was no longer to be an outcast among men. He was not cast down. He did not hope—he was confident—he was sure. His only sorrow was that he did not know where Hilda was, so that he might assuage her grief. He was only anxious to begin his labors, that he might by a day, by an hour, hasten his triumph and shorten her woe. To him came Jared Clarkson at length, with his look of despair and the confirmation of the tale of horror. But love did not falter.

"It cannot be," said Martin. "There is some mistake. I shall unravel it."

Then he gave the lie to all his vows, and started off to seek, not the truth he boasted that he would discover, but the love he longed to comfort. He laughed at her behest that he should wait until she came. He would defy her will—so bold is love! He would overturn the world, he said—so strong is love! He would find her wheresoever she might hide—so sure is love! He would rest from his search only when he might fall into the grave—so true is fond young love!

Martin's incredulity as to Clarkson's conclusion was based first upon an invincible determination not to believe, and second upon the testimony of Jason whose story he had heard. To him he referred this trustee of a woeful secret, and sped away exultantly to Sturmhold to make such preparation as was needful for the search he had already begun—for mail and telegraph had already conveyed his messages of inquiry to every conceivable place where the fugitive could have sought shelter. Jared Clarkson heard the story and hoped. He visited the seminary and talked with Miss Hunniwell. He believed in woman's intuition, and her buoyant faith strengthened the hope he sought to cherish. He even tried to forget the damning testimony already in his possession. He was a man of business habits, however; prudent, sagacious, painstaking, though overcredulous when once he had accepted any hypothesis. He cross-examined Jason carefully:

"You remember when Hilda was born?"

"Perfectly, sah."

"It was in the West Indies?"

"At Kingston, sah."

"Do you know the name of the house at which they were stopping?"

"It was a private house, sah; a minister's. I stayed on the sloop, but went up to the house to see if anything was wanted nigh about every day."

"Did you see the child christened?"

"That I did, an' one of the man's daughters where they lived was its god-mammy, too. She did look powerful nice, all in white, with the little baby in her arms."

"Was the child healthy?"

"Powerful puny, sah; an' Miss Retta were poorly, too. Atter it war a few months old we took 'em both aboard the sloop, an' tried cruisin' roun' for a spell, but they couldn't stan' it nohow—not even to go roun' the island, you know. So we put back, an' Marse Merwyn an' me come to the States for a while to look after some of that pesky Mallerbank business, that hain't never been nothin' but trouble an' trouble, an' no good comin' out on 't. When we went back Miss Retta warn't no better, an' the doctors an' all hands persuaded her to leave the baby with Miss Rickson—that was the name of the family, sah—while she come back with Marse Merwyn."

"The child remained with Miss Rickson how long?"

"Wal, it must have been nigh onto two years—p'raps more. She hadn't been back so very long when Miss Retta died."

"Were you with Captain Hargrove when he brought his daughter away from Kingston?"

"He didn't bring her!"

"Who did?"

"Miss Rickson were on her way to England, you know, wid her folks, an' she brung de little lady on to New York. Leastways dat 's what I heard."

"You did not see Miss Rickson when she brought the child on, then?"

"No, sah. The Captain went down a few days afore. I stayed at Sturmhold 'kase he was just packing off all de ole servants dat he 'd done set free an' settlin' ob 'em in de West, an' hirin' new ones. Dat was de time he brung Miss Lida back wid him."

"Who had the care of the child after it was brought to Sturmhold?"

"Wal, pretty much everybody. Bein' the only one she ruled the whole house; but, of course, Miss Lida was the nurse."

"Was she as fond of the child then as afterward?"

"Law, yes, sah; an' that jealous of Miss Retta she 'd stan' an' glare at her while she was pettin' that chile like she war ready to eat her up."

"When did you first hear Alida claim that Hilda was her child?"

"Wal, it must have been a year or two atter Miss Retta died."

"What did you say to her then?"

"Told her I 'd slap her mouf ef I ever heard her talking such a thing again—ef she did set up for a white woman."

"What did she say in reply?"

"Oh, nothin' at all. She 's jes' a pore, no-'count, silly creetur', anyhow. Marse Merwyn was powerful put out that I 'd threatened to slap her mouf, an' told me I warn't never to pay no 'tention to anything she said."

"She had a child about Hilda's age, did she not?"

"There was some few months difference atwixt 'em. I don't mind which was the oldest now."

"Did Alida's child resemble Hilda?"

"Well, it did have dark eyes an' hair, but not such eyes and hair as our Hilda—not by any manner of means."

"Now, Jason, tell us honest, what became of Alida's daughter?"

"Lida's gal! Lida's gal!" exclaimed Jason, springing from his chair. "I hain't got no right to tell you anything 'bout her, Marse Clarkson. I knows yer don't mean no harm, but I promised Marse Merwyn I wouldn't never mention the lightest word 'bout that gal 'cept I had his written orders ter do so, or Miss Hilda axed me wid her own sweet mouf atter he war dead. An' I can't break no promise ter Marse Merwyn, nohow."

"Well," said Clarkson, "I have here his written appeal to you to enlighten me upon this point." He drew forth Hargrove's letter and read the passage referring to Jason.

"Dat ain't givin' me no leave," said Jason, skeptically.

"It says I can tell, but don't once say I shall tell."

"Jason," said Clarkson solemnly, "Captain Hargrove left a parcel with me which he said would inform me of the identity of the daughter of George and Alida Eighmie."

"Then you don't need to ax Jason," said the man shrewdly.

"The information is not direct, but yet it is entirely conclusive to my mind. The package contained only the bills for Hilda's tuition here at Beechwood."

"That 's queer!" said Jason, with a puzzled look.

"In other words, your old master says to me this paper will tell you who is Alida's child, and hands me one of Miss Hunniwell's bills for Hilda's board and tuition. What do you say to that?"

"Wal, Marse Clarkson, 'tain't my place to say nothin' 'bout it, 'cept I has Marse Merwyn's orders, an' I ain't a-goin' to, nuther; but ef I should say anything," he added slyly, "I 'd say that 'cordin' ter my notion, there 'd been a mistake somewhere or somewhere else."

"And you refuse to tell me what you know?"

"Unless yer has Marse Merwyn's orders."

"Then I must follow the light I have and regard Hilda as the daughter of Alida."

"Pears like yer all mighty anxious to make a nigger outen the pore gal," said the old servant sullenly. "But Jason 's had his orders, an' he ain't a-goin' ter break 'em fer no man's foolishness, dat he ain't."

This conversation had the effect to confirm Clarkson in his previous belief, and to cause the teacher to appeal anew to God for a solution of the mystery.

The wound which Amy Hargrove had received proved to be less serious than at first supposed. The shot had glanced around, instead of passing through a vital part. Upon the second day the doctor was able to announce that the hurt was not a serious one. Eighmie and Marsden were thereupon released on bail, so heavy, however, that they were compelled to remain in the village in order to satisfy the apprehensions of their bondsmen. The injured girl was at first the object of unbounded sympathy; but her conduct was not altogether what those who came to condole with her expected. Some very uncharitably declared that she was rather proud than otherwise of her part in this midnight adventure. She had no word of blame for the men who had been guilty of lawless violence, or of the institution at whose doors all seemed anxious to lay the blame for her suffering.

"It was all a mistake," she said in a quiet, matter-of-course tone. "They are gentlemen and did not intend me any harm. They would have brought me back as soon as they found I was not the slave they were seeking."

Indeed, she seemed to blame only two people for the harm that had befallen her, Hilda and Mr. Amory. Of the former she would say nothing. No expression of sympathy for the unfortunate girl, nor any burst of indignation against her intended captors could elicit a word of regret or disapproval from the quiet figure that occupied the bed in the dimly-lighted guest-chamber of the parsonage. Those who watched her at such times could only note that the little weazened face grew a trifle whiter and harder in its outlines; the narrow brow contracted and the black eyes rolled from side to side under the half-shut lids with suppressed excitement. Of the minister she only said that he no doubt meant well enough, but his interference at that particular time was very unfortunate for her. The message which the doctor brought from Eighmie gave her evident pleasure, and she insisted on being given a pencil and a sheet of paper that she might reply. The doctor protested angrily, but she had her way, and wrote:

"SIR: I am by no means sure that I am not more in fault than you. Of course, you would never have made the attempt but for the information I gave. In doing what I did I had no thought that you would try to obtain possession of the impostor from whose pretensions I had been an especial sufferer by such means. I was angry at the fraud practiced upon me and others, and intended simply to notify you that the girl you sought was still in the house. I am sorry, on many accounts, that I did so, but beg to assure you that I entertain no unkindly feeling toward you because of the result.

"Respectfully, AMY HARGROVE."

The grim old doctor carried the missive to the man to whom it was addressed, after having perused it carefully, who inquired in astonishment:

"Who is this young lady?"

"One of your own sort, I suppose," answered the blunt physician. "She comes from the South, is an heiress, and probably sympathizes with you in your disappointment."

"She is a lady, anyhow," responded Eighmie with severe emphasis; "and anything that I can do to compensate her for the injury I shall cheerfully do."

After the first day Amy was undisturbed by visits of condolence. Miss Hunniwell came once or twice, but she was a poor dissembler, and knew enough of Amy's treachery to her friend to feel a profound disgust for her which if not expressed could hardly be said to be concealed. She was kindly cared for by the minister's household; a few formal inquiries were made each day, but by some means or other the idea had gotten out that if not actually concerned in the plot to abduct Hilda she was by no means averse to its success.

For herself, she asked no questions. If she noted the unfriendly coolness that came to pervade the manner of all who approached her, she made no sign. She obeyed the instructions of the physician to the letter—remained absolutely quiet, avoided all conversation, and before the excitement attending her injury had subsided was pronounced able to be removed to the seminary. Then, for the first time since her injury, she burst into tears, and begged to be allowed to remain for a few days longer. She gave no reason, nor was any asked. Her distress was too apparent not to awaken the sympathy of the good parson and his wife. Their hearts were touched by her grief, and they not only assented to her wish, but sought to make the days of her convalescence as pleasant as they could. As soon as she was able she wrote a letter, to which she began to inquire for an answer almost before it had been mailed.

The people of Bloomingdale and its vicinity felt a certain proprietary interest in the attempted abduction. The town had in no way been celebrated above its neighbors thitherto. Its people had been good and bad, rich and poor, notable and insignificant, in the due proportion of the average New England village. One murder away back in the time of Shay's war had made the whole region where the house had stood more famous than the muster of the rebels. It was only a vulgar murder of the meanest sort, however. There had been a fair average of suicides and accidents, some big fires and a "pretty sizeable" dam-breaking, but nothing to compare with this affair at Beechwood in the elements of a first-class sensation. In less than forty-eight hours after it became known every inhabitant of Bloomingdale felt that it was an honor to dwell in a town that was the scene of such a tragedy. Every man, woman and child had seen all that was visible, heard all that could be found out, guessed until their powers of invention were exhausted, and waited in dignified and expectant silence for what the morrow would bring forth. But the morrow was wretchedly barren. So was the next day and the next, until the people began to murmur. Before the week was ended, public indignation could no longer be restrained. Not only the people but the local press declared that the course which had been pursued by all those who might reasonably be supposed to have any knowledge of the affair had been most extraordinary.

In all that had occurred since the commission of the crime, it was universally declared that the public had been treated very shabbily. There had been a reserve, almost a mystery, attaching to the actors in the tragedy which was regarded as nothing less than an attempt to defraud it of prescriptive rights. A thousand questions had been left unanswered, and the most persistent inquiry in every quarter had failed to throw light upon them.

It was high time, everybody felt, that such persons should understand that the public had some privileges which they were bound to respect. A crime was a matter in regard to which the people had a right to be informed. The officers of justice were but the servants of the people. Jared Clarkson should remember that fame was inconsistent with secrecy. As a public character he was bound to render an account of what he did and what he knew to those whose approval made him famous. So, too, with a minister of the Gospel. There should be no mystery in his life. A doctor should remember also that the suspicion of complicity with crime was a debasement of his profession. The public clamored for knowledge, and all were warned that those who stood in the path of its desire would find that they were standing in their own light also. Each and all of those having any knowledge of the crime or the parties thereto were exhorted to enlighten the public in regard to it, under penalty of its displeasure. These were some of the questions to which categorical answers were demanded day by day but not vouchsafed :

"What had become of Hilda?"

"Who shot Amy?"

"Who was it that came so near killing Barnes?"

"Why had Martin Kortright left as suddenly as he had come?"

"What interest had Jared Clarkson in the matter?"

"Why should he be closeted with Sherwood Eighmie for hours at a time?"

"What had he in common with the slave-hunter?"

"Why did the prosecution of these notorious offenders lag?"

"Why had the prosecuting attorney been more than once in private consultation with Clarkson and Eighmie?"

"What were the documents drawn up between Clarkson and Eighmie, witnessed by the State's Attorney, and acknowledged before a notary?"

"Had Jared Clarkson bought up the unholy claim of another slave-owner to his chattel?"

"Was the peace of individuals to be purchased at a sacrifice of public justice?"

"Did a crack-brained philanthropist propose to cure the evils of slavery by constantly interfering to protect its emissaries from the penalty of violated law?"

"Why did not the Doctor tell what he knew?"

"Was Miss Hunniwell a party to the conspiracy to defeat the ends of justice?"

"Why was Gilbert Amory so strangely silent, and how did he chance to be driving on the unused road in the rear of the seminary that night?"

These and very many other questions were asked by press and people, far and near, and a myriad of guesses were hazarded by the gossips in reply to each; yet none the less did the public feel itself aggrieved, and all the more busily did it seek to penetrate the mystery that hung about the strange events.

Jared Clarkson had made up his mind as to the duty that lay before him even before his arrival. Painful to any one, it was especially repulsive to him. He knew that in a free government there were but two remedies for bad laws—their strict enforcement or absolute defiance. He hated all that smacked of slavery, or rather he abhorred it with a vehemence that made simple hatred pale. Wrath and disgust swept through his heart like a whirlwind whenever he thought of this Minotaur, for whom a labyrinth had been builded in the fairest portion of our land. He hated the worship of this beast of blood only less than he pitied the victims. He knew that he would be blamed for what he proposed to do, but he had never shrunk from duty because of public clamor. The reprehension of friends and foes had been alike insufficient to deter him from the path his conscience had marked out. But even if he had been the veriest coward that ever shrank from disapproval, he could not then have hesitated. Had not Merwyn Hargrove committed to his charge the trust in which he himself had been faithful unto death? He could not shrink while the picture Jason had painted of that last moment was yet fresh in his memory. His exemplar was sleeping under the shadow of the water-oak by the Mallowbank landing in an unmarked grave. He was calling to his representative to do even as he would have done under like circumstances. What would he have done? That Jared Clarkson determined to do, whatever the risk of blame! What would he do—Merwyn Hargrove—were he then and there present? It needed not much study to decide. So thought the sorrowful heritor of his wretched secret.

The public rumor was not without foundation. Sherwood Eighmie and his counsel had conferred with Jared Clarkson and the State's Attorney. There had been much skillful fencing, and the diplomacy of the profession had been exhausted upon each side, in the attempt to learn what hand the other held without disclosing their own. This was continued for a long time in vain. At length subterfuge was apparently thrown aside, and Eighmie's counsel made specific answer to Clarkson's oft-repeated question:

"What reason have you for believing that Hilda Hargrove was the daughter of your intestate?"

The answer was:

- 1—There was no evidence of the birth of a daughter to Captain Hargrove and his wife. Kingston had been ransacked for evidence of the birth and christening in vain.
- 2—The introduction of Hilda to the household at Sturmhold was exactly contemporaneous with the disappearance of Heloise Eighmie.
- 3—Hilda had always claimed her as her own child.
- 4—The former servants, except Jason, were discharged, and he was a party to the substitution.
- 5—Hargrove well knew of Hilda's claim upon the child, and never denied it.
- 6—In a letter written by himself to Jared Clarkson, which was found upon his person after death, Captain Hargrove had stated the fact that he desired his executors to expend all that might be derived from the estate of George Eighmie, or so much thereof as might be required, in discovering and freeing Hugh Eighmie, and that the balance of said estate, together with a sum equal to what had been expended in rearing the daughter of George and Alida, in all respects as if she had been his own child, including her expenses at Beechwood Seminary, "where she now is," should be paid to the said Hugh Eighmie in some manner so as to conceal from him all knowledge of the source from whence it came. "As to the daughter," the writer remarked, "she is already amply provided for by the operation of my will."
- 7—The will thus distinctly alluded to contained no name or reference to any one except the executors appointed thereby and "Hilda Hargrove, a daughter, who has never failed in duty or affection, to whom I leave my whole estate, well knowing that she will honor my name and memory by wise use thereof."

And now, said Eighmie's counsel, not without evident apprehension:

"What do you rely upon to rebut this chain of circumstances?"

Jared Clarkson responded with equal frankness:

"The presumption of legitimacy, and the open, constant and unmistakable acknowledgment of the father."

"And nothing more?" asked the counsel, with ill-concealed anxiety.

"That is enough," responded Clarkson evasively.

Neither party underestimated the strength of the other. Eighmie was fettered by the fact of crime committed. Clarkson was weighed down by fear of the truth. Neither party dared defy the other.

THE HOUSEHOLD—NURSERY GOVERNMENT.

A WISE old lady, sitting beside my nursery fire, with a benevolent eye upon a very new baby, in a very new cradle, once said to me: "Exact prompt obedience and punish for disobedience, but avoid raising an issue in which your child's will is pitted against your own."

This advice, although given from the serene heights of experience to the equally serene depths of inexperience, was not lost; and as, one after another, the bristling theories of cradle days were cast off with the baby's outgrown dresses, its value became apparent.

To a conscientious young mother, ardent and alert under her new sense of responsibility, it seems fairly puerile to "avoid an issue." She feels herself summoned, as by trumpet call, to instant battle with each invading fault; and so she is, but there are ways and ways.

The question here is not whether to secure obedience, but whether obedience may not be secured without those prolonged and distressing struggles between parent and child, in which a child often discovers his power to defy and "hold out" against his parents.

I think it safe to assume that a well child is usually a happy child, and that a happy child naturally inclines to cheerful acquiescence; it is, therefore, probable that in the majority of cases disobedience occurs during periods of petulance and irritability caused by some physical disturbance, perhaps unsuspected by the parent, and never comprehended by the child. Hence it is in his moments of physical unbalance that he manifests his worst traits and seems to need the sharpest discipline; yet a prolonged contest of will at such a time exhausts his strength and lowers his vitality.

Let me illustrate the working of the two principles—of raising an issue and avoiding an issue.

We will suppose your child of three years to have been kept in the house by bad weather until he is quite restless and irritable, and you welcome the first bright afternoon as a great relief; a romp in the fresh air is all he needs to recover his serenity. "Now, pick up your blocks, Dick," you say, "and you may go out to play." At the moment he chances not to be on amiable terms with his blocks; they have failed him in a critical architectural moment, and, with a scowl and a kick, he disdains to pick them up. "Oh, but you must!" you say. He demurs; you make your command even more imperative; he flatly refuses. Now, if you say, "You cannot go out to play until you have picked up your blocks," you have raised an issue. It may be the threat will prove effectual, and he will hasten to pick up the blocks for the sake of going out, and no harm may be done. But, if he is naturally obstinate, and if he is very cross at the moment, you may suddenly find yourself in the thick of a very stubborn and inopportune fight. It cuts you to the heart to spend the precious hours of sunshine thus; you look at his flushed face and swollen eyelids and know that ten minutes in the fresh air would sweeten his temper and smooth all difficulties; but you have committed yourself; you have raised an issue; he has met you squarely upon it; his obstinacy is aroused; you cannot retract; his will is pitted against yours, and you must not yield an inch now. So, wearily and heart-sick, you fight it out. The stout little heart is not so stout as your hand, and the wee man must succumb sooner or later to superior strength; and, by-and-by, when it is too late to go out to play, the blocks are tearfully picked up, and you rock your vanquished baby in your arms. He clings to you and kisses you between long sobs, and finally falls asleep with a hot cheek on your shoulder. But see the dark circles under his eyes, and listen to the pathetic catch in his sleeping breath. You have conquered, but it seems a pitiful victory to you.

Professor Bain says, somewhere in his little book on "Mind and Body," that every pleasurable emotion increases vitality, and every painful emotion decreases it. In proportion to his strength, what a drain upon the child's vitality this long struggle has been! But how could this scene have been avoided? By not accompanying your command with a threat which at once handicapped you and gave the child a point of resistance. As soon as you had said that he could not go out until his blocks were picked up, you lost the opportunity to adjust yourself to circumstances, and were dependent wholly upon superior endurance, and the infliction of punishment for your victory. All consideration for the child's health must be secondary to the carrying of your point when it is once made. The most painful experiences with a child are often the most unexpected—a whirlwind on a calm day—and unless it is a principle with the mother to keep herself mistress of the situation, untrammelled by definite threats, she will sometimes be sorely perplexed.

In this case, if the child refused to pick up his blocks, you might have warned him of danger ahead; and upon continued refusal, you might have descended upon him with swift punishment, and then hurried him out of doors to frolic with the other children before the last tear-drop was dry on his cheek. The whole affair would not have taken ten minutes, yet he would carry away in his small heart a great respect for an authority that tolerated no revolt and carried such quick retribution. When he came in, rosy and merry, at sundown, he would be none the worse physically for the episode of the blocks, but would have learned the cost of disobedience in a way not easy to forget.

With varying ages and temperaments modifications of this principle are of course necessary; but even with the vigorous, willful, older child, who disobeys from sheer naughtiness, is it not better to avoid a contest which may strengthen his will and obstinacy? If you say to such a child: "You shall not have your breakfast until you do so and so," you rouse his combativeness, and he may go without his dinner and supper as well rather than yield. We have all heard harrowing tales of the voluntary starvation and imprisonment of obstinate children. In such cases, if the parent had said: "I told you to do so and you have disobeyed; now you must lose your breakfast or stay in your room all day," the punishment would have been the same, but shorn of all the glory of successful rebellion. The pride of "holding out" would be lost—he would be simply a culprit doing penance. No palpitating mother would listen at the door for the first signal of submission. The end would no longer be sensational, with tears, repentance and forgiveness; the whole thing would have fallen flat, and be too tame for repetition.

It is difficult to lay down a rule without its seeming too sweeping. This may not be adapted to all children, or to any one child under all circumstances. I know some exceptions myself—so many, indeed, that I think it must be a very good rule. It seems to me such a serious matter, both physically and morally, for many children to have prolonged will-contests with parents, that I want to show how a mother may, in most instances, make her authority respected without raising such a contest.

MARY H. BURTON.

A Bit of Political Gossip.

Now that Thurlow Weed is gone, many stories are told in illustration of his great political sagacity, some of which will cause surprise to those who have been familiar with political facts without having known a great deal of the causes which brought them about. Such a story—the author being solely responsible for the verity of the statements—we give herewith :

From the time when Thurlow Weed first took an active part in political affairs—as far back as 1824—until shortly before his death, a little while ago, he was personally concerned in most of the great political movements of the country ; and in his party, especially in New York State, his was oftenest the mind that planned, and his the hand that did the most effective execution. He had a wonderful knowledge of mankind, and was possessed of a most remarkable memory. His discernment of character was quick and keen ; he measured men as he measured words.

The early life of the man was such as was calculated to develop in him the characteristics which later enabled him to stand above his fellow-men. In his youth he was the sport of adverse circumstances, and only by the most strenuous, unremitting exertions was he able to rise above them. But he had the mind to rise, and when he had risen he was the stronger for having struggled. He began life as a cabin-boy on a river boat, and while still a mere lad he left that occupation to enter a printing office. In course of time he became an editor ; then entered politics, and soon became a recognized leader. He was one of the founders of the old Whigs, and afterward, for many years, was one of the mainstays of the present Republican party. Presidents, Senators, Governors and many lesser officials have found their way to office through him, and more than one Presidential Cabinet was formed according to his suggestion. He sought no official position for himself, but gloried in being the power behind the throne. His advice was sought after by men in the highest official positions. He gave it willingly, and often have his suggestions almost completely changed the political kaleidoscope. It would be foolish to assert that Thurlow Weed made no mistakes in his lifetime ; he did make mistakes ; his judgment was not by any means infallible ; yet, as the world goes, he was wise, far-sighted, prudent, far beyond the average of mankind. The following story he told the writer about three weeks before he died, and it is given almost in his own words :

“During the summer of 1866, both of the political parties were already casting about rather anxiously for a suitable Presidential candidate for the next campaign. The Democrats were very much in earnest that year, and had pretty strong hope of being able to elect their next candidate, since the Johnson administration was turning out so badly. The Democratic party at that time was under the management of Dean Richmond, an exceedingly wise, honest, judicious man, who had never aspired for office himself, and who had the confidence of his whole party. Richmond was a man I really very greatly admired. Another good man, Peter Caggar, was at that time secretary of the Democratic State Committee.

“I was in Albany then, and one day I called at Caggar's office there to see him about some business matter. As I entered the room I saw Richmond, Caggar, Erastus Corning and one or two other gentlemen seated closely around a table, and overheard the words : ‘ Yes, Grant is undoubtedly the man ; if we—’ and then the speaker saw me and suddenly turned the conversation upon some commonplace topic.

“From this and the confusion expressed upon the faces of the men I saw at once that I had interrupted a private conversation. A few moments later, having accomplished my errand, I left the office, and then the words I had heard came back to my mind. It flashed across me almost immediately that these men had been discussing General Grant as a possible Democratic candidate for the Presidency !

“At that time General Grant was committed to no political party, but it was known that he had been a Democrat before the war, and it was a not unreasonable presumption that he was still a Democrat. I realized in a moment that if the Democrats should nominate General Grant, and he should accept the nomination, they would undoubtedly elect their candidate, for the general was then probably the most popular man in the country, and could be elected no matter whose candidate he might be. As I thought the matter over I was impressed more and more strongly that the Democrats had this end in view.

“Not long after this I met Erastus Corning on the street. Mr. Corning was evidently feeling very well satisfied about something. He said to me :

“‘Well, Weed, what are your people going to do for a Presidential candidate next time ?’

“‘Oh, I do not know yet what we shall do. There is plenty of time for attending to that, and the Republican party does not lack eligible men,’ I answered.

“‘Well,’ said Corning, ‘you had better put on the strongest man you have, or we shall beat you pretty badly—in fact, I think we shall do that at any rate.’

“Then I felt moderately confident that the Democrats had decided upon nominating General Grant as their candidate ; but if any doubt of this lingered in my mind it was effectually dispelled, an hour later, by a few moments’ conversation I had with Dean Richmond. After some talk upon general matters, I said to him :

“‘Corning tells me you expect to bring out a pretty strong candidate for the Presidency some of these days, and that you actually expect to elect him.’

“‘Did Corning tell you who it was ?’ asked Richmond, rather anxiously, with a disturbed expression

“‘No ; only he said that you had decided upon a very strong man.’

“‘Oh, well,’ responded Richmond, ‘Corning talks too much—altogether too much, and he doesn’t know what he is talking about half the time !’

“That completely satisfied me ; and then I began to consider if we could not do something to head off this contemplated movement of the Democrats. I felt pretty sure that Richmond and his friends had very lately conceived this idea of nominating General Grant, and had not likely gone so far as to send him any communication upon the subject. It then occurred to me that if the Republicans could see General Grant first we might effectually beat the Democrats in this particular scheme. With that end in view, I took the first train for New York, arriving in the city late in the afternoon. As soon as possible I saw Abram Wakeman, Sheridan Shook, Thomas Murphy, James Kelly, Owen W. Brennan, William A. Darling, Hugh Gardner, Dr. Van Wyck, and some more of my staunch Republican friends—all representative men in the party—and we met together, organized and held a meeting that same evening at the Astor House, in old Room No. 11, where so many political movements were planned in those days. At this meeting I explained what I had heard, and suggested that we might capture the General for our own ticket by a flank movement, as it were—by seeing him at once, asking him if he would accept the nomination from the Republican party if tendered, and then, in case we received a satisfactory answer—as I had no doubt we should if we were in time—we might publish the General's reply, committing him to us, and thus prevent the Democrats from approaching him at all upon the subject.

"The meeting was unanimously in favor of this, and I was delegated to visit General Grant 'at once.' The afternoon papers of that day had chronicled the General's arrival at Long Branch, so I hurried down to the Branch that same evening. The next morning I met the General in front of the hotel when he came out to take an early walk. I asked him to postpone his walk for a while, and come to my room, as I had something very important to communicate. The General went with me, and then I told him that I had come down to obtain an expression of his willingness to become the Republican candidate for the Presidency of the United States. I told him of our meeting held the night before, without, however, referring to its hasty organization, but allowing him to infer that we had had him in our minds as a prospective candidate for a long time. I told him that I felt I could assure him the nomination in the convention to be held in 1868, and that the nomination would be equivalent to an election.

"'You,' said I, 'will have nothing whatever to do in the matter beyond consenting to become our candidate. You have done your work for us in the war—now we will do our work for you in the coming campaign.'

"That afternoon Thomas Murphy (afterward appointed by President Grant Collector for the Port of New York) came down with a full account of the proceedings of our meeting, and an 'official' message from the committee. General Grant seemed very much pleased with our action, and formally consented to become a candidate for the nomination at the hands of the Republican party. So our mission was accomplished. The next morning the report that General Grant had committed himself to the Republicans spread consternation in the minds of the Democrats, who had already come to regard the General as their own future candidate. The hope that they had placed in 'a strong man' was now completely turned against them.

"Some time after this I met Richmond, and he confessed to me that the Democrats had been outwitted and their thunder had been stolen almost at the last moment, for he had no doubt but that, in three or four days more, Grant would have been pledged as a prospective Democratic candidate.

"The rest is history—how, in the Republican National Convention held in Chicago, in 1868, Grant was unanimously nominated upon the first ballot, there being no opposition whatever. And from that time the Republican party has been in power, as the result, in the first place, of our having beaten the Democrats in securing the consent of General Grant to accept the nomination."

Mr. Weed told the story with the enjoyment of an old soldier relating the incidents of a raid within the enemy's lines. The manner is lacking, but the actual words are closely preserved.

CHARLES M. KURTZ.

THE sketch of the late Alexander H. Stephens, published herewith, is in a sense autobiographical, since its author was in frequent consultation with Mr. Stephens until a few days before his death, regarding the notes and data whose substance is embodied in the present paper. Mr. Cleveland says in a letter: "One day I told him the article for Judge Tourgée was ready, and he said he would gladly write his autograph for it," which was accordingly done, with the intention of having it reproduced in facsimile to accompany an engraved portrait. Mr. Stephens' not unexpected, though actually sudden, death necessitated a farther revision of the manuscript, and called for the addition of many facts not heretofore published. Mr. Cleveland was selected by Mr. Stephens as his biographer, and will shortly, we understand, bring out a biographical volume. It will interest our readers to know that it is largely through Mr. Stephens' influence that the State of Georgia gives eight thousand dollars annually to the Atlanta University, and a like sum to the State University at Athens. The first-named of these institutions is devoted to the education of negroes, and it is certainly a significant fact that the ex-Vice-President of the Southern Confederacy should so have interested himself in the cause of this recently-emancipated race. He was, however, always far ahead of the mass of his constituents in broad humanitarian views, and early recognized the importance to the state of educating the ignorant classes, white as well as black. We may mention another significant fact in this connection: The author of the present sketch was a colonel in the Confederate service. He is now a clergyman, and preaches every Sunday to a mixed audience of white and black factory operatives near Atlanta.

ONE often hears it said of an attractive young woman, "She has nothing to do but take her choice," or words to that effect, meaning that she can have any man of her acquaintance for a husband if she wishes to marry. But is this true? Evidently not under existing social codes. She may, indeed, refuse one after another of her admirers until she has gone through nine-tenths of the entire list of available men, but he whom she wants may not choose to offer himself. He may be too bashful, or he may be disheartened by the ill success of his fellows, or, for that matter he may be indifferent. This, however, does not alter the case as regards the lady. She has nothing to do with making the selection except in a negative way. She may refuse what she does not want, but she can only accept what is offered. She may see the man whom her heart tells her she ought to marry, standing afar off, hardly daring to worship silently and at a distance; yet she dare not sacrifice her maidenly reserve by going frankly to him and telling him that she loves him. Of course there are very strong reasons why she should not make such a venture with masculine human nature in its present unregenerate condition; but let it not be said that she may take her choice, when, in fact, she is not at liberty to do anything of the kind. A woman who has a dozen offers in the course of her life, may felicitate herself on having received an unusually large number, but it is a limited number. Her brother, on the contrary, literally has the feminine world to choose from—or to try to choose from. He may be refused, but at least he may ask the woman of his choice if she will have him. Perhaps this same brother is a worthless brute—he may even be a dude—yet he can, without violating the laws of social propriety, ask the loveliest of her sex to become his wife. Sometimes, alas! she consents—such is the mysterious nature of womankind—and no doubt she might make mistakes even if she were free to make proposals herself. That the question has arisen as to the wisdom of such a practically iron rule as now obtains, is evident from the traditional, if wholly visionary, prerogatives of "leap year," and from the occasional introduction by popular writers of a feminine "proposal" on the part of some heroine in modern fiction. It is not at all likely that any sweeping revolution will take place in this regard, and indeed there are few judicious minds which would advise it; yet it may be that the Anglo-Saxon way is not beyond peradventure the best way. Marriages are effected in many lands, and among highly civilized people, by the mediation of third parties. Shall we say that they are altogether wrong because their way is not our way? There is a comical, yet not entirely improbable turn of events that is suggested by the appearance recently upon the social stage of the class of young men, already referred to in these pages, whose demeanor is marked by a studied elegance, and, if we may say so, by a lady-like deportment, which is certainly an outgrowth of modern social tendencies, and may be the shadow of coming events. The generations that have gone favored a retiring disposition in well-bred women, which has at the present time been largely modified by a thousand influences. The American girl of to-day has far more to do with the management of social affairs than had her mother and her grandmother. There has unquestionably grown up of late years a class of daring, high-spirited, self-reliant girls, with audacity enough for any possible achievement. Can it be—the suggestion is made with bated breath—that nature will preserve the social equilibrium by evolving a class of young men whose sweet, retiring shyness of manner shall prove attractive to the bolder spirits of the opposite sex? Nature is very apt to afford compensations. Why may she not preserve the balance in this, as in other really less important relations, replacing the partly eliminated element of traditional gentleness in woman by a masculine substitute equally charming in its way. To the dashing girl graduates of 1944, or thereabout, the dude of the period may prove irresistibly fascinating. Great reforms move slowly, and it is more than probable that most of those who are now living will “rest ‘neath the daisies” before woman’s right of choice in the matter of husbands becomes an actual fact instead of a glittering generality.

WINCKLEMANN for many years represented the deepest and truest researches into ancient art, and those who went beyond mere smattering found that in his work, added to that of Lübke and Kugler, lay the only real sources of information. But exhaustively as Wincklemann had labored—and he was the first one to apply the historic method to the study of the fine arts—he was hampered by the limitations of the time in which he lived; and his bulky volumes, valuable as they must always remain, are not precisely what is needed by the general student. A more condensed account—“a history of the fine arts that should state correctly what is known concerning their works, and should treat their various manifestations with intelligence and in just proportion”—was required by the student; and this has been given in the present volume,¹ which appeared in Germany in 1871. The many discoveries of the past ten years have altered the bearing of many statements made, and thus a thorough revision became necessary, in which both author and translator co-operated. The result is one of the most careful and scholarly records ever made, and no better manual could be placed in the hands of the advanced student. Professor Charles Eliot Norton, one of our best authorities in this direction, in the preface gives full credit to Wincklemann as the first one who secured “to the fine arts their due place in the history of mankind as the chief record of various stages of civilization, and as the most trustworthy expression of the faith, the sentiments and the emotions of past ages, and often even of their institutions and modes of life. The recognition of the significance of the fine arts in these respects is, indeed, as yet but partial, and the historical study of art does not hold the place in the scheme of liberal education which it is certain before long to attain. One reason of this fact lies in the circumstance that few of the general historical treatises on the fine arts that have been produced during the last fifty years have been works of sufficient learning or judgment to give them authority as satisfactory sources of instruction. Errors of statement and vague speculations have abounded in them. The subject, moreover, has been confused, especially in Germany, by the intrusion of metaphysics into its domain, in the guise of a professed but spurious science of esthetics.”

These same esthetics have done much to confuse all real knowledge, and no better corrective can be asked than the simple and straightforward story Dr. Von Reber tells. The first third of the volume is given to Egypt with her monuments and sculptures, and to Chaldea, Assyria, Persia and Asia Minor in general; the remainder being occupied by Greece and Rome, the story of the latter being simply that of such development as came under Grecian influence. The translation is an easy and graceful one; the illustrations are carefully printed, and the book a most valuable and attractive addition to the literature of art.

EXACTLY why various critics have announced this recent number of the “No Name Series”¹ to be immoral, it is difficult to discover. On the contrary, a careful reading leaves the impression of a higher morality than present fiction often holds—a sense of the inevitable penalty for all transgression of law, even when as innocent and unconscious as that of poor Katherine. The plot is simple. Katherine Carey is the only daughter of a self-made man, beginning as office-boy with the firm in which he eventually becomes a partner, and whose chief desire is to see a marriage between this daughter and Roger Hackblock, the oldest son of the senior partner. Lewis Barrington, a journalist and promising novel-writer, sees her giving strawberries to a group of poor children about the steps of her father’s house, and then and there, bewitched by her beauty and grace, registers a vow that no other woman shall ever be his wife. A fortunate chance that night introduces him to her, and an acquaintance begins that speedily ripens into love on her part as well. The invalid mother, the fresh and singularly unworldly daughter, the people who come and go about them, are all very real—above all the artist, Frank Davenport, who, head over ears in debt, spends the proceeds of his first successful picture in a wonderful brass bed, made up of twining dragons, “to sleep in which is an education in art.” Nancy Davenport is a very delicate and well-wrought creation, and the haps and mishaps of artist-life most faithfully and charmingly given. The Hackblocks are very unpleasantly real, and Mrs. Wilbraham, who appears on the scene after the death of Katherine’s father, the loss of fortune, and determination to atone for all the sorrow brought about by rash and inconsiderate action, is one of the most amusing figures in recent fiction. Katherine’s faults—sins, as she calls them—are all the result of defective training, and to see an error with her is to seek as instant atonement as possible. There is sorrow and abnegation, and a long, sad waiting—but “Barrington’s Fate” is happiness at last; and certainly the poor child, whose chief sin was an undeveloped, uneducated nature, deserves all that comes, the real sin lying with those who ignored its claims, though here again ignorance and selfishness were chief factors in the tragedy; and the moral lies behind all outcroppings of these traits, and is deep as life itself. The story is exceedingly unequal, but sufficiently strong to make this less an objection than it otherwise must be.

JOAQUIN MILLER has given up poetry for the time being, and is devoting himself to newspaper correspondence, in which he is having exceptional success.

"THE WHEELMAN" has given itself a new and very attractive cover, and the contents are, as usual, of very even excellence, the magazine being an essential to all interested in bicycling news.

THE Century drops the various divisions of its editorial departments and gives place to one with the title of "Open Letters," much after the order of the popular "Contributors' Club," in the Atlantic.

MR. BROWNING bids fair to become a popular author, as twelve hundred copies of "Jocoseria" were sold within a week of publication; as many as have heretofore been required for the sales of several years.

MR. JULIAN HAWTHORNE is busily engaged upon the biography of his father, which he hopes to have ready for the press by July. It contains, as would naturally be expected, much interesting correspondence.

OVER eleven hundred applications have already been made for Dommett's hymn by young aspirants for Harpers' prize, New York leading the way in numbers, Boston being next, and a few coming from the South.

"JOHN INGLESANT" has passed into its twentieth edition, and is still in active demand, in spite of the statement in various quarters that philosophical novels have had their day, and that the public demands something more stirring.

MR. JOHN BIGELOW will write the life of William Cullen Bryant for the "American Men of Letters Series," and that of Bayard Taylor will be prepared by Mr. J. R. G. Hassard, the delightful quality of whose work is known to every reader of the New York Tribune.

NINE thousand copies of "Mr. Isaacs" have been sold in this country, and the Macmillans announce a new edition of three thousand copies. The author, Mr. F. Marion Crawford, is on his way to Japan, and may make that country the scene of his next novel.

MR. WILKIE COLLINS has turned his batteries upon the vivisectionists, and in his latest novel, just completed and to be published in May, gives a study of one of the most cold-blooded types, an attack of the gout having come just in season to insure the requisite ferocity of treatment.

THE "Old Corner Book Store" passes from the hands of the senior partner, Alexander Williams, long identified with Boston publishing interests, into those of the younger partners, under the firm name of Cupples, Upham & Co. Here seems a case where the English custom of retaining the name of the original firm might advantageously be tried.

THE "American Exchange" has organized a system of excursions on the established plan, and prints a monthly magazine, very neatly made up, called Travel, containing descriptions of various tours with the expense of each. Drake's Traveller's Magazine gives also a good deal of valuable information, the traveler having absolutely no excuse hereafter for losing his way.

IN "The Battle of the Moy; or, How Ireland Gained

Her Independence, 1892-1894," there is a prophecy which it is not impossible we may see worked out. A sudden and most unexpected declaration of independence takes place in 1892, when strifes of various sorts are going on in Europe, and, after many catastrophes, the Battle of the Moy puts an end to all farther difficulty. The battle itself is powerfully described, and the little book is so full of keen humor as to be well worth reading. (Paper, pp. 74, 50 cents; Lee & Shepard, Boston).

AN exceedingly sensible little book has just been published by D. Appleton & Co., "Hygiene for Girls," by Dr. Irenæus P. Davis, the nine chapters of which are each and all full of wise suggestion. The opening one on "Nerves and Nervousness," is a summary of the causes that underlie this national tendency, and is so calm and wise in tone that it cannot be too highly commended. Evidently a very just and well-balanced mind has looked on all sides of the subject, and common sense is especially evident in the chapter on "Hygienic Morals," which ends the book, as well as in that on "Feminine Employments." (12mo, pp. 210, $1.00).

FUNK & WAGNALLS have reprinted the lectures of the Rev. H. R. Haweis, M. A., on "American Humorists," four of which were delivered before the Royal Institution in 1881. Mr. Haweis has an almost enthusiastic admiration for American humor, the highest type of which he considers is found in Washington Irving. Dr. Holmes ranks next, and is followed by James Russell Lowell, Artemus Ward, Mark Twain and Bret Harte. That on Dr. Holmes is in many points the most sympathetic and intelligent, but the book is, with all its gush and faults of style and statement, one that will go far toward giving a true impression of many American characteristics. The price is astonishingly low for the quality of the paper and binding used. (12mo, pp. 179, $1.00).

MR. GEORGE H. CALVERT must be reckoned always with our rather limited number of "men of letters," his work for many years fully entitling him to this distinction. His prose is always clear and elegant in style, and his critical power has been shown in many forms. A student always, and well able to interpret the work of the masters, whether in prose or poetry, he can hardly himself be called a poet, though his works include various dramas and tragedies. "Mirabeau, an Historical Drama," is the latest venture, and is a very faithful reproduction of the spirit of that day. The character of Mirabeau has evidently been thoroughly studied, and Cecile is a very noble and womanly conception; but the drama, while possessing some strong situations, is not poetry, but prose, and cannot add to Mr. Calvert's reputation as a poet. (16mo, pp. 103, $1.00; Lee & Shepard, Boston).

THE "Hammock Series" of Henry A. Sumner & Co., Chicago, grows slowly, the latest addition being "A Sane Lunatic," by Clara Louise Burnham. Miss Burnham is a sketchy and vivacious writer, but her plots are too wildly improbable in themselves, and in the present case too suggestive of Wilkie Collins' "Poor Miss Finch" to leave room for admiration of her inventiveness. Here, as in the English novelist's work, are two twin brothers; and the heroine, supposed to be a lunatic in the beginning, because of her constant reference to "Fairylund," and her life there—"Fairylands" being really her birth-place, and thus named from its beauty—marries the right one at last, having first very nearly married the wrong one, who is the villain of the plot. There are some amusing scenes, and the book has no objectionable points, which is in itself a certain recommendation. (12mo, pp. 325, $1.50).

HENRY HOLT & Co. have in press a volume entitled "Outlines of Constitutional History of the United States," by Luther H. Porter, which is announced by the publishers to be on a different plan from any history or text-book now before the public. "In Part I it gives a brief sketch of the government of the colonies, and the text of one of each of the three kinds of colonial charters, in order to show the basis of our form of government. It then outlines the causes which led to the formation of the Constitution. In Part II the Constitution is given and treated in detail, and the nature and object of each clause explained in a simple manner. Part III narrates concisely the origin and growth of political parties, and traces the outlines of constitutional and party questions. It is not an ambitious work, but an attempt to put into convenient form, for the first use of students or other readers, a connected account of the main facts of the origin, nature and operation of the Constitution."

A THIRD edition has been called for of Dr. C. E. Page's little book, "How to Feed the Baby," and the success is a well deserved one. The regimen, to those accustomed to old methods, may seem severe, but the many who have tested it thoroughly find the results better even than the author claims they must be. There is no doubt that over-feeding is the rule with all young children, and that much of the mortality from birth to five years of age might be prevented by wiser treatment. Dr. Page has made infant dietetics a specialty, and knows of what he writes; and for ten years he has studied baby habits, measuring every specimen that came in his way, here or abroad, and finding out as many details as possible of its general health, physical traits, special sicknesses, methods of treatment, management, diet, clothing, etc. He has made a manual which may be trusted, and those who train their children by its directions are likely to secure for them the best possible physical development. (Paper, pp. 160, 50 cents; Fowler & Wells, New York).

"A DAUGHTER OF THE PHILISTINES" is the latest novel issued by Roberts Brothers, of Boston, in their No Name Series, and is a much more powerful story than the more recent ones of the series. The story opens in New York, where a Western family, whose fortune the father has made, by the aid of his scheming wife, out of an army contract, have succeeded in locating themselves. A Fifth Avenue mansion, plenty of money and a beautiful and stylish daughter, open the doors of fashionable society to them; and, while the father amuses himself on Wall street, we are shown, with all the coolness that Mr. Howells manifests in his "Modern Instance," the family discords, the want of reverence in the young people, the foibles of the willful daughter, and the fast life of the son. But while the son goes to perdition, as he deserves, there is an innate goodness in the daughter, aided by her marriage to a man of principle, that makes her at last, contrary to our fears, a most charming young matron. There is much stock speculation in the story, and the usual end of the mushroom growth. (16mo, pp. 325, $1.00).

THE spirit of criticism is more and more a nineteenth-century instinct, and it may be questioned whether there will soon be any time left for accomplishment. When the world takes to defining past and present, and book follows book to prove either a new theory or some new shade of distinction in the old, creation ends, and by the time all have spoken there will be no modern art to talk about. Now and then, however, comes a book that is not a complaint of bad work, but an incentive to good, and of this order is Miss Lucy Crane's "Art and the Formation of Taste;" six lectures, with illustrations drawn by Thomas and Walter Crane. Nothing simpler or more direct can be imagined than these six talks, the introductory one giving an outline of the history and progress of art, and the remaining ones treating of decorative art, in form, color, dress and needle-work; of sculpture, architecture and painting. Unpretentious and quiet as the work is, no one can read without admiration for the good sense and real insight of the author, and regret that one so fitted to teach should have ended life just as its best work had begun. (12mo, pp. 292, $2.00; Macmillan & Co., London).

MR. J. L. MCCREERY disarms all criticism by the frank statement in his introduction to "Songs of Toil and Triumph," that they are sung to please himself. He quotes Ruskin's petition for no more second-rate poetry, in which occurs this passage: "All inferior poetry is injury to the good, inasmuch as it takes away from the freshness of rhymes, gives a wretched commonality to good thoughts, and, in general, adds to the weight of human weariness in a most woeful and culpable manner." Mr. McCreery replies—it need not be said, in rhyme—that though owls may cry "silence!" crickets will still chirp:

"My song is a homely affair, no doubt;
But when my heart and throat are athrill
With a thought or a joy that I want to let out, Though owls may complain, I will not keep still."

The genuinely fine poem, long attributed to Bulwer, beginning:

"There is no death! the stars go down
To rise upon some other shore," is given in full, with a history of its fortunes, and the remainder of the volume, though by no means up to this standard, is full of a very gentle and thoughtful spirit. (16mo, pp. 143, $1.00; G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York).

The first volume of Mr. Hulbert Howe Bancroft's "History of the Pacific States," "Central America," is succeeded by Vol. IV, on Mexico, the explanation for the sudden jump being found in a publisher's note accompanying the volume:

"It has been deemed advisable, for several reasons, to deviate from strict numerical order in the publication of the several volumes of this History, and pursue a more chronological course. Thus, instead of continuing the annals of Central America, as presented in the second volume of the series, the fourth volume of the series is next issued, which is the first volume of the history of Mexico. The three succeeding volumes will bring the histories of Mexico and Central America, side by side, down to about 1800. These will be followed by several volumes on regions toward the north, for approximately the same period; for example, the earlier volumes on the North Mexican States, California, the Northwest Coast, and Oregon, New Mexico and Arizona, Nevada, Utah, Washington, Idaho and Montana, British Columbia and Alaska, may be issued at any time."

The present volume has all the peculiarities as well as charms of Mr. Bancroft's work. It is too diffuse as usual, but it is also a brilliantly written narrative, packed with facts to which no other historian has had as full access. Mr. Bancroft's statement of his methods of work seems to have aroused a feeling that much of it was practically not his own. Nothing could be farther from the truth. The enormous amount of material in his library of reference necessitates the employment of trained assistants; but any practiced literary worker knows that note-taking is only the preliminary stage, and that the real labor begins when connected narrative must grow from jottings. Mr. Bancroft's style is his own, and its virtues far exceed its vices. (8vo, pp. 702, $3.50. A. L. Bancroft & Co., publishers, San Francisco).

An Attorney to His Love.

FOREVER witness this deed poll,
To whom it may concern,
That for the sweetest of femmes sole
With quenchless love I burn.
To her, in very simplest fee,
My heart I do convey,
With covenant of warranty,
Forever and for aye.
I humbly pray that she will give
Her heart to me in trust,
To be its tenant while I live
Till mine is turned to dust.
I dare not seek a title great,
Although I madly love her;
If she would grant a life estate,
I'd yield remainder over.
Her heart's entailed, perhaps; then short
I'll bring recoverie,
And plead my cause in Love's own court,
With Cupid for vouchee.
The usufruct of her dear lips
Would surely lure the bees in;
I long to hold her finger-tips
By livery of seizin.
Ah, hopeless I! To me appears
Her host of suitors; yet,
Oh, who can soothe such startled fears
By bills “quid timet?”
How my aforesaid heart would sing,
And all said fears would cease,
If this fair court would let me bring

A churchly bill of peace.

Then, by these presents, witness yo
I'm éstoppéd to deny
That she's my heart's sole alienee,
And shall be till I die. C. E. S. Wood.

Contentment.

[From a Letter to the N. Y. Tribune.]

OLD Jones he leads a happy life,
He has no care or wedded strife;
He drinks the best of ginger wine.
I wish old Jones' lot were mine.
And yet he is not happy quite,
The gout it makes him swear outright:
The rheumatism racks his bones.
I think I'd rather not be Jones.
Young Johnson better pleases me;
He's in the best society;
Has lords and ladies at command.
In Johnson's boots I'd rather stand.
And yet I'm very much afraid
For those same boots he's never paid;
He's always out lest duns should call.
I'd not be Johnson after all.
Then here I'll rest, nor rashly go,
But live and die in Pimlico;
At home I'll drink my ginger wine,
And go when I'm asked out to dine.
And as I drink my ginger wine,
I'll think that I with Jones do dine;
And when invited out to tea,
I'll fancy I young Johnson be.

BY-WAYS OF UTAH.

OLD MILL, AMERICAN FORK CANYON.

"The earth was made so various that the mind
Of desultory man, studious of change,
And pleased with novelty, might be indulged.
Prospects, however lovely, may be seen
Till half their beauties fade; the weary sight,
Too well acquainted with their smiles, slides off
Fastidious, seeking less familiar scenes."—Cowper.

UTAH, with its eighty-five thousand square miles of territory, has been less explored and less understood than almost any other section of our great West. Hampered as many have thought by Mormonism, the question was asked for a long time: "What good can come of the country?" and no one seemed to be able to furnish a satisfactory answer. The fact that there were fertile valleys, fresh streams of water, large tracts of grazing land, rich deposits of gold, silver, copper and coal, was lost sight of.

Men seemed only to think that Utah was a territory situated in the midst of vast deserts, and that it consisted of high, snow-capped mountains, extended alkali deserts, salt seas and uninhabited arid plains. Even when the transcontinental railway was built, the road hardly touched Utah, and the country for years after remained unknown, unexplored by sight-seer or prospector, and was even thought so neglected and isolated from the rest of the world that the Mormons, in making it their home, expected to remain there undisturbed for all time. But Father Time—remorseless destroyer of present things, and who obliterates past facts—has not remained idle. The Mormons had no sooner erected their city, cultivated their valleys, opened the mines, stocked the pastures and built their roads, than another people, with religious ideas antagonistic to those of Brigham Young, began to press over the high barriers which had thus far kept Utah secluded, and have continued to gain in numbers and influence until at the present time the territory is largely settled by Gentiles, and Utah is on the verge of a new life. Railways are constructed rapidly, new mines are daily opened, the output of the country is increasing, new towns have been built, and the great outside world has ceased to ask what good, but rather to say how much good, may come out of Utah.

would see Ogden and Salt Lake City, the great mysterious Salt Lake, and isolated peaks "striking up the azure" with their pointed cones of ice and snow. Far to the south the valleys would be seen to merge into deep cañons, with huge rocks of vari-colored hues, down which hissing, troubled streams roar and run swift races. The eye would see changes in every direction—now a vale, now a forest; here a lake, and again rounded hills and well-stocked fields. There would be Arctic regions and others like Italy; great banks of snow and bright green pastures. In fact, from an elevation commanding all Utah, it would be seen at once that the country is singularly varied; grand, and yet beautiful; rugged, yet subdued; arid, and yet fertile; a network of mountains, valleys, plains and parks, from over and among which run or nestle clear streams, wide rivers and picturesque lakes. The air would vibrate, too, with the hum of industry; the puff of the locomotive

PELICAN POINT, UTAH LAKE.

Nor is it strange that this change in the condition of things has occurred. The territory is immensely rich, has a most beautiful and varied topography, and a climate which is delightful. The Wasatch Mountains divide it into two nearly equal parts, and, with ranges of lesser height, form sheltered valleys, which are as productive as any in the world. If one were elevated above the country in a balloon, he would look down upon a varied scene. Extending north and south, with wooded slopes, high, snow-capped summits, and inclosing miniature lakes, valleys and forest-girded parks, would be seen the Wasatch range; east of it, vast, treeless, arid and neglected, would appear the desert lands which, during the coming year, will be crossed by a railway traversing their weary lengths; and westward—a bright spot in the view—Salt Lake and Utah Valleys would meet the gaze, lying like jewels between vast mountains, watered by lakes and threads of silvery streams, and cultivated until hardly a foot of ground remains without its waving grain and patches of garden produce. In the north of the territory, too, one tive would be heard as it penetrated the wild gorges of the mountains or toiled in the valleys; the factories and smelting works would break the stillness with their busy activity, and in the higher fastnesses men would be seen at work digging precious treasures from their long seclusion.

There were two of us who had arrived in Utah to see its sights, study its life, and, as we soon discovered, to enjoy its beauties. The artist came to sketch, and after he had covered his tablets with views of mountain-surrounded Ogden, we moved southward to Salt Lake City. The road between the two cities follows the shores of the Salt Lake. This sleepy body of water always seems like the glazed eye of some disappointed giant chafing at his involuntary confinement. East of it, and indeed bounding it on nearly all sides, are high mountains, those nearest us having snowy summits and wooded sides, while the others are veiled by a thin haze, which hides their outlines and softens them into a complete whole of great beauty.

"I wonder—" said the artist, half to himself.

"What?" said I.

"Nothing," he answered. And then: "But, do you know, this lake haunts me. It seems entirely unnatural and strange. Look at these islands of black rock, now. There isn't a bit of foliage on them, nor on the larger ones; and the water of the lake isn't over twenty feet deep. Now there's water enough runs into this basin, but there's no outlet. Evaporation? Yes, but with the salt in the water, and the clear days of Utah, evaporation can't keep the depth as it is. I think there are great outlets somewhere, and that this is an arm of the sea. Anyway, I wish it would wake up; it bothers me."

"Don't look at it, then," I suggested, but he did not hear. His gaze rested as though riveted on the sullen, unbroken, glassy surface. The lake was dull-hued, and no boats with white sails dotted its surface. To our left rose the mountains, their tops suffused with prismatic rays of the setting sun—gay, happy, smiling; but the grim waters gave no answering glance. The corn-fields kissed its shores; trim houses flirted with it, a thousand shades tempted it to speak; but, silent, cold, listless, it stretched long arms around its rocky islands, and heeded nothing in the world without.

Salt Lake City lies at the upper or northern end of a valley of the same name, and occupies a portion of the sloping "bench," or mesa, which runs toward the mountains from the shores of the lake. Back of the town rises the Wasatch range, broken here into many sized cones and deep, verdant cañons. Beyond the valley are the indistinct outlines of more mountains, while to the west rises the sloping, wood-covered Oquirrh range, ending abruptly in the north at the shores of the lake. The city itself is a place of wide streets, well-built houses, shade trees, trim gardens, and long avenues. The public buildings are mostly owned by the Mormons, and add much to the beauty of the town. As we rode from the depot to the hotel the artist said the streets made him think of Paris, they were so wide and shaded, and down their either side flowed a tiny stream of water, which swept away every trace of rubbish. Indeed, Young and his followers must have had an unusual amount of good taste. Not only did they select as a site for their city a mesa which commands an extended view, but they planned that all streets should run at right angles to one another; and, consequently, there are formed all over the city squares of green sward filled with trees, private dwellings and stores. This regularity of design is noticed at the very first. Everything is free, wide, light and open. "I don't believe," said the artist, "you can find a dark spot in Salt Lake." And after our visit was over I fully agreed with him. The sun has unlimited freedom, and its warm rays are never excluded by high walls or narrow ways.

"Salt Lake is a New England village, with foreign plans, moved out West," said the artist.

"Or a modern Edinburgh," I suggested.

"Yes; and yet, after all, it is simply Salt Lake, and a remarkably pretty town with characteristics all its own."

And that was it; we compared it to many places, and were reminded of this or that city, but, after all, there remained the fact that nothing we had ever seen before was exactly like it. There was Arcadian simplicity, but nothing was commonplace. The public buildings, the stores, the homes, all had a peculiar beauty of their own. They were light-colored, clean, pretty. No grim stains of smoke had soiled, no dull hues surrounded them. The houses had an air of solid comfort, and whether occupied by Mormon or Gentile, had bright flower-beds, green lawns and scores of trees about them. Nothing seemed new or crude or "Western;" and the longer we stayed the better pleased we were with the Mormon capital and its easy-going life.

The square inclosing the unfinished Temple, the Tabernacle and the small temple, is the Mecca for all visitors at Salt Lake. It is the centre of Mormonism. Here the marriages are performed, the sermons preached, and the converts instructed. The Temple is of granite, solid, massive, graceful and substantial. For thirty years the work has been going on; and fifteen more must elapse before the building is finished. "By which time," suggested the artist, "the Mormon Temple may become a Gentile state-house;" an idea I instantly frowned down, as it was apt to inaugurate a discussion of the Mormon question, and that I determined should be left to the gentlemen at Washington. The Tabernacle is a building capable of seating some sixteen thousand people. Its roof resembles the keel and bottom of a turned-over boat, and is of wood. The interior of the vast structure is void of any ornamentation, is in the form of an ellipse, and the seats are plain wooden benches.

The gallery rests on seventy-two pillars, and extends around three sides of the room, and overlaps a large portion of the main floor. The entire length is two hundred and fifty feet, and the width one hundred and fifty. At the extreme end is the large organ, and in front of that three raised desks for the various dignitaries, and a long desk for the chief speaker or preacher or saint. The baptismal font, of carved stone, occupies the centre of the interior. The walls are of a glaring white, and twenty doors allow an audience of sixteen thousand to leave the room in a few minutes. The acoustic properties are perfect. Standing at one end of the gallery a pin can be heard to drop at the other end, and the voice thrown from near the organ is distinctly heard over the whole interior.

Opposite the square is the "Tithing-Yard," a walled inclosure, which looks like a farm-yard, and in which every good Mormon deposits a tenth of all his produce for the benefit of the church. Not far from this place are the houses Brigham Young used to occupy, known very chimneys and upon the flat roofs of the houses, lay the city, its busy hum of life creeping faintly to our ears, and all its gardens, trees and lawns revealed. To the right, ten miles or more away, and nestling in the arms of blue-tinted mountains, lay the lake, silent, calm, and heedless of the beauty in which it lived; to the left, and pressing their huge masses upon the valley, rose as the "Bee-Hive" and "Lion House." They show their age a little now, and some of the window-sills are sadly in need of new paint. Tall trees surround these farm-like houses, and the garden-walls are backed with rank shrubs. We never saw much life or many signs of activity of any description around Temple Square or at the Bee-Hive; but the artist, bachelor as he is, insisted that a dozen faces of fair females watched our movements from out the small window-panes of the former home of a wonderfully strong-minded man. Be this as it may, I know we wandered into every nook and corner unchallenged, politely answered, kindly received. And after we had examined to our heart's content, the strange religion which sanctions so many wives to one man seemed as unreal to us as before we came to Salt Lake.

Of all the drives and rambles about the city and its surroundings, the one the artist enjoyed most was the climb to Ensign Peak. We had explored the cañons of the Wasatch, where we found cool shades, rich verdure, sparkling streams and beauty unadulterated, and had passed many a quiet hour at Fort Douglas listening to the music, and feasting our eyes with the wealth of scenery spread out at our feet, when one day somebody told us to go to Ensign Mountain. This sharp cone, with bare brown sides and a rocky crown, rises directly behind the city, and early in the morning throws its shadow over the quiet place. After panting and struggling up to the very top, catching a wider and grander view each step of the way, the artist, always impressible, but now justly delighted, seated himself upon a rugged boulder, and for a few minutes indulged in all the adjectives at his command.

"Do you like the picture?" I asked.

"It is superb, unequalled!" he said, and again lapsed into silent admiration.

And truly the scene was one to be long remembered. At our very feet, and so near that we could look into its the Wasatch peaks, grand, stately and deeply torn by cañons and narrow gorges. The lower slopes were richly covered with dark forests, but higher up the summits had banks of snow, which gleamed under the bright rays of the sun. Westward, and extending for sixty miles, were the valleys of Salt Lake and of Utah Lake, dim and haze-obscured. At their extreme, and where

"Some blue peaks in the distance rose,
And white against the cold white sky Shone out their covering snows," we caught a glimpse of proud old Nebo—grandest, highest, coldest of all the Wasatch heights. Above us arched the sky, blue, vast, and only dotted here and there by fleecy clouds, which threw upon the country below us irregular patches of light and shade. Mountain, meadow, brook and lake greeted us on every side. The valleys were green and fertile, while over all their wide expanse farm joined farm, and deep rich colors were formed by the gardens and fields of waving grain. Within the mountain-guarded region Evangeline might have lived. It would have satisfied her quiet heart, for "Half-drowned in sleepy peace it lay,

As satiate with the boundless play
Of sunshine in its green array."

The lakes which dotted and the stream which watered it shone like purest crystals, or seemed like threads of silver, while to the east and on the west the "clear-cut hills" of blue stood like huge protectors riveted to their places by the beauty of the scene. The artist sketched, but worked in vain to reproduce the picture; and at last, gazing down the shadowed vale, began to quote:

"But who can paint
Like Nature? Can imagination boast,
Amid its gray creation, hues like hers?"

And then, as the soft shades of evening began to creep over the snowy heights around us, we wandered down the mountain-side, silenced by the beauties we had seen.

But no one ever visits Utah and remains for any length of time without taking more or less interest in mines and mining. One may as well visit London and not go to the Tower as to leave out Alta, Bingham and 'Frisco when sojourning in Mormondom. I had impressed this fact upon my friend, who otherwise could have passed the remainder of his days in Salt Lake City, and we agreed at last to go to Alta. Leaving town early one morning, we boarded the Denver and Rio Grande train, and were soon gliding swiftly down Salt Lake Valley to a place called Bingham Junction, where a change of cars is made for Alta and Bingham, two small but important mining towns lying respectively in the Wasatch and Oquirrh ranges.

The valley itself, down whose very centre the railway led us, is Utah's garden. Farms, orchards and meadows greeted us on every side. Hay is raised in large quantities, and we passed many stacks of the fragrant fodder standing in the midst of fields of yellow stubble which the mowers had left. To the east, and rising first into low foot-hills, and later into massive peaks, were the Wasatch Mountains; while westward, and extending in a long but broken line far toward the south, rose the Oquirrh's rounded ridges, in which were shaded cañons, and under which nestled little villages. The day was warm and clear, and so extended was our range of vision that snow-peaks a hundred miles away from us shone resplendent in the sunlight. The gardens, the green-leaved trees, the piles of mellow fruits, and the long patches of stubble gave an unlimited wealth of coloring; while the river Jordan, which we followed, wound in serpentine coils down the rich and cultivated region.

At the Junction we turned abruptly eastward, and soon began to scale a succession of low, sage-covered mesas, the way rapidly leading us into the mountains, and giving us every minute a better view of the valley, Salt Lake and the distant city. Soon, however, we ran in between two high headlands covered with trees and bushes, and a moment later were toiling up the narrow and ever-changing Little Cottonwood cañon. The mountain shut us in on every side. A bright stream of pure water ran beside us; there was a rich growth of brush clinging to the high and granite-strewn cliffs, but only by stretching our heads out of the car-window could the sky above be seen. At Wasatch, a few miles up the cañon, the railway ends, and the remainder of the distance to Alta is made by a tramway drawn by a tandem of mules. Stepping from the car into the small sled-like contrivance we began the steep ascent. The driver touched his leader with no gentle hand; we clung firmly to our frail seats, and soon were far up the narrow cañon, and skirting the steep sides of the cliffs. The higher we rode the steeper the way became, until the valley lay far beneath us, and its shrubbery, stream and half-concealed rocks were blended into an indistinct and vari-colored mass.

"A wonderful place for snow-slides, this," said the driver at my side, just as we came to a very narrow part of the road.

"Indeed?" I answered, not particularly interested just then in anything but the view we had of distant peaks and deep, dark gorges.

"Yes," continued the knowing one; "the snow drifts here from ten to forty feet deep, leaving the largest trees looking like shrubs. It's all right while the cold lasts, but when it begins to grow warm, look out for slides! Avalanches of a hundred acres have come down these slopes, crushing everything before them. One swept over Alta a few years ago, and six persons were killed, and as many more buried. A half-dozen men were buried in one gulch a thousand feet under packed ice and snow, and, when found in June, their bodies were as fresh and fair as if they had just ceased to breathe. I admire a grand view, but I don't want it from Alta in winter time."

And neither do I, for when we reached the little town—if you can call a collection of a few houses a town—it seemed situated so as to tempt all slides to destroy it. High mountains rose about the place, and the rude houses were perched upon such steep hill-sides that I wondered they did not fall down into the valley below. How cold it was, too! It seemed as though we had stepped into winter days, and when the driver said "All aboard!" we gladly turned from Alta and began our downward journey.

If we had crawled up to Alta, we flew down from it. The mules had been unhitched, and now our car began its nine-mile slide alone. The grade must have been fully two hundred feet to the mile, and every moment our speed increased, until we were absolutely flying down the narrow path. At our left the valley sank away for five hundred feet or more; but on our right the rocky, shrub-lined cliffs rose to unseen heights. We glided through long snow-sheds, whirled about sharp corners, danced over frail trestle-works, and, with swimming eyes and beating pulses, found ourselves at last safely at our journey's end.

"A good place to see—once," said he of the brush; but I say a good place to see many times—in summer—if only to have the excitement of the homeward slide.

boldly into Spanish Fork Cañon, which leads over the range into Eastern Utah and to Colorado.

Just before we lost sight of the town, we gained a view of Utah Basin. It lay spread out below us in all its length and breadth. High mountains grouped themselves in irregular heights about it. Far to the north,

THE BOOK CLIFFS.

Opposite Alta, but across Salt Lake Valley and in a little nook of the Oquirrh range, is Bingham, a mining camp, which is shut in by high hills, where incessant stamp-mill noises confuse the unaccustomed senses. We ran up there for a day, and saw the yellow earth give up its golden treasures, and how men worked in the big black tunnels they had dug under the massive mountains. After that we wandered among the farms down in the lower country, and explored the varied attractions of the adjoining regions. At length, growing tired of such scenes, we held a consultation as to our future course, and decided upon visiting Eastern Utah.

"Now, Central Utah I can find out about by asking," said the artist; "but not yet have I found a man who can tell me what sort of country lies over the range. I am for seeing it, dry and wild though it may be."

And what he wanted I agreed to. It saved a great deal of trouble—this readily agreeing trait of mine—and starting once more from Salt Lake City we ran down the valley, through the Narrows, separating Utah from Salt Lake basin, and at Provo made our first halt. This little Mormon town, shaded by countless trees and protected by the Wasatch Mountains, overlooks Utah Lake. It is the summer-resort of the territory. Rich farm-lands stretch away from it in nearly every direction; the accommodations are excellent and the views magnificent. Leaving it on our left, and after we had followed the lake-shore a few miles, the road—the Denver and Rio Grande, by the way—turned sharply toward the east, climbed a few sloping mesas, and then struck and where the two ranges, the Wasatch and the Oquirrh, seemed to meet, stood Salt Lake City, dim and half-obscured by the distance. Opposite it we saw the lake itself, vast, dull-hued and motionless. Looking toward the south, the country appeared still more broken and uneven. Beyond the lake and with their lower slopes wrapped in delicate folds of blue haze, rose snow-tipped peaks, captained by Nebo Mountain. At our feet, and in the midst of softly-colored fields, lay the lake.

—"Where the stars and mountains view
The stillness of their aspect in each trace
Its clear depths yield of their far height and hue."

The sandy shores were lapped by gentle waves; birds skurried the mirror surface, and in the waters were reflected fleecy clouds, the deep blue sky, and the vast array of many-shaped mountains which surrounded it. The landscape was as gentle as that which Scotland offers—fresh, fair, grand and beautiful; a pastoral scene, where cattle fed and green trees waved over fields of gold-hued produce. A thousand changing lights fell on the mountain-sides; light clouds coquetted with their jagged peaks; and, isolated from the world, a picture in itself, the fertile valley faded from our sight as we onward pressed again to new and stranger scenes.

To get "over the Wasatch Mountains" was a much more difficult undertaking a few years ago than it is now. To-day the railway has scaled the lofty heights of the range, and, disregarding all obstacles, has reached the eastern portion of the territory beyond. We followed at first a succession of picturesque cañons, where the foliage was abundant and pretty streams ran beside us. The cliffs, never high, were of red or white sandstone, cut into curious shapes and fringed with tall pines or half-concealed with clinging vines. Wherever a bend in the streams had made a meadow, we saw cattle feeding or came across small farms. In places there were narrow vales extending to our right and left, up whose tree-lined lengths we caught sight of snowy mountains in the distance. And, again, there would be miniature Niagaras leaping over the cliffs and falling in silvered spray into the stream below. At one place, the "Red Narrows" by name, the rocks are of a bright red, set off by green shrubs; and at another point are the "White Narrows," where the rocks are of a light gray tint. It seems at times as though the cañons had no outlet, so closely are they hemmed in by the mountains; and yet, by making sharp and frequent turns, the road escapes all hindrances, and in time gains the Soldiers' Divide, nearly eight thousand feet above sea-level, which leads to Price River Cañon, on the east side of the range.

Price River Cañon runs through a hunters' paradise. It is a deep, wild, rock-strewn, brush-grown gorge, and is watered by a stream which leaps over fallen rocks and swings around sharp headlands in deep masses of foam. The country away from the cañon consists of dense forests and grassy parks, where deer, bear, wolf and elk are found in great abundance. There are fresh, clear streams, too, in which are fish enough to keep an angler busy for many a day. In fact the top of the Wasatch range is as good a wilderness and is as well stocked as the lover of nature or the enthusiastic hunter

As we drew gradually nearer the foot of the mountains the cañon became deeper and more rugged. On the one side there were heavily-wooded and rounded foot-hills; but on the other the cliffs ended abruptly in long lines of palisade-like formations of red or yellow-colored sandstone. Now a rock resembled a huge castle, with rampart, tower, moat and loop-holes; and, anon, takes the shape of massive chimneys and strange heads. Scattered about in wild confusion at the base of the cliffs were giant boulders, which the frosts of winter had sent rolling from their former beds into the abyss below; and everywhere there was a rank growth of low bushes and graceful pines and cedars. But little sunshine falls into the gorge, and that which does reach there comes in broken and uneven patches through the abundant foliage.

We had nearly reached level ground again, and were following the line of the rugged cliffs into open country, when we came suddenly around a projecting mountain and in sight of Castle Gate. This natural wonder is the gateway through which Sydney Johnson's army marched on their way East, and beneath the frowning ports every one must pass who goes into or comes out of the range. The two pillars of roughly-hewn rock are nearly five hundred feet high, and are offshoots of the cliffs behind them. They resemble the bows of two immense ships about to rush against one another with mutually destructive results, and are so high and steep that no one has yet climbed them. Their crests are bare, weather-beaten and desolate, but their bases are half-concealed by low-growing shrubs and wind-swept cedars. Between the pillars run the could wish to see. Tall, gaunt trees, fallen and half decayed, upright and strong, or pushed by fierce winds against their fellows meet the eye at every turn; there are dark recesses, tumbling cascades, sweet-smelling breezes, and solitudes which speak to the imagination and fascinate the beholder.

river and the railroad, and as we stole slowly through the narrow way, past the red-hued heights, which, the scene was wild, strange, and yet full of picturesqueness. The tremendous pillars were so tall that the sunlight touched their foreheads and threw long shadows on the cliffs behind, but lower down the shade was unrelieved of its grim darkness. Silence, broken only by the noise the river made, held the region captive. Looking back the way we had come, appeared the dark mass of the mountains, and eastward long lines of vari-a rude camp had been erected to accommodate the track-layers and graders. There was one large tent for eating, another for cooking, and several for the men and contractors to sleep in. Scores of horses and mules were tethered before long feed troughs. The train we were on brought rails, ties, hay, and a miscella-colored and curiously-shaped bluffs of crumbling sandstone faded out of sight down Castle Valley. We were over the Wasatch barriers. Before us lay Eastern Utah, and as we moved onward even the low foot-hills of the main range sank gradually into insignificant mounds of sand; vegetation, foliage and all the freshness we had been enjoying became things of the past. We were in a sea of dull-hued earth, and, when once fully upon its lonely wastes, we ceased to wonder that so few had been able to tell us of the region or had been unable to describe its utter loneliness.

Eastern Utah extends from the Wasatch Mountains to the western limits of Colorado. The region embraces an area which measures some two hundred miles across, and which is twice that number of miles long. In it there are no towns, no farms, no fresh tracts of any description. It is an arid desert, with sage-brush and sand-dunes, rolling mesas and long stretches of bare, bleak wastes. The climate is mild. By spring the Denver and Rio Grande Railway will have pushed across it, rendering the region easy of access. The adjacent mountains have mineral and coal; the soil, if irrigated, is capable of production, and in time the country may be reclaimed. Down one portion of it flows Price River, and across another runs the Green, while in the east are the Grand and Rio Dolores, and in the southeast the Rio Colorado.

At the present time, however, as I have hinted, there is no civilization, and nothing has been done toward reclaiming the sea-like district. We escaped from Castle Gate and the Castle Valley only to find that the railway track ended a short distance beyond. At the terminus neous mass of goods. Far ahead of the camp we could see the long line of embankment which the graders had made, and the track was being laid at the rate of a mile a day. It was warm and pleasant in the valley. On either side were low ranges of hills, bare, dull-colored, dry and irregular. The dust was suffocating. A too sudden putting down of the foot raised a dense cloud of it. The tents, men, horses, and in fact all things about us, were white with the thick sediment. It was an active place, a scene of unusual life and movement.

"Shall we go on?" asked the artist, looking toward the desert which stretched before us. "Shall we hire a team and drive to the Colorado end of the railway extension, or go back to Salt Lake?"

"I am for going on," I answered. "I should like a few days in the desert. How long will it take us to reach Colorado?"

"Four or five days."

"Then I would rather try it."

And an hour later there was brought up before the tent in which we were lounging the "outfit" which we were to live by, or in, for the next four days, and until we had crossed nearly two hundred miles of dry, hot sand. The team consisted of a buckboard, a driver and a pair of very diminutive but very long-eared mules. The driver's name was "Owen;" but Owen what, we failed to discover. After strapping our bags to the wagon, and taking leave of our new-found friends, we were off, jolting, dust-obscured, crawling at a slow pace through the deep layers of powdered dust.

Traveling in a desert behind a pair of mules is fun at first, monotonous after a day; tiresome after two days, and torture ever afterward. Fifty miles a day seems a short distance to make, but when you are bounced fully twenty miles in addition by the dust-covered stones in the way, the work of that twelve or thirteen hours is quite sufficient. I am of light weight, and the ruts and stones we went over kept me continually bobbing up and down, until every bone in my body ached; and as for the artist, he had despair written all over his face. Owen alone remained calm and indifferent. He spoke but rarely, flourished his whip continually, and got fully ten miles in two hours out of his mild-eyed animals. The dust was friendly; it was inclined to be extremely sociable. When we left camp we looked like ordinary travelers, but an hour later were as white as millers. Eyes, hair, clothes and satchels were pelted and powdered with the too friendly stuff. We brushed ourselves and fretted at first, but soon yielded to the inevitable, and prepared to see whatever there was around us.

And yet there was not much variety. The first day we drove along Price River, or rather a few miles north of where it ran. The farther we penetrated the desert the lower the hills on either side of us became, and when we camped at night in an engineer's tent, in a grove of cottonwoods, there was nothing but a vast plain before and behind us, and only a long line of cliffs on the left, which Owen said were known as the "Book Cliffs," and would follow us clear to Colorado.

Had we not been so thoroughly tired, I am sure we should have objected to the accommodations offered us; but, worn out as we were, the ground floor of a tent was most acceptable. After a hearty supper in the camp, we rolled ourselves up in the blankets we had brought, and with a pile of sand for a pillow, were soon in the land of slumber.

These camps (the fact may be stated here) were the only lodging-places which the desert provided for us during our entire journey. The chief engineer has one tent, and his assistants usually occupy three or four others, while cooking and eating takes place in another. The interiors are bare of everything except what is really necessary. The chief has a long table, a few books, some instruments, and a soft spot in a corner for his blankets. The assistants simply have their stove, and sleep in blankets on the ground. Sometimes the various tents are arranged with military precision, but usually are pitched in wild confusion; but, humble as these shelters are, I defy one to approach them late in the evening, after a hard day's drive, and not consider them the most inviting places he ever saw. There is usually a bright camp-fire burning, throwing a ruddy light upon the scene, and as the visitor approaches the dogs bark and a tent-flap is raised to allow a head to stick out, and a voice to bid the stranger welcome. After eating, we invariably grouped about the open fire with our host, smoked our pipes, and listened to the hoarse winds which blew across the desert spot. All was new, strange and odd, but yet warm and comfortable, and as snug a resting-place as one could wish.

Bright and early the next day, and while the air was still crisp and cold, we were off again. All the second day we toiled over a veritable desert. To the north ran the "Book Cliffs," and late in the day appeared the dim, red-colored, jagged outlines of the San Rafael range far away to the southward. No trees were to be seen, no birds, no patches of green grass. Everything was flat, dry and sandy. Only a few tufts of greasewood or sage relieved the dull monotony of the view.

"No," said Owen, "there ain't much variety, an' that's a fact; an' yet, let the wind blow pretty hard, as it does often, an' you'll get up a change pretty sudden."

"How is that?" we asked.

"Wal, you see, when the wind sweeps over there right smart it just makes a powerful lot o' dust and sand fly, an' it's all a man wants to do to face a dry storm like that. Yes, sir; these mounds here are made by the wind, an' all this sand keeps changing so the place looks different every time I see it."

And then he told us a few facts more. Near the base of the cliffs there is some grazing-land of sweet short grasses, which the cattle of the region live on. In the San Rafael range mineral has been found, and there are huge rocks and cañons, which serve as hiding-places for the cattle-thieves who sometimes infest the country. Water is scarce, but the few wells which have been dug have struck it at a slight depth. Price River leaves the desert and runs through Box Cañon, in the Book Cliffs, until it reaches the Green. The winters are mild, the summers hot. The earth is usually caked and hard, but where broken by freight-teams is soft and dusty. There is little or no rainfall, and no attempt has yet been made to cultivate the soil.

As the day advanced we gained a better view of the San Rafael range. It stretched before us for fifty miles or more, and faded away at last in a dim blue distance. The Book Cliffs, high, knife-like, and colored by seams of shale, continued at our side. At times these were like massive cottages, and huge chimneys were formed by isolated portions, but usually the fronts were steep and unbroken, and not a sign of verdure could be seen. Around us stretched the level plain, dull and barren, and with only low sand-dunes to break the outline. In such a region the quiet and stillness became at times oppressive. Our voices grew hushed in sympathy, and for hours we drove slowly and silently along our way. Now and then we frightened up a flock of small birds which exactly resemble the sand-birds along the sea-coast, and anon a buzzard sailed solemnly over our heads. It seemed as though nature, prodigal elsewhere of her gifts, had neglected this portion of the world, so bereft was it of every trace of beauty.

The afternoon of the second day brought us to Green

"How far is the Rio Colorado Cañon from here?" we inquired.

"Can't say, exactly," he answered. "Don't know none here as ever got there. Do you see them rocks," pointing to a wild confusion of red-tinged boulders piled up in the near distance in the south. "Well, all the country below here is like that, an' 'twould take pretty hard work to get through to the Colorado. Pretty rough country, mister, and don't you forgit it!"

A little beyond the Green we came to a mesa which stretched across our path. Climbing it, there was obtained a view such as we had not enjoyed since we stood on Ensign Peak. All day we had obtained unsatisfactory glimpses of some snow-capped peaks extending in broken masses across the plains, and Owen had said they were of the Sierra La Salle range. He, however, had cautioned us to waste no enthusiasm, for, as he said, "You can't see 'em good now, but after passing Green River I can give you a good look at 'em." And

CAMPED IN THE DESERT.

River. Rounding a high point of the cliffs we saw the stream glistening in the sunlight, and winding down a sandy valley. A fringe of cottonwood trees attracted our notice first, and hours of steady travel elapsed before we reached the river itself. Driving down the sloping banks, and fording the clear but shallow waters, we came to the first settlement of any description we had yet seen. It boasted the name of Green River City, and consisted of three or four rough, log-built cabins, with the words "Saloon" and "Restaurant" conspicuously displayed on soiled canvas over the doorways. In front of the primitive shops were congregated a few ill-dressed, rough and greasy-looking men, who live by supplying passing freighters with "forty-rod whisky" and vile-tasting cigars. Before the "town" ran the river, coming out of a cañon in the cliffs, and entering another soon after. It was down the Green and through its cañons that Major Powell passed on his way to the Rio Colorado, though, as an old fellow said to us, "he didn't believe Powell ever made that trip, 'cause he'd tried it, and couldn't noways near get through the gorge."

"Is it a deep cañon?" we asked.

"Deep!" he echoed; "deep! Well, I should say so. An' not only that, but full o' rocks an' whirlpools, an' as dark as night. I tell you, I don't want to try 't again." when we had reached the top of the mesa this mild enthusiast halted his team with, "Now you can see 'em," and bade us look.

Shall we ever forget the sight! Behind us ran the river, the only bright line in the dreary waste. Beyond it stretched the desert. Far in the west the San Rafael range threw out its long, red, broken arm, and where it was obscured by haze some snowy heights appeared in view, mellowed by the distance and soft as the hills of Italy. Before us, twenty miles away, and separated from our mesa by a wide stretch of valley, towered the Sierra La Salle. In the midst of so much low ground the height seemed double what it really was. White banks of snow covered the serrated peaks, and snow-banners blew in veil-like threads far off their sharp points. Lower down the mountain-sides were covered with a thick growth of timber; and lower still appeared huge chimneys, domes and factory-shaped pinnacles of red sandstone. To the left of the range, low, wooded, blue-tinted hills extended to a dim distance, while between them and the La Salle, the deep, red-rocked cañon, worn by the Rio Dolores, opened its wide mouth to us from out the greenness around it. At the end of the intervening valley ran the River Grand, hid from our sight, but with its course marked by twin rows of cottonwoods growing on its banks. At the foot of the main range, so Owen told us, there is a Mormon colony living in what is called "Little Green Valley," where there are fertile fields and rich farms, and a summer climate three-fourths of the year. But the distance to this little oasis was so great that we could discover no trace of civilization there. The valley nearest us appeared smooth and level, but in reality was filled with deep washes, and the dry cracks formed a network over its whole extent.

The La Salle peaks were the most enjoyable feature of the landscape. Every cone differed from its neighbor in size and shape; and yet there was not one which did not have its heavy covering of purest snow. Not a tree, no suggestion of a rock was to be seen among the white pinnacles. Every summit stood boldly out against the deep blue sky like a bit of Arctic grandeur peeping above a virgin forest. From the topmost heights sharp ridges ran into lower depths where the pines grew, and formed deep gorges and dazzling cañons. The towering masses seemed like giants of ice—cold, solitary, powerful, and able to withstand the fiercest storms. There the rays of the early sun were seen, and long after the desert was wrapped in dusky shades they still were bathed in a light which seemed loth to leave them. Fingers of a frozen hand, they pointed ever upward, landmarks for miles and miles of space around them, and speaking of a grand, a beautiful life of stainless purity, which those who gaze at them try at times so hard to live. And then the forests, merged by the distance into compact layers of green, told us of sylvan shades where nature had never been disturbed. Trees fell there, and no eyes, save those of wild animals, saw their death. We looked from a desert to a wilderness; we stood where the earth was dry and parched and saw where waters ran and freshness abounded.

We camped that night near the mesa, and before we slept the moon had risen, and threw its cold, mellow light over the shining peaks. Long, gaunt shadows fell upon the snowy and upon the tree-covered ranges. The wild coyotes of the desert filled the air with their mournful cries. Around us the camp-fires burned briskly, lighting up the feeding mules tethered within their glow. The sky above, clear, vast and arched, was filled with sparkling stars and planets. We were in another world, a foreign region, alone with nature. The wind of night whistled its mournful notes, and, warmly tucked beneath our blankets, we knew that, high on the La Salle peaks, the snows were drifting and wild winter was holding drear carnival.

EDWARDS ROBERTS.

DENCY MERRILL'S WEDDING.

BY MARY ALLEN.

DENCY MERRILL sat on the doorstep of the old log house which was her birthplace, and had been her home for eighteen years, and gazed with a happy face across the "big medder" toward a little clump of trees which intervened between her and a certain little new log house, from which she could faintly hear the sound of a hammer.

This was not the first evening she had thus sat listening to that sound and watching to catch a glimpse of Sam coming down the road whistling a merry tune. It was always the same tune that he whistled, and Dency knew that linked with the melody was a simple rhyme of a happy life, a little home, and a loving wife.

As the first sharp, clear note smote upon her ear she would arise from her seat and go and meet him; and when Sam saw her coming the whistle would die away as the contracted lips expanded into a broad smile. There was never any formal greeting between the two, for Dency Merrill and Sam Wheeler were plain, practical people, whose feelings rarely took the form of words, but manifested themselves chiefly in unromantic deeds.

Dency, especially, was lacking in sentimentality. She was a woman who could mend and make and scrub and bake for the man of her choice; one who would always have the meals served promptly, and keep the house in order; one who would, with untiring zeal and a certain womanly skill, perform all the duties of a nurse in illness, but who would not be apt to sweeten her zeal in serving with many loving phrases or merely tender touches.

"I believe in plain vittles," she used to say. "Pork and beans and good cider vinegar is good enough for me, but them that wants mush and molasses kin have 'em, only they needn't expect 'em where I'm cook."

And Sam expected neither softness nor sweetness in Dency, and he honestly enjoyed and appreciated the homely sturdiness and piquancy of her character, which the "pork and beans and vinegar" of her simile typified.

The rough, active life of the pioneer does not tend to the especial development of the emotional nature, but rather of a rugged reticence in regard to mere feelings.

"We think as much of our own folks as anybody, but we've no time to palaver," was the general opinion expressed in homely phrase.

Sam Wheeler, absorbed, like every one else, in supplying the inexorable demands of the body, was quite unaware that he possessed a vein of genuine sentiment, and, indeed, would not have understood it had any one suggested the fact to him; but he did understand the happy light that shone in Dency's eyes as she came to meet him on this bright afternoon, and he understood by the sweet thrill that stirred his heart when their eyes met, that she was dearer to him than aught else in the world.

His greeting as they met was:

"Wal, Dency, my girl, it's all done, even to the button on the back door. I've put up a corner-cubberd fur ye, 'n' made a swing-shelf down suller. I've sot up the stove in the 'lean-to,' 'n' I've swept out 'the room' and got it all ready fur ye to go to work to-morrer. I reckon you hain't been idle to-day, nuther."

"Wal, I just hain't. Ef I hain't flew around to-day there's no use a-talkin'. Ma's been as cross as two sticks, but she hain't set down all day; 'n' Elsie, too, she's worked like a nailer. We've got two dozen punkin' an' two dozen mince pies baked, 'n' a heap o' johnny-cake, a bushel-basket o' doughnuts—you won't forget the cider, will ye?—'n' we've biled a ham, 'n' we got sassage, dried beef, pickles, 'n' a splendid m'lasses cake that's as nice as a fruit cake. It's got dried apples stewed in m'llasses and cut up fine into it. M'lindy Bailey showed me how to make it; she learned when she went to Tadmire to her cousin's weddin'. Ma made a one-two-three-four cake, and as fur bread, I reckon we've bread enough ef the whole 'Six-Mile Woods' had been bid to the weddin'. M'lissy Jones is comin' over to cook the meat and pertaters to-morrer afternoon. I only hope 'twon't rain."

Sam had listened to all these details with profound interest; it was evident that they were of moment to him.

"How early ye goin' over to-morrer?" he asked.

"Oh, I'll be there afore you. There's a heap o' work to do over there. I'll have to be stirrin' by sun-up. I'll bring a snack, so we won't have to take time to come hum to dinner. Hain't you comin' in?"

"Shan't have time to-night, Dence. Got some settlin' up to do with the old man."

Dency laughed.

"Comes putty hard on our folks—your'n 'n' mine—losin' their best han's just 'fore harvest. Wal, I reckon when we're a livin' over there," pointing toward the grove, "they'll think a heap more on us than they ever hev, even ef we allers have stayed to hum and slaved fur 'em fur nothin'. Ma don't set no great store by me, but she'll miss me when it comes to cookin' fur harvest han's, I kin tell ye. But pa, now, I think he 'preciates what I do, and I'm glad we hain't goin' so fur away but what we kin see him real often."

Sam had a dim comprehension of the fact that it is no light thing for a girl to leave her home and parents forever, even to go with the man of her choice, and work with him in the founding of a new home; and there was a touch of deep feeling in his voice as, laying one hand upon Dency's shoulder, he said:

"Wal, Dence, to-morrer at this time we'll be a livin' over there in our own home, 'n' your father 'n' mother'll allus be welcome there. An' Dency, I've allus said that ef I ever had a woman I'd be good to her, 'n' I mean ter be a good husband to ye."

Dency's practical little heart was touched; but, true to her creed, she replied rather abruptly:

"O' course ye will, Sam. Ef I didn't know that I wouldn't hev ye. I hain't a bit afeared but what you'll be as good a husband as I will a wife, any day. I hain't no angel, 'n' I don't pretend to be. I expect to make ye stan' 'roun', Sam."

Sam laughed as if he fancied he should enjoy being made to "stan' 'roun'" by her, and, with a "Wal, I'll risk it," he went down the road whistling his favorite air, while Dency entered the house.

She found her mother "flyin' 'roun' like a hen with her head cut off," as she expressed it, getting supper for "the hands," assisted by a lazily-moving girl of about fifteen, who immediately sat down when she saw Dency come in.

"Now you Elsie," screamed Mrs. Merrill from the pantry, "you git right up 'n' finish settin' that table, 'n' Dency can fry the ham. Here we've been a-cookin' all day, and hain't got nothin' to eat after all. I'll be glad when this pesky weddin's over, and we kin have a little peace and quietness onct more. You'd think, pa, to see the way Dency's been a-fussin' all day, that she 'spected the folks was a-comin' to her weddin' in a starvin' condition fur want of food. Why, if we'd a quarter 'f an army to feed, as they used to in Revolutionary times, we'd hev orations enough fur 'em; but it allus puzzles me why they didn't divide 'em 'roun' more evenly. A quarter 'f an army to a family! There ain't much equillery-bim to that."

Mrs. Merrill, as you will perceive, was not an educated woman, but she was Eastern-born, and had emigrated to the West in her early girlhood, so that she had had better opportunities than many of her neighbors, and had been a reader of a variety of books, and therefore imagined herself quite a literary woman.

Farmer Merrill, a rough old man, without an atom of pretension, generally laughed at his wife's attempts to "show off afore folks," but said nothing. At this time he turned to Dency, who was moving about at her work in a manner which showed that she was a little irritated.

"Wal, Dence," said he, "a gal never has a weddin' but onct, do they?"

"Yes, they do, pa," interrupted Elsie. "Folks sometimes gits married more 'n once."

"A gal don't," said her father jocosely. "There's never but one weddin' fur a gal, 'n' I don't blame her fur wantin' a tip-top out-'n'-out rip-snorter, I don't."

Dency gave her father a grateful look, and announced that supper was ready.

"Do ye need any help to-morrer gittin' things ship-shape?" asked the farmer, as they drew around the table, and the ham and potatoes and johnny-cake began to circulate.

"I reckon we won't need any help, pa. Sam said he'd got the carpenterin' all done."

"Fore I'd go to livin' in a log-cabin," said Elsie in a contemptuous tone, "when everybody now-a-days builds frame-houses!"

"Ye've lived in a log-cabin all your days," said her father sternly, "'n' ef ever you git as likely a feller as Sam Wheeler, I'll be mighty thankful, I kin tell ye. Though," he added as an after-thought, "I'd be sorry fur him."

A general laugh went round the table at poor Elsie's expense, and, with a toss of her head, she replied:

"They hain't any one 'roun' here you'll ever hev a chance to feel sorry fur, I kin tell ye that," and she flouted herself out of the room.

"Now, pa," said Mrs. Merrill, "you're too hard on Elsie. She's as good as Dency any day, but she hain't quite as ambitious, and she takes to books like I used to. She'll be a lady ef she has a chance."

"Hope she'll take herself away from here then," growled the farmer. "I don't want none o' your fine bandbox ladies 'roun' me. I want folks that's got some git-up-and-dust to 'em like Dency—folks that hain't afeared o' silin' their han's with hard work."

"But Elsie hain't well."

"Pshaw! Needn't tell me! An' ef she hain't it's because she don't do nothin'. I'd get peakin' and pinin', too, ef I didn't do no more 'n she does. But there's one good thing—she'll hev to work when Dency's gone."

"Sun-up" the next morning saw Dency, true to her intention, with her lunch-basket on her arm, wending her way to the little new house; but Sam was there before her, and met her at the door with a smile of welcome.

"Didn't believe you'd beat me, Dence. I've got a fire made and water hot fur scrubbin'."

"I allus knowed you was wuth savin', Sam. An' ef you hain't put a roller fur the towel, too! That's real handy."

"Here's a nail fur your bunnet, 'n' the basket kin stand on this shelf. It's a nice, tidy little place, hain't it, Dence?"

"It'll be tidy after I've worked at it a spell," replied Dency, as she took off her sun-bonnet, rolled up her sleeves, and pinned up the skirt of her dress. And then there ensued such a rubbing and a scrubbing as that building never saw before—or after either, for that matter.

Sam was her willing slave. He it was who kept up the fire and brought the water. He nailed up the pretty curtains of striped calico, whereon yellow cupids shot blue arrows from the hearts of gigantic roses at preposterous men and women, and he it was who admired silently the pretty bare feet that pattered about on the wet floor, to "save the shoes," which were resumed when the floor was dry. At noon Dency made coffee, and, spreading a brown table-cloth over the pine table of Sam's own manufacture, laid the simple meal.

"We'll have to set on these hosses," said Sam, bringing in the four-legged wooden steeds to which carpenters give that name.

"All right. We shan't have time to set long. There's a right smart chance o' work to do before two o'clock, fur I'm goin' home then."

"Fur the last time," said Sam, with a grin. "Will you please pass the bread, Mis' Wheeler?"

A bright flush shot over Dency's face, but she saucily replied: "Better not count your chickens 'fore they're hatched. I hain't Mis' Wheeler yit, 'n' ef you hain't keeful maybe I won't never be."

"I'll resk it!"

"You're allus willin' to resk it, but there's sich a thing as reskin' it once too often. Now, lemme see. What's to be done? You've got hosses and boards enough to fix the tables fur supper?"

"I calk'late I have."

"Well, then, there's all the vittles to be brung over 'n' put in the cellar, and cheers to be brung from your home and our 'n' fur the wimmien folks—the men folks kin stand. Then we're to go home and git rigged up, and come back. As the folks come they'll leave their hosses in pa's barn and walk over, 'n' about four o'clock the weddin' 'll take place."

"Glory hallelujah!" shouted Sam, seizing Dency around the waist and giving her a rousing kiss. "There's where the laugh comes in."

"Maybe you'll find it hain't, ef you don't behave yourself and quit puttin' me out so. Then after the weddin' you'll hev to see to the boys gittin' the tables ready and bringin' up the vittles, while the things is cookin'; 'n' I must git the pertaters all ready fur bilin', 'n' the fire laid all ready to kindle. I reckon we kin hev supper ready by six, at the furthest; then we'll give 'em an hour to git their suppers, 'n' an hour to clean up and wash the dishes, so I calk'late we could begin dancin' by eight."

"We'll hev a jolly old house-warmin', won't we Dence? The gals are goin' to help, I s'pose."

"O, yes, M'lissy 'll tend to the cookin', and Becky and Cynthy 'll help me wash the dishes."

"But you're not goin' to wash dishes, Dency, 'n' with your weddin' gown on too!"

"They're my dishes," replied the future Mrs. Wheeler, with decision, "'n' I'm goin' to see that they're washed proper ef I have to do it myself."

"Catch Dency a shirkin'," said Sam admiringly to himself, as his prospective housekeeper went to the door to shake the table cloth.

By two o'clock Dency's plans had been carried out, and she and Sam repaired to their paternal homes, to meet again at the little new house in bridal attire. "Not later than half past three," as Dency said when they parted, "fur we must be here fust, you know, to look after the folks when they come."

"It's an awful clus, muggy day, Dency, 'n' it's sartinly goin' to rain," was Mrs. Merrill's greeting as her daughter entered the house.

"O, ma, you're allus borryin' trouble, I don't believe it 'll rain; ef it does 't'll be only a shower to lay the dust 'n' clear the air."

"Wal, you don't borry trouble," replied Mrs. Wheeler in an aggrieved tone. "You won't even take it when it comes."

"I just won't ef I kin help it," answered the girl as she went up stairs to make her wedding toilet. Mrs. Merrill's prophecy proved true. In less than a quarter of an hour a brisk rain was falling.

"What d'ye think now?" called that lady in a tantalizing tone from the foot of the stairs.

"Jest you wait, ma," floated down the cheery reply. And Dency's prophecy proved also true, for the rain lasted but a short time, and the sun came out clearer, brighter than ever; and the grass and leaves, with bright, clean, sparkling faces, kissed the feet and hands and showered blessings on the head of the happy maiden as she hurried across the "big medder" toward the little new house already so dear to her heart.

As in the morning, Sam met her at the door, with a smile of welcome, but there was a strange embarrassment in their greeting. Sam, no doubt, felt a little awkward and constrained in his new suit, and in truth did not look as graceful and manly as in his everyday homespun; but Dency, like every woman, felt more at ease because of the consciousness that she was well dressed, but for the first time she fully realized that she had reached the last boundary line of girlhood. No wonder that she shrank back a little timidly when she knew that the actual moment of crossing it had come.

Silently she crossed "the room" and busied herself in rearranging the curtains, and silently Sam watched her. He took in every detail; the rounded figure, the pretty green challé dress with its pagoda sleeves, the cherry-colored neck-ribbon, his gift, and the abundant black hair so glossy and smooth, puffed over each ear in the prevailing style; and he thought no one in the world could be as pretty and good as Dency.

At length, going to where she stood gazing out of the window, he seated himself, and drew her down upon his knee. She made no resistance, but fixed her eyes intently upon a short crisp curl just over his left ear, which she twirled around her fingers.

Sam tried to speak, but was surprised that his voice refused to come. "Some pesky thing in my throat chokes me," thought he, as he worked at the stiff collar with his fingers, and after a violent hemming he succeeded in clearing his throat.

"You don't know how proud and happy I am, Dency girl;" (this was his pet name) "proud of you, and proud I've got a little home to bring ye to. 'Tain't what I'd a hed ef I could a hed my wish, but every stroke of work that's been done here has been done with a thought o' you. I said to myself, 'Now Sam, make your work true and honest like your love fur Dency. You know you're true to her from the shaggy outside, clear down to the core,' and I hev done honest work on this house. It 'll stand as long as we live, and we 'll keep it, won't we? No matter how rich we get, or how big a house we may build some day, we 'll allus keep this little caboose, and tack it on to the big house somewheres; and we 'll show it to our children and grand-children as the place where we was first married and went to keepin' house, won't we?"

Dency felt the quick blood leap into her face at his words. She had almost been on the point of crying, but it wouldn't do to be such a goose ; and therefore, to hide her true feeling, and her embarrassment, she answered in a half-tantalizing tone :

"It's a mighty good thing fur yer that you hed the house of you wanted me."

"So," replied Sam, laughingly, "it's the house you 're a marryin', and not the man."

"Jest so," said Dency. "Catch me a marryin' and goin' home to his folkses, like Marthy Wright, and a hev'in' his old mother a standin' over me to watch ef I scraped each plate a hull minute 'fore I put it into the dish-pan. Nor I wouldn't take him home to my folkses, nuther, like Sally Bailey did, 'n' hev him a puttin' up with the old man's jawin'."

"Wal, I don't blame ye fur that feelin', Dency ; but ef I hedn't hed a house, wouldn't ye a married me, eh ? Wouldn't ye Dency ?" And he drew his arm more tightly about her, and looked into her face with eyes from which the smile had fled. Somehow her words had touched him deeply. He did not believe that Dency was influenced by the material comforts he could give her, but after what she had said he wanted to hear her say it was for himself that she accepted his offer. Dency did not, in the least, comprehend the feeling that prompted his eager question. Knowing in her own heart that Sam's being "well to do" had had no influence over her, she felt that she had given him the strongest proof of her love in promising to be his wife, and just now her own nature was under the influence of so new and strange a feeling. Realizing the necessity of diverting her thoughts from herself, and breaking from Sam's detaining grasp, she sprang up, saying :

"Don't be foolish, Sam ! Here comes Uncle Joel and Aunt Matildy," and she hastened away to welcome the first of the wedding guests.

Sam followed her, calling back to his face the smile, and saying to himself: "She's only jokin', of course. I know Dency, 'n' she's true as steel;" but the longing for the expression of love from her lips still remained, and would not be banished.

"Sam looks awful stiff," whispered M'lindy Bailey to Dency. "I hope gittin' married hain't goin' to make him disagreeable."

The house which Sam had prepared for his bride was a small one, made of hewn logs, and contained but one room. There was, however, a slab "lean to" or "shanty" built in the rear, which was to answer as a summer kitchen. The cellar was reached by an outside stairway, which was protected by a door set at an angle which Sam said to himself would make it a "nice sliding place fur the children."

The grove which hid from their view the Merrill homestead was in reality some distance away, there being no large trees in close proximity to the little dwelling.

Looking from the back door of the "lean to" straight across the "big medder," Dency could see the new barn which her father had built at some distance from the old house, near to the "rise of ground" upon which he intended some day to put a new house, when he could "allus keep an eye on Dency," he said. She noticed that none of the friends had left their conveyances at the new barn, and spoke of it to her father.

"No," said he. "There's room enough in the old barn, and it's so much nearer the house, I didn't think it wuth while fur 'em to hev to trapse off down there with their teams. The hosses won't know whether the barn's new or old."

The friends who had come to Dency's wedding were from a circle of fifteen miles radius, and were a homespun set of hard-working farmers, but with big hearts brimming over with kindness and good nature. The men gathered in knots and clusters outside the house, with hands in breeches-pockets or whittling, with hats pushed back from their faces, and their cheeks dis-tended with generous quids of tobacco, the expressed essence of which they distributed right and left with lavish impartiality, while they discussed crops and stock and the failures and successes of farming. The women sat in little groups in "the room," and openly scanned and criticised each other's attire, or exchanged experiences in household matters or infantile ailments.

"I don't think that color is becomin' to you, Cynthy. You allus was saller, but that makes you look as yaller as a punkin'."

"Seems to me you got the puckers of your skirt toc much in a heap on one side."

"My Willie had the hoopin' cough harder 'n any young 'un I ever saw."

"'Twouldn't be possible to hev it harder 'n my Sally Ann. Why, she—"

"Yas, white woolen stockin's does full up awful. I gin'allly color Becky's Sunday ones with cut bur, but fur every day, blue dye—"

"Oh, the sight o' sassage we eat ! It's a caution, I tell you. But then he allus says hogs don't cost much fur keep, 'n' he was brung up on sassage, 'n' so I—"

So interested were both speakers and auditors that they had not noticed that the day had grown a little darker, though there were many exclamations of "It's awful clus to-day," "A real muggy day;" but no one heard the low, shuddering sigh that stirred the leaves of the trees and set them to whispering a prophecy. And they did not hear when the sigh grew into a sob, and far away in the distance there was heard a sound like the voiceless roar of a wild animal furious for prey.

The men outside said they "reckoned 'twas goin' to rain," and they "s'posed it was most time fur the sur-remony, anyway;" so one after another they straggled into the house.

The minister, seated in a big arm-chair which had belonged to Grand'ther Wheeler, and had descended to Sam, was deep in a conversation with Deacons Jones and Green on church affairs.

"I saw your father going across the medder," said Sam to Dency. "What's he goin' fur?"

"Fur the family Bible. He'll be back soon."

Farmer Merrill, going across the "big medder" for the family Bible, which was his wedding-gift to Dency, and in which he intended to have the preacher make an entry of the marriage, was so busy with his own thoughts that his ears were at first deaf to these portents in the air, but at length he took note of a low, rumbling sound, like the approach of a distant train of cars. A railroad had been built the year before so near that they often heard the trains thundering over it.

"Didn't know ther' was a train this time o' day," said the farmer to himself as he entered his house, and went in search of the Bible. "Must be a tremenjus heavy train, too. Never heard such an infernal racket. Why, what's the matter ? It's got pitch-dark all of a suddint." And grasping the book, upon which he had laid his hand just as the darkness fell upon him, he hurried to the door. For a moment he could see nothing, and then, as suddenly as it had fallen, the darkness cleared away, and looking down the road he was amazed to see his new two-wheeled "sulky" come sailing out of the top of the new barn.

"Je-whittaker !" exclaimed he. "That's mighty cur'us ! Don't see how that could happen 'thout the ruf comin' off!" And glancing in the direction which the little vehicle took, he saw the roof sailing over the orchard. "It's a harricane," he groaned, "an' Sam's house is right in the track on it."

But Sam's house was hidden by the veil of blackness in which the terrible destroyer had wrapped itself—the dear little house which Sam had proudly boasted would stand as long as they lived. And perhaps it had. Perhaps in its ruins Dency and Sam were both lying dead. With this awful fear in his heart, Farmer Merrill hurried across the meadow, yet not daring to raise his eyes to see the desolation which the tornado had caused. But as the rumbling grew fainter in the distance, he nerved himself to bear the inevitable, and looked up. Ah! the house was gone—gone entirely, not piled, a heap of ruins, upon crushed and bleeding human forms, but gone bodily, lifted from its foundations, the heavy timbers being carried away, and the floor being left uninjured, while upon it lay a strangely mingled heap of men, women and children, too frightened to cry aloud.

The first warning of the approaching tornado that was noticed by the company was the distant rumbling, which by them, as by Farmer Merrill, was attributed to the cars. As it drew nearer and became more intense, Caleb Green had given a glance out of the back door, and exclaimed in alarm, "It's no train. It's hell a comin'!" And the next moment the place was enveloped in a thick cloud, and it seemed to them as if a legion of fiends were howling about them. Their ears were assailed by a confusion of awful noises, roaring, whistling, shrieking, and amid all a strange grinding and tearing sound, while the walls shook and quivered as if in deadly fear.

Men, women and children threw themselves into each others' arms and awaited the awful crisis. Sturdy, brave-souled and daring, no one fainted or went into hysterics, but all, with an instinct of self-preservation, threw themselves flat upon the floor.

In that awful moment Sam's one thought had been of Dency, and he endeavored to shield her with his own body from injury. "T'll have to kill me fust 'fore it can tech her," he said to himself; and he felt a fierce sort of joy in thought that, even if Dency didn't care particularly for him, he loved her well enough to be glad to die for her.

The storm had passed, a dead silence succeeded the fiendish tumult, the clouds broke away and the sun once more looked down upon them with a broad smile.

Sam finding himself unhurt, was the first to spring to his feet and assist Dency to rise. Pale, but erect, she stood and looked about her upon the figures that still cowered on the floor at her feet, then anxiously out toward the meadow. She drew a deep sigh of relief as she saw her father coming running toward them. "Father's alive yit!" she exclaimed, "'n' I guess there hain't nobody hurt," and Sam felt her hold upon him relax, and her form begin to tremble.

"Set down, do, Dency; you're all unstrung," he whispered.

In another moment she would have been sobbing hysterically upon his shoulder had not her mother, who had been lying near her, arisen to a sitting posture, and, clasping her knees with her hands, rocked back and forth groaning and wailing:

"It's a judgement! It's a judgement! I knew somethin' dreadful would happen, 'cause Sam begun the house on Friday."

At these words Dency raised her head and turned toward her mother, who continued:

"Oh, dear! Oh, dear! I knew Dency wouldn't git married this year when she sot them tew cheer backs together."

The minister, who in the general alarm had thrown over the arm-chair in which he sat, and ensconced himself safely underneath its generous shelter, now thrust out his head like a turtle from its shell, and said in his most sepulchral tones:

"The hand of the Lord is in it."

Sam felt Dency's hold upon him unclasp. She moved away from him toward the speaker. Then there flashed through his mind the question he had asked, which Dency would not answer. His house was gone and she was leaving him; the horror of the tornado was heaven compared with the anguish of that thought. Yet he would say no word to keep her. She should be free, but brave as he was he could not repress the groan that sprang from the depths of his heart at the thought.

Dency heard the groan, and her first thought was that Sam was injured, and she hurriedly whispered: "Are you hurt, Sam?"

He shook his head. But if not injured, why so pale? why those clinched hands, those tightly drawn lips?

"You are hurt," she insisted.

"No, not hurt, Dency, but your house is gone."

Quick-witted Dency grasped the meaning of that groan at once, and she turned quickly toward the preacher, who had now arisen and, with a pompous manner, was saying:

"It is evident that the Lord did not intend this wedding to take place—"

"I knowed it—I knowed it," sighed Mrs. Merrill. "Poor Dency! she was so proud of her house."

"Pride always goes before a fall," continued the minister.

With one look at Sam, a look so full of love that it would have healed at once his poor wounded heart, if he had seen it, Dency stepped toward the minister and spoke up, proudly:

"Ef you think I'm goin' to be cheated out of my weddin' this way you're much mistaken. I wa'n't a marryin' Sam Wheeler for his house—"

Do you hear that, Sam? Yes, Sam heard, and the courage came back to his heart, and the light to his eye, and he moved forward and took his place by Dency's side.

"They ain't no one hurt. Sam and I are here, and ef we can't be married under our own ruf we can be over our own sullen. An' ef Sam's willin' to take me right now, and here, you can go ahead with the ceremony."

The minister looked at Mrs. Merrill in a bewildered way as Sam replied:

"I'm only too glad to take ye now, Dency, fur life and death; and bless ye fur your brave, true words."

As the minister, still uncertain what to do, glanced from one to another, the voice of Farmer Merrill was heard:

"All right, parson. Go ahead 'n' marry 'em, 'n' give 'em your blessin'. Folks that's got grit like that ought to be helped, not hindered."

So, in their roofless, wall-less home, with the traces of desolation on every side, in the awe and hush of escape from a fearful death, with the fierce tornado thundering in the distance, and the bright June sun shining overhead, Sam Wheeler and Dency Merrill took upon themselves the vows that made them man and wife.

A quiet bustle of congratulations followed, which was interrupted by a loud burst of laughter from those standing on one side of the room, and Becky Smith's sharp voice was heard to exclaim:

"Wal, I du declare! Si Peters, how under the sun and airth did you come down in the sullen?"

Every eye was turned toward the slowly rising cellar-door from which emerged poor Si, looking rather crest-fallen but evidently determined to brave it out.

"I was blew there."

"Humph!" said Becky; "should think you was. When the wind riz you was a standin' right behind me, 'n' instid o' you a doin' your duty you shirked, and I landed on the floor." What else she might have said was drowned in the shout which greeted her words.

"Was anything hurt over home?" asked Dency of her father.

"Nothin', only the ruf of the new barn's gone a ridin' in my sulky. Blamed ef 't ain't the curusest thing ever I seed. That thar ruf went a skootin' off over the orchard and the sulky arter it, 'n' the house wa'n't teched. Then the harricane lighted down here and scooped this little shanty in, and then it went kitin' off over the grove. It acted fur all the world like a rubber ball; hit the top o' our barn, bounded up, lit here, then hopped over the grove, and so it goes hippety-hoppin' along over the kentry, knockin' things endwise wherever it lights. Wonder what it's done with the logs from this house?"

"I kin tell you," said Caleb Green, who had been out reconnoitering.

"It's stuck 'em in that sand back over there. Druv 'em in half way up, as if with a spile. 'Twon't be sich an awful job to git 'em out, 'n' after harvest we'll have a bee and put the little house together agin."

This plan met with universal favor, and we will add here that it was duly carried out.

But now the preparations for supper must be made. The stove, which had been overturned, was again placed upon its feet a little distance from the house; a fire was kindled and the potatoes were soon bubbling, and the ham "sizzling" and frying, while the tables were arranged by "the boys," and "the girls" tripped up and down the cellar stairs with the abundance of good things provided by Dency for the feast.

"Dency," said Sam drawing her to one side, "there's a moon to-night; don't you believe we could hang up a couple o' lanterns and have the dance arter all?"

"Capital! We'll do it. It'll be ever so much nicer dancin' out doors than in the house, 'n' the floor hain't racked a mite."

And it was soon made known to the company that the original programme for a dance would be carried out.

"Your daughter has a good deal of pluck," said the minister to Mrs. Merrill.

But that good lady seemed to feel that pluck needed an apology.

"Yes, Dency means well," she replied, "but she hain't of a nervous temperature. Nothin' pleases her, or makes her lose her equillery-bim; but as fur me I'm so easily upshot, the slightest thing flounces my nerves," and she sighed complacently.

The moon came up as the sun went down; the lanterns were lighted and raised aloft on standards made of saplings; the fiddler seated on a chair placed on top of the stove left the whole floor cleared for the dancers. The preacher and the elderly people went home, but all night long the scraping of the fiddle and the stentorian "calls" of the fiddler blended with the sound of tripping feet. And all night long the twinkling stars laughed and winked at the hearty, whole-souled dancing, as Caleb Green whirled Becky Smith around in obedience to "Swing your pardners," or the whole company became woefully confused in the "Grand right and left." And when the sun arose next morning he was greeted with the sound of "Fisher's Hornpipe" and a rather hoarse voice shouting "All hands 'round!"

"Hain't you a little tired, Mis' Wheeler?" asked Caleb. "See, it's sun-up."

Dency blushed at the sound of her new name, as she replied:

"So it is, and there's pa blowin' the horn fur break-fast. But I didn't git cheated out o' my weddin', did I?"

"Nor I out o' my trust in you," whispered Sam softly in her ear.

"Wal, I really didn't think you was such a goose," replied Dency saucily.

THE SUMMER MOON.

Ah, cloudless moon, forever hang
High in the starry sky!
Forever let thy mellow light
Our longing eyes descry!

Forever clothe the slender twig,
The flow'ret bathed in dew,
The stately tree, the clinging vine,
With beauty ever new!

Forever on the silvered sea,
And on the shining sand,
Pour the full radiance of thy glance
And make it fairyland!

Forever on the hill-sides rest,
And on the rocky strand:
Forever touch the frowning cliffs
With thy magician's hand.

And from their wooded depths evoke
A phantom, warlike host,
A shadowy band of sentinels—
Grim watchers of the coast!

Ah, cloudless moon, forever watch
O'er silent, slumberous night!
Forever o'er the broad earth spread
The glamour of thy light!

CHAPTER XLIV.
FACING THE ORDEAL.

WHEN Hilda reached her room it seemed as if the world had taken on a new aspect. Every nerve tingled with indignation. Fear had been swallowed up in anger. There was a tinge of shame, too, in her thought as she remembered how she had fled at the first hint of danger. She wondered what her father would have said had he witnessed her flight. Then the memory of her dream came back and she saw him again with the light of the moon upon his face as he held the sloop upon her course and went calmly on to meet his cruel fate. As the shadows gathered above the city and she heard the bells ring out the invitation to evening worship she seemed also to see the face of that strange Mr. Brown, which was so fixed in her memory that she could never forget it. Very sad and very stern it seemed, as if it looked in pitying scorn upon her weakness. Then she thought of all who were behind her in the struggle—true-hearted Harrison Kortright and his wife; Martin, whom she could ever command, though she must never love him any more; Jared Clarkson, whom even her father trusted; Gilbert Amory, who would even have taken life in her defense; the prudent and devoted teacher; and Jason, who had come, no doubt, to warn her of her danger. Oh! she had a host of friends, and it was weak and silly of her to flee from them. The tears flowed fast as she thought of them, and she wondered that she could ever have been so distrustful. The world, which in the morning had seemed so barren of all friendship or truth, now seemed overflowing with sympathy and devotion.

Then the thought of her duty came. Duty to whom? First of all, to her father and his memory. She had pledged herself, even in the first gush of her agony, to do honor to his name. How should she do it? By displaying the same spirit. None should ever say her acts belied her parentage. She paced back and forth across her room in the deepening gloom, her hands clasped tightly and her veins throbbing with defiant exultation. The future seemed to open before her a vista of light as she thought. If indeed it should—a shiver of dread passed through her frame at the thought—if it should be that she were not his daughter—if she were, in fact, the daughter of George Eighmie and of the poor weak creature who aimlessly wandered about the corridors of Sturmhold—why then, indeed, a still grander duty lay before her. In that case she owed even more to that man who had given her his name, his filial love—aye, even his life. Then, too, she would owe a broader duty to that people whose misfortune had put its taint upon her life—whose primeval curse had blighted her love. The sacrificial spirit took hold upon her. Perhaps, she thought, it might be her destiny to become one of the great examples which should help to alleviate the thralldom of a race and lift a shadow from a nation's life. Whatever might be the truth in regard to herself her duty pointed still in one direction. She must return and face her destiny. Bond or free, rich or poor, it should not be said that the daughter of Merwyn Hargrove, or the daughter of that friend for whom he rendered up his life, failed to do honor to his memory.

But what was the first thing to be done? How should she begin to act the worthy part for which she had been cast? She wished that she might fly back to her room in the seminary. She wondered if it were empty, or had another occupant already. Then she began to think how she might return and reach it unperceived. She knew not why, but somehow it seemed as if she must begin her new life in the very place where the old one ended. Where the old one ended? Had it ended? She smiled as she thought how she had buried the Hilda of two days before. Even Martin—dearly remembered as he must ever be—she had given him up. She had no hope that the doubt would ever be cleared away. In fact, she half expected that it would be confirmed. She could hardly help believing that her life had been grafted upon that little life which had exhaled almost as soon as it was begun. She had vague memories of a tropical home—was it memory, or was it the weird necromancy of that loved story-teller who had painted for her so many pictures of the lands his eyes had seen? She could not tell. She only knew that the sweet, unruffled life she had led had given way to one full of woe and suffering perhaps, but one that she did not shrink from facing. The ordeal was prepared. The smoking plowshares lay along her path. The judges were in waiting. Yes, her old life was ended—cut sharply in twain, but she longed to graft a new one upon it. She would join and unite them so that the point of severance should hardly be perceptible to other eyes. The luxury, the ease, the freedom she had enjoyed, what were they but a preparation for the duty that lay before? She must go back to her old haunts and begin anew.

But how? Again and again the question recurred. She wished she had the gray-bearded man she had met at dinner to advise her. Then she remembered having heard her father say that advice was a good thing when one already knew what he meant to do. She thought what he would do were he in her place—the dear wise father, who had always left her to decide for herself. Surely he had not done this without a purpose. He meant that she should decide, and not only decide, but act on her own judgment in the future, as he had encouraged her to do in the past. Ah, it was cruel! The lady at the table had only half stated the rapacity of her pursuers. Not only had they not waited for her to take off her mourning, but they had not even allowed her time to put it on. The tears flowed at the memory of her affliction. She reproached herself that even the sorest trouble had caused her to neglect to testify her grief to the whole world. Henceforth her garb should bear witness to her sorrow. She would wear only weeds all her life long. Sackcloth should enswathe her form even as woe must overshadow her life.

All at once she forgot her despondency. She was young, and her buoyant nature laughed at trammels. Her tears were none the less bitter because they were so easily wiped away. She sprang to her feet, laughing, softly and quietly. Then she made haste to light the gas; searched in her bag and brought out some black stuff; combed her hair smoother still upon her brow; plaited the dark stuff along her cheek, which had grown pale with the woe of the last two days; smiled contentedly, and then sat down at the table to examine the contents of her purse. She found that they were ample for all her present needs. Miss Hunniwell, more prudent than herself, had foreseen her need, and had transformed the larger portion of the deposit her father had made in her behalf into ready money, in anticipation of the need of a prolonged concealment. It was strange what a change had come over her. Calmly, even smilingly, she prepared for her couch. She slumbered peacefully, and on the morrow was astir early among the city shops, cheapening, buying and directing, as if danger and sorrow were unknown to her. Nevertheless, her cheeks were strangely pale, and her demeanor quiet and subdued.

A few days afterward a lady in widow's weeds got off the train at Bloomingdale. She was fair and young—that much might be seen through her heavy veil. She asked to be driven to the seminary, and handed the hackman her check, for which he received a trunk unusually large and new. Her name was marked in large letters upon each end. There was an unusual crowd at the station, but no one paid any particular attention to the new arrival. The people were so excited over the affair at Beechwood that they had no time to notice any one not specially connected with that tragedy. The lady was alone in the hack, and on the way to the seminary the driver told her all about the matter—all that was known, at least, as well as some guesses of his own at the unknown. The stranger seemed much shocked, and at one time appeared almost inclined to retract her order and go to the hotel. The driver, in his rough way, was very sorry for his fare—she was so young and tender, and yet wearing widow's weeds. She seemed entirely broken down with sorrow, and never raised her veil nor spoke above a subdued monotone during the trip. He made some cautious inquiries in regard to her affliction, but an involuntary sob and the sudden thrusting of a white handkerchief under the gold-bowed glasses which she wore told the good-natured fellow that his inquisitiveness was very painful. So he desisted, and gave his attention to his team. Arrived at the seminary, she sent her card to the principal, and waited in the reception-room until she came. Many of the pupils, who were busy with preparations for departure, glanced in at the door half curiously. She did not look at them, nor once lift her veil. Miss Hunniwell came with a look of mild surprise upon her face and the card of the new-comer in her hand. As soon as she had entered the room the strange lady rose and closed the door. Then turning to the teacher, she raised her veil. The teacher regarded her with a puzzled look, as if seeking to bring back to her memory some half-forgotten face. Then she shook her head almost imperceptibly.

"Don't you know me?" asked the stranger.

The teacher started, came closer, and peered anxiously into the pale face framed in the dull black of the widow's weeds. The stranger took off her glasses. Miss Hunniwell started, and would have screamed, but a plump white hand was clasped firmly over her mouth. Then there were tears and embraces and anxious inquiries, as when friends long parted meet again. The door was opened after a time, and Miss Hunniwell and her guest passed along the hall together. The stranger's veil was down, but the teacher's agitation was clearly perceptible. She took the stranger to her own room, where she soon left her to attend to her own duties. It was a matter of great surprise when she directed the lady's trunk to be taken to Hilda's room; but she explained that it was an old pupil who once occupied that room, and had now come back to seek seclusion in her deep affliction. She had explained to her, she said, the unfortunate associations of the room, but she did not seem to mind them at all. No other room would seem at all homelike to her, and she especially desired that she might be allowed to have that. So the strange widow lady was soon duly installed in the room Hilda had chosen when she came, hardly more than a child, to select the place in which she would pass the years of her school-life.

After a time the teacher brought Jason to the room. The lady had put aside her widow's veil and removed the glasses she had worn. Her hair was brushed smoothly down upon her forehead, and only a faint line of white about the throat relieved the sombre depths of the mourning which she wore. She advanced and offered her hand to Jason. Her lip quivered and her eyes filled with tears as she did so.

The faithful servant gazed at her a moment in astonishment. Then he suddenly seized her by the arms, peered keenly into her face, and exclaimed:

"If it ain't Miss Hilda! Bless God, our little Miss Hilda!"

Before she could prevent him he had seized her in his arms, and was tossing her up and down as if she had been a child, the tears rolling down his face and his lips uttering half-incoherent bursts of gratitude.

"There, there, Jason," said she, gently releasing herself at length. "I am very glad to see you again, but you must not try to toss me about in that fashion. I am not so small as I once was."

She gave him her hand as she spoke, which, with the characteristic freedom of the old servant of the plantation, he kissed and fondled, while his eyes seemed to devour her features.

"Ah, Miss Hilda," he exclaimed, "I thought I wouldn't never git a sight of you no more. You jes' run off, nobody knows how nor whar, an' leave Jason here without a word—jes' bound to wait till you comes back in your own way, whenever you gits ready, for all the world like your pa. I declare, child, you're his own gal, sure. Here's Marse Eighmie comes a-tearin' round atter ye, an' all at once, jes' when he thinks he's got yer safe, whar is yer? Then, atter a little, when everybody thinks yers done gone an' hid, jes' as ef yer'd been a sure enuff nigger, as all on 'em tries ter make out, why, here you is!"

Despite the fact of Hilda's evident sorrow, and that he had not seen her since her father's tragic death, he could not repress his joy. But his mood changed instantly, as he saw her lip tremulous with grief at this allusion.

"There, there, honey," he said soothingly; "don't you go to feeling bad now. You know there ain't nothin' that would make Marse Merwyn gladder 'n jes' ter know what his little gal's done—come right back here into the jaws of the lion that's a-huntin' atter her, as you has, chile. Bless yer dear heart, you's yer pa all over again, that yer is, an' Jason knows it. That was always the way with him, you know—here one minute an' there the next, axin' nobody's advice, an' tellin' nobody what he was gwine ter do till it was all over an' done. There, there, dear, don't take on so—please don't, honey," said Jason, as she snatched away her hand, and, sinking on a chair, sobbed aloud with a sorrow she had before had no opportunity to indulge.

After a time she checked her grief, and said with a choking voice:

"Have you no message for me, Jason, from—from my father?"

"There, now, what an old stupid he is!" exclaimed Jason reproachfully. "Here I've been a gwine on about nuffin', an' this dear chile jes' a hungerin' for dem las' words her pa sent her. 'Clar it does seem as if Jason was gittin' to be a straight-out fool an' no mistake."

The faithful servitor had opened his vest as he spoke, and from an inside pocket now drew forth a letter which he handed to Hilda with an air of reverence that could not have been greater had she been a queen and he an humble liegeman kneeling at her feet.

"There, Miss Hilda, that's what I ought to have given you before, only I was that glad I done forgot all about it. Marse Cap'n give me that jes' the las' minute 'fore he made me come away. De Lo'd knows, Miss Hilda, I didn't want to do it nohow, an' I wouldn't if he hadn't jes' forced me to. There warn't no sort of use on 't—none in the world. If he'd jes' have let me take a crack or two at that crowd in dead earnest instead of firin' all round 'em as we'd been a doin', there'd a been plenty of time to have got him aboard an' off before they'd have rallied up to stop us. But he wouldn't do it, Miss Hilda—he p'intedly wouldn't—but jes' give me this letter an' told me not to let no man or woman catch so much as a glimpse of the least corner of it till I put it in your hands, Miss Hilda. And I hain't. Now, there 'tis, an' Jason's filled his last orders. There ain't nothin' more for him to do now—nothin' more."

"Thank you, Jason," said Hilda, as she took the letter and glanced at the superscription. "You are a good, faithful fellow," she added, as the tears streamed down her cheeks. She pressed the letter passionately to her bosom, as if to still with its touch the beating of her heart. She reached out her other hand and patted the cheek of the faithful servant. He caught it and covered it with kisses.

"You must not say there is nothing more for you to do, Jason. Papa sent you away, no doubt, that you might take care of me. He knew I would need you when he was gone."

"I'll do it, Miss Hilda—anything you want in the wide world I'll do. If you'll jes' let Jason serve you like he did Marse Captain, that's all he wants."

"You shall always do that, Jason."

"Thank ye, Miss Hilda, thank ye; but you must promise not to run off an' leave me no more," said he, half doubtfully.

"Oh, never fear!" said Hilda, as she turned to the window and broke the seal of her father's letter. Hardly had she glanced at its contents when an expression of surprise escaped her lips. She read a little farther, and a cry of pleasure came bubbling from her heart. An instant after she rushed across the room, with the crumpled letter close clasped to her bosom, fell upon her knees beside the bed, and cried, as the tears rolled down her cheeks:

"Thank God! thank God! Poor Papa! Dear Papa! Thank God! Thank God!"

The teacher stole away and left the faithful servant alone with his young mistress, to tell the story of the father's tragic death.

Martin Kortright returned to Sturmhold burning with zeal in his lady-love's behalf. To his parents he told over and over again the story of what had occurred at Beechwood. He laid before them all the plans his ardent brain had devised for discovering whither she had flown. Already he had secured the co-operation of detectives, and he proposed before a week had passed to put her likeness and a full description in the hands of the police of every city in the country. To all this Harrison Kortright imperatively objected.

"If she were a runaway servant or a lost child, that would do. But you must remember, my son, that it is Hilda Hargrove of whom we are speaking. Just read that letter of hers once more, and you will see that the girl who wrote it doesn't need to be hawked around the country like a lost poodle. She means to do something, and wants to be let alone to do it in her own way. Heaven knows she has people enough hunting after her already, and you would only add to her troubles if you began a pursuit. Let her alone, my son. Let her have time to get over her grief and terror, and determine on the course she will pursue. She has sufficient for her present needs, and knows very well that she has only to indicate a want in order to have it gratified."

"But she will think I have no spirit if I sit down and wait for her to clear up this mystery all alone," said Martin. "If I could only let her know what Jason is able to prove, she would come back at once."

"I am not so sure of that," rejoined his father. "She is not running away from the slave-catcher so much as from the fear that she may be something worse than a slave herself."

"Jason's testimony settles that also," interrupted Martin.

"I am afraid Jason's story is hardly conclusive," said the father. "Jared Clarkson knows that I don't put a particle of confidence in the inference he draws from the papers in his possession. I am sure that Hilda is Merwyn Hargrove's child. Not only did he acknowledge her as such, but she resembles him as closely one person can another. She has all his coolness and courage, as well as his quiet candor and undoubting self-reliance. Even he could detect nothing of her mother about her except in appearance. Now, if Clarkson put the same reliance in Jason's story that you do, he would have telegraphed at once to relieve my anxiety. I heard from him twice yesterday, but nothing to indicate that he has changed his impressions in the least."

"But Hilda ought to know what Jason says, and have the letter he refuses to give to any one else as well as the package Clarkson has for her."

"That is true," said the old man, "but you are not the one to take it to her. If she knew you were on her track, can you not see that she would just rush deeper and deeper into obscurity? It is you and your love that she dreads more than all the slave-hunters in the world. If you should pursue her before this doubt is settled, she would not hesitate to destroy herself in order to escape from you."

"My God!" exclaimed Martin, "what shall I do?"

"Do?" said his father reproachfully. "You are the last one to ask that question. If ever a woman had a right to demand obedience from her lover, that woman is Hilda Hargrove at this time."

"She doesn't expect me to obey and leave her to suffer, does she?" asked Martin impetuously.

"She expects, and she has a right to expect, that you will obey her wishes when they are fair and reasonable ones."

"But hers are not reasonable," said the son, with some show of irritation.

"Let us see," said the father. "She tells you frankly that she would die before she would marry with a doubt upon her birth. You, in your impetuous love, might at first think otherwise, but there could be no surer way of securing the unhappiness of both than by overcoming, if you could, this objection. You are as sure of her love as if you looked into her heart, but you know also that you can never change her determination."

"But I cannot wait in idleness while she is in trouble—perhaps in peril," protested the young man, as he strode back and forth across the room with clinched hands and a brow knotted with agony.

"Wait you must, my son, because she bids you. If there were no other reason at this time, you are bound to regard implicitly her lightest wish. But you do not need to be idle. Your waiting and separation may continue for many a year, but whenever the cloud is lifted, as it will be some time, you may be sure she will keep her word. You should remember that she may need a good deal of money to carry out her plans, and we must be ready to meet her requirements. We are her trustees—you and I. You must continue to do the work I am no longer able to perform."

"There is nothing to do about the estate. It is all in good condition, and almost taking care of itself."

"You speak of her father's estate, my son. It is time you learned that Hilda has even a closer relation to us. One half of all that stands to-day in my name belongs to her."

Harrison Kortright then explained the facts which the reader already knows.

"Does Hilda know this?" asked Martin, drawing a long breath, when his father had concluded.

"I do not know," was the reply, "but I take it for granted that she does. You know her father always had great confidence in her. I doubt if he kept anything from her except that miserable matter of his brother's children."

"You think, then, that she wishes me to stay here and look after her interests as you have done hitherto?"

"It is reasonable to suppose that she would desire to have her matters in such shape as to yield whatever funds she may require, is it not?"

"I suppose so," answered Martin moodily; "but how shall I know her wants, or she know that I am obeying her request?"

"I suppose she will expect that without any information, but I see no reason why you should not communicate with her," said the father.

"How?" asked Martin, stopping short in his walk.

"By advertisement," replied his father. "You may be sure that Hilda will see it. She will not miss a line that concerns any one connected with this matter."

So the father and son devised some brief personals which Hilda only would understand, and know that they were messages from home.

CHAPTER XLV.

A MASKED BATTERY.

HILDA's first thought after having secured unsuspected refuge in her old quarters was to find out exactly what had been done, in order that she might determine what she ought to do. She no longer felt any apprehension on her own account. Her father's letter had entirely relieved her mind as to that, but it also devolved upon her the continuance of that task which had cost him his life. The son and daughter of George and Alida Eighmie were not only commended to her care, but she was especially charged to discover, if possible, the former, and to see to it that the latter remained in utter ignorance of her birth and origin, unless circumstances made such a disclosure imperatively necessary. On the next day, therefore, Mr. Clarkson came to the seminary at the request of Miss Hunniwell. After his first surprise at the presence of the young lady whose guardianship had been so unwillingly thrust upon him, he bethought him of the package he was charged to deliver into her hands, and returned to his hotel for it. Having delivered it to Hilda, he seemed at once to be relieved of a great burden. After she had glanced over its contents, he began to tell her what he had done, or rather what he had determined to do. Very fortunately for her, he said, the enemy had made a false move. Instead of trusting to the law, they had gone outside of it, and had tried to assert their rights with a strong hand. This fact he proposed to utilize in effecting a compromise, by which the collateral heirs of George Eighmie should release all claim upon the children of Alida.

"I suppose," said Hilda thoughtfully, "that it will be best for me to remain concealed while you are engaged in this negotiation?"

"Oh, of course," exclaimed Clarkson. "Your absence was the most fortunate thing that could have occurred."

"Have they discovered the strange mistake they made?" she asked.

"Mistake?"

"Yes—in regard to the identity of the daughter of George Eighmie?"

"I do not understand your meaning," said Clarkson, with a puzzled look.

"I mean, do they know who she is?"

"Well," said Clarkson with some embarrassment, "they suspect the truth, of course, but they really know no more than when they came."

"Indeed," said Hilda, "that is very fortunate. Then I should suppose the best thing to do would be to throw them still farther off the scent."

"Of course; but how?" asked Clarkson.

"I might show myself," suggested Hilda.

"Show yourself, my dear," he cried, starting up in alarm. "It would disarrange everything. It would be fatal. Do please remember that the warrant for your arrest is still in the marshal's hands."

"Well, suppose it is, what then?" asked Hilda in surprise.

"You would be seized in an instant if they knew of your presence."

"What if I were?" persisted Hilda. "They can do me no harm."

"Perhaps not," said Clarkson thoughtfully, "but what good can result from it?"

"The legal proceedings would take some time, I suppose?"

"Several days, at least."

"They might be delayed, protracted?"

"Of course."

"How long?"

"For some weeks, probably."

"Well, in the meantime—"

"In the meantime, you would be in jail."

"In jail?"

"Yes; that is, you would be in custody, unless released on a writ of habeas corpus."

"Well, it would be all right in the end."

"Probably, but is it not better to relinquish all claim to the estate of Eighmie, and thereby put an end to their pursuit? By that means, too, the facts remain solely in our possession."

"I see. I must guard against that. It was Papa's last wish that I should conceal the facts, if possible, forever."

"If you will allow me," said Clarkson, "I think there has been entirely too much concealment in this matter."

"That may be, but we must still continue it for her sake."

"For her sake? Whom do you mean?"

"Why, the one we have been speaking of all this time—George Eighmie's daughter."

"I was in hope," said Clarkson scornfully, "that when she was once out of danger she would have the moral courage to avow the truth."

"How can she, when she does not know it?" asked Hilda artlessly.

"But she does know it," said Clarkson impatiently. "Miss—Miss Hilda—I—I must say that I am disappointed in you. I will gladly do all in my power to rescue you from your present peril, because of my promise to you—to Captain Hargrove, I mean—but after that you must understand that I will have nothing to do with any false pretenses."

"But how can I help it?"

"You will be your own mistress."

"Well?"

"You will have an ample fortune."

"Well?"

"Why not stand up and defy this infamous race-prejudice?"

"What would you have me do?"

"Nothing now; but when the danger is over, and you are in the secure possession of what you will receive, I would have you repay the debt of gratitude you owe to Merwyn Hargrove, not by keeping up the miserable sham he urged upon you, but by showing the world his noble conduct in its true significance."

"I do not understand you, sir," said Hilda, shrinking from his vehemence.

"You do not understand?" he said angrily. "Say you will not, rather. I mean that you should be brave enough and strong enough to avow the truth—to say to the world, 'This man was so true and noble that he conquered every prejudice in order to fulfill his pledge. He even took to his heart one cursed with the blood of a despised race—gave her a daughter's place and a daughter's love.' In other words, I would have you avow your own parentage."

"My parentage?" cried Hilda in amazement.

"Yes, I would have you reward the devotion of a poor, crazed mother, and acknowledge with pride the heroism of that brother—" the speaker paused, looked hastily about, and then added in a lower tone—"that brother who has devoted his strength to the service of the race whose degradation has blighted his life."

Hilda shrunk from him as he spoke in undisguised dismay. Then she turned impetuously upon him:

"Why, Mr. Clarkson," she exclaimed, "what do you mean by such language? Do you think my father was a liar? Do you think his solemn declaration to you was a falsehood? Do you impeach his dying message to me?"

"It is because of his declaration that I speak thus!"

Hilda looked as if she doubted his sanity. Finally she opened the packet in her hand, ran over its contents hastily, and said:

"Mr. Clarkson, my father tells me here that he has informed you of all the facts concerning the daughter of Alida."

"So he did, by means of the parcel accompanying that which you hold."

"Will you be good enough to allow me to examine that parcel?"

Clarkson looked at her half-suspiciously; then drew the package from his pocket, and after showing the superscription, handed her the bills it contained. She glanced at them carelessly, and extended her hand for more.

"That is all," said Clarkson.

"All? Was there nothing more, absolutely nothing?"

"Nothing but this wrapper, which had evidently been used to inclose other papers."

He handed her a sheet of paper loosely folded to inclose others. It was indorsed in her father's distinct and positive hand:

Inclosures.

1. Letter from A. E.
2. " " S. M.
3. " " W. K.
4. " " M. H. to W. K.
5. Affidavit of J. U.
6. Statement of acct. of W. K.
7. Letters H. E. to W. K.
8. " M. H. to W. K.
9. Letter of instructions to W. K.
10. " Bills of M. H.

"And nothing more?" asked Hilda, with a perplexed look.

"Nothing more," said Clarkson wonderingly.

Hilda sat down and rested her head upon her hand in thought. She turned the papers over and over, as if seeking to unravel some mystery. In the meantime, Clarkson sat watching her with a curious, pitying look. Once or twice he half started, as if he feared she were about to destroy the papers he had given her. After a time she rose, crossed to where he sat, and handing him the package she had received from him which was addressed to her, she said quietly:

"Will you please read that?"

When he had concluded she gave him the letter she had received by the hand of Jason.

"And that also, if you please."

The effect on Jared Clarkson was astonishing. Incredulity, amazement, joy, and finally mortification, were depicted in turn upon his countenance. After a time he rose, and with a deep blush upon his fine, frank face, extended his hand and said:

"I crave your pardon, Miss Hargrove. I am sorry to have been so poor a counsellor."

Then Hilda broke down and wept passionately. The long struggle was over, and nature would have its way. She had passed the dread ordeal and must fain weep over her deliverance. Clarkson stood by, absently patting her head and smoothing the masses of her hair, to soothe her agitation.

"I very greatly regret having caused you so much pain, my dear," he said in a low, fatherly tone.

She looked up into his face half smiling through her tears, and said:

"It only shows how true a friend my father chose to aid me in the task he left unfinished."

Clarkson stooped and kissed her forehead.

After this there were some grave consultations in the widow's room at the seminary. An eminent lawyer came more than once; Jason was carefully examined, and before another day had passed Sherwood Eighmie and his confederates found a legal network woven about them which portended unexpected difficulties. Actions for conspiracy and libel were brought against them in the name of Hilda Hargrove, based upon affidavits sworn to by her, and requiring very heavy bonds on the part of the defendants. In the meantime the demeanor of Clarkson underwent a change that no one could account for. Instead of depression and gloom his mirth was almost hilarious. There was no longer any display of anxiety, and the compromise which he had set on foot was entirely neglected. The strange widow lady after two days' sojourn found that the associations of her old room were not so soothing as she had expected. Besides that she had received a great many visits for one seeking seclusion, and it was a matter of no wonder to the remaining pupils of the seminary that she had already concluded to seek a more tranquil home. So she was driven to the station and took the train westward. By some strange chance Jason left upon the same train, but he rode in the second-class car and paid no heed to the young widow whose veil fell in decorous folds almost to her feet.

CHAPTER XLVI.

CLAMOR IN THE HOME NEST.

THE news of the attempted abduction at Beechwood awakened the utmost excitement at Skendoah. A thousand things had contributed to produce this result. While Squire Kortright might be termed the tutelary deity of the place, yet there was a sort of traditional belief, very largely due to the significant winks and nods of the old man Shields, that the master of Sturmholt was associated with Kortright in the enterprise out of which the town had grown. Moreover, Merwyn Hargrove had been a sort of lion in the region where he lived. There was something very attractive in the half isolation which he maintained, as well as in the mysterious tales that had from time to time connected his name with both good and bad achievements. But whatever his life had been, the manner of his death would have fixed his place in the esteem of his neighbors beyond all cavil. Coming as it did upon the heels of their own great calamity, and being allied to it still more closely in cause, they gladly looked upon him as a martyr in whose name and fame they had each a sort of proprietary interest. Added to these facts was the farther one that the relation subsisting between Martin and Hilda was very well understood throughout the region, and we shall not find it hard to realize the excitement which the story of Eighmie's attempt and Hilda's flight aroused in the little village. Martin and Hilda for their own sakes were well-beloved. The villagers had seen them grow up from childhood, sustaining to each other always the most intimate relations. Their mutual affection had been a matter of pleasant jest and kindly gossip long before either of them had suspected its existence. Hilda's beauty and Martin's staunch sincerity had deepened this impression until almost every villager felt as shocked and outraged by the news as if his own heart's dearest treasure had been ravished from his possession. Their sorrow and anger had manifested itself in every conceivable form. Since the return of Martin, the office, which was now wholly under his control, had been thronged almost all the time with sympathizing friends and visitors.

A public meeting had been held, and in speeches and resolutions the people had testified at once their loyalty to principle and also their determination to make the most of their own local celebrities. A band of young men had been organized whose purpose was declared to be the rescue of Hilda should she ever be so unfortunate as to fall into the hands of her persecutors. To say that the story of her origin was disbelieved in Skendoah, but states the truth too mildly. It was scouted at as a transparent fraud by every man, woman and child in Skendoah and vicinity. No one there had any more doubt of her right to inherit as the daughter of Merwyn Hargrove than of the fact that he had named her sole legatee in his will. This universal feeling was intensified still more by the knowledge that Jared Clarkson had become her champion and defender. However poorly they might have esteemed her cause, the fact that he had espoused it would have secured for her their sympathy. When this was added to the other causes mentioned we can well believe the statement of the local press, that "Skendoah was ablaze with excitement." Had volunteers been called for at any hour to go to her rescue the town would have been almost depopulated of its male inhabitants.

It was in the middle of the afternoon—the very busiest hour of the day in the office where Martin Kortright was at work—the office from which his father had so long directed those operations that had linked his name forever with the town's prosperity. The plain black-lettered sign, "Skendoah Mills," that hung over the door had never been changed. Though the son was in charge of the great interests emoraced by this proprietorship, it was understood that he was as yet only the right hand of the father. In fact all business papers were still signed "Harrison Kortright," though executed by "Martin Kortright, Attorney."

Despite the hum of labor upon all sides, the young man's thoughts were busy with Hilda. As he gave directions in regard to the purchase of supplies, the sale of stock, the rebuilding of the burned factories, now well under way, and a thousand other details essential to a great enterprise, he wondered where she was, and whether she would approve the course he had decided upon. He had yielded to his father's views chiefly because he could really see nothing else to do, but also very largely from a conviction that Hilda would realize how much harder it was to obey her than to follow his own inclinations and seek to discover whither she had flown. He had an impression, too, that spies were on his track, and that if he should succeed in finding her it would be only to increase her peril. So he worked on with the sad, pale face that had haunted him ever since he heard of her flight coming between him and the paper when he wrote, dimming his eyes and dulling his brain.

To the people of Skendoah this conduct on Martin's part was the subject of unstinted praise. They would not for a moment admit that he did not know her hiding-place. That notion was to them absurd. They believed that he knew, and kept away in order that she need not be traced through him.

"They won't ever git that gal by follerin' up his tracks," said Shields, pursing up his thin lips and glancing approvingly over the razor-like edge of his nose at Martin through the office window. "Both of 'em are too much like them they 're named after to be caught in that way. Here he is pokin' 'round here as innocent and careless as you can imagine, and Hilda nowhere in the world that anybody knows on. Now, mark my words—the first you know that young man 'll take it into his head to travel and drown his grief, and the next thing you 'll hear there 'll be a wedding somewhere over the water, and they 'll snap their fingers at slave-catchers. And Skendoah 'll stand by 'em, too, and furnish them the money to have a good time—furnish it regular every week, and lots of it, too. Bless their hearts, if anybody ever deserved it, it's just them two."

There was a suspicion of moisture about the old man's eyes as he spoke. He had hardly gone a hundred yards from the office when he heard a tumult in the street leading toward the depot. What could it mean? A carriage was coming slowly along the street, beside which walked and ran and shouted an ever-increasing crowd. Hats and handkerchiefs were waving in the air. Men forsook their shops and women their houses to join the cavalcade. Crowds poured out of the factories, and all was clamor and confusion. At length the driver whipped his horses into a quick trot, the crowd was left behind, and the carriage drove up to the office door. Jason sprang from the driver's seat and assisted a lady in deep mourning to alight. As she touched the ground she threw aside her veil, and showed a bright soft blush upon her cheeks. She ran up the steps, pushed back the door that stood ajar, and saw Martin gazing blankly upon the page before him. His pen was idle, and his thought was not of business. In the room beyond she could hear the clerks busily calling to each other from the books they were posting. The clamor outside came nearer while she paused. The blush grew deeper. She held her breath, and stole on tiptoe up to him. Looking over his shoulder she saw the page before him held but one word, "Hilda." There was a rustle—the perfume of a remembered presence—a pair of soft hands were about his neck, warm lips pressed his own, and a voice whispered:

"I have come, Martin, just as I promised that I would!"

The clamor swelled louder and louder without. Some one had bethought them of the town bell, and its deep, sonorous peal rang joyfully out over the excited town. The water was shut off. The wheels were still. The square in the middle of the town was alive with eager faces. After a time Martin appeared in the office door with Hilda upon his arm. Then the crowd went wild. Cheer after cheer went up. The one piece of ordnance in the town was dragged forth from its dusty hiding-place beneath the stairs of the town hall and mingled its reverberations with the clangor of the bells and the shouts of the people. Harrison Kortright, in the library at Sturmhold, heard its echoes faintly. For almost a week sleep had hardly visited his eyelids. He started up on his couch, listened for a short time to the recurrent shocks, smiled peacefully, and said to the plump matron by the bedside:

"They 've heard from Hilda."

Then he laid his head upon the pillow and slept.

POTTERY IN THE DINING-ROOM.

"There is, perhaps, less good taste displayed in our country in this matter of table services than in any other household adornment."—W. C. PRIME.

Two rooms in the house should be of all the most attractive—the sitting-room and the dining-room. In the one gathers the family circle at the close of day or on Sunday, while twice or thrice each day the other presents one of the prettiest sights upon which the eye can rest, when all meet around the table to partake of the morning or evening meal, and join in converse over the events of the day, in anticipation or review. It is of the latter place I propose to speak in advocacy of gratifying one sense too often neglected, but no less deserving enjoyment than its usually more fortunate rivals.

When every endeavor is made to afford pleasure for the sense of taste by tickling the palate with all kinds of delicacies, and ear and intellect have their share of the feast through conversation, "grave or gay," "lively or sedate," is the eye alone to be starved, and the sense of beauty only not gratified in this enjoyable room?

The food will taste better from table appointments carefully chosen with an eye for the appearance as well as utility of the article, while a little thought given to the harmony and effect of the silver, glass and china in which are served the food upon your table, will well repay in a stimulated appetite and greater satisfaction in partaking of the viands.

In this day of artistic endeavor the table should be a study, and the sideboard no less thoughtfully furnished and arranged than the bric-a-brac cabinet in the drawing-room. All the ornamentation of the dining-room should be in harmony with the purpose for which the place is designed, and this may be easily effected, as the number of appropriate subjects offered by picture dealers and others is unlimited, and, in addition, are found in every store very pretty heads and figures in parian or terra cotta that serve for use on mantels or brackets. It is, however, to the sideboard, china-closet and table I propose to confine my attention in this article, as being the most important section for consideration.

In selecting the china for your table avoid having too great variety of wares or the other extreme of monotony in the assortments. It was in former years the fashion to purchase an entire outfit of one ware, shape and color; but, while this has obvious advantages, and is still the custom with a large proportion, art and good taste have decreed that this monotonous habit shall be broken, and we now rarely sit at a well-appointed table that has not upon its cloth a succession of dishes changing with the courses and varying in style—a sure index of the taste and culture of the owner. Even where the service is of one uniform decoration, the monotony is now usually relieved by various fancy articles of other wares.

On the other hand, this may be carried too far, and thus lose its advantage. Like the so-called "music of the future" and "descriptive" music, in which the infatuated devotee pretends to read, as in a book, sentiments and facts instead of harmony of sounds, for enjoyment only, so, in some cases, the attempt to place upon china decorations symbolizing the use to which the piece is to be put may be overdone. It is certainly appropriate to decorate the dessert-plates with fruits, and the game course with birds and animals, but the dinner-plate would hardly be attractive if upon its surface were portrayed a slice of roast beef or cut of spring lamb.

There is a point where this propriety of decoration, as we may call it, oversteps the boundary of good taste, and becomes an impropriety to be avoided.

If you desire to follow the prevailing fashion, and array your table with a variety of wares and decorations, it may be effected with an outlay scarcely greater than would be required for a complete service of one decoration throughout. True, in following this plan, it is impossible to avoid duplicating some articles that occur in two or more different courses; but, in compensation for this additional expense, many pieces which form part of a tasteful assortment are of cheaper material, thus equalizing the cost. In the following hints regarding the selection of table pottery, I speak to those who, while not "rolling in wealth," have yet sufficient means to be able to gratify the eye and taste, even at a slightly increased cost.

Should you decide upon purchasing an entire outfit of one ware and decoration, you have ample scope for a selection in the multitude of service offered, and the first point for decision is—what ware will you have, French, English or Chinese? Many arguments may be offered in favor of each.

The English sets are of moderate cost, and this has been almost the sole reason for the great demand that has existed for this class of goods for several years past, as the changing fashions have required that the sets be low-priced or the constant change would become a burden. The ware itself is of inferior grade, and the decoration of a peculiar style, its only purpose seeming to be to hide the surface to which it is applied. The designs, however, are good, and have in a certain sense revolutionized ceramic taste, as applied to table-ware, by creating a demand for well-covered decorations, even on other grades or qualities.

The main attraction in Chinese sets is their oddity and quaint shape, with which the blue-and-white decoration harmonizes beautifully, producing an effect that would speedily become popular but for the expense of the goods.

French porcelain possesses the best intrinsic value. The pure white surface forms a beautiful groundwork, than which bright tints or delicate colors can have no better contrast. A writer has said: "White is a most valuable color where cheerfulness is required, but its use is to set forth and give value to color."

Having chosen the ware, next select the style of decoration, and this being a matter of individual taste, no comment is necessary farther than this: If English ware be chosen, have it well-covered with decoration—the more the better, as you cannot have too much to be in keeping with the prevailing taste in this grade. If, however, you decide in favor of the French porcelain, quality, not quantity, should be the test. A little decoration of choice quality and exquisite execution is far handsomer than elaborate patterns, although taste has largely changed in this particular, and many a design is now en règle that only a short time ago would have been pronounced loud and coarse.

Let me assume, however, that, discarding the fixed assortment of the regulation dinner-set, you have determined to furnish your table with porcelain and glass esthetically selected, and are desirous of producing, by careful choice, a result which shall be unmatched in its complete union of usefulness and beauty. To compass this end, much care and study are necessary, coupled with no little knowledge; but the result will well repay the trouble.

For the first course the selection is restricted exclusively to choice of shape and decoration, as French china is almost the only ware in which you can obtain the articles needed. If you intend serving the soup outside the dining-room, soup-plates only are necessary, and for formal dinners this is the usual plan pursued. In less elaborate entertainments a soup-set, comprised of the soup-tureen and stand or salver and the soup-plates, presents a handsome appearance on the table. Of late years the shapes of soup-tureens and other covered pieces for the table have changed completely, oval and round being entirely superseded by square dishes. The decoration of the soup-set is a matter of individual taste, and needs no farther suggestion.

The fish-sets now made are among the handsomest articles in pottery, and a great variety is offered in all wares and designs. English majolica, Argenta ware and French china are best adapted for the purpose, and as the first course must from necessity be of French porcelain, a pretty contrast is obtained by using English ware for the second. In my estimation the Argenta ware of Wedgwood is preferable to any other material for this course. The decoration must consist of fish, shells or marine plants, or, still better, a combination of the three. A pretty conceit is offered in French sets, having a single fish painted across the centre of each plate, with head and tail extending almost to the extreme rim on either side. The fish-dish has a large fish reaching the entire length. A fish-set should contain the fish-dish or platter, plates for serving, and a sauce-boat for drawn butter. The latter is often omitted.

In the game-set—which is almost identical in assortment with the fish-set, except that the dish is wider and shorter, and instead of the sauce-boat is a little-handled compotier for jelly—you are again compelled to accept French goods or else have your plates of different material from the balance of the set at this course. In fact, it is the French alone who understand the system I am describing, and upon them we are dependent for beauty at the table as well as in almost every place where delicate touches of ornamentation are required. In English china some exquisite game-plates are made by Brownfield on an octagon-shaped plate, richly gilded, each having in its centre the head of such bird or animal as would properly appear at this course.

Next in order is the roast or entrée. Either of these courses requires a small dinner-set, being in fact the dinner itself, to which all preceding courses are introductory and all subsequent ones supplementary. A Chinese set of blue-and-white is, esthetically speaking, the proper thing in this course, and this is almost the only place in which Chinese ware can be used to advantage. Its expense is for most sets more than other wares, but not so exorbitant as formerly. English printed ware of the better grades, such as Copeland or Minton make, is also effective for use at this stage of the meal.

Salad-sets may be of majolica or porcelain. If of the former, a pretty salad-dish is tall in shape, with panels at the side, in which are raised representations of lobsters, vegetables, etc.—everything, in fact, from which salad can be prepared. Do not, however, purchase the plates that usually accompany this dish, as the raised surface is awkward for use, and should never be selected except for fruit or some such service.

The ice-cream and berry-set is prettier in glass than any other material, not only for its own beauty, but to serve as a foil to the charms of porcelain and earthenware, of which by this time the eye has wearied. Craqueled, amber, iced and cut-glass are offered for your selection, and in choosing you cannot go far astray, as either of the styles named will make a handsome display on the table. The first two are rather old, and, if expense is no object with you, by all means select the heavily-cut glass. If possible, let it be of English make, this being better in color and workmanship than the domestic article.

Nothing now remains for consideration in the regular table course but fruit or dessert-plates, after-dinner coffees and finger-bowls.

Of the first there seems to be no end. Every grade of ware or style of decoration, from every country where pottery is made, has representatives. Please your own taste in the selection, but they must or should be of the same ware and general character of treatment as the after-dinner coffees, with which they really belong as part of a course service. A popular custom, and one that produces a very pretty effect if properly chosen, is to have this course furnished with a variety of designs, all, however, being upon ware of the same make, and the decorations such as harmonize with each other. Do not overlook the necessity of following this latter suggestion, or the entire effect may be spoiled by a collection of designs all beautiful in themselves but unsuitable for simultaneous use.

The assortment of after-dinner coffees is even greater than of fruit-plates, and it would be useless to attempt to guide your choice.

In finger-bowls select colored glass in preference to plain, or even cut crystal, this being not only newer and more fashionable at present, but more delicate in appearance, as the colored glass prevents the water showing at the sides. They should be of assorted colors, and each one have its own plate of glass to match resting on a napkin of crimson or other color, which, in its turn, rests upon a dessert-plate. The glassware upon the table should be all of the same style, and must be either the thin blown glass or the heavy cut—the latter is preferable, but much higher in price than the thin article.

These pieces form the necessary assortment for the several courses; yet, while they include all that is really necessary, as your design is to produce an effect really artistic and worthy to be a model, every little detail must be carefully studied. The little things upon the table—outside of and belonging to no course—are like conjunctions and prepositions in language, connecting or adding to the various services; and in these seemingly insignificant details lies the beauty or ugliness of the entire collection. Briefly summed up, these little things are: Individual butter-plates of majolica or porcelain, prettily decorated but different from any other set upon the table; individual or table salts (both are much used), generally of cut glass; sugar-bowl and cream-pitcher, both of Wedgwood's exquisite jasperware, but differing in color, having one black if possible; syrup-pitcher, if used, may be of the same ware. For berries or fruit a little sugar-bowl and cream-pitcher of folded green leaves are daintily attractive.

But need I continue? In this outline I only design giving the framework or skeleton upon which each must hang the garments as taste may dictate. My plea is for more care and thought toward the gratification of the eye when furnishing the table than is usually considered necessary. The dining-room should be cheerful and attractive. The meal should be partaken of with that entire pleasure that can only come from a complete gratification of all the senses. Try if the charms of a well-appointed breakfast-table will not induce the head of the household to lay aside his morning newspaper and join in cheery conversation, and this room thus become for all, residents and visitors alike, what, as I said at the beginning, it should be—the most attractive in the house.

It has been suggested to me that a fitting topic with which to conclude this subject would be "Pottery in the Ash Barrel;" but there are certain emotions or sentiments of the human breast too sacred for idle comment, too tender for rough handling, and this is one. The woman who is "Mistress of herself though china fall," is in possession of a degree of self-control worthy of monumental recognition. The mere mention of the subject brings to the memory of each a flood of painful recollections of departed treasures, over which we shed a parting tear and consign them to oblivion's kindly keeping.

CASTLE-BUILDING.

"What are you building, darling?"

I asked of my girlie fair,
As she quietly sat on the hearth-rug,
Piling her blocks with care,
While the ruddy glow of the firelight
Danced in her golden hair.

"I am building a castle, mother,"

My little maid replied.

"These are the walls around it,

And here is a gateway wide,
And this is the winding stair
To climb up by the side."

So the busy, flitting fingers
Went on with her pretty play,
And the castle walls were rising
In the fading winter day,
When—a sudden, luckless motion,
And all in ruins lay!

Ah, merry little builder,
The years with stealthy feet
May bring full many a vision
Of castles rare and sweet,
That end like your baby pastime—
In ruin sad and fleet.

Yes, laugh o'er the toy walls fallen,
For sunshine follows rain,
And we may smile, looking backward
At ruined shrine and fane.
While the heart has shattered temples,
It may not build again.

LUCY RANDOLPH FLEMING.

LEX TALIONIS IN THE NURSERY.

IN these days when insignificant causes are credited with large results, and trivial influences are recognized as potent factors in development, it may not be amiss to scan with critical eyes even our most familiar nursery ways, lest traits not altogether charming may be unconsciously fostered by them.

This occurred to me the other day with the freshness of a new idea when I saw a fair and gentle young mother, quite an ideal Madonna, instigate her baby to retaliation when he thumped his head against a chair. "Naughty chair to hurt the baby!" cried mamma, eager to divert the little fellow and check his tears. "Baby pound the chair." Whereupon, with a vindictive wrinkle across his little nose, he pounded and was comforted. His mother, glad of restored cheerfulness, smiled on the performance.

It seems usually to be assumed in the nursery that all a baby's mishaps are malicious and unprovoked attacks upon him. No venerable piece of furniture is supposed to be too sedate to assault the youngster in his lurching rambles around the room, and when the crash comes it is always this unprincipled assailant—never the baby—who is to blame, and nurses smile to see the baby forget to cry in his vigorous retaliation.

It would be interesting, if it were possible, to know how much of the inconsiderate treatment of others and the lack of appreciation of the consequences to another of our own acts, which we see in later life, is due to, or at least encouraged by, these nursery tactics. It is such a strong impulse of human nature to impute blame to another and shirk it one's self that a few years of irresponsibility and revenge in the nursery must give this impulse a chance to become a habit and strike deep root in some congenial soils.

The small boy who bullies the nursery furniture, and considers somebody else responsible for every infantile bump, will bully his playmates by and by, and accuse every one but himself when things go wrong; and the little fist that was so quick to pound an offending chair will illy bear restraint when a comrade offends.

This applies more especially to those autocrats of the nursery, only-children, or children so much younger than their brothers and sisters that they miss the wholesome friction and restraint of conflicting, and occasionally dominating, interests. But in every family where children are under the care and influence of nurses there is occasion for discretion in this matter.

The mother of one imperious little fellow early recognized his tendency to self-assertion and resentment under supposed injury. As she had especial reason to dread the development of these traits in him, she sought, while he was a mere baby, to modify them. Whenever the baby's head and the door-knob came in collision they were mutually condoled with, while baby was made to feel that he was the trespasser. A severe bout with the rocking-chair was compromised to the satisfaction of all parties by the application of brown paper to the forehead of the baby and the rocker of the chair. It was found that the supposed injuries of his fellow sufferer diverted his attention from his own, serving that purpose as well as the retaliatory method, while teaching him self-forgetfulness and sympathy.

It did not seem wholly laughable to that mother when, at three years of age, she saw him, supposing himself to be alone, turn and apologetically kiss the door-step upon which he had inconsiderately slipped and bumped.

This child was one who instinctively thought every injury intentional, and whose native impulse was a revengeful blow or kick. A temperament sensitive to affront, misconstruing the slightest act into an insult, quick in resentment and slow in forgiveness, inevitably brings keen pain to all lives closely associated with it, and any modification of these traits during childhood is a far-reaching blessing. This mother felt that, although her imperious and hot-tempered little man might grow into an imperious and hot-tempered big man, he would never be so inconsiderate of others as he might have been had he not kissed that door-step.

Thoughtfulness for others and a sense of mutual responsibility certainly can be taught very young children; and one of the many ways to teach it—one of the little ways which it is not safe to ignore or disrespect—is not to let even the baby suppose that anybody or anything wantonly injures him; to teach him that accidents are purely accidents, for which he is likely to be as much to blame as any one else—often the most so—and that if he is hurt, he must not forget that the other party may be hurt, too, and needing sympathy as much as he. It is a frequent thing to see large children angrily resenting the most evident accidents, and sullenly reiterating "he meant to," "he meant to hurt me—see if I don't pay him for it," etc., etc. Defective nursery training must share with natural depravity the responsibility for some of these unlovely manifestations. Magnanimity may be a virtue of slow growth, but the seed should be planted all the earlier and tended the more carefully for that reason.

Since the small things of life sum up its happiness, and the every-day mental attitude and mood of a friend affects our comfort more than spasmodic exhibitions of the greatest nobility or heroism, no ungracious tendency is too insignificant or possible grace too elusive for thoughtful treatment in the development of a child.

MARY H. BURTON.

It is always salutary, if not always agreeable, to see ourselves through the spectacles of other people, and Mr. Edward Freeman, whose recent visit to this country introduced him to hosts of Americans, reads us some lectures that contain a great deal of thoughtful comment on our political and social conditions. No foreigner, unless it be De Tocqueville—certainly no Englishman—has ever stated so intelligently, comprehensively and briefly the great underlying principles of our political system. This is very remarkable in view of the conflicting impressions which a stranger must of necessity imbibe through conversation with individuals belonging to the great opposing factions in American politics.

In one of his most suggestive chapters Mr. Freeman says: "I often asked my American friends of both political parties what was the difference between them. I told them that I could see none; both sides seemed to me to say exactly the same things. I sometimes got the convenient, but not wholly satisfactory, answer: Yes; but then we mean what we say, while the other party only pretends. Certainly, when I was there, the difference between different sections of the Republican party was much clearer to an outsider than the difference between Republicans and Democrats. I found it easier to grasp the difference between a Stalwart Republican and a Republican who was not a Stalwart than to grasp the immediate difference between a Republican and a Democrat. . . . There are abiding differences between them, differences which have been important in the past, which may be important in the future; but just now questions which would bring out those differences are not uppermost. . . . It is simply because there is no such burning question at present stirring that the two parties seem largely to say the same things, and yet to be as strongly divided as ever. I may speak on this matter as one who has made the nature of federal government an object of special study. It strikes me that, as the doctrine of State Rights was pushed to a mischievous extreme twenty years and more ago, so there is danger now of the opposite doctrine being pushed to a mischievous extreme. The more I look at the American Union the more convinced I am that so vast a region, taking in lands whose condition differs so widely in everything, can be kept together only by a federal system, leaving large independent powers in the hands of the several States. No single parliament could legislate, no single government could administer, for Maine, Florida and California. Let those states be left to a great extent independent and they may remain united on those points on which it is well that they should remain united. To insist on too close a union is the very way to lead to separation. I know of no immediate reason to fear any attempt at centralization, such as might thus lead to separation. But it does seem to be a possible danger; it seems to me that there are tendencies at work which are more likely to lead to that form of error than to its opposite. In discussing this matter I must cleave to some doctrines which I know are in some quarters looked on as obsolete. I must even cleave to the phrase 'Sovereign States,' though I know it may offend many. For a state is sovereign which has any powers which it holds by inherent right, without control on the part of any other power, without responsibility to any other power. Now every American state has powers of this kind. The original thirteen states did not receive their existing powers from the Union; they surrendered to the Union certain powers which were naturally their own, and kept certain others to themselves. And the later states were admitted on the same terms and to the same rights as the original thirteen. There is therefore a range within which the state is sovereign: within another range, within the range of the powers which have been surrendered to the Union, the Union is sovereign."

Elsewhere it is curious to find Mr. Freeman speaking of certain small American towns, notably Bristol, Penna., and Farmington, Conn., as having "a thoroughly Old World look." In Farmington, however, he seems to have been somewhat shocked at finding the oldest house in town occupied by "Ould Ireland Papishes" instead of by the New England Puritans, whom he had hoped to see.

SOME months ago it was announced that a French archæologist, M. Le Plongeon by name, had made surprising discoveries in the peninsula of Yucatan. The expedition was undertaken, we believe, at the instance of the French Government, or at least with its assistance, and researches prosecuted for several years have brought to light records which lend additional strength to the claims of America to an antiquity far greater than that of which the so-called "Old" World can boast. Many of the finest ruins are still inaccessible, being within the territory of hostile Indians, whose poisoned arrows and warlike characteristics render scientific invasion impracticable without armed protection. In one of the cities, Ake by name, whose temples were in use at the time of the Spanish Conquest, are "katuns," or time-columns, each marking a period of one hundred and sixty years. Of these there are thirty-six in one of the buildings, marking the lapse of nearly six thousand years. As these columns were connected with religious ceremonies, it is not likely that any irregularities interrupted the regular placing of the stones. Another certificate of antiquity is found in the occurrence of the head of the mastodon as a religious symbol or object of worship. Now, geologists tell us, on what they regard as indisputable evidence, that the animal was extinct as much as ten thousand years ago, and the inference is certainly fair that the builders of these temples could have known of its existence only through direct tradition. At all events, it is difficult to understand how they could otherwise have produced its image. There is, moreover, an identity almost absolute between the manners and customs indicated by these early Yucatanese records and those of Chaldea, Persia, Burnah and Siam, and the Masonic fraternity will, it is said, be enabled to add a few thousand years to their record in consequence of Dr. Plongeon's discoveries. When Commander Gorringe found alleged Masonic symbols under the obelisk, Freemasons complacently reminded us that they had always said so, and we may assume that they will not "let on" that they are in the least surprised at this additional proof of their respectable antiquity. Far be it from us to cast ridicule upon an eminently honorable fraternity; but if this kind of thing is to go on, would it not be well to claim the fig-leaf of Scripture as the original symbolic apron of Masonry?

THE sketch entitled "Miss Hildreth," in No. 64 of THE CONTINENT, was written by Mary N. Prescott, and not by her sister, Harriet Prescott Spofford. These two well-known authors will please note the editor's apology for the not altogether unnatural mistake.

THE many thousands who in later years learned to identify the "Arthur" of "Tom Brown at Rugby" with Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, Dean of Westminster, will welcome the little volume in which the personal recollections of his life-long friend, Dean Bradley, are embodied. It is no formal memoir. The book took its origin in two lectures delivered before the Philosophical Society of Edinburgh, to which he added a third given at Fettes College, the three forming three chapters in what is, while waiting for a more formal biography, the best picture of the man yet given.

While disclaiming the idea that this is in any sense biography, Dean Bradley writes:

"Yet I venture to hope that the publication even of the short summary of his life and work which is comprised in these three chapters may be not unwelcome to some, at least, among the many who, beyond the limits of those to whom they were directly addressed, had yet felt the spell of his character, or had been attracted or instructed by his writings."

There is no attempt at criticism or analysis of work accomplished. Dr. Bradley divides Stanley's life into seven distinct stages, and the division makes itself naturally.

"They are, first, his childhood at Alderley; next, his boyhood at Rugby, where he grew up under the influence of his great teacher, Dr. Arnold. Then follows his brilliant career as a scholar at Balliol. Then, fourthly, the many important years that he passed as a resident member of the University of Oxford and as an active and influential tutor, no longer of Balliol, but of University College. After this come the seven quiet years of his canonry at Canterbury; then his work as Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Oxford, and, finally, the closing and culminating stage of all, his life and death as Dean of Westminster."

The picture of his boyhood as well as early childhood is a very beautiful one. His mother united the deepest tenderness with a clear-eyed sagacity seldom found in such connection, and he was singularly fortunate in father as well as mother. A shy and shrinking child, there was little indication, from seven to fourteen, of the brilliant talker he afterward became. His passion was for reading, and though he had moments of longing to join in the pleasures of other boys, and brooded over his isolation, he passed through this stage, and under Arnold's powerful influence aroused once for all. He still suffered from shyness, but became distinguished at once for talent, carrying off in one year the five great school distinctions. The tradition still runs that Dr. Arnold, as he handed him the last of these prizes amid the breathless silence of the forms, said quietly:

"'Thank you, Stanley, we have nothing more to give you.' 'Still,' writes Dr. Bradley, 'on the other hand, it is not to be supposed that, happy and cheerful as he was at school, he ever became a genuine specimen of what is now ordinarily understood by a "public school boy." He ranged freely over the country, not very interesting in itself, round Rugby; but he never acquired any taste for the ordinary games and amusements which now-a-days fill the foreground in the popular conception of young Rugby life. Indeed the taste for such games, far less organized than they are now, was less widely diffused than it has since become, and the distinction between the many who played or idled and the few who worked, greatly effaced since, was in the earlier and rougher period of Arnold's time still strongly marked.'"

At Oxford he won the Newdigate prize, and after taking his degree became a tutor, a popular one, and wielding more and more influence as time went on. He was the friend of all his pupils.

"'We walked with him, sometimes took our meals with him—frugal meals, for he was at the mercy of an unappreciative college "scout," who was not above taking advantage of his master's helplessness in arranging for a meal and his indifference to any article of diet other than brown bread and butter; we talked with him over that bread and butter with entire freedom, opened our hearts to him, while his perfect simplicity, no less than his high-bred refinement, made it impossible to dream that any one in his sober senses could presume upon his kindness.' Dr. Bradley tells a characteristic story of his first Eastern trip which illustrates this capacity for making and holding friends: 'Mohammed, the faithful dragoman, after the last farewell was over, crept down into the cabin, knelt and seized his hand, and then rushed away with an outburst of passionate grief at parting with one whom he would never see again, and whom, in spite of the difference of creed, he revered as a saint.'"

His zeal in controversy was by no means love of conflict, but arose, as in his father's case, from love of truth and the determination to allow free speech and thought to all. The title of liberal Christian, though bestowed upon him sneeringly, was his dearest possession, and his place in American minds had come to be so large an one that Dean Bradley's just and sympathetic memorial will find as many readers here as on the other side, those who knew him best and longest joining with the casual acquaintance in the verdict pronounced upon him as a man:

"It is impossible for me to describe to you, it is difficult for me to analyze to myself, the feelings which he inspired in a circle, small at first, but with every fresh term widening and extending. The fascination, the charm, the spell, were simply irresistible; the face, the voice, the manner, the ready sympathy, the geniality, the freshness, the warmth, the poetry, the refinement, the humor, the mirthfulness and merriment, the fund of knowledge, the inexhaustible stores of anecdotes and stories, told so vividly, so dramatically—I shall not easily enumerate the gifts which drew us to him with a singular, some of us with quite a passionate, devotion."

THOUGH the field in the eleventh volume of "Campaigns of the Civil War"¹ is more limited than any previously treated, both in the number of troops and the space occupied by their movements, it is one of the most interesting of the series. It is the story of the last year of the war in the Shenandoah Valley, and though the first chapters are necessarily only a record of skirmishes and small battles with no definite result, the interest increases steadily, and as soon as definite policy in Washington is recorded there is very definite action in the Valley. It was from this point that all the operations came, bearing most directly on the North, for the threatening of Baltimore and Washington by General Early brought the terrors of war more really home to us than any more remote campaign had done. Until the sending of Sheridan to take full command the Valley campaign had been at the mercy of many minds, Halleck at the War Department waiting for advices from Grant at City Point, days being lost by these slow methods. With the change, Grant, while retaining full authority, left Sheridan greatly to his own discretion. The record shows absolute trust and loyalty on either side, and Grant's confidence was most triumphantly justified in the short but brilliant campaign, in which the young general sent Early "whirling through Winchester." The story of the famous ride is as exhilarating as the poem we all know, and Mr. Pond has used his material to such advantage that the book cannot fail to be one of the most popular of the series.

THE city of Delit has formally commemorated the tercentenary of Grotius, and a movement has been begun for the erection of a monument.

A NEW society novel, anonymous, but announced to be by "a well-known Bostonian," will be published immediately by Cupples, Upham & Co., successors to A. Williams & Co.

PROFESSOR McMASTER, of Princeton, the brilliant author of the new history of the American people, is to write the life of Benjamin Franklin, in the "American Men of Letters Series."

"THE MAGAZINE OF AMERICAN HISTORY" has been sold by A. S. Barnes & Co. to the Historical Publication Company, New York, and it will be edited hereafter by Mrs. Martha J. Lamb, well known as the author of "The History of the City of New York."

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, who print the only authorized edition of Mrs. Carlyle's letters, lately issued by them in two octavo volumes, have published a new and cheaper edition in one volume, printed from the same plates, and with an etched portrait of Mrs. Carlyle.

MESSRS. EDWARD STERN & Co. will shortly publish an article by Mr. Hyman Polock Rosenbach on the "Jews in Philadelphia prior to 1800." This will be the first work on this subject ever printed. The edition will be limited to two hundred and fifty large paper copies.

"THE DOMESTIC MONTHLY," which has always had a literary flavor much more decided than that of the average fashion magazine, is to print a new novel by Justin McCarthy with the title of "Maid of Athens," his first literary work since the completion of the popular "History of Our Own Times" a few years ago.

THE first volume of the new series of "Plymouth Pulpit," published by Fords, Howard & Hulbert, has just been completed with No. 26 of the series, which will be found to contain not only all the old charm of style but a steady increase in every deeper quality, faith and hope growing stronger with every year of the preacher's life.

THE Boston Journal gives a hint to publishers which all readers will trust they will take to heart. "An extra expenditure of two or three cents in strengthening the back of a book makes all the difference between a book which will drop to pieces after a little handling and one which will stand wear. Most people would rather have the money spent in that way than in fantastic decorations for the covers."

MR. GEORGE H. CALVERT is less successful in rhymed stanzas than in blank verse, and thus "Joan of Arc; A Narrative Poem," falls below the standard of "Mirabeau." It appeared a decade and more ago, and may possibly to-day be less valued by the author than when he first gave it to print. It is smooth verse; the story is told at length, but it is not poetry. (16mo, pp. 108, $1.00; Lee & Shepard, Boston).

AN exceedingly compact and well-written addition has been made to the "American Health Primers" series, in "Brain-work and Over-work," by Dr. H. C. Wood. He treats the causes of nervous trouble at length, emphasizing the necessity of hygienic knowledge, and then passes to "Work," and its effects; "Rest in Labor," "Rest in Recreation" and "Rest in Sleep." The little book is entertaining as well as useful, and should be in the hands of every brain-worker. (Paper, pp. 126; 30 cents. P. Blakiston, Son & Co., Philadelphia).

ANOTHER addition has been made to Mr. William S. Gottsberger's excellent translations from foreign authors in "Marianela," by B. Perez Galdos; translated from the Spanish by Clara Bell. The little story is picturesque and dramatic. There is no tragedy, as in "Gloria," but a catastrophe, pathetic rather than terrible, and a humor which sparkles here and there and lights up the somewhat sombre picture, and the book will well repay reading. (16mo, pp. 264, $1.00.)

THE first number of the "Leisure Moment Series," "Gideon Fleyce," by H. W. Lucy, has appeared, the novel being also included in the "Leisure Hour Series." Paper and print are excellent, and the low price and convenient form will undoubtedly make the new venture a very popular one. The story is in some points unusually powerful, giving some excellent descriptions of English middle-class life, and an electoral contest, entered into by Gideon Fleyce, who is a renegade Jew, determined to use his wealth in making a place for himself among the Gentiles. There is a murder of a very sensational order, the chapter in which the dead man's appearance and surroundings are described holding a strong suggestion of the memorable one in "The House of Seven Gables," and there are numerous well-managed subordinate characters, Captain O'Brien and Napper Tandy, a heroine much more charming than her name, being the most successful. (Paper, pp. 324; 30 cents. Henry Holt & Co.).

AN octavo volume of over five hundred pages, in which there is not a solitary dull one, is a somewhat astonishing statement to be made of a new life of Cromwell, any lively interest in which might seem to have been exhausted by Carlyle. But Mr. J. Allanson Picton, the author, who considers that there is room for a life written in less complex fashion than that by Carlyle, proves his point, having made a volume in which there is very little analysis of motives, or of Cromwell's political morality, but a story of his acts, from which the reader may draw his own inferences. Mr. Picton is said to be an Independent preacher, and thus is in fuller sympathy with Cromwell's religious views—really the largest part of the man—than a Church of England man could possibly be; but he is impartial, quiet and candid, and has made as trustworthy a study of his subject as it is possible to accomplish. Cromwell's chief benefit to mankind, according to Mr. Picton, lay "in his power to meet a great emergency of revolutionary violence; in the frankness with which he accepted as the practical issue of the time a duel to the death between prerogative and self-government; in his capacity to inspire thousands with his own enthusiasm; in his predominant energy which forced distracted parties to unison of action; in the prophetic fire that kindled into one flame the religious zeal, the patriotic fervor, and the personal devotion of his followers." The make-up of the book is especially neat. (8vo, pp. 516, $3.50; Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co., New York).

"ON VIOL AND FLUTE" well expresses the dainty and melodious nature of the verse enshrined in a volume in which the printer's art has done all that its possibilities include. From cover to cover, binding, paper, margin and type are all perfect enough to please the most exacting book lover. For the poems there may be more question, though no one will deny to Mr. Gosse many of the best qualities of the younger school of poets; a delicate and graceful fancy—here and there a subtle thought—a sympathy with the moods of nature and real power of interpretation, and a full knowledge of whatever rhythmic power lies in words. Like all of this school he has serious limitations. His outlook seems bounded by the horizon;

he is more in sympathy with the ancient Greek spirit than with the spirit of humanity, and he reproduces the airy manner of the early French trouvere poetry, pleasing himself with this revived fashion in rhythm, as in one of the latest poems, "Expectation," and in the "Sestina," one of the best modern examples of this difficult measure. "To My Daughter" is an exquisite poem, and there is strong human quality in the final ballad already widely copied, which appeared first in Cassell's Magazine of Art, "The Cruise of the Rover." If Mr. Gosse lacks the power essential in the work of the true poet, a consecration lacking in this lighter verse, he is always musical, delicate and pure, and with such foundation there is room still for the greater poem not yet attained. (12mo, pp. 250, $2.00; Henry Holt & Co., New York).

MR. BROWNING's star is certainly in the ascendant in America, two prominent publishing houses having within a short interval of each other found it desirable to issue selections from his poems, each prefaced by an essay on his work as a poet. Both volumes are fine specimens of book making, but the present one from Dodd, Mead & Co. has the advantage of a fine portrait of Mr. Browning. Mr. Grant White's essay is necessarily less satisfactory than that of Mr. Stedman, himself a poet and of a quieter temper of mind than the former, who goes out of his way to give an unnecessary fling at Mr. Longfellow and at women in general, who in this country at least are Mr. Browning's most constant readers, defenders and expounders. "He writes for thinking men," Mr. White announces. "'Bishop Blougram's Apology' and even 'Childe Roland' do not interest the average young woman of these much literate times; and the average young woman is now a large constituent part of the audience which the general high-average poet of the day—a Longfellow, for example—has in his mind's eye as he is writing." This seems rather gratuitous, but need not affect the enjoyment sure to be found in the careful selection, which began as Mr. Browning's own choice, and was embodied in two bulky volumes, printed in England. "This collection some half a dozen lovers and students of his poetry read carefully, and made a list each of them, without the knowledge of the other, of the pieces he or she would choose; and those for which there was a union, or nearly a union, of all voices, were selected. A few were then added from his more recently published poems." This collection was again weeded, and the result is "Browning at his best, and nearly all the best of Browning," in which statement every reader is likely to agree, though, as in all collections, one fails occasionally to find what would have been expected to hold prominent place. (12mo, pp. 265, $2.00).

In a recent communication to the Biological Society, M. G. Delaunay observed that medicine, as practiced by animals, is thoroughly empirical; but the same may be said of that practiced by inferior human races, or, in other words, by the majority of the human species. Animals instinctively choose such food as is best suited to them. A large number of animals wash themselves and bathe, as elephants, stags, birds and ants. Man may well take a lesson in hygiene from the lower animals. Animals rid themselves of parasites by using dust, mud, clay, etc. Those suffering from fever restrict their diet, keep quiet, seek darkness and airy places, drink water and sometimes even plunge into it. When a dog has lost its appetite, it eats that species of grass known as dog's-grass, which acts as an emetic and purgative. Cats also eat grass. Sheep and cows, when ill, seek out certain herbs. When dogs are constipated, they eat fatty substances, such as oil and butter, with avidity, until they are purged. The same thing is observed in horses. An animal suffering from chronic rheumatism always keeps in the sun as much as possible. The warrior ants have regularly organized ambulances. Latreille cut the antennæ of an ant, and other ants came and covered the wounded part with a transparent fluid secreted from their mouths. If a chimpanzee be wounded, it stops the bleeding by placing its hand on the wound, or dressing it with leaves and grass. When an animal has a wounded leg or arm hanging on, it completes the amputation by means of its teeth. A dog on being stung in the muzzle by a viper, was observed to plunge its head repeatedly for several days into running water. This animal eventually recovered. A sporting dog was run over by a carriage. During three weeks in winter it remained lying in a brook, where its food was taken to it; the animal recovered. A terrier dog hurt its right eye. It remained lying under a counter, avoiding light and heat, although its custom had been to keep close to the fire. It adopted a general treatment, rest and abstinence from food. The local treatment consisted in licking the upper surface of the paw, which it applied to the wounded eye, again licking the paw when it became dry. Cats also, when hurt, treat themselves by this simple method of continuous irrigation. M. Delaunay cites the case of a cat which remained for some time lying on the bank of a river; also that of another cat which had the singular fortitude to remain for forty-eight hours under a jet of cold water. In view of these interesting facts, we are, he thinks, forced to admit that hygiene and therapeutics, as practiced by animals, may, in the interests of psychology, be studied with advantage. He could, thinks the British Medical Journal, go even farther, and say that veterinary medicine, and perhaps human medicine, could gather from them some useful indications, precisely because they are prompted by instincts which are efficacious in the preservation or the restoration of health.

THE report of the Commissioner of the Imperial Japanese Mint, Osaka, being the twelfth report of the Japanese Mint, shows that the high standard of excellence of the work done at this establishment is still kept up. Rather more gold was coined than during the previous year, viz. 803,645 yen, all in five-yen pieces (the yen is almost equivalent to the United States dollar); the silver coined during this year was all in one-yen pieces, and amounted to 3,294,988 yen; whilst the nominal value of the copper coins, in two-sen, one-sen and half-sen pieces, was 1,130,548 yen. The total nominal value of the coins of all denominations struck since the commencement of the mint to the end of the last financial year is 102,888,478 yen, of which more than one-half is gold and two-fifths silver. Besides this a large number of medals have been struck and refined ingots produced. This year a large number of old bronze guns and field-pieces have been melted down, refined and converted into copper coins, and also additional improvements and economies have been made in the treatment of old Japanese silver coins prior to their recoinage. The sulphuric acid works in connection with the mint have been more busy than last year, and nearly a million pounds of acid have been exported to China in addition to that produced for home consumption. It is curious to note that while the United States has hitherto been content to depend on England or France for all its soda ash, of which it consumes an enormous quantity annually, Japan has already begun to supply its own demands, and from its soda works—now in working order—a considerable out-turn of sulphate, black ash, white ash, and crystalized soda has been made. Caustic and bicarbonate of soda will shortly be produced, and it is proposed to add works for the production of bleaching powder, so as to utilize the whole of the hydrochloric acid formed. There was a considerable increase in the amount of Korean gold-dust received during the year, but it was not generally of a high standard. The curve showing the variation in weight of the silver yen issued, as also the report of the trial of the pyx, and the reports of the assays of the pyx pieces made by Professor Chandler Roberts, of the Mint in England, and by Mr. Lawner, of the American Mint, show that the greatest care and attention are given to every department, both by the foreign employes and by the native officials.

In a paper read before the American Public Health Association, John T. Nagle, M. D., gives the results of his investigations regarding suicides in New York city during the eleven years ending December 31, 1880. It appears that during that time 1521 deaths were registered in the Health Office as caused by suicide, 1193 being of males, and 328 of females; whites, 1518; colored, 3. It seems, however, that the register refers certain deaths to suicide which would certainly not be included under that head by most registers, since they were evidently accidental and not intentional. The highest yearly rate of suicide in New York city during the past seventy-seven years was in 1805, when there was one suicide to every 3017 inhabitants; and the lowest rate was in 1864, when there was one suicide to 23,827 inhabitants. Taking those races present in sufficiently large numbers to make the comparison of value, we find 626 suicides among the Germans, giving a rate of 34.49 per 100,000, for eleven years. The Irish furnish 213 cases, giving the rate of 9.71 per 100,000, and the United States 368, giving a rate of 5.61. Evidently the American is not so easily discouraged as the others. The most common means used was poison, which is reported in 503 cases. Paris green was the poison most used, being the cause in 200 cases. Hanging was employed in 237 cases; cuts and stabs in 174; gun and pistol-shot wounds in 395, and drowning in 99 cases. Tables are given comparing the rates in New York with those of other cities, both American and foreign, for the year 1880, but for the great majority the numbers are too small to have any statistical value. The smallest proportion of suicides is found in the Scotch cities, taken altogether.

MR. J. E. TODD, in the American Naturalist, gives the following account of the singular habits of the Psoralea Argophylla. During an extended trip in Dakota this plant was a daily companion. So abundant is it that it gives large areas of the prairie a silvery whiteness. In the latter part of August a hot southwest wind blew for several days, which so blocked the roads in places with the loose "tops" or stems of this plant as to considerably retard a team in traveling, reminding one of similar experience with the "tumble-weed" and "tickle-grass" near cultivated fields after a frost. The fashion followed by these utterly diverse plants is beautifully adapted for scattering seed over the prairies. They all form in growing a spherical bushy top, but their methods in starting on their journey are very different. In the case of the "tickle-grass," the panicle breaks off at the first joint below. In the "tumble-weed" the root is usually pulled up to complete the lower part of the sphere, the plant usually growing in a loose soil. But the psoralea, growing in a hard turf, resorts to the following method: Very near the top of the ground a joint is formed in the stem, as perfect as that for separating a leaf from the stem. It cuts through all the tissues, so that when the top dries up and begins to sway in the wind, it is broken off very readily and evenly. One might perhaps think that the wrenching of the stem was the only cause of the separation, but I satisfied myself that a real joint is formed by examining plants still green. The bushy top of the psoralea is higher relatively from the ground than that of the amaranthus, so that it is roughly spherical without the root.

THE special feature of the new observatory at Columbia College will be a paper dome. "This will be the fourth paper dome in the world," said Professor Rees. "They have all been made by Waters & Sons, of Troy, N. Y.—the manufacturers of paper boats—and are all in this country. The first one made is at Troy Polytechnic Institute, the second at West Point, and the third at Beloit College. While that at West Point is the largest, this is the best in construction and arrangement. The method used in the manufacture of the paper is kept a secret, the makers using a private process. The dome is made in sections—semi-lunes, as they are technically called. There are twenty-four of these sections. They are bent over toward the inside at the edges, and bolted to ribs of wood. The thickness of the shell is only three-thirty-seconds of an inch, but it is as stiff as sheet-iron. On one side of the dome is the oblong opening for the telescope, and over this is a shutter (likewise of paper, but stiffened with wood lining), which slides around on the outside of the dome. The whole dome is so light that the hand can turn it. The inside diameter is twenty feet, and the height is eleven feet. The floor of the observatory is one hundred feet above the ground; it was necessary that it should be so high because of the tall buildings around it. The building is rapidly approaching completion, and the dome is already in place.

THE action of very diluted nitro muriatic acid (aqua regia) on meat and other animal substances has been recently studied by Signor Pavesi, and he finds the substance an excellent preservative agent. Meat, in pieces of about ten pounds, kept in the liquid in wooden vessels remains unaltered and savory for years. The meat treated may also be dried at sixty degrees to seventy degrees without undergoing change, apart from a diminution of volume and the appearance of a brown color. Put for a few hours in water, the meat recovers its original softness and natural color. The proportions of the acids in the preserving liquid are not given. The method is also adapted to the preservation of animal substances for scientific purposes, but presumably the "dilute" acid of commerce is considerably too strong for use in this manner. It is very cheap, however, and experiment would readily determine the proper degree of dilution.

S. A. LATIMORE.

One Pair Long Black Buttonless Kids.

A CONTRIBUTION TO A VEXED QUESTION.

Sam.

THERE was no sprucer-looking lad
When Sam came courting me;
At spelling-match or candy-pull,
Husking or apple-bee.

He never had a lazy bone,
So prospered like a charm;
Already well-to-do in life,
He'd bought a little farm.

For cabbages and onions thrived
Beneath his patient hand,
And corn and turnips seemed to grow
By magic on his land.

It was a happy day for me
When Sam made me his wife,
And everybody prophesied
For us a happy life.

And Sam was good and kind and true
As needle to the pole—
My happiness his constant aim,
My love his only goal.

He had some very grand ideas
For tiller of the soil,
And would not let me lift my hands
To any household toil.

Had I, like other women, trod
My round of petty cares,
Perchance I'd never known the yoke
That patient woman bears.

I learned the sufferings of my sex—
Ambition under ban,
Debarred all nobler paths to tread,
Crushed by the tyrant man;

Beneath the savage sway of Turk,
Within seraglios hid;
Under the light of Christian states,
To speak in church forbid;

Insulted by the stronger sex
With logic learned by rote,
Forced a debasing tax to pay,
Denied the right to vote.

I worked myself to fever-heat,
A burning letter penned,
Addressed to that progressive sheet,
The thoughtful "Woman's Friend."

I know not why, my letter took
Our little world by storm,
And kindly critics styled me, then,
"Th' Apostle of Reform."

I'd got my fingers in the ink,
And sturdy blows I dealt;
My name became a household word
Where woman's wrongs are felt.

When summoned to the lecture field
I boldly plead my cause,
Upholding to a nation's scorn
Unjust and partial laws.

Still there is something which I've lost
My honors ill repay:
Somewhere along my upward path
From Sam I've strayed away.

I begged he'd join with me to sound
The trumpet of alarm;
He guessed his mission mostly lay
In stumping round his farm.

He couldn't grasp progressive thought,
But looked supremely bored,
And when I read my finest work
He went to sleep and snored.

A vital spark of heavenly flame
Unto a clod allied!
Before I married such a dolt
I would that I had died!

A dolt who knows not when he's won
That noblest prize in life,
A soul above the commonplace—
A literary wife!

Now, seated at my desk, I write—
The desk he bought for me;
His feet in slippers that I worked,
He dreams, perchance, he's free.

I answer letters, plan campaigns,
Interpret Heaven's decrees;
He wonders if the ground's too wet
For planting early peas.

Sometimes, when woman seems content
Her slavish life to lead,
Careless alike of mission high,
Of noble thought and deed;

When open scorn or covert sneer
My efforts ill repay,
Sometimes I wish I had not grown
From Sam so far away.

THE CONTINENT

Vol. III. No. 21.

PHILADELPHIA, MAY 23, 1883.

Whole No. 67.

Without a pause, she glides along
 Adown the oaken stair
 Into her father's lordly hall;
 And as she enters there—
 The guests among—a throng of knights
 Surround the maiden fair.

She turns from all their whispered words
 To seek her father straight.
 "Yon noble stranger, who is he,"
 Said she, "that near doth wait?"
 He answered: "'Tis a bard who craved Admittance at our gate."

"Now if his song doth match his mien,
 Right goodly must it be!
 Oh, father, bid him sing," she cried,
 "That time may swifter flee!"
 The youthful minstrel heard her words,
 His harp of gold took he.

SONG.

Bird, in thy lonely nest,
 Fluttering often with a strange unrest,
 Why sing no song? Why entertain no guest?
 O say! dost thou await
 The coming of a heav'n-appointed mate,
 While visions haunt thy heart so desolate?

Though Love with fitful gleams
 Doth light thee through the happy land of dreams,
 When thou awakest, dark thy future seems;
 Yet all the woods around
 With wooing melodies of birds resound.
 Answer, sweet voice! none sweeter can be found.

Nay, if to charm thine eyes
 Love come not suddenly—a glad surprise—
 There is no hope for thee beneath the skies.
 Life must this rapture bring,
 Or thou wilt hide thy head and droop thy wing
 And die, e'er thou hast ever learned to sing!

The lady, speechless and entranced,
 Heard the sweet song he sung,
 For to the golden harp his voice
 In silver cadence rung;
 His words they reached her lonely heart,
 As on the sounds she hung.

He ceased. Then spake the castle's lord:
 "Lo! I am old in years,
 Yet ne'er hath lay save thine, O bard!
 Beguiled these eyes to tears;
 Here find thy home, and in return
 Thy voice shall charm our ears."

So, long within those friendly walls
 The minstrel fair did stay,
 And sweetly sang from early morn
 To ending of the day,
 He sang of love unto the maid,
 He sang her heart away!

At length thus spake her father stern:
 "Fair daughter, thou must wed.
 Of all who woo, by whom wilt thou
 A willing bride be led?"
 She blushed like morn. "I love the bard,
 And none save hi—" she said.

Then answered he in frowning wrath:
 "Jest not, rash maid, with me!"
 "I am not jesting, sire," she said,
 "For I will single be,
 Or wed with him." Fiercely he spake:
 "Now hence I banish thee."

"All portionless and meanly clad,
 Ere sets the sun this day
 Shalt thou be thrust without my gate
 With him thou lovest. Stay
 But to don a peasant's garb."
 She murmured, "I obey."

She bade him there a mute farewell,
 Her chamber straightway sought;
 She laid aside her jewels rare,
 Her satins richly wrought,
 And clothed her in the humble gown
 Her weeping maidens brought.

Yet when she stood thus lowly clad
 In garments scant and mean,
 Her lovely, youthful features shone
 With beauty most serene;
 And though she wore a peasant's garb,
 She bore her like a queen.

Her damsels said: "Our lord doth keep
 Her wealth and jewels rare,
 Yet still she hath her sapphire eyes
 And still her golden hair,
 Her teeth of pearl, her ruby lips—
 Gems all, beyond compare."

She turned and kissed them as they spake,
 Then glided swift and straight
 Down oaken stair, through lordly hall,
 E'en to the castle gate,
 And reached the minstrel where he stood
 Her coming to await.

"All portionless and meanly clad,
 Before thee now I stand!
 Oh, would," she said, "for thy dear sake
 I brought thee wealth and land!"
 He kissed her crystal tears away,
 And clasped her outstretched hand.

"Of all thou hadst, fair bride," quoth he,
 "I take the priceless part;
 For who can rob thee of thy grace,
 Or of thy loving heart?
 Say, wilt thou then indeed be mine,
 Rich treasure that thou art?"

"Oh, much I grieve for sire and home!
 Yet will I go!" said she.
 "There is a music in my soul
 Which none can wake but thee.
 My heart-strings quiver 'neath thy hand;
 Oh, touch them tenderly!"

Up turret high her maidens climbed
 To watch them journey on;
 The sunset lit her golden hair,
 His golden harp it shone;
 And thus they journeyed to the west,
 Thus vanished with the sun.

As it befell so long ago,
 So is it oft to-day,
 For when the minstrel Love doth woo
 'Tis hard to say him nay;
 E'en while we hearken to his song
 He steals our hearts away!

A SUMMER AT "MAGOG" LAKE.

You may take the evening train from Boston for Northern New England, and, as you have set your face toward Montreal, you will pull from your pocket a "folder" of the Chemin de fer Southeastern et ses connexions, and you will learn that, while you were chatting in plain English with your friend, you are, in reality, riding in a "char d'ortoir Pullman attaché au train de nuit de Boston à Montreal." Realizing that a Montrealer has as much right to speak French on his way to Boston as you have to speak English on the way to Montreal, Queen's Dominions, and a foreign tongue disputes precedence with your own. You are but little farther from home than if you had gone to Saratoga or to Lake George; but how different are the shores of Lake Memphremagog! If you are a New Yorker or a Philadelphian, you have gone considerably farther, and you are, even more than the Bostonian, impressed with the natural beauties of this lovely sheet of water.

Let no one imagine that we are treating Lake George with disrespect. Far be it from us to throw contempt upon the treasures of Horicon, or to think otherwise than reverently of the footfalls of Uncas, "last of the Mohicans." Nor shall we yield to any one in our appreciation of the eastern range of hills that starts with French Mountain and leads along through Pilot, Buck and Erebus up to Black Mountain; and, descending thence by way of the Elephant, Sugar-Loaf and Anthony's Nose, most appropriately ends in Mount Defiance, the constant threat of both French and English garrisons at Ticonderoga. Even Tongue Mountain and Shelving Rock, with their famous rattlesnakes, shall not escape our praise; and we should be ungrateful indeed if we had no pleasant memories of Gale's and Sherrill's, or of Judge Garfield, who could call all the trout and deer by name, or of "Captain Sam" Patchen. And if the history of our country entertains us as it should, we may travel far before we will find repeated within such a small radius the daring deeds of Major Rogers, Sir William Johnson, the Baron de Dieskau, or Generals Abercrombie, Amherst, Montgomery, Schuyler, Montcalm and Allen.

But there is a choice among good things. It was a sensible tourist who said: "Buy a guide-book, and then avoid the beaten paths it recommends. It leads inevitably to where fashion has gone; and if you want real rest and recreation, you do not want to go there. We go a step beyond this advice and say: "Come to Memphremagog and its tributary lakes. Leave an order at the office on your way to 'stop my paper,' and trust to some friend to telegraph you if the office or the factory is on fire. Cease to think of life in the city just because you haven't a pitcher of hot or cold water always at your command. In a word, make up your mind to thoroughly enjoy the country, and not simply to 'do' it, as is the custom with some."

Leaving Lake George, therefore, to the professional or to the "society" tourist, you will find in Memphremagog an expanse of water of equal length—over thirty miles—and of superior breadth—an average of more than two miles. You are not treading upon shores that are known to historical lore, save as the indomitable you still partake somewhat of the feelings of that Englishman who, utterly dazed at the jargon of Paris, was quite comforted and reassured by hearing a dog bark in the plainest English. You may travel "in English" from Boston on the train we have named, but when you awake in the morning you are on the borders of the

them to come out and fight. And yet, as allies of the French, they were dreaded in the disputes that arose regarding the boundary-lines after the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle—hence the active campaign of Major Rogers. As a barrier against their progress, the northern part of New Hampshire had already been surveyed and partially settled. The northern parts of neither New Hampshire nor Vermont were settled early, because they were exposed to the war-paths through Lake Champlain in the west and along the Connecticut and other rivers on the east. So lately as one hundred years ago the southern end of Lake Memphremagog was in the County of Charlotte in the nascent State of New York—a county which included all the northern boundary westward through Lake Champlain to St. Regis on the St. Lawrence, and southward to Saratoga, the converging lines including the Adirondacks and the larger of the Green Mountains.

Wild as was this region, it was surpassed in wildness by the tract that lay just across the border. What are known as "the Eastern Townships" or the "South-eastern Counties" were settled toward the end of the last century. They were so named to distinguish them from the "Seigniories," wherein the feudal law still held the French habitant. The townships were settled by pioneers, who came in a great proportion from New England by way of Lake Memphremagog, and they held their titles "in free and common soccage." These hardy pioneers were early "evangelized" by religious bodies in New England and New York, but more directly by Lorenzo Dow and Hezekiah Wooster. It may be that this accounts for the fact that litigation is so infrequent and criminals are so scarce that a single courthouse and jail serves four large counties at the eastward, and similar accommodations serve five counties at the westward, the lake appearing to divide this tract in halves from north to south; and yet, in one of these very courts, you may find a crier so lost to any reverence for royalty that he will open and close the august proceedings with "Oliver Ditson" in place of the customary "God save the Queen."

The railroad will land you at Newport, Vermont, and there is no other convenient method of reaching the lake, whether you come from the south or from Montreal. It is true that you may find your way from Montreal to Magog, at the foot of the lake, by a devious railway. You may also take a stage-ride over the hills from Sherbrooke. Perhaps the stage is not at hand, and you are tumbled into a gig upon "grasshopper" springs, known as a calèche, the driver sitting where the dashboard should be. Or you are so fortunate as to secure a place in a "buckboard" wagon, where you hold the "wagon umbrella"—for none of the wheeled vehicles hereabouts have the "buggy top," so rough are the roads. All of this experience you may save by landing at Newport after the orthodox fashion.

And now, unless we can agree upon certain matters, we had best part company right here, and you may return, after taking a flying trip through the lake by steamer. You must discard all the conventional clothing that makes city life a burden. In place of the white shirt, cuffs, collar and cravat, you have a simple garment of navy blue flannel, with a rolling collar, cut low in the neck. Suspenders give way to a belt of leather: loose pantaloons, large shoes with broad heels, and a broad-brimmed straw hat tied with a bit of black tape complete your costume. For a lady, stout, heavy shoes, old clothes and a "dish-pan" hat are recommended. If it is a possible thing, bring your own boat or canoe with you, or purchase one on your arrival. You will then before daybreak. You are, rather, upon the spot of which the poet sings:

"Our father rode again his ride
On Memphremagog's wooded side;
Sat down again to moose and samp
In trapper's hut and Indian camp;
Lived o'er the old idyllic ease
Beneath St. François' hemlock trees:
Again for him the moonlight shone
On Norman cap and bodiced zone;
Again he heard the violin play
Which led the village dance away;
And mingled in its merry whirl
The grandam and the laughing girl."

The region is full of Indian traditions, but they are of the sort that one might expect from the peace-loving St. François, who seldom found the three tomahawks suspended in front of their cabins as a challenge for be independent of every one, and you will have many advantages that others cannot enjoy. And if you are camping out the ownership of the boat is a necessity—almost as much so as the proper equipments and furnishings. But, above all things, in camping out be sure that your companions are of the right sort—not afraid of work, and not inclined to be homesick when the first rainy day comes along.

Although you may enjoy Memphremagog to some extent without these preparations, yet, to have your fill of pleasure, you must carry out all these details. You are then ready for any fortune; and your first objective point should be the "Owl's Head." "And why was it given that name?" you ask of a native. "I dunno," is his reply, "except that the owl is the largest bird around here, and that is the largest mountain." This room, which covers the whole floor under the sloping sides of the roof. At one end a raised platform is ornamented with a picket-fence, that separates the two violins, the double-bass and the old-style "melodeon" from the dancers. The leader of the band calls out, "All git ready for a polkey redeway!" Then commences a series of tunes the like of which was never heard before—the leader himself confessing that they are a jumble of various dances—but discords are few, and the time is perfect. To this music the gallants dance with their ladies far more gracefully than the average of our American city beaux. When the quadrilles are announced the leader is in his element. Starting off with a kind of swaying motion, he keeps himself going like a great pendulum, while he calls out, "Bal-anstupartners," "Korners," or "Prommenadeall." In statement is hardly true of the bird, for there are many eagles hereabouts; but it is true of the mountain. The western bank—not the eastern, as at Lake George—is a long chain of mountains from Prospect Hill, at Newport, to Orford at the northern end. The intervening links of the chain are object lessons in natural history, the names being Bear Mountain, Owl's Head, The Elephant and the Hog's Back. The Owl's Head stands twenty-seven hundred feet above the lake-level, and thirty-seven hundred feet above tide-water, both of these figures being greater elevations than Lake George can show. Down the sides of these hills chutes are laid, which serve to convey logs to the lake through the winter, the same being rafted to market during the summer. Fire-wood, you will learn, is dear at two dollars a cord; and as for coal, it is unknown.

We have come from Newport to the Mountain House, at the foot of the Owl's Head, and we are now in the Queen's territory. A dance is on the programme, and the hospitable young Canadians invite us to "shake a foot" with them. The whole party arrives by a small steamer, which has gathered up couple after couple on its way. As the guests are ready they repair to the ballroom, which covers the whole floor under the sloping sides of the roof. At one end a raised platform is ornamented with a picket-fence, that separates the two violins, the double-bass and the old-style "melodeon" from the dancers. The leader of the band calls out, "All git ready for a polkey redeway!" Then commences a series of tunes the like of which was never heard before—the leader himself confessing that they are a jumble of various dances—but discords are few, and the time is perfect. To this music the gallants dance with their ladies far more gracefully than the average of our American city beaux. When the quadrilles are announced the leader is in his element. Starting off with a kind of swaying motion, he keeps himself going like a great pendulum, while he calls out, "Bal-anstupartners," "Korners," or "Prommenadeall." In every case where the opportunity offers, the arm of each gallant encircles the waist of his inamorata. The climax is reached when the "chorus jig" is announced with one of the young men as leader. It is a Virginia reel and a money-musk combined, so as to offer the greatest latitude for cutting "pigeon-wings" and other pirouettes. After such violent exercise it is not strange that one of the belles remarks: "Law! I sweat so I hardly know what to do." Another belle is dressed in a skirt of drab cloth, trimmed with two bias bands of brown cloth, and ornamented with bows of blue ribbon along the front. A white sacque, belted down with a blue ribbon, forms the waist. But the belle of the ball carries the palm with a dress of heavy black cloth caught up on one side of the skirt into pink satin bows, several of which dot the skirt and the waist in different places. A white cotton scarf is fastened at the neck with a bunch of faded pink flowers. On her head she wears a large hat turned up on one side, faced with scarlet ribbon, and trimmed with old ribbons and flowers of the same color. This remarkable head-gear is tied down by means of an old brown veil. Ornaments, celluloid. Supper is announced, and the whole company descends several steep flights to the dining-room, where a country supper has been spread. A few more dances, a few songs, an international mixture of "Yankee Doodle" (with cries of "Treason!") and "God Save the Queen," and the dance is over. The rays of sunlight are already streaking the eastern sky opposite as were attempting to drain it and advanced toward Memphremagog in a wave sixty feet high, carrying everything before it. To the north of Willoughby Lake is the gorge through which the Clyde River cuts its way to Memphremagog. Towering over all are the high tops of Washington, Lafayette, Adams and others of the the steamer moves away, leaving a long line of sparks and live coals to mark its course.

The ascent of the Owl's Head should be made during the forenoon, as there are no accommodations on the summit for an all-night sojourn. After a brief nap and a hasty breakfast, we start on the three-mile walk to the summit. We do not need the guide of Mont Colon or the Pinge d'Arolla, for the path can be studied out if it is not always plainly visible. A few sugar maples remind one of the climbers of a city-bred man who came hither, and, on being shown a "sugar bush," innocently inquired "where they ground up their trees to make the sugar?" We ascend the stony bed of brook after brook, slipping in spite of our alpenstocks, and puffing like so many steam engines. A huge shelving rock that had once fallen from above shelters a spot whence issues the last spring that we shall encounter. Canteens are filled and the tramp is commenced anew. The trees become more and more stunted, until finally they average but three or four feet in height. A sudden turn and we are at the summit, crowned with rifted rocks in triple groups. From the group that overlooks the lake we may sweep the surface from Newport to Magog. At the south are the islands known as The Sisters—Province (through which runs the boundary between the United States and Canada), Round, Whetstone, Skinusit, etc. Behind and to the eastward of Newport, twelve miles distant, are Mounts Pisgah and Hor, which confine the fathomless waters of Willoughby Lake. Not far away is the site of the famous Runaway Pond, which, many years ago, while still a pond, broke away from those who White Mountain group. Nestled among the hills close within the Canadian border stretches the long street of Stanstead Plain—for all the world like the street in Woodstock, Connecticut. "Stan' steady there!" was the frequent admonition to the early surveyors, and hence the traditional origin of the name. Toward the east and north we trace the course of the Tomfobia down to Massawippi Lake, which shows its deep waters over the edges of Blackberry Mountain before it pours them through the Massawippi into the St. Francis. Just over the hills is Megantic Lake, an enlargement of the Chaudiere River, along which Arnold, in 1775, descended from the Kennebec to the St. Lawrence on his way to join Montgomery before the walls of Quebec. Clustering along the eastern edges of Memphremagog are the hamlets of Fitch Bay, or "Sucker City," and Georgeville. Long Island, Malson's Island and Lord's Island hug the eastern shore. Magog—not the trim effigy of Gog in the banqueting room at Guildhall, but the busy lumber metropolis of five hundred souls—appears but a step away, although it is twenty miles distant. Turn whichever way you will toward this eastward expanse of farming lands and the impression grows stronger and stronger that the cleared tracts form but a very small proportion of the whole.

A little to the west of north we see Orford, just across from Magog, a peak a trifle higher than the one upon which we stand. Although it is the highest peak in Canada, and although it has the advantage of a carriage-road to the summit, yet the views from the Owl's Head are far more satisfactory. In line with Orford, but so near that we can look down upon his summit and discover the trout pond in his side, is the Elephant. Over beyond his outline is Brome Lake, source of the Yamaska, with Knowlton nestling at its head. Far away are seen the huge masses of Rougemont, Belœil, and, if the day is clear, the outline of Montreal Mountain as a background to the bright tin roofs or the towers of Notre Dame. Ascending to another group of rocks we may see farther to the westward, discerning the Pinnacle, and then across the border in Vermont, Jay Peak, Mount Mansfield and the Saddleback. Across the borders of Lake Champlain rise the majestic Adirondacks, led by Mount Marcy. Thus from the Owl's Head we may see Montreal, Marcy, Saddleback and Mount Washington. But from Washington we may discover the sea; and from Saddleback one may signal to another on Mount Holyoke, who can readily discern Long Island Sound. Thus the higher points suggest an endless variety of triangulations, while the smaller hills bring up Heine's impressions of a similar panorama: "I beheld the mountains looking at me earnestly, and nodding with their mountain heads and long cloud beards. Here and there a distant little blue hill appeared to raise itself on the tips of its toes, and look curiously over the other hills in order to see me."

And now we are, for the first time, prepared to understand the topography of this region. Yonder Adirondacks form the starting point of the Laurentian system of mountains, a system that crosses the St. Lawrence in the fragments of the Thousand Islands, extends one arm to Georgian Bay on the west, and the other to the Ottawa, which it crosses at Lac du Chat. Forming the watershed between the tributaries of Hudson's Bay on the north, and the St. Lawrence on the south, it follows the course of the latter to Labrador, at varying distances, toward the interior. To geologists it is known as the oldest system in Canada, the highly-altered strata being bent, tilted and invaded by masses of crystalline limestone, gneiss and other obtrusive rock. Ores of iron are found in interstratified layers, and veins of copper and lead cut the stratification. The Green Mountains are the Alleghany Mountains in a more southern latitude. When they cross into Canada they become the Notre Dame chain, the metamorphic masses that range themselves along the western bank of Memphremagog, on one of which we are now standing. From this point it stretches out to the peninsula Gaspé in constantly decreasing altitudes. Along the eastern shore of Memphremagog the strata are pierced by large masses of granite; but, for the most part, the lower altitudes of the range have so far disintegrated that the soil has become superior to that of Northern Vermont or New Hampshire for farming purposes. Aside from the phosphates, limestones and marbles are found in endless variety. Asbestos, soap-stone, talcose slates and ochres form materials for paints; while ores of iron and copper are profitably mined. Indeed, the whole district of St. Francis, which stretches to the eastward, is remarkable, aside from the good quality of the soil, for its elevated morasses and its abundance of small lakes at a level of from seven hundred and fifty to one thousand feet above the sea. So that if the theory of a broad St. Lawrence River, three hundred or four hundred feet above the present level is true, we would in ancient times have found Memphremagog and its neighbors elevated lakes still, although many of the detached mountains that dot the plains toward Montreal and Quebec would have appeared as islands in the vast expanse of running waters.

Our camp furniture, reinforced by our canteens, soon furnishes us with a savory dinner; and while we are enjoying it we listen with interest to the tale of one who has been here before. "You would not believe it," he narrates, "but I once climbed this mountain with a gentleman and his wife. We had a fair-sized lunch, but we neglected to get water at the spring, thinking there was one higher up. After awhile we found ourselves on the top, thirsty, hot and tired, and no water. To descend for a supply was absurd, and our anticipations of a cup of coffee (made from somebody's 'extract') were swept away. The lady soon discovered a pool of brackish water that the rain had kindly left in a crevice. It was too black to use, but still it was water. Our kitchen utensils were a glass jar, from which we had emptied the preserves upon the bread and butter, and an alcohol lamp, whose cover served as a kind of skillet. The first step was to rinse out the jar with the brackish water, and wipe it dry with papers. Then we stretched the lady's handkerchief—of course it was clean—across the mouth of the jar and filtered a considerable quantity of water through it. From this reservoir a supply was drawn to make skillet after skillet of coffee, first for the lady and then for the rest of us. In this way we managed to have coffee as long as the alcohol held out, in spite of our disadvantages."

The descent from the Owl's Head is no easy matter, although it is not attended with danger. Bears and catamounts are occasionally found, but so seldom that there is little chance of meeting them. The toil and trouble of both the ascent and the descent are amply repaid by the magnificent views from the summit, and the newcomer will never regret that his first acquaintance with the lake included a vision of every square inch of its surface from Newport to Magog. If the visitor is an artist he cannot fail to make the entire circuit of the lake, bearing away with him sketches of the steep cliffs of Gibraltar Point and its dismantled hotel; of Belmere, the summer resting-place so recently enjoyed by the late Sir Hugh Allan, whose presence was always indicated by the peculiar flag of the Allan line of steamships; of Lake View Grove, the Camp-Meeting of the Second Adventists; of Bay View and its extensive picnic grounds; or of Georgeville and Knowlton's Landing, connected by the ferry-boat known as the Old Grunt. If he is fond of working up the details his portfolio may be rich in sketches along the shores of slaty rocks tipped on edge and crowned with a thin layer of soil, through which hemlocks and birches strike their roots far down into the gritty substance. Everywhere he will see this strange formation in place of the blue marly clay that forms the banks of the great lakes of the upper St. Lawrence basin. His pencil will be attracted by bits of abandoned lime-kilns, with overhanging vines, or by huge rocks in the shape of stumps, which appear to have been nailed together, the effect of nail-heads being produced by rusted pyrites. Or else his eye is charmed with high walls of serpentine equal to those of Corsica or Cornwall, and almost as rich as verd antique. And while he skips from island to island to note the same general formation of the shores with ever-varying details, he will not neglect the infrequent pastures are filled with bright red strawberries that cannot be resisted, and you will, in the enjoyment of the present, cease to care whether or no the anemones are the tears of Venus for Adonis; nor will you rashly dispute that the violet is blue because it is a maiden who entered the lists of beauty with Venus, and was beaten blue for her impertinence. As the summer progresses, you will see that an occasional housewife, believing that "the flowers are the alphabet of the angels," has arranged a little parterre with tiger-lilies, sweet peas, morning-glories, bachelor's buttons, sunflowers, poppies, dahlias, sweet-williams, marigolds, blue-bells, fuchsias, geraniums, peonies, and larkspurs. As you sit in the cool hallway, streams that pour their crystal waters into the lake, but will rather ascend them through mile after mile of overhanging rocks, each turn revealing a still more romantic spot than the last.

Should the visitor be a botanist, his success will vary with the season of the year. The flora of these uplands cannot be surpassed in any latitude north of 45°. Of course the trailing arbutus, the May flower of the Pilgrims, can always be found among the traces of the departing snow. Then follow, in almost this exact order, the wood-anemone, dog's-tooth, blue, yellow and sweet white violets, marsh-marigold, spring-beauty, wild strawberry, everlasting, dandelion, purple and painted trilliums, golden saxifrage, crow-foot, gooseberry, huckleberry, raspberry, jack-in-the-pulpit, clintonia borealis, bunchberry, lady's slipper, coltsfoot, shepherd's purse, buttercup, red-berried alder, five-finger, wild ginger, red and black hawthorn, Solomon's seal, wild black currant, yellow and white pond lilies, red and white clover, black snake-root, yarrow, wild red raspberry, silky dogwood, white baneberry, blue flag and golden rod. By the time that you have seen the last of these buds unfolding it will be the middle of June. The fields and

To the visitor who tarries well into the autumn, nature lavishes a far richer display of variegated foliage than she spares to more southern latitudes. The fall of the leaf at Memphremagog is caused by the early frost, and not by the withering heat of a long summer. The warm season is so brief that the leaves lose none of their freshness before they are called upon to die; and, dying, they retain their colors in a most wonderful manner for many years afterward. In a word, the tourist must be impressed with the fact that nature has been kind to the buds and to the flowers and to the autumn leaves in this region, even if she has made it impossible to grow apples without a graft upon a crab-apple stock, or prohibits the raising of any crops but wheat, barley, oats, maize, buckwheat, peas and beans.

Nor is nature less kind in displaying the rising and the setting of the sun. The magnificent sky-line of the mountain-ridge along the western shore of Memphremagog appears to fulfill its grandest mission when it catches the rays of the departing sun and reflects them to the cloudland above. The mid-summer sun is an early riser in this northern latitude; but he is a corresponding late riser when the icy touch of winter has smoothed the white caps of the lake to a common level. During the long and cool evenings of the early fall the auroral exhibitions can be excelled nowhere else, so clear and pure is the air. Arcs of the great circle dip from the zenith to the horizon, dividing the hollow sphere of the heavens into halves, quarters or eighths-broad bands, like bayadere stripes, define the circles, that grow smaller and smaller as one looks overhead; while darting from one part of this framework to another, and often filling in the spaces as they pass, are hues of red and purple and gold, whose brilliancy it would be difficult to equal, even in a year of electrical storms and the total depravity of the spots on the sun. But whether at sunrise or sunset or in the auroral display,

"Filled was the air with a dreaming and magical light; and the landscape Lay, as if new-created, in all the freshness of childhood."

"But all of us are not scientific, or perhaps even appreciative admirers of the aurora; certainly but few of us can lay claim to being artists or botanists. And what has Memphremagog for us?" The answer is simple. Memphremagog has something for every taste and condition in life. If you are not camping-out, but have your family with you, take care that you do not fall into the hands of a landlord who will charge you a dollar a day, children and all, "and take them as they run." You may do better than that at some other hotel or at a farm-house out among the hills, where you can have your dinner soon after noon, and then repair to the "gallery" or balcony for a smoke or a snooze, still leaving a long afternoon for a row or a bath before the eight o'clock tea. The genial head of the farm-house—who excels his neighbors in the very necessary art of being able to do anything—will devote himself to your amusement. Whist, Wagner and Sullivan will serve to pass away the hours while you must shelter yourself from the dampness that gathers without. The host will fill the intervals with a clog-dance, or the recital of his trials when he kept a hotel, and numbered among his guests a lady who often took him to task for keeping a bar.

"Would you believe it?" he asks. "One day a guest ordered champagne for the whole table. The glass went past her. She started, hesitated, and then said: 'Oh, I didn't see what it was! I'll take some of that.'"

If it is your fortune to stay at one of the small hotels in Georgeville or Magog—there are no large hotels except at Newport—you may have several advantages over the farm-house, you may screen yourself from the sun behind the long row of hemlocks that have been brought from the woods and tied against the pillars of the gallery. You may frequent the more ample quarters of the house-shed or lounge within the cooler recesses of the bar-room. You may then learn all the secret history of the village—for bar-room loungers are the worst kind of gossips. You find out that neighbor A churns with horse-power; that the breeze of to-day depends upon the aspect of the Milky Way last night; that the "milt" of the earliest porker killed will show what kind of a winter is coming; and that the surest way to find the cows among the hilly pastures is to catch a devil's darning-needle, hold him by the wings, and travel in the direction indicated by his tail. You discover that merchant B has a "general store," as well as Wanamaker or Macy, but that his sin consists in having no larger stock, and in being postmaster and telegraph operator at the same time. Merchant C, you learn, is bewailing the good old days, when his father could make a profit of "three or four per cent on goods sold." "And what did he call three or four per cent?" you ask. "Why, three or four times what they cost him, of course!" is the reply. You also learn that the general products of the country are few beyond wool, beef, mutton, cheese, butter, hops and sugar, and that, for the most part, the Frenchmen are content if they can have plenty of peas and potatoes.

You are more fortunate, however, if you can claim acquaintance with any of the few proprietors of summer cottages who have established themselves along the banks of the lake. You will find little elegance of surroundings, save what nature has furnished, for that is not the reason why the houses in Montreal have been deserted for the time being. But you will find highly-cultivated gardens, smooth lawns and well-laid terraces. Above all, you will find that which cannot be hidden, even in the wilderness—true English hospitality that makes you feel doubly welcome, if you chance to be welcome at all. This hospitality, you must admit, is far preferable to more costly residences that are surrounded with a cold and forbidding atmosphere.

"But what shall we do," you ask, "if we cannot share this hospitality, or if we do not 'enthus' over the sketch-book of the artist, or if we do not care to listen to bar-room jokes?" Well, you can fish to your heart's content, and with good luck, too. You may come here with your Limericks, Carlises and Sproats; with your multiplying reels and balance handles; with your lines of braided silk, and with your "split bamboo, six strip, trout fly-rod, two tips, silver mounted, twelve feet long, eight ounce weight, finest finish, quality guaranteed." And yet, unless you listen to the old fishermen you will fish in vain. They know where to fish for bass and where for perch. They know the weedy shallows, where you may troll for pickerel; and, more than all, they have their "anchors" at the deep holes, where the "lunge" loves to doze and wait for his food to be brought to him. The "lunge" is really a lake trout, although the early settlers thought he was the muskallonge. He is the finest as well as the largest fish in this locality, a ten-pounder being "a good average." To secure him you must use the "lunge-hook," the like of which is never seen elsewhere. An old fisherman—and you should never go for the first time without one—will row you to his anchor, which is a float fastened to a sunken stone, with from one hundred to one hundred and fifty feet of elm bark. Tying the boat to the float he dives into his minnow pail and brings forth two chubbs or shiners. One of these he pierces from mouth to tail, and shoving it far up the hook, calls it "the shank bait." The second shiner he pierces just under the dorsal fin, and calls it "the wiggler." If the wide jaws of the lunges do not open for this bait he tries bits of perch, or perhaps a piece of pork, so dainty is his game. He cares nothing for rods or reels, but when you have a bite he admonishes you in no uncertain language to "jerk it like the devil and pull him in! By crimps!" You ask him how he tells the days that are favorable for fishing, and he will tell you, with the soberest face, that the signs of the Zodiac settle that question. "You see," he asserts, "when the sun is in Gimminy there's no good luck. In Cancer it is better; but we have to look out for cool and cloudy days. We don't have to be quite so careful in Leo, but in Virgey ther's trouble enough, unless the bait is o' the best. When Librey comes then luck commences to mend, and if you are here at the beginning of the Scorpion you will have the best fishing of all. Come and see us then if you can, mister." And then, as his tongue loosens, under genial influences, he will rant against the use of flies until you are half-ashamed to own that you brought yours with you, so evident is it that you have with you "the best fisherman on the lake; durned if I ain't."

It may be that the fish have taken a prejudice against the fly from the fishermen. At any rate, they are slow to rise to any kind of a cast. You are far more likely to catch an eel, and have him wriggling from one end of the boat to the other, if there is any moisture on the bottom. If you become tired of Memphremagog you may visit any of the numerous lakes in this region, lakes that average eight or ten miles in length, by perhaps a mile in width. There is Brome Lake, source of the Yamaska, with its black bass; Brompton Lake, with its trout; Magog Lake, with its pickerel and trout that will rise to the fly; Massawippi Lake, with its black salmon, shad, sturgeon and pickerel; Sugar Loaf Pond, on the side of the Elephant, where vigilant watch is kept over the trout; or St. Francis Lake, at a farther distance, with an abundance of fish of every variety. The trout-breeding establishment at Magog will also prove of interest.

But, more enjoyable than all, is our excursion to Lake Nick, a spot that you will find in no gazetteer and upon no map. As we land at the Georgeville wharf the same specimen of an antiquated loafer who, in the bar-room, told us all about the signs of the milt, the milky way and the darning-needle, accosts us with: "And are you going over to the river landing?" "Oh, no," we reply, "we are going to load our boat and horse and wagon yonder on the Old Grunt and steam over to Tuck's Landing." "Well, I wanted to go to the river, and I thought you might as well have the money as anybody." Assuring the blear-eyed old fellow that a navy-blue shirt does not make a professional waterman we embark and cross the lake. Then loading the wagon with the boat, which serves as a box, we drive over the hills. The road grows more and more rough. Passing the time of day with an occasional French cabin, we are asked in plain English, "Any rum?" "And what do you take us for?" is our inquiry, as we disappear over a corduroy roadway, overhung with branches. The lane has not been used since the mines were abandoned years ago. After mile upon mile of this jolting we suddenly came upon a sparkling sheet a mile or so around, and this is Lake Nick. Why it was so named no mortal knows; but the origin of the name might have been from the cries of the loon and the howls of animals that commenced at sundown and made the place seem even more weird than before. There is but one farm-house near, and that belongs to one Arthur Sparling, who has lived his natural life in this wilderness. His bounteous table is soon supplemented by our lunch, the horse is turned out and we are seated on his gallery for a chat.

The night is well along before we tire of exchanging stories; but at last the old man leads us off two by two in the direction of his little chambers and bids us good-night. Down, down we sink into the recesses of the feathers until we are lost in dreaming of fish and fishing and lawyers and editors. The break of day finds Sparling on hand with a breakfast, and we are off for two other ponds before nightfall, when we manage to regain the Old Grunt and again to sleep in our beds at home.

There are many trout streams that pour their cold waters into Memphremagog; but if you will "run" them successfully you must manage to reach them by daybreak. No sound or sight of you should ever reach the game, or your fishing will be in vain. They may rise to your cast, but the angle worm suits them better. Your canvas shoes are useless when you jump from one point to another over the mossy carpet that covers the rocks. Heavy soled shoes of leather or high-top boots alone are suitable. If ladies attempt the sport they must make up their minds to be carried across the fordings on the backs of the gentlemen; otherwise they had best remain in-doors and knit. If you are a novice in the art of trout fishing, not of lady-carrying, do not waste any time in looking after the veteran fisherman who accompanies you to the stream and then leaves you. Two anglers cannot fish in close proximity, and your veteran friend will not be lost, although he may be hours in reporting himself. When he does come his basket will be full, and he will say something about "fishermen's luck."

Delightful as is this independent way of hooking the trout, it is yet equaled by the nonchalant way in which you may shoulder your gun, call your dog to heel and paddle your duck boat or "dug-out" along the marshy stretches that infrequently border the lake. In the proper season ducks of several varieties, loons, eagles and other large birds are at your command in the air, while along the ground you may secure a fox, a mink or a hedgehog with little trouble.

When Sunday comes you will desert your camp for the nearest sanctuary, and, if your party is so large, have no hesitation in giving an escort of six or eight to any young lady that may be popular. There will then be no partiality displayed, and the service will be a benefit, because your minds are not lost in abstraction. The benefit of such a service on Sunday will keep you in good shape and preserve your dignity when you repair to a neighboring school-house on a Monday evening, see the good rector put on his robe before the audience, for want of a robing room, and view the total depravity of a lamp—there is only a lantern besides—which goes out while the sermon turns upon the parable of the wise and the foolish virgins.

Whenever you are tired of the beauties of the lake, you may explore the attractions of the interior. You may take a hunting tour among the wild fastnesses that lie half-way toward Quebec on the northeast; or you can, more easily, cross the lake at Georgeville with old "Captain" and the buckboard, unless you prefer to "ride and tie." The range of mountains along the western shore conveys the idea that all kinds of horrible monsters—possibly in human shape—dwell behind them. When you have once ascended through the pass in the range you will descend into the valley of the Mississquoi, with its swift currents and occasional reaches of deep water covered with tangled masses of logs. The Mississquoi, arising in Vermont, turns a huge loop into Canada, and then returns to Vermont in order to empty into Lake Champlain. Following down the valley, you stop at a cross-roads post-office and inquire if there is any mail awaiting you. "Well, I should think there was! Are you that feller? Why, something has been coming for you every day for a week. Goodness gracious! and are you here?"

A little farther along you will come to the most fashionable resort in all this locality—Bolton Springs. As it is Saturday, you will encounter any number of country couples who have taken "a day off," and are enjoying themselves to their utmost. What business has sulphur-water with pleasure, anyway? Whatever the answer, these rustics are making the most of their opportunities. Among them you will meet a literary aspirant, who insists on showing you his productions and declaring that he has not succeeded in having them published, because "the magazines are all run by rings."

In the evening you will meet the same couples at a small hotel near by. Still other groups of rustics have arrived during the afternoon, and the long, round-end galleries are full. The dance, similar to that of the Owl's Head, takes the time till midnight, when all dancing ceases, and the early hours of Sunday are devoted to moonlight promenades. By special arrangement dinner is to be at noon, so that the visiting couples may have an early start homeward. Unfortunately, such an invasion of guests has drawn so heavily upon the larder that the meat designed for breakfast and dinner has been consumed at the former meal. No one knows this but the hotel-keeper, whom we miss about noon-time. One o'clock comes, and no dinner. Two o'clock gives no better prospect. "Where is old Brown?" is the general inquiry. At last a speck appears on a distant hill. It grows larger and larger. At last the monad develops into a man, who is soon recognized as our hotel-keeper. Driving furiously to the rear of the house, he unloads the carcass of a sheep from the end of his wagon, and then, mingling with some of his guests, he explains his absence thus:

"Boys, I've had a hard time catching this sheep. At one o'clock I was chasing over the hills five miles from here. When I went to pay the man he was mad at me, but I told him the sheep tried to bite me. But here I am. I have cut him up into inch bits, and he is stewing away like a good fellow now."

In spite of this appetizer, the meal is acceptable; the rural couples start for home, and the quiet of the Sabbath is once more restored. We are a long distance from the Owl's Head, but he peeps and blinks at us over the hills. The road that passes the house is a resort for smugglers, and, if you are awake, you may hear the creaking wagons go by on a dark night on their way toward the American border through the dark defiles of Glen Sutton. After resting in this solitude for a few days, we jog along on our return, stopping once in a while to run a trout stream or to read the epitaphs that abound in the private burying-grounds.

Again we are at Memphremagog. Again we are under the care of the genial Captain Achilles—pronounced Arkless, and not Ahsheel, although it is a French name. Once more we roam the length and breadth of the lake by steam-power. And then—for all good things must have an end—we turn away from a spot upon which the foot of the professional tourist has rarely trodden, and hope for many more days of enjoyment before "old Magog" becomes a thoroughfare for pleasure-seekers.

A LULLABY.

Ho! dear little west winds, come over the lea;
I pray you speed quickly to baby and me;
Come croon your sweet lullabies softly and low,
The rustling of young leaves, the brook's rippling flow;

The lush of the waves as they break on the shore,
And dreamily mimic old ocean's deep roar:
The bees' drowsy tune set to murmuring rhyme,
The fairy-like music wee lily-bells chime.

Come sing to my nestling the songs you have sung
This eve to the birdlings in leafy nests swung,
Whose green, swaying cradles, high up 'mid the trees,
Respond to the touch of each gay, flitting breeze.

The birds and the flowers are hushed all to rest;
Now lull my bright birdling to sleep on my breast,
While God's holy angels from Heaven above
O'ershadow my darling with white wings of love.

CHAPTER XLVII.

A FLICKERING LAMP.

IT was a boisterous cavalcade that set out for Sturmhold that afternoon. The Father, it is true, had been but a short time dead, but the Daughter was alive again. She was like one risen from the dead. She had come through the ordeal unscathed. The hot plowshares she had been called upon to tread beneath her feet had not scorched even the tender soles. When they were ready to leave the village, they found a procession ready to escort them. Men, women and children, almost the entire population of Skendoah, with the brass band in the lead, discoursing triumphant music, marched out of the little square down the narrow street, across the bridge and up the hill beyond. The blue waters of Memnona glittered in the sunshine. Hats and handkerchiefs and banners waved adieu. Shouts and laughter and tears spoke their well wishing. Smiles and tears testified the pleasure that even in her sorrow Hilda gathered from this good-will. A few carriages and a gay group of horsemen escorted the lovers homeward. The air was chill, but the December sun was bright; the roads were hard, the pace was brisk, and, despite the trace of sorrow, jocund Love led the procession. Sorrow for the dead could not quench the joy of the living. The old life was ended; the new begun. Trustor and trustee were of the past; the cestuis que trust had come into their own. All that the past had sown, the present had come to reap.

As they drew near the gray-turreted mansion, one by one the friends who had borne them company thus far bade them farewell with cheerful words, bright smiles and wind-blown kisses. Despite their joy at her return, they felt that only Love might accompany the bereaved daughter within the home made sacred by the memory of one who would not come again, despite her prayers and tears. Leaning upon Martin's arm, and shielded by the veil which had been her refuge from peril, Hilda entered again the temple filled with her father's memory. Oh, how divine the fragrance that clings about the home where love hath dwelt! The dim, faint memory of a mother's waning life mingled here with the abounding richness of a father's love. His presence was everywhere—upon the graveled walk, beside the gate, within the door—wheresoever she turned her eyes she beheld him—her loved, her lost. She saw the servants through her tears—those who had served him. She thanked them with gentle obeisance for the greeting which they gave his daughter. She half resented the presence of Harrison Kortright and the gray-haired dame who greeted her with motherly effusion in the hall. Even Martin seemed to be almost an intrusion at that hour. She broke away from them and rushed along the hall to the great stairway. Then she turned quickly, threw her arms about Martin's neck; kissed him through her tears, as if she would do penance for her thought; hid her head upon his breast and wept in his embrace. As she turned away she saw a head thrust out of a door beyond, and a quick, furtive look of surprise and hate shot past her and rested upon Martin. She recognized her old nurse and went forward and spoke pleasantly. A dull, vacant stare was all she received. Then she fled away to her own room, locked the door, and, for the first time since her bereavement, gave way to the sweet, sad luxury of sorrow.

Of the great house which he had builded, three rooms had almost bounded the solitary life of Merwyn Hargrove—the room in which his wife died, that in which his daughter slept and the library where were the treasures of his unfortunate brother's life. These constituted his home—ah, how empty now that he would fill it no more with his strong life! This had been her childhood home. What pleasures had not thronged all the familiar nooks! Safety, repose, love—home. All good things had come to her within its walls. Without, sorrow and danger and unutterable horror! Love had met her on this very threshold. In this room she had bent down from her father's arms to press the first kiss on his lips who was now her lover.

The room adjoining—if the unclosed folding-doors could be said to have separated them—was her father's—the holy of holies, into which she had come each morning since her recollection—a white-robed worshipper—a welcome priestess, with her morning greeting, to receive her morning kiss. From the tower adjoining this—her mother's sunny boudoir it had been in her life, and nothing there had been disturbed—a narrow stairway led down to the library, opening with curious art behind a case of books that seemed only to have been thrust out from the wall to make room for the volumes upon its crowded shelves.

How often in her childhood she had risen in the night and sought her father in the library! How her bare feet pattered down the lonely staircase, and bounded across the warm tufted carpet to the outstretched arms! How often she knew nothing of the return until she waked to find her father's arms about her in the morning! Oh, tender, strong-armed father! Oh, watchful, loving heart! How his presence thrilled her memory!

How his absence chilled her heart! She knelt by his bedside and wept and prayed. How grateful was her heart that he had been; how disconsolate that he was not! Ah, how passionately she kissed the white, cool pillow—kissed it because his head had pressed it, because it would press it no more!

After a time they called her to the evening meal. She begged to be left alone. Then Mrs. Kortright came. She would not see her. Jason came afterward, and, with the privileged persistency of the old servant, knocked until she answered—knocked until she wiped her tear-stained eyes, and opened the door a little way that he might speak to her. He did not ask her to eat—he did not try to persuade, but told her that on the stand before the hearth in the library he had placed a lunch. There was a good fire there that would last all night. If she should get cold or hungry in the night she would remember the stairway in the tower. The fire made it look "mighty cosy" there, he said, "most as if Marse Merwyn himself were there." She thanked him gratefully for his deft attention. Then he went away and left her to live over again the life the dead had shaped and blessed. It was not until long afterward, when the night had grown still and her limbs were numb and chill as if with long embracement of the dead, that youth and health conquered her sorrow, and she stole down the stairs to the library.

No sooner had Hilda arrived at Sturmhold than Harrison Kortright, with subtle forecast of her wishes, directed everything to be removed from the library that could in any manner suggest its occupancy by another since her father's death. During the short time he had been there he had often thought that she might be annoyed at his presence. Yet he had remained because it seemed his duty to occupy the mansion, and no other room was so home-like and comfortable to him. In truth he seemed to be nearer to the man whose interests he had undertaken to guard there than elsewhere. As soon as she came, however, his couch was taken away, and the lounge that Hargrove had used substituted in its place. His easy-chair and all that could betoken his presence was removed. So when Hilda came softly down the stairway, opened the half-concealed door and stepped into the room, she almost felt as if her father would step forth from some dim alcove to give her welcome.

The wood-fire had burned low, but a great mass of glowing embers dispensed a comfortable warmth. An easy-chair stood beside the hearth. A shaded lamp cast a soft radiance through the room. She sat down and warmed her chilled hands. After a time she lifted the snowy cloth and began to eat the luncheon that had been provided for her. The keenness of her sorrow had passed away. A sweet drowsy mood, full of tender memories, came over her. Little by little consciousness receded, and she slept. Thought shaped itself into a dream. She was still sitting by the fire in the library, but now she was waiting for her father's coming. She watched the door, expecting every moment that it would open and admit him. She grew weary with delay, and wondered why he did not come as she dreamed that he had promised. She fancied that some great danger beset him. She thought that he was calling to her, but she could not go. Her limbs were leaden, but each sense was marvelously keen. The wall of the library seemed to open, and she saw beyond. Gradually the personality of her dream changed. Her father faded from her thought, but the sense of peril still remained. Now it was Martin over whom it impended. She was still in the library. He was in his own room—the room in the tower that matched her mother's boudoir. She knew that he had chosen that since he had lived at Sturmhold, because it had been their play-room in childhood. How strange our dreaming fancies are! She dreamed that the fire rolled out upon the hearth and spread—a livid, seething torrent—to the foot of the stairs that led up to her lover's room. It charred the floor, curled about the steps, caught the banisters, blistered the wall, and gnawed its way slowly upward.

Then she saw a figure—who could it be? It seemed that she ought to recognize it, but she did not. A figure with wild eyes, disheveled hair, and garments strangely disarrayed. She saw it steal along the hall, burst into the library, rush to her father's desk, tear open the lid, grope nervously about for a while, and then, with a sudden, eager cry, snatch something from within, and press it to her bosom. The dream had merged into reality. Hilda was wide awake. She saw a woman standing by her father's desk whom she did not know. She had forgotten for the moment that he was dead. She thought a robbery—a wrong to him—was being committed, and sprang forward to prevent it. She clutched the woman by the arm and shrieked for help. The startled robber turned on her assailant. A brand had rolled out upon the hearth and burst into a blaze. Hilda's pale face and black robe stood revealed by its light. A strange look of terrified recognition flashed across the woman's face. The wild, frenzied glare died out of her eyes. She ceased to struggle, shivered, and shrank away.

"Rietta! Rietta!" she said in a voice hoarse with terror. Then, with a shriek of mortal fear, she sank down upon the floor a shivering, chattering, shapeless mass, and Hilda recognized her old nurse, the crazed and pitiable Alida.

Hilda's cries brought the household to the library. When they raised Alida to bear her away, a curiously-wrought key dropped from her hand. As they went past the room in the base of the tower the smell of fire began to pervade the house. The door was locked. They burst it open and found the flame, half-smothered by its own hot breath, creeping slowly up the stairs. It was soon quenched, and the unconscious sleeper above knew not how near the stealthy root of death had come to him, until he heard a terrified voice calling at his door; and when he answered he heard a fervent "Thank God," as Hilda tripped across the hall to her own room and was back in the library almost before Mr. Kortright had noted her absence. Martin soon joined them. Hilda told the story of the night, and Mr. Kortright of many other nights. Then Jason came with the key that had dropped from Alida's hand. He said it was the key of the strong box that Merwyn Hargrove had built into the wall of Sturmhold. He had lost it just before he went away, and had more than once bewailed the fact. Then they wondered how Alida came to have it at that time, and Mr. Kortright went to examine the desk. Upon the left a secret drawer lay open to his gaze; what seemed the framework of the desk, having turned inward on a hinge, disclosed a tiny recess in which a bundle of papers still lay. Mr. Kortright took them up, and, after merely glancing at the indorsements, handed them to Hilda. There were ten of them, and the indorsements corresponded with those upon the wrapper in the possession of Jared Clarkson, as Mr. Kortright noted at once. In the meantime Jason was searching among the same books Alida had been wont to examine, for the missing volume. Hilda remembered having seen it in her father's room. When she had brought it, Jason turned it over until he found a blue mark drawn around the paging. This was the combination on which the safe was locked. He drew the heavy desk away from the wall, and quickly threw back a panel of the wainscoting and revealed a small vault filled with papers. A brief examination showed that this hidden store-house contained neither deeds nor bonds nor any evidence of debt or thing of appreciable value, but only the records of love—letters and mementos of the wife he had never ceased to mourn—the letters they had exchanged as lovers, and afterward as husband and wife. There were some letters in a cramped Italian hand from Hilda's grandfather, and a large package of them from Miss Fanny Erickson, in regard to the little nursing who had been left in her care. This was the name which Jason had persisted in calling Rickson. By these, Hilda's history might be traced almost day by day from the hour her mother left her, in Kingston, until the good lady, then on her way to England after her father's death, had written: "I send this by Captain Hargrove, who has been laughing and crying by turns for an hour, over the sturdy little girl I have brought him instead of the puny babe he remembers. She is indeed a beautiful child, and I hope that in the happy life before her she may not quite forget her volunteer nurse, who only wishes she might never part with her little Hilda."

"It is strange," said Martin, "that Alida should have known where the key was hidden."

"Good reason why she knew," exclaimed Jason. "She put it there herself. I could most take my oath Captain Hargrove never knowed of that little till. I never heard of it, certain. Besides, he told me himself the key was lost."

"But how did she know where to find the combination?"

"Jest watched till she found where he kept it," replied Jason. "I told Marse Merwyn that woman was always spyin' round. But he said it didn't make no sort of difference. There was nothing for her to find out, and she was a poor, no-count creature at the best, and could do no sort of harm to any one. It seems she did find out something, though, and might have done a power of harm."

"What do you suppose was her purpose?" asked Hilda of Harrison Kortright.

"It is hard to tell," said he with a sigh, "just what she meant to do. She had undoubtedly watched your father at his desk, and was perhaps aware of the nature of his communication to Clarkson. Her malady, perhaps, was less serious then than now. She had dwelt upon the idea that you were her daughter until it had become the controlling idea of her disordered mind. She probably removed these papers from the envelope and substituted others, not, perhaps, thinking of the character of those put in their places so much as the abstraction of these."

"But why should she wish the key to this vault?" inquired Hilda.

"For the same reason, probably," said Kortright. "She seems to have thought that if she could destroy the evidence that you were the daughter of Merwyn Hargrove, you would of necessity be considered as her child."

"So you think her purpose was to destroy them?"

"Originally that was her design, without a doubt. Of late, in her nightly intervals of semi-lucidity she seems to have had a distinct purpose. Her crazed brain remembered that there was something at the left of the desk that she wanted. She had half-forgotten what it was and where she had hidden it. She dimly remembered, also, that there was something in that set of books that was somehow connected with her general design. I doubt if she knew what it was. She no doubt opened the drawer to-night by accident, or the sight of Martin may have stimulated her memory so that she recollected where it was. The possession of the key may, perhaps, have enabled her to recall what it was she wished to find in the book she was accustomed to examine on her nightly visits to the library, or it may be that she only knew that your father always looked at the book before opening the safe, and had no distinct idea what it was she sought."

"Poor Alida!" sighed Hilda.

Aye, poor indeed! Her life had exemplified the fearful possibilities for horror that a system destined to swift destruction held. After a life of shame and sorrow and misery her poor crazed brain was soon to be at rest. When one came searching for her a few days afterward, in order that a mother's crime might be in part atoned, he was just in time to gaze upon a still, cold face, note a birth-mark, which the abundant iron-gray hair had hid, and stand by her open grave.

"Poor Lida," repeated Hilda, as she thought of the woes that had beset the life of one whose worst fault had been an unreasoning love for her. Tears fell fast as she thought what Alida had suffered and she herself had escaped.

Aye, weep gentle heiress of sweet memories! The last plowshare is overpast. Ah, not the last! The children of George Eighmie, whom your father has given you in charge to watch over—what of them?

CHAPTER XLVIII.

SOME BITS OF GOSSIP.

AMY HARGROVE had at length an answer to her letter. It was very brief, merely referring her to a letter which the writer had sent to Miss Hunniwell. So, in response to her request, the teacher visited her convalescent pupil, taking with her the letter alluded to. It was from the president of the Bank of the Metropolis, and was in response to one of the circular letters she had sent out announcing the discontinuance of the school for the time being, and inclosing bill for Amy's board and tuition.

She had also suggested that because of the injury Amy had received she might require more than her usual allowance for the term. It was in this manner that all of Amy's bills had been paid, and all communication with her guardian had been made through the president of the bank. To this letter Miss Hunniwell received the following reply:

"MADAME: I have yours of the 8th inst., and inclose draft for the amount of your bill. In response to your farther suggestion, it may be well for me to state that the remainder of the sum deposited with me for the benefit of Miss Amy Hargrove amounts to $674.43, which will be paid to your order or to hers. In case she should desire to draw on us, however, we should require your indorsement as a guarantee that the money actually reached her hands."

"I deem it proper to state here that no farther responsibility will be assumed on account of the young lady by the person who made this deposit. It is needless, therefore, to advise prudence in its expenditure. It will probably suffice to carry her through the next term, when it would be wise for her to seek some means of self-support."

"To avoid needless inquiry, it may be well for me to add that I am strictly prohibited from disclosing the name of the party who provided this fund, save upon his written request or that of his legal representatives."

"With the utmost sympathy for the young lady and yourself, I am your obedient servant, WILLIS KENTON, President."

Amy's pinched, cold face became ashen in its pallor as she read this letter, and tossing back her curls looked up at the teacher with a wild terror in her great black eyes. Her lips grew white, and a shiver passed through her frame as she asked huskily:

"What does it mean?"

"I do not know," said the teacher kindly.

There came to Jared Clarkson, while yet at Bloomingdale, by the hand of a brisk young attorney, a letter from Matthew Bartlemy to this effect:

"MY DEAR SIR: I can hardly make out what you are all doing up there in Blankshire. Why you haven't put Eighmie where he can have a chance to cool his heels in solitude before this, I cannot imagine. However, I suppose you know. I'm almost sorry for the man, too. He wouldn't have been half the fool he is if his counsel, Bob Gilman, was not so powerful sharp that he can't use the little sense the Lord gave him. He was just possessed with the idea that Hilda was George Eighmie's child, and had been adopted by Hargrove as his own in order to conceal her identity. I don't know why he took up the notion, unless it was just because that was a thing no human being that had a grain of sense would ever think of doing. I knew Gilman had that idea years ago, and I must say I was foolish enough, one while, to be a little afraid it might be true. I even went so far as to sound Hargrove on it myself. But, bless your heart, I never was more ashamed of a thing in my life. Why there wasn't a quiver in his eye nor a flush on his face as he spoke of it. A half-amused, half-pitying smile stole round his mouth as he referred to it, evidently not dreaming that any one but a crazy woman could entertain such an idea. I didn't say anything about it when I came back, because I had a notion that some time or other Gilman would burn his fingers with it, just as he has. That letter to you that was found on Hargrove's body clinched this notion in his mind, and I must say it did squint that way mighty strong. If I had not known better, I might have weakened then. But I knew a man had better try to walk on water than think of standing on that hypothesis. So I only laughed to myself, and watched to see where I could put in to advantage in Gilman's game. I had no fear for Hilda, though I cannot quite understand that letter. Hargrove was a mighty careful man about his papers, and I have no doubt you have the whole riddle at your fingers' ends before now. What has become of Hilda, though, it puzzles me to make out. It isn't like the girl to run away. She don't come of running stock, and always seemed to have spirit enough to do credit to her blood. From what the papers say it looks as if there was something you were afraid of. Knowing it cannot be Hilda, I have wondered if it could be that Eighmie's mistake was nearer what he wished than the game he expected to bag.

"However, I will not try to make any guesses at this distance, but tell you why I send the bearer to you now. He brings almost conclusive proof—indeed I think it is conclusive—that the mother of Alida was never a slave, consequently Alida was not a slave, and Eighmie's marriage with her was valid. This evidence consists of the sworn confession of a woman who has lately died, to the effect that she was delivered of an illegitimate female child at the house of Dr. Gant, which she left in his care—or rather to his pity—for, though she gave him a hundred dollars more than he stipulated for his services, she made no conditions about the child. Indeed, she avers that she never saw it but once, and expressly told him she had no desire to see it again. She had been sent to Dr. Gant under an assumed name, in order to conceal her disgrace, and never informed the doctor what her real name was. She thought little of the matter until many years afterward, when, a childless widow, she began to mourn for the babe she had so inhumanly cast away among strangers. Before that, however, the doctor had died, and her agent could get no clue to the girl's identity. He happened to strike on me, and told me enough of the story to awaken my suspicion that the daughter was Alida. As the woman was still alive, at that time, and was not exactly ready to admit the whole truth, however, I only hinted at what I knew. At the same time, I made up my mind that if I heard of Salathiel Jenkins being in this state I would get the truth out of him so far as he knew it. There were one or two old things hanging over Jenkins that I knew would incline him mightily toward truth-telling if he could hope thereby to keep me from hooking on to him. After a while I got hold of Jenkins sure enough, and he gave the affidavit which Mr. Torrens will show you. I ought to have said before that the bearer is Alfred Torrens, Esq., of Gleason, Torrens & Torrens, Attorneys, Washington—a most respectable firm. You probably know the old man Torrens, as he is very much of an Abolitionist, though not quite as rank as you. This affidavit closes up the gap pretty closely. The dates agree with the woman's confession, and the doctor's letters, to which he refers, give the name by which the woman was known while under Gant's care. It evidently lay on the doctor's conscience, for Jenkins says he tried repeatedly to find the girl, but he always blocked the way by telling him that he had forgotten what he did with her. I suspect there was some blackmailing, if not some kidnapping, done by Jenkins in the matter. The woman has left property, I think, to this daughter, or her descendants, under some sort of impossible conditions which Mr. Torrens will explain to you if he sees fit. I infer that the gist of them is that the beneficiaries shall take the testatrix's name, and that her youthful frailty shall be entirely concealed. Whether you can aid him or not depends, I think, on whether you understand Hargrove's letter to you. If you do, you probably have the clue in your hand. If you do not, the Lord only knows where the young man will have to go to find that necessary bit of thread.

"My chief interest in the matter is that it cuts Gilman's folks out of all chance to recover Mallowbanks or mulct Hargrove's executors in damages for his spoliation of the estate in manumitting the slaves. We can close the whole thing up now, and when the little girl Hilda comes of age or marries, she can step right into an unincumbered inheritance, which I hope she will enjoy, as her father had trouble enough over other people's folly. By the way, please give the child my regards, and tell her that when it does come off—her marriage, I mean—old Matthew Bartlemy will expect an invitation, and is going to come all the way to Sturmholt to drink her health and dance the first set with the bride. Though I suspect the son of that clear-headed Dutch-Yankee, Kortright, will find the gal and marry her before you find even which way she has gone.

"Please write me all that you think would make me feel good about your experience with Gilman's clients. He's so sick of his relief expedition now that he has taken to his bed. I don't allow that he shall forget it while I live either.

"I suppose the suits here might as well be closed out now. You might get a power-of-attorney out of Eighmie, allowing me to enter judgment. If you have him by the wrist, as I suppose, he will no doubt be in a 'disposing mind,' as the law phrases it, and let you have about anything you choose to ask for. Yours faithfully,

"M. BARTLEMY.

"P. S.—I will send in my bill against the estate as soon as I have everything completed. I suppose this matter will set you against slavery worse than ever, and I admit that it is a pretty hard thing. After all, it is not fair to judge an institution by its worst features or its accidental results. One might just as well denounce the town-meeting because there are paupers in New England, as declaim against slavery because such cases as Alida's are possible.

Such fool business as running all over the North hunting niggers, whether it is lawful or not, will soon end the whole matter. The fact is that slavery only exists now by the tolerance of the North. They have the power and a constantly-increasing numerical predominance. Our fire-eaters laugh at this, but when the tug comes, it is the most men and the most money that wins. I think that in less than twenty years this question will be decided. If it ever comes to an open rupture with the North, likely niggers will not be worth fifty cents a head when the controversy is over. The whole political atmosphere seems to me feverish and excited. If the Secessionists and Abolitionists could all be hanged, we might have peace long enough for those that are left to die of old age. That would be hard for you and your friends, but I don't see any other way. By the way, what do you think of that fellow Jason? Do they ever raise such servants anywhere except in a state of slavery? That man only cost Hargrove about six hundred dollars, and he's worth his Jared Clarkson was charmed with the manly earnestness and simplicity of this country clergyman. The more he saw of him the deeper grew this favorable impression, and, with characteristic heartiness, he neglected no opportunity to speak of him in his letters in terms that were certain to enhance the regard of those who read. During his entire stay in Bloomingdale the good pastor's library was his favorite resort. Upon the last of his accustomed visits Mr. Torrens accompanied him, and while Clarkson disputed with the pastor about theology in the library, the young lawyer conversed with Amy Hargrove in the parlor.

Of what they spoke none ever knew, but when, two days afterward, Mr. Torrens started on his return, Amy Hargrove went with him. From that day none who had known her ever heard her name again. A few months afterward Gilbert Amory received a draft almost equal to a year's salary. It was mailed in New Unthank, raising his gun, drew a bead on the advancing party, but Hargrove forbade him to fire.

weight in gold. Tell Miss Hilda never to let him go out of her service under any circumstances. Yours,

"M. B."

Gilbert Amory, before he attempted the rescue of Hilda, was an unknown country minister. Ten years of honest work among the New England hills, though not without results of which we need not be ashamed, had certainly been barren of fame. Within a week thereafter the East and the West were engaged in clamorous rivalry for his possession. His unquestioning manhood had struck a chord in the hearts of the people that was to make him welcome throughout the land. Without knowing it he had become a hero. Telegrams and letters poured in upon him at a rate he had never dreamed of. It was evident that this modest yet self-reliant expounder of the Divine Word would ere long leave the little hamlet in the New England hills to take part in the endless Armageddon within the walls of some great city.

York, but there was no clue to the source from which it came. He was greatly troubled about accepting so large a sum from an unknown donor. His wife insisted that it was meant as payment for what they had done for their strange, involuntary guest, and, considering the facts, not at all excessive. As it came at a time when such a windfall was peculiarly acceptable in making preparation for the new field of labor in the far western city, his objection was at length overruled and the draft was cashed. After all, the good woman's speculations were more fanciful than real.

The affair at Beechwood is one of those mysteries that are never cleared up to the satisfaction of the public. There were many guesses at the truth, but none ever knew whether they were right or wrong. The data on which they were based consisted chiefly of these facts: Sherwood Eighmie and his confederates were allowed to depart on merely nominal bail. This bail was forfeited, and the suits, public and private, were allowed to die of sheer indifference on the part of the prosecution. When Eighmie returned to his home the litigation between "Eighmie et al. and Hargrove's executors" was dismissed on the plaintiffs' motion and at their cost. From these facts the people in and about Bloomingdale concluded that public justice had been bargained for private right. They could only have been half right at best, but those who held these views were stimulated thereby to a more active antagonism to slavery. These facts occasioned much comment also in the region where Sherwood Eighmie lived, but he kept his own counsel. There it was generously believed that public sentiment in Blankshire had balked the law, and that, in order to save himself and his fellows from troublesome and endless prosecution in a hostile community, he had agreed to surrender his rights, and had chivalrously kept his word. In the minds of all who accepted this view, it tended not a little to fasten the conviction that the South could not look for any justice at the hands of the North, but only envy, chicanery and hate. Not long afterward Eighmie entered into possession of Mallowbanks, by what right no one knew; but, as nobody appeared to dispute his possession, he continued to hold it. Years afterward there was found upon the Register's books of Clayburn County the record of two quitclaim deeds of the plantation known as Mallowbanks, situate in said county, properly described by metes and bounds, one executed to Hilda Hargrove by Heloise Eighmie, and the other to Sherwood Eighmie by Hilda Hargrove. As these constituted color of title in him, his possession became, in the course of years, an indefeasible right.

CHAPTER XLIX.

THE HARVESTING.

ANOTHER year had passed. The Man and the Hour had come. The culmination of half a century's thought was at hand. It was a bright day in October. Where a majestic current burst its way through solid granite walls, nestling in the shadow of overhanging mountains, was a little hamlet turbulent with wild excitement. The pomp of war was strangely interspersed with the garb of peace. Turmoil and frenzy, bravado and fear, were curiously mingled. A piebald soldiery mimicked with quaint oddity the duties which the veteran performs unconsciously. A little squad of men in blue uniforms, under direction of a grave-faced man of middle age, constituted the centre of attraction. A cordon of sentinels was drawn around an open space near the river-bank. A long low building, with a double doorway that occupied almost the whole front, stood at the end of this space. Outside this line of sentinels pressed the populace, citizen soldiers and rustics, old and young, crowding upon each other to see what was within.

It was not much, yet none who saw it—aye, none who read of it in the journals of that day—will ever forget it. Within that narrow space an old man lay upon the ground. A blood-stained blanket underneath his helpless limbs. A son upon his right hand dying. Upon his left another, dead. The sun beat upon his bare head. Eager crowds questioned and jeered. The blood oozed through the matted hair and ran slowly down his neck. A wound upon his forehead was half hidden by a handkerchief, grimy and discolored. Sweat and dust and blood were upon his face and hands. The surgeons said he could not live.

This old man, with less than a score of followers, had startled the world from slumber. In every Southern state the call to arms was heard. Patrols were doubled. Slaves were watched. Terror came to every home in a dozen states. The sunshine hid unnumbered perils. The womb of night was big with horrors. Thousands were in hourly fear. Millions slept in terror many a night thereafter. He had fallen. His insane attempt had failed. The magazine on which the South had builded was yet unfired. The insurrection of a day was at an end. The flags of two states waved triumphantly over him. The Stars and Stripes proudly attested the supremacy of the Constitution and the laws. A few dead bodies were in sight. Here and there others lay upon the public way—within the shattered building, on the rocks in the turgid river—some black, some white. Even death could not protect them. Insult pursued their poor still clay. Men shot the dead. Pools of blood were about the streets.

Even in his weakened, broken plight the old man was leonine in look and gesture. A word of comfort to the dying son, of pity for the one already dead, but of his own sad hurt no word. No murmur of complaint, no moan of pain. To those who stood over him plying his ebbing strength with fierce inquisition, his replies were clear and calm. To those who uttered curses, he found breath to administer reproof. Even cowards were compelled to admire his courage, and those who hated most to admit his sincerity. "The bravest man I ever saw," said one whose own courage many a bloody field afterward attested. "No man ever lived before who was at all like him," said another, who bent over him that day and sought to drag from his lips the story of some great conspiracy—some Catilinian revolt against "the best government the sun ever shone upon." In vain. At the top and bottom, the beginning and the end, there was but one man—one thought, one name—John Brown. Not boastful nor ambitious; not seeking power or wealth; not looking to overthrow a nation or found a dynasty—the one man "unlike all other men" had drawn unto himself a few whose hearts were fused with the fervor of his own high purpose, and had undertaken a movement perilous and rash beyond any in history.

The Martyr had appeared. Self-immolated he lay upon the soil of Virginia. The world knows the story. That "strange Mr. Brown," as Hilda had called him. "Old Brown, of Ossawatamie," as his enemies named him. "Old man Brown," as the most friendly of the metropolitan journals of that day termed him. "Captain John Brown," as he modestly avowed himself upon his capture—the incarnation of a thought that already colored with its fervid glow the life of one-half of a great people—John Brown had offered himself and the poor lives that clung to his a sacrifice for liberty and a protest against slavery. "Guilty," said they who saw only the blood that flowed. "Mad," said they who pitied. "A fool," cried those who measured his act by their own weak spirit. "Unlike all other men," said the statesman who saw and wondered. "John Brown," is all the world has yet found to say of him. Uncomprehended, because the world has so few standards by which he might be measured. Revered as a martyr through one-half the land. Execrated as a monster by the other. Looked upon with reverence in many thousand Northern homes. A name of terror at every Southern fireside. To the North the forerunner of justice and liberty. To the South the incarnation of bloodshed, rapine, woe! To the one his act meant aggression. To the other his execution meant defiance. When he died, throughout the North the church-bells tolled and prayer was uttered for the passing soul. In the South thanksgiving was offered for deliverance from evil. John Brown! Monster and Martyr; Conspirator and Saint; Murderer and Liberator; Cause and Consequence! Animating one-half the land to emulate his example; stimulating the other to meet aggression; inciting both to the shedding of blood!

Brave, humble, single-hearted, simple living. Seeking not his own gain. Cruel in the scathing intensity of his hate for wrong. Grand in the impossibility of his attempt. Sublime in his faith that through his death the purpose of his life would be performed. The climax of one age and the harbinger of another!

Upon the bridge that spans the river stands a restless crowd gazing at a half-naked body that lies upon a rock midway of the rushing stream. It is long since dead, but many a shot is fired at the bare breast and cold, set face that overhangs the boiling eddy beneath.

"D'ye see that mark upon his face?" said one.

"For all the world like 'Lathiel Jenkins," answered his fellow, curiously.

"Don't you know him?"

"No."

"Why, it's that boy 'Lathiel used to own—the one that run away."

"You don't say?"

"Yes; I knew he'd go to the bad. He was always saying he'd 'rather die than be a slave.'"

"Well, he's had his choice," said the other carelessly.

"Yes," was the reply. "It's a pity, too. He was a right likely boy if he hadn't been so high-strung."

Skendoah has a holiday once more. The wheels are still; the looms silent; the factories closed. The houses are decked with flags. Martial music echoes through the streets. A thousand bayonets catch the sunbeams. The tread of serried ranks is almost drowned by the clatter of attendant feet upon the sidewalks. There are moist eyes and quivering lips. Mothers and wives and sisters are sacrificing to the sentiment of freedom. Skendoah has given of its best and bravest. A thousand households have yielded up a chosen life—a first-born or a best-beloved. In the front rides one with grave, flushed face, still young. The end of preparation and of waiting has come at length. He is not one man but a thousand. Behind him are the ripening years. The labors of a generation have brought forth fruit. The lost lake yields up its treasures. The busy years have transmuted into gold the waters of Memnona. Skendoah sends its heroes forth, equipped for the soldier's work, and Martin Kortright leads them.

The train is filled; the engine puffs and shrieks; the crowd cheers lustily; the tears are hidden and the sighs are drowned. In an open barouche stands a fair young wife whose eyes are bright and dry, waving a farewell. So long as the train is in sight the spotless signal of her love waves good cheer to the departed. When the last glimpse of it is lost she bows her head upon the shoulder of the gray, decrepit man who sits beside her, and utters to the coachman the one word, "Home!" Ah! how sobbingly weak and vain it sounds! Sturmhold once more has lost its master. As they drive through the thronged streets—past the silent factories, across the bridge above the empty channel, and see the soft spring sunlight kissing the blue waters of Memnona, Harrison Kortright waves his hand toward the quiet lake, the clustered homes, the silent caverns where the gnomes of labor sleep, and says:

"This day cometh the Harvest!"

The nation faces the ordeal the Past has prepared. HOT PLOWSHARES lie along her path, and she is led blindfold and barefoot to the trial. The ages wait to sit in judgment!

BY RHODA BROUGHTON,

Author of "Good-by, Sweetheart!" "Red as a Rose is She," etc., etc.

PERIOD III—CHAPTER V.

It is Miss Churchill's maxim always to make herself as comfortable under any given circumstances, as those circumstances will permit; nor has she failed on the present occasion, to live up to her own precept. Beneath the garden wall, where the shade spreads coolest, a fur rug, filched from the drawing-room floor, is extended; cushions, unlawfully thieved from the drawing-room sofa, mollify the hardness of back of the garden chairs. Upon the unlikely hypothesis of her conversation running short, she has unearthed all the novels she can find. At her feet the dogs alternately sleep, and gnash their teeth—rarely successful—at the flies. In the sun, close by, stands the parrot's gilded cage; so that, if other resources fail her, she may fall back upon his loquacity. In addition to the dogs, at her feet also lies Rivers, unworthily occupied in tickling the inside of the dozing Pug's ear with a flower-stalk. This is the tranquil Arcadian picture that salutes Mrs. Forth's eyes as she issues from the house. He has his back turned toward her! He has not cared enough for her coming, even to place himself so as to watch for it! How is she to know that it was only a moment ago, in obedience to Sarah's orders, and in dread of the remembered penetration of her eyes, that he had adopted his present position? How cool they look! How much at ease! What a pity to disturb them! After all she might as well have finished the proofs. As she draws near them, walking so softly over the turf that they are not immediately aware of her, a new burst of laughter fills and grates upon her ears.

"You seem very merry," she says dryly.

Sarah exhibits no surprise—as why indeed should she?—at her sister's advent. With her head thrown back comfortably over her chair, she finishes her laugh luxuriously out, but of Rivers' mirth, Belinda need no longer complain. There is not much that could be called mirth in the face that—suddenly leaping to his feet—he turns toward her. What a death's-head she must be to work such an instantaneous transformation in him?

"You seem to be very merry," she repeats.

She is conscious of the resentful dryness of her tone; of the fagged flush upon her cheeks; and the sullenness that she has not quite been able to banish from her eyes; but she is as powerless to correct the one as the others. What has he done to deserve that tone? Beneath it he stands tongue-tied.

"May I not know what your joke was?" she says, struggling not very successfully for a greater amenity of manner; "why should it not amuse me, too?"

"It—it was nothing much!" he answers, deprecatingly; "I do not know why I laughed; it was only—" looking unhappy and ashamed, "that Miss Churchill was telling me that Punch had once been engaged to the parrot; and that it was broken off because she bit his tale to the bone!"

There is such a contrast between the very mild wag-gery of this anecdote, and the deep humiliation of the tone in which he narrates it, that Sarah sets off laughing helplessly again; but not a muscle of Belinda's face moves.

"That respectable old jest," she says, with a slight shrug; "it has been for many years a family Joe Miller!"

"It was not a Joe Miller to him!" replies Sarah, standing up in indistinct defense—indistinct through much laughing—of her pleasantry; "he may pretend now that he did not like it—but he did!"

Belinda sits down; but the cloud still lowers on her brow. To her own heart she says that she does well to be angry. That here, for the first time face to face with the tragedy of their two lives, he should be in a condition to be genuinely amused by so miserable a jest—by any jest! Nor does the crushing of his merriment please her any better. She then is the wet blanket who stifles his jollity. Times are indeed changed! If she were to leave them, no doubt the peals of laughter would at once break out afresh. But for the present they are effectually stilled. Painfully and sorely conscious of this, she makes another difficult effort to recover her good temper.

"I think I am losing my sense of humor," she says awkwardly; "it must be the effect of Oxbridge air. Punch, will you, too, lose your sense of humor?"

She has lifted the lively little dog up on her knees; and is half hiding her hot face against his.

"He is losing something else, is he not?" says Rivers, made bold by her gentler tone diffidently to draw a little nigher to her, and to raise his eyes in painful questioning to hers.

As he speaks, he lifts his hand and touches the locket habitually worn round the neck, and as habitually tried to be scratched off by Punch; and from which a lock of hair is at present obviously escaping.

"Why, Punch, do you wear locks of hair?" asks the young man, laughing nervously; "Whose is it? Pug's, let up hope!"

"It is always coming out," interposes Sarah in a disgusted voice; "the fact is," lazily drawing herself up into a sitting posture, and looking round explanatorily, "that people have a way of giving me locks of their hair—I am sure I do not know why—and as I cannot possibly wear them all, Punch is good enough to wear some of them for me! Punch has worn a great deal of hair in his day, have you not, Punch?"

As she speaks, she calls the dog to her; and becomes absorbed in the contemplation of his jewelry.

"Is it German or English hair, should you think?" asks Rivers, almost under his breath.

There is a smile on his face as he puts this question; but a smile with whose mirth she need not quarrel. In a moment how the Hussars and Uhlans are clanking round her again! How the soft wind is pelting her with cherry flowers! How the old Schloss is towering up against the German sky! She cannot answer him; but those few words seem to have given them back something of their former intimacy.

"Now whose is it?" says Sarah reflectively, having taken out the little lock, and being now contemplatively eyeing it with her head on one side; "what a memory I have! Belinda, can you help me? whose is this lock of hair of Punch's? Oh, but it must have been since your day; it is not unlike yours" (turning to Rivers, and coolly setting the little tendril against his hair to compare them). "Did you ever give me a lock of your hair?"

He turns with a start. He has been unwisely allowing himself to drift into one of his old speculations, as to whether any woman's ear had ever sat so daintily close to her head as does that of the wife of Professor Forth.

"A lock of my hair!" he cries, jumping up, and falling on his knees before Sarah, with an air of exaggerated playfulness; "if I have not, I am quite ready to supply the omission; whereabouts will you have it from?" passing his hand over his own crisp curls. "May I take your scissors, Mrs. Forth?"

It is the first time that he has so addressed her. It is with untold difficulty that the name crosses his lips, and consequently he enunciates it with unusual distinctness. It is in reality a cudgeling that he is administering to himself for his late lapse, but to her it seems a wanton cruelty.

"May I take your scissors, Mrs. Forth?"

Mrs. Forth's head is, however, bent so low over her work-basket, that apparently she does not hear. Behind the shelter of that convenient receptacle for tapes and needles, her hands are trembling and writhing. At Dresden would he have talked even in joke of giving Sarah a lock of his hair? Why, he never even heard her when she spoke to him! Happily for Belinda, at this point, she is summoned to the house on some trifling errand, which detains her for ten minutes—ten minutes in which she is able to resume some hold upon herself; and it is well that it is so, for the sight which greets her is one not calculated to promote her equanimity. Sarah has abandoned her lazy reclining, and is sitting up, and holding Rivers' hand; not, indeed, when one comes to observe closely, in any very lover-like manner, but as one who is examining it with an air of the liveliest interest and curiosity.

"I should be ashamed to own such a hand," she is saying, with her accustomed candor; "it is like a workman's hand."

"But I am a workman," he answers bluntly.

And then he is suddenly aware of Belinda's presence, and snatches it away.

"It really is quite a curiosity in its way," says Sarah in a pleased voice; "it is as hard and horny as a day-laborer's; do show it to Belinda!"

He looks toward her, hesitating and uncertain. She has resumed her former seat, and her work-basket.

"Do!" she says, trying to speak with her newly summoned tranquillity, and he holds it out to her, palm upward.

It is a beautiful hand still, shapely and vigorous, but on it are disfiguring evidences of hard, coarse toil. There is nothing particularly affecting in a work-roughened palm: it is a condition to which are subjected the hands of ninety-nine out of every hundred of the human race; and yet, as she looks at it, she has much ado to prevent the tears from springing to her eyes.

"You know," he says, "I told you that I could not stand the confinement of an office life!"

"We know?" cries Sarah, pricking up her ears. "You told us? What do you mean? When have you ever had the chance of telling us?"

He stops—staggered and white. He had forgotten the presence of an auditor. Nor is Belinda in a plight to help him.

"I mean," he says, floundering, "that I—I intended to tell you; and so," hurriedly resuming his narrative, "I—I went as an ordinary hand in the iron-works; and was set to work at the puddling-furnace."

"The puddling-furnace!" cries Sarah, delighted with the sound; "and what is a puddling-furnace, pray?" repeating the phrase with emphatic relish.

"A puddling-furnace is a furnace where the pig-iron from the smelting-furnace is worked about at a great heat with iron rakes—rabbles, they call them—and I had the honor and pleasure," with a shy laugh, "of working one of these rakes, until the iron became malleable."

Belinda's pretence of work has dropped unheeded on the grass beside her.

"H—m!" says Sarah, still agreeably interested; "no wonder that your hands are not so pretty as they might be. And was it very hard work?"

"It was not exactly child's play," he answers dryly; "but they gave us high wages; they were glad to get hold of a good strong chap like me. We had need to be pretty strong!"

"And did you work at it all day?"

"We were relieved every six or eight hours. We could not have stood it longer on account of the heat; that was pretty bad!"

He pauses a moment, passing his disfigured hand, half in absence, half in kindness, along Pug's roomy back; then adds:

"It is the heat that does it! As a rule, puddlers do not live long; it is the heat that does it."

He says it with complete simplicity, neither expecting nor wishing for compassion; as if to spend eight hours a day in a puddling-furnace were the natural and ordinary sequel of an education at Eton and Oxbridge.

So this is how he has spent the twenty months, passed by her in listening for the postman's knock—in this life-shortening, mind-deadening brute toil! Well, even so, he has had the best of it!

There is a silence of some moments' duration, broken by Sarah, whose sharp ear has caught a sound of footsteps.

"Ha!" she cries with animation, "here comes my little flock; and as ill-luck will have it, I have forgotten every one of their names. Belinda! quick! help me! which is which?"

Belinda lifts her downcast eyes; lifts them to see three young gentlemen, whom apparently the parlor-maid, with that contempt for undergraduates inherent in the native Oxbridge mind, has left to announce themselves, timorously advancing. They are evidently not very easy in their mind, and are somewhat obviously each pushing the other to the front.

Clearly, Professor Forth's house is no habitual lounge for undergraduates. A movement of irrational relief thrills through Rivers' heart as he realizes this.

"They must indeed be fond of you, Sarah, to have faced me!" says Mrs. Forth, with a dry smile. "How frightened they look! as frightened," with one quick glance at Rivers, "as you used to be!"

She does not pause to see the effect of her words; but rising, walks with her long slow step to meet her guests.

"I do not wonder that they are frightened," says Sarah in a stage aside to the young man. "Does she not look as if she were going to ask them to w^{d. Sker} owes the pleasure of their visit? If I do not fly^{ousane} to the rescue even now they will turn tail and run!"^{born o}

But Sarah for once is mistaken. They have no^{ushed} desire to turn tail and run. It is doubtful, indeed, wheth^{iting} on their homeward way, and over their evening cigars, t^{und.} their limited and artless vocabulary of encomium is m^{f a} ore strained to find epithets of approval for Miss Church^{ds} ill than for her austerer sister. But indeed, to-day, Be[;] linda is not austere.

"Why should she snub them?" she asks herself sadly; "has she not had enough of snubbing people for all her lifetime?"

And so she is kind to them—too kind, Rivers begins presently to think with a jealous pang, as he sees her pouring out tea for them with her all-lovely hands; endowing them with her heavenly-smile; lightening their darkness with her starry eyes. Nor is he, even yet, wise enough in love's lore, or coxcomb enough to suspect that it is he himself—he sitting by, apparently neglected and overlooked—who has lit the eyes and carved the smile.

Sarah is very kind, too; but they are rather hurt at the hopeless muddle into which she has got their names.

By-and-by, when well be-tea'd and be-caked, they are embarked upon a game of tennis, and the sound of callings and laughings, of balls struck and racquets striking, breaks the Arcadian silence of that hitherto virgin inclosure—Professor Forth's tennis-ground. It is too small to admit of more than one set at a time; and Belinda, as a good hostess, despite the warm urgencies of the now tamed and happy strangers, retires in favor of her visitors. It boots little to inquire whether the sacrifice costs her much.

"Do you play?" cries Sarah nonchalantly, flourishing her racquet under Rivers' nose. "No? Ah!" with an impudent smile, "you are more at home with your rake!"

Though it is morally impossible that they could have understood it, both Bellairs and Stanley are contemptible enough to laugh at this sally; a fact which would no doubt have made Rivers disposed to punch their heads, had he heard them; but the jest and its prosperity both fell upon deaf ears. Sight and hearing are stopped by the anxious fear:

"Is she displeased with him for refusing to play? Ought he to have played? Will she now expect him to go? At parting, will she say any word of farther meeting?"

A lump rises in his throat. Not presuming again to take up his place on the grass at her feet—though, after all, it is a privilege that no one grudges even to the dogs—he stands, uncertain and unhappy, before her. If she so wills it, this must be the end. Nor does she seem in any hurry to put him out of his incertitude.

Upon her the day's earlier mood is returning. In what life-giving whiffs comes the kindly wind! Did ever homely-coated bird say such sweet things as does the blackbird from among the cherry-boughs? and the little vulgar villa-garden has grown like that of which Keats spake:

"Where the daisies are rose-scented,
And the rose herself has got Perfume that on earth is not!"

He is here before her, waiting one lightest sign from her to lie down at her feet and be trampled on. Is it any wonder, that being a woman, she lets three minutes elapse before she gives that sign?

At the end of that time, "Are you at it still?" she asks abruptly.

It is half an hour since the subject was dropped, and a dozen others have intervened between; yet he seems to have no difficulty in understanding at once to what her speech alludes.

"No," he answers with a sigh of relief (for it is evident that had she wished to be rid of him, she would not have introduced a new, or resumed an old topic), taking possession as he speaks of Sarah's forsaken chair; "I am promoted to be foreman."

He pauses for her to comment or congratulate; but she does neither. She only stitches feverishly on.

"It struck me that the same thing might be done with much less expense of labor by machinery," he continues, with the hurry of one who has no assurance that he is not wearying his listener; "and in consequence of this—this invention of my mine, which our firm has taken up, I have been promoted to the rank of foreman."

He stops so decidedly that she is compelled to make an observation of some kind.

"And in due time, of course, you will be taken into partnership, and marry your master's daughter," she says with a difficult flippancy.

The blood rushes to his face. He had expected a kinder commentary. Surely no jest ever so ill became her whom, in his eyes, all becomes. There is a silence. The sun's rays are less vertical, and the dogs have wakened. Punch indeed, under the mistaken idea of being obliging, is officiously retrieving the tennis balls, and being warmly slapped by the heated players for his good nature.

"Well," says Belinda, with nervous asperity in her tone, "is there nothing more? Go on."

"Others have invented machines of the same kind," he continues spiritlessly, for her jest has taken the heart out of his narration, "but they have turned out either complete failures, or only very partial successes; if mine has better luck, our firm holds out hopes of taking out a patent, and giving me a small share of the business."

"Did I not tell you so?" cries she, laughing rather stridently; "why, my prophecy is already half way toward fulfillment."

Again his face burns, but he deigns her no answer. If she can stoop to so unworthy a merriment, she shall at least enjoy it alone.

"It is evidently all for the best," he says, trying to catch her callous tone; "it seems that I have a kind of turn for mechanics. It was news to me that I had a turn for anything convertible into money; if—if things had gone smoothly, I might have lain down in my grave without finding out where the bent of my genius lay; and that would have been a thousand pities, would it not?"

He ends with a laugh. Her mirth, which had offended him, has long died; nor has she any answer ready to his question. Her long arms (even arms can look sad) lie listless on her lap, and her great veiled eyes see visions. Vanished from before them are the little square garden and the tennis-players. They see only his future life-path stretching before her; his life growing ever fuller, fuller, fuller of busy, prospering, eager work, with ever less and less room in it for the gap left by her. By-and-by that gap will close altogether. The sooner the better for him!

But for her? Over her there pours a rush of frantic longing to tear it wide; to keep it ever, ever yawning. But it will not so yawn always. It will close so that scarce a scar will be left to show where it once was. He is fond of his work already. In how different a spirit he addresses himself to it from that in which, sulky and half-hearted, she turns to her hated toils. A sense of injury and offense against him rises in her heart. He can never have suffered as she has suffered; his meat has never been ashes, nor his drink tears!

"It is clear that you are Fortune's favorite," she says in a hard voice; "I congratulate you."

"Thank you," he answers, deeply wounded; "you have hit upon the exact phrase that describes me."

There is such a sharp pain in his tone, that, though she has been anxiously averting her eyes from him, they must needs seek his in apology.

"Forgive me," she says with a remorseful watery smile; "you know that I was always bitter; and somehow," her lip trembling, "time has not improved me!"

Seeing the sorrowful twitching of that lovely and beloved mouth, he loses his head for a moment.

"It would have been nothing from any one else," he says, murmuring under his breath; "but it came ill from you."

She offers no denial. Only she drops her eyes; and a stealing selfish sweetness laps her senses. Not yet, then, is the gap filled.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SWEETHEART.

THE stars shine out on the wide, wide sea
With a light that is ne'er forgot;
But your eyes, sweetheart, shine out on me
With a light that the stars know not.

The larks sing soft, in the fresh green grass,
Their heaven-taught melody;
But the birds are dumb as your sweet words pass,
Swift-winged as the light to me.

You have feasted me, love, as the rose the bee,
On the sweets of your lips and your eyes;
You have opened love's portals and given to me
The cycles of Paradise.

The rose climbs up to my window-seat,
And faints in its rich perfume;
But the breath of your lips is sweeter, my sweet,
And their crimson is love's ripe bloom.

Oh, lips that were fashioned for kissing mine,
That whisper in love's low tone!
Oh, eyes that out of love's vast deeps shine!
Sweet heart of my heart, mine own!

THE PRUDHOMME PRIDE.

BY SOPHIE WINTHROP WEITZEL.

PART FIRST.

BAYVILLE wondered what the Prudhommes lived on. Some people said it was their pride. Yet one would think there could not be a great deal of that left. One would suppose that must have melted away almost as fast as the property.

The fine sweep of lawn, its elms cut down, had been sold before Judge Prudhomme died, to pay his sons' debts. The stately box-alleyed garden had been cut through by the railroad. The full-length portrait of old Governor Prudhomme had been "parted with." To be sure, it had been bought by the state, and was to hang in the State Capitol—not at all an ordinary business transaction, Mrs. Prudhomme said. Most of all, James Prudhomme had come home, and he was certainly not a thing to be proud of.

Pride, however, lives on meagre diet. If the Prudhommes lived on pride, and pride lived on the faded glory of the Prudhommes, it may have been a sorry story, but it may also have been a true one.

The old house certainly kept up its dignity, standing with its great wings and Mount Vernon front in the dreary solitude of a commonplace modern street. Long lines of portraits still hung in the hall. Brocade gowns, which had stood before kings, and slippers which had danced with Washington and Lafayette, glorified the garret. There was believed to be silver of untold value in the house, and china in the deep, shady closets which it was simply distracting to think of.

Mrs. Prudhomme, or "Madame," as she enjoyed being called, though white-haired and faded, still carried her head like a goddess, as she did when she came home a bride fifty years ago, bearing upon it the honors of two proud families. Even now, on her rare appearances in the streets, obsequious Bayville—obsequious, though critical—bowed low before the old ark of a carriage, ignoring the fact that coachman and steed were Mike, the grocer, and his yellow nag, hired for the occasion. Many persons even bowed to the carriage when nobody but poor James was within. And when Miss Rachel drove out they did more than bow—they smiled.

Miss Rachel, however, seldom did drive out. She liked better to walk. Every morning she stepped briskly down the street to do her marketing, and would have carried a basket on her arm if her mother had allowed it. Sometimes of an afternoon, when her mother was busy with Trollope's latest story, and James was out of mischief, Miss Rachel would stray off quite alone into the country and up the hill for a far view of the beautiful bay and the sea beyond. Once she had been seen running in the garden with her little dog for company. But that indiscretion was not repeated. Such behavior Madame Prudhomme said was highly unbecoming a young woman over twenty-five years old. And so it was, Miss Rachel blushing confessed, and ran no more.

The evenings, and indeed the days, were chiefly passed in the sober old drawing-room with James, if he happened to be at home, stretched on the sofa where Washington had once sipped coffee, and Madame Prudhomme stately by the fireside, reading or dropping stitches in her perennial afghans. There was little conversation. James never talked. Rachel's little comments on Bayville topics did not interest her mother.

After the daily paper had been read there was not much of common interest to the three.

Madame Prudhomme clicked her needles and thought, not of her work, but of those painful gaps, those dropped stitches that fifty hurrying years had left, and nobody could stop to mend. Daily she went over that catalogue which every mother carries next her heart.

Regina, John, James, Christina, Charles, Joseph—at every name there came a sigh.

Regina, the eldest, was not dead. She lived in Europe. It was cheaper, she wrote her mother, after you knew the ways. Her husband, who called himself a cosmopolitan, and spent his best years playing dominoes at a dull little German bath, had nothing to call him home. They would stay for the present, certainly.

John—the less said about him the better. He was dead now.

James—here he was on the sofa, come home again.

Happy Charles and Christina died young.

Joseph was shipwrecked on that last voyage to the Islands, from which he was to have come home with a competency and marry his cousin Jane. Instead of that neither he nor the competency came, and Jane lived ten years and died.

At the last name on her list—Rachel—Madame Prudhomme forgot to sigh. This little maiden had come late to her mother—a November daisy, a kindly afterthought of heaven. To be sure she was very little like the other Prudhommes—not much more than a daisy is like a Victoria Regia. But then she was always there looking you brightly in the face. She made you think of spring. She was "capable," too. She read well. She picked up the dropped stitches. She was Rachel!

If it had not been for James even these faded autumnal years of the Prudhommes might have been peaceful years. But there was James, an obtrusive, a sorrowful fact. If he had practiced evil for himself alone, Miss Rachel thought—if he had merely gone through the very slim bank account and driven her to her wits' ends for the daily family supplies—she could have borne it better.

But he did not confine himself to these mischiefs. With the attractions and graces of a gentleman, with the weight of his honorable name and his superior years, with his generosity and good-fellowship, he easily gathered about him a bevy of admiring young men, the sons of the rich business men of modern Bayville. He could not talk to his mother and sister, but he could keep a room-full of these youths in breathless interest or ecstatic laughter an entire night.

It grieved Miss Rachel to see these young men drawn into her brother's idle, gross and evil ways. She set herself to think what she could do about it. Many an elegant little supper she contrived, at the risk of several family dinners, that she might at least keep the party for a time in a sweet atmosphere and an innocent house. She was much younger than James, and a good deal afraid of him. But in the face of his wrath and of her mother's proud displeasure, she would sometimes have her brother's callers shown into the drawing-room, and keep them busy through a long evening with music, chat or a game of whist.

Miss Rachel felt particularly sorry about Charley

Newman, whom she had known since they both were children. They had been at Sunday-school together, and a bowing acquaintance had since been kept up, though until of late they seldom met. Young Newman's father was the richest man, and many persons would have added the best man, in Bayville. And Rachel believed her old playmate to be good-hearted and innocent, though just now a little wild and thoughtless.

More and more frequently were James Prudhomme and Charley Newman seen together—on the streets, in the hotel porches, at the Prudhomme mansion. Oftener and oftener Rachel invited Charley in when he came to the house, and more and more cordial she became. Madame Prudhomme was chillingly tolerant. She did not approve of these upstart families. Mr. Newman she supposed was a respectable man, an inventor or something of that sort. She wished James would not choose such companions, and she wondered Rachel encouraged him in it.

Still Charley Newman came and came, and still Miss Rachel grew cordial and delightful. She went for a sleigh-ride with him and her brother. She coaxed them to take her to "Pinafore," instead of going off with a so-called shooting party. Once or twice she wrote a note to her old playmate, arranging for some meeting or slight festivity.

How should innocent Miss Rachel, twenty-seven years old, guess that Bayville, multiplying the sleigh-rides and "Pinafore," the visits and the notes, had quite made up its mind that the Prudhommés were about to mend their shattered fortunes by an alliance with the Newmans? How should she guess that her brother had discouraged neither the gossip in the town nor the hopes of the young heir? How should she suspect what those hopes might be till one summer day he found her alone, and she was smitten suddenly with sore dismay.

Miss Rachel was not experienced in this feeling; but she recognized it. She had had it once before, in her boarding-school days, when the handsome young minister fell at her feet and implored. And so, half an hour later, this other young man sadly went his way, and Rachel Prudhomme, twenty-seven years old, ran up stairs and cried—a sad lack of the Prudhomme pride! But love was sweet to the lonely little woman.

And then, how was Rachel to foresee—to dream—what followed? The fortnight's hunting expedition—the desperate flirtation with a pretty country girl—the newspaper announcement which took all Bayville's breath away:

"In Littleton, September 1st, Charles Newman, of Bayville, to Miss Flossie Brown, of Littleton."

"I left him there last week," said James in explanation. "He said he should marry her now he'd gone so far. He's a young goose! And here's all Bayville gloating over the story that he's broken an engagement with you, and disappointed the Prudhommés! I hope you enjoy your work, miss. So much for not consulting your brother!"

Rachel had been breathless like all the rest of Bayville, and speechless unlike them; but at this she found her voice.

"Please understand, James," she said, "that it makes no sort of difference to me what the young men on the street say, or what anybody else says, of my affairs. I don't understand this matter at all; but I know this—that the opinions and beliefs of the young men of your acquaintance, or indeed of the whole town, do not affect me in the least; and you know it, too, James."

The touch of family pride became her well, and James had nothing but a prolonged whistle to offer for answer.

One other person in Bayville had been as ignorant as Rachel of the current gossip. Mr. Newman, the millionaire, occupied with extensive business and schemes of far-reaching charity, had known too little of late of his son's pursuits and whereabouts. It was in a puzzled and uncertain condition of mind, most unusual with this man of business, that he lifted the knocker of the old Prudhomme house the day after James' return. He had learned enough to lead him to make this call before pushing his investigations farther.

Rachel saw Mr. Newman coming. She knew very well the tall and portly form; she knew the fringe of grayish hair falling beneath his hat, and she knew the bald spot that was under the hat. The families had long been neighbors in church, and, though she had scarcely exchanged twenty words with this man in her life, she felt on quite intimate terms with his face, it had looked pleasantly upon her so many years.

"You will forgive my calling, Miss Prudhomme," he said, "though it may seem to be upon my own business. My son has been so much with your brother, perhaps I can get a little light here. I don't know what Charley has been doing lately. He's been rather wild, I'm afraid. I've neglected him, I'm afraid. But, to tell the truth, I came chiefly to say to you, Miss Rachel, that if my son has been annoying you in any way—if he has been thoughtless or too ambitious, or troubled you in any way, why, I've come to beg your pardon in his stead."

"Oh, Mr. Newman," cried Rachel, "there is nothing for me to pardon. It is all my fault—what passed between us, I mean. And before that, I am afraid—Charley is easily led, and my poor brother, you know—"

"Yes, I know, I know," said the good man soothingly. He could not bear to see this shadow of grief and shame on Rachel's fresh face. "I know; we mustn't judge too harshly. We mustn't forget that there's only One who sees the whole life. Now, were you going to tell me a little more about that other, my dear? Or would you rather not?"

Rachel told the story with all her blushes flying about her face, and good Mr. Newman was by turns so very sorry for Charley and so charmed with the narrator that his own countenance was quite a study in light and shade.

"I hope you will forgive my thoughtlessness," she finished. "I think Charley must have done so, and I do so hope this marriage—"

"Well, we'll do the best we can about the forgiving," he said, with something between a laugh and a sigh. "And now about this young couple. I shall start this afternoon to catch them, and we must make the best of it—make the best of it! I thank you very much, Miss Rachel—very much indeed."

It was a day or two after this that the postman brought Miss Rachel a letter:

"MY DEAR MISS PRUDHOMME: I have found our young people, and I think you will be glad to know that after a talk with each I feel much relieved about them. The little girl seems sweet-tempered and affectionate—just seventeen—and she is very pretty. Charley had made arrangements to go into business here, but has now decided to go home and take a position in my office. The young people will live with me for the present. If you should feel inclined to give my little daughter the pleasure of your acquaintance, I should take it very kindly of you.

"Yours sincerely, JOHN NEWMAN"

Miss Rachel did not often get a letter. There were the regular family bulletins from Regina, and now and then a few lines to herself personally from her distant nieces or from an old school friend. Her most precious treasures of this kind were those that came to her long ago from her brother Joseph during his voyages. These she kept in a beautiful little Eastern cabinet which Joe had himself brought her. When she had read this new letter two or three times she laid it away near those old ones, in a little compartment by itself. And she thought, as she did so, how she should always value it as proof of a pleasant camaraderie with a good man, and how she should call on that "little daughter" as soon as possible.

PART SECOND.

THE young married pair, having been first sent to a sister of Mr. Newman's, in New York, for the proper outfitting of the bride, came home to Bayville. Their father met them with the carriage in a state and elegance he seldom affected. As they drove up to the beautiful house on the hill, lights streamed out, servants stood waiting, a richly appointed dinner-table gleamed at the end of the hall, and the choicest rooms of the house stood ready for their use. Charles Newman grasped his father's hand in a corner, as a man can grasp another man's hand, and said, with a husky laugh, that if this were not a case of the prodigal son, it was certainly a case of the prodigal father.

Shortly after, cards were issued for a wedding reception at the Newman's.

When Rachel's came Madame Prudhomme examined them with a stately amazement.

"Really quite an elegant affair," she said. "You will have to send a refusal, I suppose. There's a little of that nice note-paper left in my secretary."

"But, mamma, I want to go," said Rachel flushing up.

"Want to go? Rachel! You never did such a thing in your life. What are you thinking of?"

"I must tell her," thought Rachel. "I must certainly tell her something." For the little woman was quite determined to go.

"But, mamma dear," she began, "there is a special reason this time. Do you know?—I have never told you because it was so silly—but that young man has been here so much, James and some other people have thought that he and I cared for each other. So you see—"

"Nonsense! Who would think of my daughter caring for one of these townspeople?"

But Madame Prudhomme dropped the subject, and when she next took it up it was with the question:

"What are you going to wear if you go to that party?"

"The garret will settle that," said Rachel gayly, and ran up stairs.

Nothing but a happy combination of past wealth and present poverty could have produced so charming a costume as Rachel's that evening. The garret had yielded a soft-shining satin of nameless tint. Over it fell lace that might have made a duchess weep, and the single curiously-set gem that sparkled in its midst was such as could not easily have been purchased anywhere in the world to-day. There was nothing new about our little lady, except her gloves and flowers and the dimples that seemed always freshly bubbling up on her bonnie countenance. Mike, the grocer, acted as coachman, and Madame Prudhomme insisted on old Margaret, in white apron and cap, attending as maid. The faithful servant sat dazzled in the brilliant dressing-room among the handmaids of the house of Newman, and I hope she may be shriven for the lies she told about her family's greatness, and the magnificence of daily life in the Prudhomme mansion.

Rachel had never had so good a time in her life. She was twenty-seven years old, but she had never had so good a time in her life. It was a trifle dreary for an instant going into the drawing-room alone; but the host stood near the door, and himself took her to his sister, who was helping him welcome his friends, and to the newly-married pair. He introduced to her a delightful professor, who told her about fossils, and then a gentle youth, who roamed with her through the great conservatories. He himself brought her dainty ices, and took her for a walk in the lighted garden, where he left her with another delightful professor. It was a distinguished and brilliant company, for men of letters and of science and women of high standing were proud to know this man of active mind, royal heart and upright life. The host was everywhere, with his kindly little jokes, his infectious cheeriness; and when Miss Prudhomme's carriage was announced, and the shabby old establishment stood exposed among grinning coachmen in the brilliant light, it was the millionaire himself who handed her in as if it had been a chariot and she a queen. Certainly Rachel never had so good a time in her life! And all the way home she had to pinch herself hard to make sure that she was not a young girl in a story-book, but Rachel Prudhomme, twenty-seven years old.

Life in the Prudhomme house now returned to its usual calm. Madame Prudhomme was more rheumatic this winter, and read Trollope and dropped stitches up stairs. Nothing more festive than a Sunday-school teachers' meeting ever took place in the drawing-room. Madame Prudhomme approved of church and Sunday-school, was glad to have Rachel attend them, and wished James would do so. Now and then a guest appeared of the order with which Rachel had been familiar from her childhood. "My name is Smith. My grandfather married a Prudhomme," was a formula well known to her. She knew how most quickly to silence the inquirer by plunging him at once into the family documents. She knew on just what top shelf of a remote closet to place the genealogical volume which was sure to follow (with compliments) in due season.

Toward spring two distant cousins of her father came for a stay of a week to investigate and oversee repairs on the family tomb. This visit had a most reviving effect on Madame Prudhomme. She sat down stairs more than she had for months. She even drove out to the cemetery, and in the evenings the three gray heads were bent with great delight over musty records of the dead. Rachel felt very insignificant, but she could get up very little interest in these far-away people. Now and then, to be sure, some brave deed or noble life shone out like a jewel in the dust, and gave her a thrill of proud delight; but, for the most part, the present, dull as it was, anxious and perplexed as it often was, interested her more than the misty past. As for the future, she seldom thought of that, though a general rosiness seemed to suffuse the horizon before her.

Trouble, however, new trouble, was in the immediate foreground.

Late one afternoon a dingy, reluctant country wagon, covered with a black cloth and followed by an increasing crowd of men and boys, passed through the business streets of Bayville and stopped before the police headquarters. Its burden, still covered with the black cloth, was slowly carried within, while the low-toned tidings ran through the crowd. It was James Prudhomme, shot, probably, by his own unsteady hand while hunting. The excited officials gathered over the body and consulted. They were much relieved when the crowd, giving way to right and left, admitted Mr. Newman, who, passing up the street, had heard the news.

The man of business stood for a time with head uncovered, considering. He then undertook such arrangements as were necessary, and agreed to inform the family. "But I must go to my office a moment first," he said. "And let me see; perhaps there are some papers." The officials had already found a shabby and ill-furnished purse. This Mr. Newman took, and going to his office filled it with bank notes as liberally as he dared, returning it to the dead man's pocket.

I need not tell how, as carefully as possible, the wretched fact of the young man's death was conveyed to Rachel and her mother—how long grief and shame mingled with a new shock and sorrow in the mourners' hearts—how Bayville gaped and moralized and pitied.

In a few days Miss Rachel found herself much perplexed about that roll of bills. It was far too large a sum, she thought, for James to have had with him in any natural way. She inquired among the young men of his acquaintance, but could get no clue. She was on the point of advertising the sum as found, but she decided to send first for Mr. Newman.

"You have been so kind," she said, "I am going to trouble you still more."

"Precisely the right thing for you to do," he answered. "I am very glad you sent for me. I know a good deal, of course, about such matters—being in my sort of business, you know. And I happen to be informed of all the circumstances in this particular case. The money is yours by every right."

Rachel still looked puzzled.

"We business men mustn't tell tales, you know. But we know a good deal. We have facilities, you see. And now I wish you would promise me, my—my dear, that if you are ever troubled or in doubt about any matter of business you'll send for me."

Rachel looked up in his good face, believed him with all her heart, and promised.

Mr. Newman was, in general, a happy man. But one thing made him miserable, and that was trouble of any kind which he could not relieve. The rubbings of that bald spot on his head, the wrinklins of his broad and sunny countenance and the deep ponderings of heart which went on within him as he watched his little neighbor in church and thought he saw a deepening shadow on her face, were such as might have threatened a permanent gloom had it not happened that there were a good many other poor and troubled people in the world, and more especially a young pair at home to be knit together and made happy in every possible way.

At last the good man hit upon a stratagem by which, he thought, he might get the better for a time of even the Prudhomme pride. He encountered Rachel casually at her gate one morning and stopped for a few words. "I beg your pardon, Miss Rachel," he said at last, "but there's that poor Historical Society of ours." The millionaire took off his hat, rubbed his head, and looked as unhappy as he could make himself look. "You see we've got a big list of officers and an elegant hall and plenty of capital, but I declare we haven't so much as a case full of things to show—things that are really historical. I've been thinking that if you could—if Madame Prudhomme could, you know—make up her mind to part with some of the interesting things in your house—that urn, for instance, that Washington had coffee out of—or, well, 'most anything—why it would be immensely valuable to us; and I know she was once prevailed on to let the state have that portrait—"

The good man rubbed his head again and tried to keep up a despondent expression; but he was so delighted at a gleam of relief he thought he detected in the face before him that it was a most transparent fraud, or would have been to one less personally interested than Rachel.

She half suspected him at first, but much contriving was beginning to make her mercenary, and suspicion was lost in a swift calculation of the comforts that old urn would bring her mother.

"I don't know, Mr. Newman," she said. "Thank you for thinking of it"—she really could not help thanking him, he looked so good—"I will ask mamma and let you know what she says."

What Madame Prudhomme said was this: No! She should certainly not think of such a thing. She wondered the man could ask. That Prudhomme urn, to be sure, sold to a little society of tradespeople! But Miss Rachel, as I have said, was certainly growing mercenary, and at this juncture she showed herself capable of finesse. Her mother now sat up stairs altogether, and never looked at the silver. Rachel left the old urn in the baize-lined box, but she rubbed up a tankard of equal age and had it ready to show Mr. Newman when he called for his answer. "I really think," she said, laughing, "it had quite as much to do with Washington as the urn, for I have been looking into the old journals somewhat, and I think that particular urn went to another branch of the family."

"Never mind, Miss Rachel, never mind," answered Mr. Newman beaming. "Anything that can add a couple of ciphers to its age, you know—that's all that's needed now-days!" He might have been some glorified miser chuckling over his gains. "And if you ever think of anything else you can possibly spare, why—that Historical Society is so poor, you see—it would be such a favor."

And now again the days went on more monotonously it seemed than ever before. Even the genealogical gentlemen seemed to come more rarely. Even the Sunday-school teachers' meetings were less frequent, for Rachel was more and more confined to her mother's room and bedside. Acquaintance with Charley Newman's wife had been progressing all this time, and the development of the affectionate little country girl into a pleasing young woman, and the growing content on the husband's face, were among the happiest circumstances of Rachel's life at this time.

The young pair were now in a home of their own, and Rachel found herself taking a matronly interest in their little housekeeping experiments. It was novel and sweet to her to have the right to feel so familiar a concern in the affairs of any one outside the family.

The problem of daily life grew no easier. But Rachel remembered her promise, and more than once she took pity on the Historical Society, which body, through its president, certainly rewarded her most handsomely for her offerings.

At last there came a day when sorrow and loss crept closer than ever before to this woman's heart—when the mother's beautiful, proud head lay low, and the poor little heart-chilled daisy stood alone in the autumn wind.

It was so very still and empty in the house when all was over. Kindly relatives had lingered, but the last was now gone. The last letter of sympathy was laid aside. Friends had been thoughtful. Houses of cousins all over the land stood open to her for visits of indefinite length. Bayville had nothing but kindly words to offer now. Charley Newman and his wife heaped up fresh flowers in her rooms, fresh kindnesses in her heart. These things eased the pain, perhaps, but they did not fill the emptiness.

She sat alone one morning, and the world looked very bleak. The door-bell rang, and the clouds suddenly lifted. At the same moment a friend came in. "I have been so sorry to be away all this time," said Mr. Newman, "so very sorry, Miss Rachel."

"But now you have come back," said Rachel smiling. They said a few words about his journey. He asked a few questions in his sympathetic yet cheery tones on the subject nearest her heart.

"But I came this morning to ask you a question," he said at last. "I am sure you will answer it frankly and freely, and—kindly. And if you can answer it as I wish, I shall—I shall be very happy. Your home is broken up. I came—I came to ask you if you could make up your mind to come and make a home for me? I hardly need to tell you about myself. You know it all, I think. I have worked with my hands a large part of my life. My grandfather was an honest man, I believe, but you never heard his name. I'm a widower; you know that, too. My wife died twelve years ago."

A vision of Mrs. Newman's good-natured face and rather striking costumes passed before Rachel's eyes. But it was quickly shut out by the earnest face bending over her.

"Maria was a good woman, and I loved her," said the widower loyally; "but she wa'n't a—a rosebud!"

Rachel by this time deserved the simile. She was one bewitching confusion of blushes, smiles and tears. And here was this good man waiting for her to speak.

"Mr. Newman," she said, looking up into his eyes, "you are my very best friend, and I honor you more than any man in the world!"

His face was a sunrise. He stretched out his warm strong hand.

"Then does that settle it, my—my blessing? May I kiss you? And now when will you come home?"

Miss Rachel paused in her sewing the next day. "I do believe," she said to herself—"I do believe I am doing that dreadful thing, marrying for a home. I am! A home means to me love, and honor, and obedience. I am! I certainly am! I wonder, too, what Regina will say. I must write her at once."

Regina said, in short, that she was very much surprised. On what the house would bring Rachel could live very genteelly in Europe. She knew nothing about this Mr. Newman, but she presumed he was a good man. She sent a Swiss carving for a wedding present, and hoped her sister would be happy.

And was this the end of the Prudhomme pride? I am not so sure of that. The last time I was in Bayville, passing the Newman place, I saw a little maiden—six years old perhaps—who carried her head like a duchess, and who bore at the same time a striking resemblance to the elderly man by her side. A lady came out on the lawn to meet them. I thought she looked proud of them both. I thought the Prudhomme pride, instead of dying, had begun a new and healthier life.

THE HOUSEHOLD—A SPRING WORD.

Now and then the editor who has settled upon a certain topic and is casting about for the best words in which to present it, finds that the desire has been simply a pulse of the thought-wave which has passed simultaneously through many minds, and that every exchange gives an article, long or short, on the same subject. The wastebasket in every sanctum holds its proper percentage of poems on Spring, and there is even now and then a new word, a fresh method of singing the old song, that half atones for singing at all. But aside from its poetical aspects, spring has small attention. It is the season of fresh colds, of house-cleaning, of moving—of everything that is shifting and uncertain and depressing. And with all the other afflictions comes spring fever. Appetite goes; headache and languor come. The housekeeper is in despair; and till June and a comparatively unchanging temperature bring one to the proper point of summer endurance and summer enjoyment, there is a sense of discomfort, and often of positive suffering. The editor of the Christian Register has summed it all up in words which tell the same story and make it eminently useless for the Household editor to seek new ones in which to say precisely the same thing, in, very probably, by no means as incisive a way.

From the first of April to May, or even later, is this miserable intermediate state of which he writes:

"The average town-dwelling American probably finds the ensuing month or six weeks about the most unsatisfactory portion of the year in which to enjoy life, unless it be the dog-days. The approach of warm weather relaxes the system. He has the 'spring appetite,' which means no appetite. He feels listless and dull. If he consults the doctor, he is probably told that he is 'bilious'—a word that covers a multitude of sins in patients, and conceals a great deal of conscious ignorance in physicians. Or, if he depends upon old housewives' traditions, he drenches himself with bitters or peppers himself with pills.

"Why cannot people put a little more common sense and thought into their living, and take a hint from nature and the calendar? 'Throw physic to the dogs'—the sagacious animals will not touch it—and change your diet and habits to match the changing season. Avoid heavy and heating food. A little judicious starving is a good thing for the squeamish spring appetite. If a man isn't hungry, why should he eat? Dr. Tanner has proved, what many persons have found out for themselves, that abstinence is not so fatal as many seem still to suppose.

"If one can eat breakfast and relish it at ten or eleven o'clock, but can only force down a few mouthfuls into a protesting stomach at seven, why shouldn't he conform to the situation? Not a fifth part of the civilized world breakfasts in the fashion in vogue in this country. Many a man or woman would find their appetite equal to a plate of oranges or a dish of oatmeal or a biscuit and a cup of coffee in the morning, who cannot eat chops, fried potatoes and griddle cakes. A head of lettuce and a slice of bread and butter will often be relished for lunch, when hot soups or cold meats would go untouched. Fish and eggs are plenty and cheap in most markets, and they afford a great variety and combination of dishes especially adapted to the season.

"Another point is too often forgotten: spring means renewed activity. If the city men, who have huddled in ill-ventilated cars all winter, will walk to and from their business, or far enough to get up a good glow every day, they would soon have less reason to complain of biliousness. A good jogging and aerating will do the blood more good than any nostrums. If the women would get out into the air, spy around the markets for nice things with which to switch the home table out of the well-worn ruts, visit their children's school, walk for the novelty of it, or even to see the spring openings, out doors and in, the change from the nerve-rasping perplexities and stifling air of the house would revive their interest in the bill of fare.

"We are all too prone to sit still and 'see the wheels go round' in the same old fashion in matters religious, political, social and gastronomical. If some of the pretty, pious mottoes that adorn our homes could be traded off for the golden text, 'Variety is the spice of life,' and the useful truth it embodies could be applied as it ought to be, there would be a good deal better living and more fun in the world, a better relish and more good digestion; and, therefore, it would be less of a dog-kennel of a place in which to live than the dyspeptic philosopher declared it to be."

WHEN TO BE IDLE.

THERE are undoubtedly seasons and periods when it is wise to wait; when it is not worth while to commence any undertaking, great or small. There are studies which it is not worth a man's while to take up, pursuits which it is not worth his while to follow. For the book that is read at dinner-time or in the street, or a language that is learned in recurring spare moments, is very apt to be half done, except by the occasional few, who really have strength of mind and body sufficient for such achievements. As a usual thing, there is more loss than gain in such a habit, and both conversation and manners suffer when there is a trick of thinking it worth while to pull out some implement of labor, pen, pencil or needle, at times when other people are content to seem unemployed, and are only busy in being agreeable. All such acts come under the same category of virtue with the housewife's economy of time, which made her sit up in bed to knit stockings in the dark, or re-thread her needle at the infinite expense of time and eyesight to save an inch of cotton. Work done in odd moments is never good work if it interferes with meat, mass or rest. It is an evidence of thorough self-mastery when a man knows how to use time, and has the sense to recognize when time is not worth using in any definite way.

"I laid me down and slept," sang David, and when he awaked he answered, "I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people that have set themselves against me round about." It is a good help, and a great help, to "commune with your own heart," and many times to fold your hands and be very still.

M. A. BARK.

A CHEESE-MAKING BERRY.

NATURE has, it appears, provided a substitute for rennet in the manufacture of cheese, the article being the berry of the plant known to botanists as Withania coagulans. This shrub, says the London Globe, thrives in the Punjab and Trans-Indus territory, and has long been used by the Bellocches and Afghans to curdle milk. But its complete efficacy was not demonstrated until lately, when the berry was officially experimented with at a farm belonging to Sir James Ferguson, the present Governor of Bombay. The report published by the government says that a complete success was achieved, a perfect curd being produced and the cheese turning out excellent in every respect. The method of preparing the punera—so is the berry called, from the Persian name of cheese—is to put some ounces into a small quantity of cold water, and to allow this to simmer by the side of a fire for twelve hours. At the end of that time about half a pint of the decoction will suffice to curdle fifty-five gallons of milk, the quantity of berries employed being two ounces. With a view to the more extended cultivation of the shrub, an experimental plantation is about to be established at the Government Botanical Gardens at Saharanpore.

HOW TO TAKE EXERCISE.

THE aim of exercise, says the London Lancet, is not solely to work the organism which is thrown into activity, though that is one, and a very important, part of the object in view, because, as the living body works it feeds, and as it feeds it is replenished; but there is another purpose in exercise, and that is to call into action and stimulate the faculty of recuperation. Exercise with a view to recuperation should never so much exceed the capacity of the recuperative faculty as to prostrate the nervous energy.

A LITTLE COMPANY.

Chicken Soup.

Little Neck Clams.

Lamb Chops Breaded.

Tomato Sauce.

Roast Haunch of Venison.

Boiled Potatoes.

Oyster Plant Fritters.

Salmi of Grouse.

Cheese.

Cream Crackers.

Chocolate Puffs.

Apple Pie.

Lemon Water Ice.

Fruit.

Coffee.

CHICKEN SOUP.—One large chicken, an old hen answering quite as well. Cut it up, and put over the fire in four quarts of cold water, seasoned with one large tablespoonful of salt, half a teaspoonful of pepper, and one or two sprigs of parsley. Add a cup of rice when it has boiled slowly three hours, and boil an hour or so longer. Then skim off every particle of fat, letting the kettle stand on a table till boiling stops. Strain through a sieve, take out all the bones and pieces of meat and the parsley. Press the rice through the sieve, and stir into the soup. Save a cupful of it to use with the pieces of chicken, either as mince or croquettes.

PANNED CLAMS.—Allow one patty-pan with nearly upright sides to each person. Cut stale bread in rounds to fit the bottom of each pan, butter it, and wet with clam liquor. Fill each pan nearly full of clams, pepper and salt them, and lay a bit of butter on each. Put them in a dripping-pan, cover with another, and bake till the edges curl—about ten minutes. Serve in the pans.

LAMB CHOPS BREADED.—Trim the chops carefully into French chops—that is, scrape the bone clean down to the circle of meat. Dip each one in beaten egg, and then in rolled bread crumbs, and fry a bright brown, seasoning them with pepper and salt.

TOMATO SAUCE.—One can of tomatoes, one small onion, cut fine; three cloves, three allspice and three pepper-corns, half a small carrot, and a sprig of parsley, one teaspoonful of salt. Boil all together half an hour, then rub through a sieve. Melt one tablespoonful of butter, and add a heaping one of flour. Stir till perfectly smooth, and add the strained tomato slowly, letting all boil five minutes.

ROAST HAUNCH OF VENISON.—As in No. 4 of THE CONTINENT.

BOILED POTATOES.—As in No. 1 of THE CONTINENT.

OYSTER PLANT FRITTERS.—As in No. 42 of THE CONTINENT.

SALMI OF GROUSE.—This may be made of any cold roasted game. Cut into neat pieces. Put all the bones and trimmings into a saucepan with one quart of stock, an onion sliced, four pepper-corns, a blade of mace, and a teaspoonful of salt. Boil one hour, then strain, skim off the fat, and heat the pieces of grouse gradually. The broth should be reduced to less than a pint. Pile the grouse in the centre of a platter, pour the sauce over them, and garnish with fried bread cut in points.

CHOCOLATE PUFFS.—For the cakes: One cup of butter, one pint of sifted flour, one pint of hot water, six eggs. Melt the butter in the water, and bring to boiling-point. Add the flour, and boil one minute, beating it smooth. Let the mixture cool. Beat the eggs light and add to it. Drop in large spoonfuls on buttered pans, and bake ten minutes in a quick oven. Fill with the following mixture, passing a sharp knife around each when cold: One quart of milk, four tablespoonfuls of corn starch, three eggs, two cups of sugar, four tablespoonfuls of grated chocolate, one teaspoonful of vanilla. Wet the corn starch with a little of the milk, boiling the rest in a double boiler. Beat eggs and sugar together, and add when it boils, and then the corn starch. When smooth and thick stir in the chocolate and vanilla, and, when cold, fill the puffs.

APPLE PIE.—Make of evaporated apples soaked two hours, and then treated as in No. 44 of THE CONTINENT.

LEMON WATER ICE.—As in No. 28 of THE CONTINENT.

HELEN CAMPBELL.

GENERAL GREENE B. RAUM, who has just resigned the position of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, has manifested more skill in keeping worthless men in office, and getting credit for them as good officers, than any man ever possessed before. During the years of his administration the "Revenue Rings" of the South have been a stench and an abomination to every honest man. The iniquities and outrages that have been perpetrated under the forms of law, the complicity with fraud, and the utter absence of all regard for honesty or justice that has marred the administration of this system, have been such as to justify calling it infernal rather than internal. It is, of course, a difficult law to administer at the best, but its administration has been such as to make it a thorough disgrace to the government. Mr. Raum was not responsible for all of these evils. The system could not have been administered at the South without serious difficulty by any one. He was only responsible for keeping in place men whose moral characters were a disgrace to any service, and whose associations and pecuniary relations showed that they were the silent partners of "blockaders" and "moonshiners." Mr. Raum was an efficient officer in the sense that he was active and attended strictly to accounting for the immense collections of his office. Only an infinitesimal proportion of the collections actually made was lost. It is not probable that the revenue suffered to any serious extent from his remissness in keeping in office the men he did in various parts of the South. The whole production of the illicit distilleries of the South is not very great in comparison with the monster establishments of the North. "Blockading" is abundant, but it is on a petty scale. It has probably cost the government about as much to break them up as it would to let them work on. It is in the character of the men whom he has chosen and kept in the service that he is chiefly reprehensible. The result has been a state of affairs so generally believed to be fraudulent that the Revenue service has become the heaviest load the Southern Republicans have to carry. Men whose lives were reeking with moral filth have been the petted favorites of the department. The protests of men were disregarded, and the whole machinery was dedicated to the most infamous political abuses.

DEPUTY COMMISSIONER ROGERS, who, it is intimated, will have the place, is thoroughly capable, and the worst thing that can be said of him is that he has been exposed to the flavor of the office for so long a time. The scent of an odoriferous service clings to him, and may defeat his appointment. If he should get the place, however, and have the nerve to do it, he is just the man to clean out the stable—he knows where the dirt is.

THE Civil Service Commission, by their very first act, have demonstrated that the millennium did not begin with their appointment. Mr. Dorman B. Eaton takes two newspaper columns to explain why this is the case. He need not have done so. The work of sorting men by rule is one that the merely impractical doctrinaire may dream of and talk about with a zest that would seem to promise miracles, but it is one that has never yet produced good results in any branch of life or thought unless supplemented with a tact that overrides formularies and wins its way above rules by the multitude of the exceptions. The method of civil service appointment that has just been inaugurated is but the beginning of a long and doubtful experiment. It is an attempt not to purify the sources of power, but to fix an iron rule by which its improper exercise shall be balked. We do not believe that the system can be made a success under our form of government, and we believe that it would be a national calamity if it should. At the same time, we are very willing the experiment shall be tried, honestly and fairly, and its operation and tendencies fully demonstrated. A bad system, like all bad laws, is best overthrown by a strict and literal enforcement.

THE article on "The Right to Bear Arms" has attracted so much attention and elicited so many letters of inquiry from people whose right in this regard was not set forth in the article, that we have decided to make a collection of heraldic material, with the purpose of publishing, when reasonably complete, a work on Heraldic America. It would seem, from the number of communications we have had on the subject, that there are very few Americans who are not of more or less titled lineage. The few which our contributor happened to select from Philadelphia and its vicinity appear to have been only just sufficient to awaken the attention of many others to the subject, and they have come forward with great unanimity to ask that equal justice be done to them. In order that we may be in a position to meet this demand for heraldic recognition, we have secured the services of one curious in such matters, to examine all communications upon the subject and arrange the matter for publication. Parties desiring to avail themselves of this opportunity may address "Heraldry," at this office. All communications must be accompanied by the name and address of the person sending them, an account of the manner in which the right is derived, and a reference to or copy of any evidence there may be of such right. A copy of the crest in wax or an accurate drawing should accompany each application. For ourselves, we think that the American who occupies his time with these things is employing the moments of a limited career in a very unprofitable manner. An aristocratic name and a trace of so-called nobility may be an enviable possession, but "the guinea's stamp" has somehow an unaccountable inclination to appear on spurious coin. What has been called nobility under the varying forms of imperialism in the Old World is of such an uncertain character as not unfrequently to make the coat-of-arms a badge of shame rather than of honor—

"Now stamped with the image of Good Queen Bess, And now of a Bloody Mary."

However, there are many thousands of worthy people who, even on our soil, and with the priceless heritage of our American citizenship, regard these badges of accidental rank with peculiar pride. The matter has a pleasant side, and the inquiry is at least harmless. Indeed, in one sense it may be accounted profitable as showing how much better the life developed here has become than that from which it sprung. The proudest lineages of the Old World have here been crossed and mingled with the lowest stocks, with every now and then a bar sinister across the field. Yet the whole has been exalted. Our American life can stand a large admixture of foreign nobility without serious injury. It welcomes prince and peasant alike, and makes of the children of both stronger and braver men than their fathers were. It does us no harm to look back at what our fathers were, even though we should find, as Saxe assures us, that

"Your boasted line
May end in a loop of stronger twine
Than choked some near relation."

The scaffold has been the fountain of more real nobility, perhaps, than the herald's office. The patriot's halter is oft-times a prouder bearing than the king's favor could bestow. Considering THE CONTINENT bound to minister to the enjoyment of all, we offer this opportunity to such as may desire to avail themselves of it.

**

APROPOS of our view of the comparative value of American citizenship and inherited rank, we are reminded of an anecdote told of a prominent Philadelphian, who was connected with the construction of the first railroad in Russia. At the formal opening, the Czar was in attendance, and rode upon the first passenger train that passed over the road. The nobles who accompanied him were obliged by the etiquette of the court to remain standing while in his presence throughout the whole trip. The American projector was seated. The tired courtiers complained of this to the sovereign.

"You are wrong," said he. "Not one of you can by any possibility be a king. This man may be made President and the head of a great nation to-morrow."

**

We are reminded, too, by a little incident connected with the article in question, of an expression which an old neighbor in another state frequently made use of in regard to old families:

"I tell you, gentlemen, old families are powerful apt to run out."

A very "dudish" young scion of an ancient stock made his appearance in THE CONTINENT office a few days after the appearance of the number containing the article, and asked to see a copy, explaining that he wished to ascertain whether it made mention of his family arms. Seating himself at a table, he read the article carefully through. Then, rising and laying the number on the desk before a busy clerk, he said with an air:

"It is not there, sir—it is not even mentioned; yet it is one of the oldest families in the country. I think if it had been noticed I should have bought a copy!"

The clerk recovered after a considerable time, and volunteered his opinion that the young man's family was much like a hill of potatoes—the best part of it under ground.

**

THE commendations which the "Housekeeper's Year Book" has received are among the most gratifying things that have attended THE CONTINENT's career. From every part of the country have come from housekeepers of all sorts of experience thanks and suggestions. Our attempt to systematize and facilitate the labors of the housewife, to simplify her accounts and to enable her to keep a correct and convenient inventory of her belongings, has met with such unqualified praise and commendation that the large edition is likely very soon to be exhausted. It is furnished to the trade by Fords, Howard & Hulbert of New York, or may be obtained of us either by subscribing to THE CONTINENT for one year, or by remitting the price—fifty cents.

Only one poor fellow seems to find it superfluous. He writes:

"While not in itself essentially a humorous publication, your 'Year Book' is full of rich humor—to a bachelor. Its various prescriptions read well at least. If they feast the body as well as THE CONTINENT feasts the reason, what more can be desired?"

We are sorry indeed for our solitary well-wisher, and hope the "Year Book" will prove a constant remembrancer of the one thing he lacks to make his life complete.

THE financial disaster that recently befell Rev. E. P. Roe, the novelist and fruit-grower of Cornwall-on-the-Hudson, is in some sense a public calamity. Few men have exerted a healthier influence upon the life of to-day than Mr. Roe. In these times, when the novel with a purpose is made a matter of artistic ridicule by over-refined dilettanti, and the novel without a purpose is corrupting the heart and brain of the rising generation, it is well worth our while to give a moment to the consideration of the life and work of this earnest-minded, simple-living author, whose works, if not always of the highest literary merit, have always been of the very best tone and character. Not only this, but the very large sales which his works have had disclose to us the pleasing fact that our American reading public is not yet entirely given over to the worship of that realism which insists that fiction shall be given up to painting life as it is, dirt and all. Neither has it yet risen to the exalted plane from which life is regarded as one eternal flirtation, and romance only to be found in the debatable ground that skirts the line of the immoral. Mr. Roe has given pleasure to many thousand readers, and no man can point to a word or a line that has made any man or woman worse or corrupted the heart of any child. His books have not always scintillated with the light of impossible epigram, nor have his characters been able to sustain the strain of endless self-analysis. They have not been loiterers along the path of life, who had nothing to do but to make eternal inquisition as to microscopic trivialities. They have been men and women who touched the world in honest, homely ways sometimes, but always in ways that our American life exemplifies, and exemplifies to its beauty, honor and credit. Judged by his works, our life of to-day is not absorbed in inanities of an estheticism which is merely a tawdry varnish of unhealthy ease. His characters show us a life fresh, sweet, honest, with that undercurrent of ambition for good that, above all things else, distinguishes the American home.

Living simply and unostentatiously on his little fruit-farm, with his own hands performing the labors which his pen has brought to the knowledge of thousands, who have thereby been enabled to make their home-life easier and sweeter, he has been an exemplar as well as the delineator of honest, manly living. His life has been a busy one, not busy with the feverish, restless rush and hurry of the stock-gambler or the man whose whole life is devoted to gathering gold by overreaching his fellows, but filled with that labor that bespeaks a healthy manhood.

In short, Mr. Roe is a good man who has made the world better by having lived in it. By reason of an over-confidence in one whom it does him honor to have trusted even to his own hurt, the accumulations of his life have been swept away. When we read the story of Scott, after middle life overwhelmed with financial disaster, chiefly through his own greed of display and desire to adorn the title he had won, calling upon his weary brain year after year for some new and marvelous work, and finally staggering to the very edge of the grave, pen in hand—drawing upon his broken brain to the very last hour for thoughts that might be coined into golden guineas to meet the demands of his creditors—very few can abstain from tears. We always wish that we might have been allowed to bear a little of that weary burden in order that the world might have been enriched by a longer life-tenure for the wonder-working brain.

Mr. Roe is not a Scott either in power or love of ostentation, but he is none the less worthy of grateful sympathy. This he will receive from many thousands of appreciative readers and admirers. It is a little saddening, however, to believe that it will end in sympathy. Mr. Roe has shown himself in his misfortune the brave, sturdy man we had a right to expect from his works that he would be. He asks no favor, but faces his load of debt as becomes a man. He will discharge it, no doubt, but it may consume his life. There is a method by which his admirers might aid him. If each one would buy one more of his books, it would be a practical exhibition of sympathy that would no doubt be valued by him far beyond the amount he would receive.

"THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD" is the name of a magazine published by the International Institute, Boston, for the purpose, it declares, "of the discussion and dissemination of the wisdom contained in the great pyramid of Jeezeh, Egypt." It is a little saddening, however, to the world to know that Jeezeh has an organ finally. He has waited a long time for it, and there are people who think that all the wisdom that ever was in the pyramid has been injected into it during the past century. All the same, it needs "dissemination," and we know of nothing that will stand "discussion" better or longer. It has braved Bedouins and the sirocco so long that it may well bid defiance to Boston.

OWING to the non-receipt of expected advance-sheets from England, the editor has been obliged to curtail the weekly installments of Miss Broughton's story, "Belinda," so as not to be obliged, even temporarily, to suspend its publication. This contingency may yet occur, in spite of the utmost economy of present material.

THE thrill of horror and pity felt by every one who read the final record in Captain De Long's diary, given to the public in the daily press, is felt again in reading the volume in which Colonel Gilder describes the search for the survivors of the ill-fated Jeannette. "Ice Pack and Tundra" is a reprint of the letters written by Colonel Gilder for the New York Herald, revised slightly, though their picturesqueness and faithfulness in the beginning made this almost unnecessary. There are three excellent maps and forty-eight illustrations, some of especial interest, being copied from Esquimaux drawings. From cover to cover the interest does not flag for an instant, from the time when the search-steamship Rodgers gets under way to its sudden destruction by fire and the consequent change in every plan. As a result of this burning came the journey across Northern Siberia, accomplished in the face of unending difficulties, perils from man in the shape of unfriendly guides, and in nature from freezing and semi-starvation, all piling up together. The book abounds in quotable passages, vivid and curious bits of description of housekeeping in native homes, and innumerable accidents of travel, as in the following case:

"At last we reached a hill-side swept by the wind, and found sled-tracks which Wile-dôte recognized as the right trail, and we trotted along merrily until the sleds were caught by the wind and swept over a precipice. I saw Wile-dôte and his team disappear over the edge of the cliff into a cloud of whirling snow, and knew that in a second we must go, too. I could do nothing but close my eyes and set my teeth when I felt myself in the air and falling, I knew not where. Fortunately it was a fall of but about twenty feet to a snow-bank, down which the dogs, the sled and I rolled to the bottom, while I saw Wanker, who had been sitting on the other side of the sled, with his back to the cliff, shot over my head and reach the bottom first. I knew no one had been hurt, for the snow was very soft, and we were almost buried by the drift before we could regain our feet; and I could not help laughing at the ridiculous figure poor Wanker cut as he passed over my head, rolled up in a little ball, and desperately grasping his brake. He looked like a witch riding on her broomstick. . . . Time and again we were compelled to throw ourselves down in the snow and rest for ten or fifteen minutes before making farther exertion. . . . Several times during the morning I had to remove from my face a perfect mould or mask of frozen snow half an inch thick, and my nose, cheeks, chin and forehead were badly frozen. My companions fared no better."

The end of the volume is familiar to all, and needs no farther recalling to the mind, the whole forming one of the most thrilling of the many sombre narratives of Arctic exploration, its beautiful make-up rendering it a valuable addition to any library.

ANY knowledge of Latin literature has been thus far the possession only of the classical scholar, and even for him there was no systematic chronological outline, save as personal effort and arrangement brought about recognition of the subject as a whole. But any popular work in this direction had never gone beyond projects, and there was grave doubt if sufficient popular interest existed to make such a venture successful. Interest in the dead languages has flagged. There has been a conviction in many minds that the amount of time they demand may better be spent on scientific study or modern languages—anything having a more positive practical bearing on modern life and its needs; and the fact has been ignored that to understand the past is a necessity in any real comprehension of the present. History in recent years has only rewritten itself on this basis, and given us not the dates of successive reigns and the chief acts of the various kings, but the daily life and thought of the people. The history of literature has followed in the same lines, and has come to be philosophy as well as history; and Mr. Simcox has planned his crowded volumes on this principle, the result being the best history of the period that is to be found in equally compact form. He has been accused of straining after effect, and caring more to take a novel view of established reputation than for dispassionate judgment. Here and there are passages that suggest such a suspicion, but, as a whole, the work is singularly well balanced, and one which at once takes its place as an authority for every general reader, and valuable as well to the critical scholar and student.

For Latin literature there are no gaps as in the history of Greek literature. For over eight hundred years a succession of poets and philosophers, historians and playwrights fills the scene, the work of each moulded by the characteristics of the time, and in turn moulding that which followed. Mr. Simcox opens each volume with elaborate chronological tables, the first dating from B. C. 753 to A. D. 39, and from A. D. 30 to A. D. 569. He describes the people of the Alban hills, the slow growth of any national literature, and its dependence on Greece, dividing his story into three parts: the literature of the republic, the literature of the empire, and the literature of the decline. The Augustan age naturally has fullest space, but detail for every division is far more minute than the average reader would ever require. Yet all are full of interest, and the result is a sense of intimate knowledge of these stately names, such as nothing else has ever given, and a corresponding sense that Roman history has suddenly become alive and is a vital part of to-day.

MISS HOWARD'S "One Summer" and "Aunt Serena" are to be brought out in Edinburg by Mr. Douglass, who already has one or two of Dr. Holmes' books on his list.

THE spring success is evidently Professor Hardy's novel, "But Yet a Woman," three editions having already been brought out, the first proving entirely inadequate to fill the orders received.

MR. RUSKIN is hard at work on the new edition of "Modern Painters," the second volume of which has just appeared. It contains not only a new preface and critical notes, but also an "epilogue, with autobiographical account of the author's early art studies." A new edition of the "Seven Lamps of Architecture" is also forthcoming. The recent Oxford lecture on "Rossetti and Holman Hunt" is to be published immediately, and will be followed by others to be delivered next term, under the general title of "The Arts of England."

IT is an artist of forty years' standing who gives his chatty reminiscences in "Gatherings from an Artist's Portfolio in Rome," by James C. Freeman. A former volume, under the same title, held material of much the same nature—bits of Roman life, recollections of artists, distinguished and otherwise, a rambling and genial record, warm with local coloring, and a pleasant companion for an idle hour. Mr. Freeman was one of the first American artists to take up residence in Rome, and no one could have more intimate acquaintance with the life he describes. (12mo, pp. 357, $1.50; Roberts Bros., Boston).

THE nineteenth century is giving a lesson to the twentieth which will undoubtedly put a heavy tax on all letter-writing and journal-keeping, unless the doers of these deeds become wise enough to let their last act in life be the kindling of a bonfire for every scrap of written paper in their possession. It is the grand-nephew of Benjamin Constant who gives, in a Parisian court-room, his views of his great-grandfather's infatuated correspondence with Madame Récamier, but he failed to accomplish his purpose of suppressing the book. The court declined to sanction his claim; and, indeed, it would have been odd if the writer of a book were bound to insert in it a virtual censure of its propriety and good taste.

MRS. M. E. BLAKE'S dainty little volume, "On the Wing: Rambling Notes of a Trip to the Pacific," has much more justification for being than the ordinary newspaper correspondence. Hackneyed as the topic is, she has made it fresh and charming. Her descriptions never bore one, and her sense of color is so fine that flower and tree and atmospheric effect have seldom been more perfectly reproduced for the reader. The book is a tacit argument for the excursion system, the writer having journeyed with one of the Raymond parties, but this comes up incidentally, and not as advertisement. In any case, a delightful little book has resulted, the hints as to dress, baggage, etc., being of especial value to every traveler. (16mo, pp. 231, $1.00; Lee & Shepard, Boston).

NOTHING more incisive and decisive has ever been written about books than is to be found in Mr. J. C. Van Dyke's little treatise, "Books, and How to Use Them: Some Hints to Readers and Students." There are various manuals on this topic, all interesting, all the work of men whose words deserve attention, and all of more or less value to the reader; but this is the essence of them all. Mr. Van Dyke is not arbitrary; he suggests rather than insists, but his suggestions carry such weight that the reader adopts them instinctively. His common sense is as refreshing as his way of presenting it, and no one can read the little book without a sense of gratitude to the man who brushes away illusions and delusions like so many cobwebs, and whose demand for a reasonable use of such powers as one may own, is as cheerful and inspiring as the call of a trumpet. There is a careful index, and the book is essentially a well-made one—good paper, clear print, and broad margin joining forces with the contents to make something well worthy of long life and many editions. (12mo, pp. 159, $1.00; Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York).

MRS. ALEXANDER'S new story, "The Admiral's Ward," is the old one after all, but told with so much grace and skill that one forgets to be critical, and encounters one after another of the old acquaintances with a delightful sense of friendliness and satisfaction in another meeting. There is a handsome sham hero, an artful clerk in a lawyer's office, who comes suddenly into an inheritance and five thousand pounds a year. There is a genuine hero, not so handsome, who in the end wins the prize the first one has failed to keep. Laura Piers is the orphan niece of an English clergyman, who prefers residence abroad, and who brings her up with his own daughter and son, Winifred and Hubert Fielden. All are left almost destitute on his death, and the admiral, a most unworldly and admirably-drawn character, assumes the charge of all. Laura has been sister and mother both, and bears the brunt as usual, using her artistic gift as one means of support. Reginald Piers, the first hero, and a distant cousin, apparently falls in love with her on renewing their old boy and girl acquaintance, and Laura accepts him and is blindly happy till a day on which she suddenly overhears him in the midst of a passionate protest to Winifred against the fate that binds him. Why he should have chosen it becomes the puzzle, until by means that the reader must discover in person, it is found that Laura is the true heir, and that Reginald has known it almost from the beginning. In the meantime, Denzil Crewe, the second hero, has fallen deeply in love with Laura, whom he finally wins. A long procession of very individual characters file through the pleasant pages, and the story ends with full satisfaction for everybody. ("Leisure Hour Series," 16mo, pp. 478, $1.00).

"MIBBS."

Are those little boys playing "hookey?" Oh, no; they are only pegging at marbles.

What is to be Expected.

Now the milkman wakes us early,
With his long and mournful cry;
And the greens look fresh and curly
As the peddler carts them by;
And the youth with mustache twirly
Sports a vest whose hue is pearly,
As he goes to meet his girlie
On the sly.

Now the father thinks with groaning
That the boys all want new boots,
And the mother knows with moaning
That the girls must have spring suits;
And the plumber-
Man looks glummer,
For he has no show in summer;
But not so the merry drummer,
Setting out with heart of glee
To talk people deaf and dumb, or
To death, as it may be.

Now the man who owns a garden
Issues forth to view the same,
And begins his hands to harden
And his back to make quite lame;
And the small boy thinks of "hookey"
In a calm, determined way,
And, hiding slate and book, he Pegs at marbles all the day.

Now the poet searches madly
In last spring's rejected verses—
Searches wildly, searches sadly—
And with language that much worse is Than Bob Ingersoll's deep — remarks;
And the gentle maiden yearneth
For the long, long golden days,
As she, planning wisely, turneth
Her last summer's polonaise;

And the young man's bosom burneth
For one or two damp days—
He is wishing
To go fishing—
So he says.

Now the painter is most precious,
And engaged for all he's worth;
While the builder's hopes are spacious,
And the rag-man's full of mirth;
And ten million schemes fallacious
In ten million brains have birth.
About this time, good gracious!
All sorts of things come forth.

Darwinism.

Two lovers sat in a shady nook:
Intent was she upon her book;
Intent was he upon her hair
That crowned a face so passing fair.

"I wonder," she said, "if it can be true—"

"I wonder," he said, "if eyes so blue—"

"Pray, don't interrupt, but hear me out—"

"Or sweeter lips or more charming pout—"

"As Darwin said, that we all descend—"

"Or cheeks where such roses and lilies blend—"

"From the ape? I'm sure I don't think—"

"Or ears just tinged with the sea-shell's pink—"

"I do, but of you I am not quite so sure—"

"Graced a fair maiden so sweetly before?"

"When you—when I say that now we have found
The missing link by which two hearts are bound?"

Two lovers sat in a shady nook,
Forgotten was Darwin's latest book;
Soft kisses fell on the golden hair,
Soft blushes stole o'er the face so fair.

THE THOUSAND ISLES.

BY W. A. CROFFUT.

My wandering soul is satisfied ;
I rest where blooming islands ride
At anchor on the tranquil tide.

The sky of summer shines serene,
And sapphire rivers flow between
The thousand bosky shields of green.

'Tis sunk beneath the wave ! No trace Reminds me of its native grace
And witchery of loveliness."

But Time repairs the wreck of old,
And veils, with touches manifold,
The shining shards with green and gold.

The sad wounds hide in tender moss,
And ferns and lichens creep across
And every ragged scar emboss.

The pine its coronal uprears,
And banished beauty reappears
'Neath the caresses of the years.

The fairy-land again has grown ;
The Huron god has found a throne,
And Manito reclaims his own.

And so the summer shines serene,
And sapphire rivers lapse between
The thousand bosky shields of green.

And so I drift in silence where Young Echo, from her granite chair,
Flings music on the mellow air,

O'er rock and rush, o'er wave and brake,
Until her phantom carols wake
The voices of the Island Lake.

I know the tale the red man sung—
How, when this Northern land was young
And by a smiling heaven o'erhung,

Its beauty stirred the Arch-fiend's ire,
Till, burning with insane desire,
He smote it with a shaft of fire

And shattered it to fragments. "See !"
He cried with diabolic glee,
"The paradise that mocked at me !

Beneath my skiff the long grass slides ;
The muskallonge in covert hides,
And pickerel flash their gleaming sides,

And purple vines the naiads wore,
A-tiptoe on the liquid floor,
Nod welcome to my pulsing oar.

The shadow of the waves I see,
Whose silver meshes seem to be
The love-web of Penelope.

It shimmers on the yellow sands,
And while, beneath the weaver's hands
It creeps abroad in throbbing strands,

The braided sunbeams softly shift,
And unseen fingers, flashing swift,
Unravel all the golden web.

So, day by day, I drift and dream
Among the Thousand Isles, that seem
The crown and glory of the stream.

A LESSON FROM JAPAN.

A "JAP" ARTIST AT WORK.

THE amateur decorator who makes a few unmeaning strokes upon the panel, or embroiders them upon satin, and straightway says, "Behold! my handiwork is Japanese art," is always interested in examining the history of that curious workmanship which has, of late, gained such hold upon popular favor. The philosophy of art endeavors to penetrate the causes of the idiosyncrasies of the Japanese, and to learn not only the conditions but the governing motives of their pictorial representations. For every nation has its own perceptions of beauty and its own ideal, toward which its limners work.

Japan, the land of wonder and romance, has been, until lately, like a sealed book to the outer world. Its curiously-devised covers were all that foreigners were allowed to see, and curiosity was sorely tempted to turn the leaves writ with such cabalistic signs to learn something of its customs, scenery and art.

Practically the lids of the book were not opened until the year 1853, when Commodore Perry, reaching the shores of Japan, armed by a letter from the President of the United States, succeeded in concluding a treaty by means of which her ports were thrown open to all the world. It is true, however, that the Dutch had possession of a small island near Nagasaki two hundred years previously; but other people were none the wiser in consequence of that settlement.

To an English ambassador, Sir Rutherford Alcock, may be given the credit of the first large exportation of Japanese curios. His magnificent collection in the English Exposition of 1862, awakened general surprise, just as the similar department of the exhibition of 1876, in Philadelphia, aroused here a novel interest in the bizarre yet attractive work of the Mongolian race.

The public has since learned more and more of this singular country, but we may briefly recapitulate some of its salient features. The feudal system obtained from its earliest history, which the learned men of Japan pretend to say extends back ten thousand years. They seriously declare that the Mikado, or Emperor, has descended from the Sun god without a single break. Indeed, it is considered proven that the present incumbent is the one hundred and twenty-fourth in direct descent.

When we take this into consideration, and the fact that mentally, as well as physically, Japan is an island, that a sea of mystery ebbs and flows about its shores, bearing on its tide strange tokens of its physical features, its social life and its religion—there is little wonder that it has a character at once so unique and so attractive.

It appears that the ancient territorial nobles were conquered and made vassal princes under the subjection of the Shogun (Tycoon), the generalissimo of the Mikado's forces. These provinces were divided among the relatives of the Shoguns, so, at the time of the making of the treaty there were about two hundred princes or Daimios, who exercised authority over the common people, while yielding obedience to the imperial power. These princes were highly cultivated in certain ways; they attached to themselves artist-artisans, whose offices were hereditary, like their own. Each had his insignia of certain forms and colors, and his loom and weavers by whom his own fabrics were woven. Intensely loving out-of-door life, the sunshine and the free air, they became inimitable in the harmonies of color and styles of decoration.

So it comes to pass that the Japanese Empire, sixteen hundred miles long by about two hundred wide, consisting of four large and thirty-eight hundred and fifty small islands, covering only one hundred and fifty thousand square miles, has been able to profoundly affect the artistic sense of the Caucasian race. Hardly a rude cabin of a western pioneer but bears on its rough walls, fans, panels or hangings on which, with a few deft strokes, are outlined curious grimacing figures, smirking and posturing under cumbersome robes of gaudy yet pleasing hues. Yet so thoroughly do their original combinations suit the universal sense of the pleasing that the most cultivated and refined rejoice in Japanese designs and workmanship. Pictures of such inexpensive materials that ten of them can be purchased in the streets of Tokio for a cent, are exhibited in a multitude of ways, lighting up with their dashes of vivid brightness dull, stiff, stereotyped American homes.

Those who have purses sufficient for the outlay, rejoice in rooms crowded with objects of Eastern luxury. There may be a quaint, lacquered cabinet, its shelves powdered with gold-dust, inlaid with mother-of-pearl, with birds of wondrous plumage, or fish whose every scale is a gem of color, with insect or shell true to life. On them are arranged egg-shell porcelain, light as thistle-down, and fit only for the handling of Titania's fingers—bubbles blown by some oriental Puck in playful mood.

There, too, is a vase of bronze, with grotesque figures chasing one another about the base, at which one must laugh who never laughed before; jars with raised ornaments, exquisitely inlaid, carvings in ivory—an old man or woman smiling, shrewd and full of character; bits of precious crackle-ware, creamy Satsuma, or treasures from Kioto or Kaga, beside the deep coloring of the favorite egg-plant; cloisonné enamel, whose metallic outlines are filled with paste ground to a subdued yet matchless splendor; trays and bowls, parti-hued and of varied shapes, suggesting, but never repeating, birds, flowers and bees; impossible dragons, mailed and bristling, witching even in their ugliness; surfaces on which heavenly blues, live greens, pinks and blood-red crimsons or warm, creamy tints blend and intermingle—all are there. Then there is a sword with lacquered and silver inlaid scabbard, and stuffs from old looms, stiff with priceless embroidery in gold and silver; these and a thousand more charm the eye and cultivate the esthetic sense, even when we scarce know how or why.

AMONG THE CLOUDS.

It is a long and pleasant lesson to learn, that how and why. To do it, we must not only comprehend the social and intellectual condition of the race under question; we need to go farther than their mere physical surroundings. Under outward determinative influences lies the spiritual nature of the Japanese artist, those convictions which inhere in his character and help to shape, unconsciously, the very ideals toward which he works.

The insular position of Japan, while restricting its artistic limits, has assisted in fixing its peculiar character. Any people having great vitality, yet shut out from others, will exhibit strong distinguishing features. And here is a race whose first known ruler antedates the first Catholic pope by eight hundred years—a race which has had time and repose in which to work out its own original conceptions without shirking or skimping. What to them that Western nations declare :

“Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay!”

We confess their hold on truth when we go back and take from their hands the clues to the laws and methods of Nature, which they have followed leisurely and lovingly until they have approached very near her secret places.

Isolated as they have been, yet the wandering winds have borne to them faint tokens of what others had done, since, mingled with their own, are traces of Hindoo, Assyrian, Grecian and Persian art. But, from its contiguity, China exercised the greatest influence over their development. The first teachers of art came from that country in the fifth century.

In the thirteenth century was founded the Yamati, or Japanese school.

Toward the end of the last century it attained greater freedom and breadth, till, at the beginning of this, arose a new set of artists. Those who now take their places have given tokens unhappily of decadence, which different writers attribute to different causes. Hoffksai, one of the most original and versatile of all, can be studied in his various albums, which have been duplicated in this country, and nothing more interesting and spontaneous, within certain limits, can be found. Like all genuine artists, he has striven to catch the key-notes of Nature. His decorative effects are not copies, but variations upon some spirited theme, carried out with the most pains-taking fidelity.

The native workman's inspirations have been a love of Nature. He depicts her phases, not in timid fidelity, but with the gay abandon of a child playing with familiar toys, and arranging them into all sorts of new conventionalized combinations. Dwelling in a country liable to be devastated by earthquakes, his house is made of flimsy materials, unsuited to elaborate pictures, yet everything on his walls or in use satisfies the canons of beauty. Ornamentation is chaste and unhackneyed; nothing is left bare and nothing overloaded. With his passion for out-of-door life, picturesque scenery, blossoms and birds, he has taken these for his friends and teachers. The glad procession of flowers is held sacred in festivals, beginning with the plum, then the cherry, the wistaria, the iris and the chrysanthemum, and all lend themselves to his facile pencil.

How does the native artist acquire his light, firm touch, delicate, swift and dainty as the flight of a bird? He begins, a child at school, by learning to draw at the least estimate one thousand characters which form the basis of the Japanese alphabet—these are often increased to ten thousand. They are repeated during weeks, months and years, so that his eye and hand are trained to steady, rapid work. Instead of slate and pencil he employs brush and paper. The latter, cleansed, is used over and over again. Then he fixes on some object, which he paints continuously till he is its master. In the more common art-work, crouched upon the floor, with paper or silk before and pots of paint beside him, with swift strokes and great economy of effort, a turn here and a dash there, the picture is outlined and tinted. Throwing it aside to dry, he finishes another—like, yet unlike—a kindred strain with slightly varying notes. No two flowers are shaped or placed alike, no two lines exactly regular or of the same curve, and all so conventionalized as to be strictly decorative. He hates monotony.

His hand-work partakes of the qualities of the artist as well as the artisan, and his very ignorance of machinery serves him in good stead, making his dexterity as perfect as his eye for form, color and arrangement. Just as Persian and Turkish carpets please by their slight irregularities, which no Jacquard looms can produce, so the most common hand-made article decorated by the Japanese partakes of an inequality which is as much more fascinating than dull regularity as sentient man exceeds the soulless machine.

Nor does the native artist forget the laws of symmetry. Underneath seeming disorder run proportion and harmony; ever-recurring notes repeat the strains that make music out of color and sing chorals of chromatic harmony. We must not expect of the Japanese more than mere decorative art—he never reaches the dignity of high or pictorial art. His religion forbids him to glorify the body, though he sometimes represents the human form in intense action or passion. His great power is in a kind of keen sixth sense of detecting the unexpected, the humorous, the grotesque. His exaggerations are as ludicrous as they are original

KALEIDOSCOPIC.

It is a question if eyes turned inward at such a curious angle do not indicate a corresponding mental twist. The bowed, distorted manikins which figure in their landscapes, clad in garb of which each button and fold marks a certain rank, may indicate the incongruous way in which the Japanese mentally views whatever he represents.

What has been the influence upon the art and manufactures of America by contact with this "Land of the Rising Sun," or "Land of Peace," the "Great Japan," whose name is written in characters as bizarre as her people?

In the first place, it has flooded the country with neighbor of the Orient on his own ground; life is too short for that. But he can and does take numberless suggestions and work them into loftier pictorial effects. He has learned that it is a mistake to copy from the Japanese too freely. The spirit of any object, more delicate and elusive than the dust on a butterfly's wing, cheap designs, made by workmen with the esthetic intuition quivering at their very finger-ends. The most common of these pictures are alive with the very spirit of nature, yet show the result of long, patient training. They are perfect in finish, and are entirely adapted to the end in view. The art-morality of the native artisan is unimpeachable, in which sphere he is a standing rebuke to our veneers and shoddy workmanship. We must confess that, under the crudity of the present rage for decoration, the influence of the Japanese has been to vitalize the reverence for nature and love for her essential loveliness.

The American can never expect to compete with his cannot be represented till it be felt and loved. He has also learned simplicity—that is, ease in attaining ends; hinting at the exact surroundings, yet never drawing attention from the main object of the picture.

Designers and decorators have been the first to feel the impetus of new art-motives, since our "kin beyond the sea" are strongest in these two respects.

Jewelry was first to show the effects of this influence, resulting in a freedom and variety of art-forms that has grown rapidly in accordance with the demand for them. Our artist has given here some original designs with the Japanese motif.

Silverware has been somewhat influenced by Oriental metal-work, but awaits much improvement. Often the manufactured ware is cast or raised separately, and clumsily fastened to the manufactured article. For instance, an ice-pitcher with hammered ground of oxydized silver is ornamented with a branch made separately. To this branch are fastened gold leaves, wild roses of silver, and perhaps a bird or butterfly of still different colored metal. This of course can have nothing of the effect of beautifully manipulated Japanese-work, where the decoration is both delicate and bold, with a touch of bright metal at special points. At other places it is in such low relief and so artistically blended with the background as to gleam out like stars in a twilight sky. This can never be produced by the stamping press.

Porcelain shows some Japanese influence in bands and medallions. Furniture, too, in cabinets and small tables, follows somewhat the style indicated. A good deal is decorated in the semi-Japanese manner. In carpets the manufacturers have made little improvement, still using the old floriated and Persian patterns, such as have, with slight changes, flooded the market for years. Wall-paper and woven fabrics have responded more fully to the demands of the age, many new artistic designs having been furnished. Some of them are in the styles of old Dutch and Venetian work, but others bear unmistakable evidence of Oriental influence. The stripe and simple repeat is seldom seen, and the "crackle" of porcelain has probably given hints for wall-paper.

In decorative work generally, where the whole design is complete within certain limits, and there is no "repeat" as in pictures for lithographs and illustrations, there is a subtle but very complete improvement. Here lies the scope and aim of Japanese influence, and a broad field it is. The house and all that is within may just as well be varied, picturesque and pleasing, as stiff, tawdry and inharmonious. And in its construction Jack and Jill, while embodying the improvements of the age, will not forget to consult the esthetic sense of the art-artisans of "The Land of the Rising Sun"—"Great Japan."

AN IMPOSSIBLE DRAGON.

THE ARMY OF THE GRASS.

WITH clover white and clover red,
It hides the stain where heroes bled,
Its tender secret keeping;
And spreads its mantle where the dead
In peaceful rest are sleeping.

It finds the graves of blue and gray,
It comes on Decoration day,
With violets and daisies;
It keeps dear memories green for aye,
Where wild birds sing their praises.

Down the calm vale where waters run,
The grass looks up to greet the sun,
Happy in shining weather;
A million joyous blades, like one,
Rejoice in light together.

The army of the grass is true,
Waving its flowers red, white and blue,
When called by winds to rally;
And, like the hosts of Roderick Dhu
It springs from hill and valley.

Creeping in silence up the mound,
It holds its conquest of the ground.
Below the captured hill is;
Its emerald flag embroidered round
With buttercups and lilies.

Like liberty crushed in the dust
By tyranny, the grass will thrust
The spear that shall dis sever
The clod, for, like the truth, it must Rise victor by endeavor.

Let flowers of every hue abound
Within the silent camping-ground,
Where rest the brave immortals;
For Heaven is near the hero's mound,
And love waits at its portals.

JOHN TRUE'S DECORATION DAY.

BY ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS.

JOHN TRUE came home from his work one day with a slower step than usual. It was a June day in 1861. John True lived in Dogberry, a Massachusetts village. He was a house painter by trade, and had on his working clothes, which were not becoming, being of an unassured bleached-cotton color to begin with, and splashed with conflicting tones of paint, in which red had obtained a murderous predominance. But John had one of the figures that conquer clothes; he swung easily at the hips, carried a straight shoulder, and put down an elastic foot. He had curly hair, and the indefinable expression in the background of the eyes, belonging to a man who has a happy home.

It was not a sharply individualized home, seen from the outside, being a cheap white house, like other cheap white houses in Dogberry; too heavy in the brows, too narrow in the cheeks, uncertain in the jaws, and of a chilly expression. It had white shades and a white fence, and an acre or two of land, wherein nature seemed to relieve herself in a gasp of green, and to dash up the deep sepia loam where the potatoes grew, in a riotous outburst of personal feeling. There were currant bushes in the garden, and a tall cherry tree, which budded late, now pale with dropping blossoms. As the master of the house came up the front yard he stopped to examine the cinnamon rose-bush, and looked over at the cabbages in the southwest corner.

A child's voice came through the open door and windows—a little boy's voice; he was singing; he sang one of the Sunday-school hymns taught in the emaciated (white) meeting-house on the hill beyond the village. The result of his musical effort was somewhat to this effect:

"My omeizzen Ye-ev-ing, my
Resizzenere;
Ven wy shoulda ma-a-ma,
If twyalsypere!"

Another voice sounded clearly within, but that one sang a wordless lullaby, "'sh-shing" to sleep a gurgling baby; and neither the coo nor the lullaby struck a false note against the shrilling song of the theologically-minded little musician, who piped on gloriously.

John True, out by the cinnamon rose-bush, said to himself:

"Happy to-day, ain't they?" And then, when he had said it to himself, he said it aloud to the roses:

"The folks seem happy to-day, don't they?"

Nobody from within had seen him yet, and he lingered about, fussing with the bush. In general, he held that the floral kingdom was created for the amusement of the female mind; cabbages called for a certain masculine force. But he picked a rose-bud, clumsily, before he went to examine the cabbages, which he did with a vague attention that overflowed upon the potato-patch; he had a sense of strengthening his character by concentration upon these sturdier facts. It took him a good while to get into the house.

He came at last, with what seemed a reluctant step, in which there was this curious thing to be noticed, that he trod softly, like a man who is afraid that he shall wake the sleeping. Yet clearly the baby had nothing to do with it, for little Mrs. True's was one of those exceptionally blessed households in which the baby's nap is not a thing of terror and a gloom forever to all mature existence. As a rule, the more noise you made, the better the True babies slept.

The door was open, as I said, and John True stepped in on tip-toe. A rag mat, clean enough but very old, lay in the little entry; he looked down at it as he entered, wiping his feet, which were dusty dry, with mechanical patience. The mat had a blue-flannel rose on it, touched off in black alpaca on one of the petals where the flannel had given out. A child's tin horse, without a head, stood in the entry, and trundled about when his foot hit it.

The little tinkling noise betrayed his presence, and the lullaby in the inner room stopped abruptly. A woman's voice said:

"That you?"

"It's me," said John. He hung his hat up and stood hesitating. The little boy was singing with piercing shrillness:

"Wy shoulda ma-a-ma
If twyalsypere!
My omeizzen Ye-ev—"

"'Sh-sh, Tommy!" interrupted the woman's voice, dropping on meanwhile contentedly into her lullaby. "Go see who that is in the entry, Tommy. 'Sh-sh-sh-h, my dear! Lie still and slu-umber!"

Tommy checked himself in the midst of his religious aspirations and ran to the door, where he stood peering—a pleasant little rogue, well built and red; he had on a green gingham apron, and had been eating gingerbread. Tommy said:

"W'y, it's Pupper!" with the eternal surprise of childhood, to which all things are forever new. His father patted him on the head, and said:

"There, there!" while he re-hung his stained straw hat, which had tumbled down. The hat was brown, and had a row of air-holes perforated about the crown—a new fashion then. True began to count them as he stood staring. The child crept back and tugged at his mother. True heard him tell her that "Pupper" didn't kiss him, but only spat him. The mother crooned on to the gurgling baby.

"I believe I'll change my clothes first," called John, without entering the room.

The lullaby stopped short.

"Why, John!"

John flushed, and went in at once. As he entered the room, details blurred and slipped away before his eyes; he perceived chiefly that the windows and blinds were open, and the late summer light came quivering into the western corner of the room where the woman sat with the baby; the child fell heavily back upon her long, maternal arms away from her half-draped breast. The light blinded her a little, and she moved out of it, holding up her face like a Madonna to the Lord. John kissed her with the silent reverence with which even a house-painter, my esthetic friends, may kiss his wife when she gets one of these aureolas about her.

"Now, Father," she said, with sweet mock reproach in the voice of a woman to whom clearly reproaching is not natural, "you may go change your clothes! The idea! I guess it would have been the first time for twelve years, wouldn't it, Tommy? Think of Pupper stopping to clean up before he kissed us, Tommy!"

"I'd got an extra daub on to-day," said John True, glancing down at his unbleached cotton blouse and overalls. "I've been to work to Seth Grimace's. There seemed to be such lots of—red."

He went away into the shed and hung up the splashed and spattered clothes. It took him longer than usual to "clean up," a process which he conducted by the aid of the yard-pump and kitchen roller. Some of the paints especially would not come off his fingers, even for the turpentine.

"I hate to paint a red house," he said.

His wife called him two or three times to supper before he answered:

"Yes, yes, Mary," and with a deep breath joined himself to them. He felt all the dear and delicate currents of daily life sweep him on. It was like any other supper, after all. He sat, shining and soapy, at the head of the pine table. Tommy was beside him; the baby was well asleep in the sitting-room. Their mother had brushed her hair, and sat smiling. She talked about the doughnuts and the hash. He eat both with relish—he felt very hungry. Everything seemed to be going on, and would go on forever.

"Where 's Sissy?" asked John suddenly, laying down a pickled cucumber that was already melting at his lips.

"Why, she 's gone to the Sunday-school picnic, you know," said Sissy's mother. "She wore her pink cambric. I gave her some of that cold mutton, with the sausage and pie. I made her take the umbrella, in case it should rain. She won't get home before nine. Jenny Severby went with her."

"They've got a letter from Severby. He ain't wounded much," said John absently. He was thinking about Sissy, and to himself he said: "One less."

He was glad Sissy was at the picnic, and yet he wished, too, that she were at home; an empty place made the table look so. He finished his pickle, and took another doughnut.

"I hain't had squashed pienough," announced Tommy at this juncture. This was a point upon which Tommy and his mother cherished differences of opinion and a gentle domestic flurry celebrated the controversy. It was difficult even for his parents to conceive the inconceivable, so far as to believe that any boy could cry louder than Tommy. John ate on calmly; he was used to it, and Mary had a way with the child. He wondered sometimes which groggery he should have selected, if he had married a scolding wife. Simpson's had its advantages, but Joe's was farther from home. This was the deepest metaphysical speculation in which John True had ever gone adrift. He pursued it dreamily now, as Tommy, subsiding from agony to theology, as so many wiser than Tommy had done before him, struck up again:

"My omeizzen Ye-ev-ing, my
Resizzenere;
Ven wy shoulda ma-a-ma
If twyalsypere?"

"What is that boy singing?" asked his father.

"Why, it's plain enough. I'm sure," said Mary, in a gently reproving tone. "He says:

'My home is in Heaven,
My rest is not here;
Then why should I murmur
When trials appear?'

It's easy enough to understand the boy. He speaks very plain, I'm sure he does. I think he's going to have a beautiful voice when he's old enough. Let's send him to singing-school, John, shan't we?"

"I guess I'll go and get my smoke," said John. But he came back in a moment, fumbling awkwardly in his pocket, whence he drew an abject-looking cinnamon rosebud, which Tommy had freely sat on more or less during the evening meal.

"I meant to have put it in your gown before supper, Mary." John came bashfully up, and held the flower between his thumb and little finger.

His wife said: "You dear old thing!" for he did not often give her flowers. He was not one of those men. She put the rose in her bosom coquettishly, and nodded at him. A fine color flowed over her face. She felt ten years younger, and looked five. She began to sing as she washed the dishes, on a full Baptist-choir soprano, merrily joining Tommy in the statement that his home was in Heaven, till it seemed to become a general family joke, they were all in such spirits about it.

John listened to them as he sat smoking on the back door-steps. He looked over the potato-field; the arms of the cherry-tree leaned around the corner of the house toward him; the chickens came up and pecked confidently at his boots, but the rooster disliked tobacco and kept at a distance. Tommy came out and strangled him from behind with two little green-checked arms. The child's kisses produced the effect of a vertigo upon the man. He got up to put away his pipe, and stood staggering.

His wife came out and talked about the cherries and the chickens. She hung upon him, and they wandered about the little yard and garden till the sun sank behind the meeting-house belfry, and the currant leaves looked no longer like thin gold, but like thick agate or lava, and drooped with dew. In the sky, purple forms, like banners, came up and on, and the mists in the valley moved solemnly, as if they had been thoughts. In the fading of the day the woman's face seemed to grow shrunken and desolate.

"You look thin," said John.

"I don't feel thin," said Mary.

It seemed she was not thinking about the sunset, but about the potatoes. She had many questions. Should they plant pink-eyes next year? How did the new fertilizer affect the cabbages? Mightn't she have a fuchsia and three geraniums under the L window? Tommy must have a swing on the cherry tree. In the fall, where should we put Sissy's teeter-board? She'd been promised one in September. And when should the chicken-house be painted red? And, John, could we get a rabbit for Tom? And, John, did Sissy grow so fast that we must cut her hair?

"Don't you think it's getting a little damp?" asked John.

He spoke in the high throat-voice his wife was used to when he had the toothache. She said:

"What! that old wisdom at it again? Poor fellow!" and reached up to pat him upon the cheek before she took the boy in.

He watched them as they went. Tommy, half asleep, leaned heavily, tugging at his mother's bright calico dress, which in the dusk had faded to a gloomy color. Mary half lifted, half led the little fellow. The baby woke, and cried faintly from the dark house.

John True stood under the cherry tree and stared after them. He did not smoke any more. He felt the delicate white blossoms falling to the ground around him.

He was a man to whom nothing had ever happened. The impossibility of change was like the remoteness of death. He tried to fix his mind upon the passing hour. He thought of little things. It occurred to him that he would go into the house and look at the green check on Tommy's apron.

The lamps were lighted before he got in, and he groped dizzily toward them through the heavy, sweet-scented night air, across the narrow yard. His wife glanced at him as he came in, but did not at the moment speak. She had brown eyes and brown hair, and always looked prettier by lamp-light. She had put the cinnamon rose into her hair because the baby snatched at it.

John sat down on the hair-cloth sofa in the sitting-room while Tommy was being put to bed. He felt like a visitor in his own house. Tommy kissed him good night hilariously, and said his prayers for Pupper in a metrical manner, closely resembling the tune of "Three Little Kittens," and replacing by an emphatic Amen, the historic "basket of saw-aw-dust."

Then Sissy came home from the picnic. Sissy was a tall, bleached girl with freckles, and wore her hair in two long braids behind. She did not look like her mother or her father, but like a queer great-aunt who made an unfortunate marriage. It was necessary to talk a great deal about the picnic, and Sissy had lost the umbrella.

John remembered that he had not collected his mind by counting the squares on Tommy's apron, which had disappeared with Tommy; it seemed that a great opportunity was lost.

But Sissy too was tired, and would go to bed. When she came to say good night, her father asked her how old she was, and Sissy told him she was eleven, and her mother said:

"Why, John! what a funny question!" And John said nothing at all. And so, presently, Sissy too had gone to bed, and her mother went up with her; and John said he would finish his smoke.

He did not smoke, however, but stood in the sitting-room where they had left him. When he was quite alone, he stretched his arms with one mighty, pathetic gesture above his head. The awful power of a human home was on him; he felt as helpless before it as the child in the cradle. His soul shot out tendrils everywhere; he could have clasped the tall rocking-chair, the baby's sock that had fallen beneath it, the old mat that stood before his wife's sewing-chair, the scraps of her work scattered about. Her voice and Sissy's came from the bedroom above. Tommy was singing himself to sleep with a droning sound:

"My ome —lizen Ye-ev-ing."

"I'll bet the chap that wrote that, never had one to his name anywheres else!" cried John True.

Mary came down stairs. As she entered, she glanced at him, but said nothing.

She moved about with gentle bustle, picking up scraps of cloth and spools, and the children's playthings; she drew the green paper shades, and smoothed the worn red table-cloth, and pulled her rocking-chair around away from the light.

"Wy shoulda ma-a-ma?"

sang Tommy, and so sank into his first nap, from which he aroused but once to ejaculate—

"Twyalsypere!"

in a firm voice, before silence settled for that summer night upon the cheap white house.

Mary True sat beside her husband in the quiet room;

she was run-and-back-stitching the seam on a red de-laine dress for Sissy.

"It's her fall dress," she said, "but I thought I'd begin. I made it over out of that one of mine—do you remember, John?"

"I guess so," said John, with a mighty effort of the imagination. "It looks as if I'd seen some woman wear it. I guess I remember it, Mary."

"Why, John! It's the dress I had made up one wedding-day two years ago, to surprise you in. And, John! you kissed me three times extra in it the night I put it on, and said I looked younger than Clara Severby. I should think even a man would remember that!" with great contempt.

"Why, yes, I said I remembered it," replied John, meekly. "Clara looks old," he went on, "since Severby—are you going to send Sissy to the High School, Mary?"

"I—have always thought we would educate Sissy," said Sissy's mother, speaking slowly. "And John, dear—"

"Well, Mary?"

"Don't you suppose—"

"Don't I suppose?"

"Don't you think we might, somehow, manage—other folks do that ain't better off than we are—don't you think we might—if I didn't have any new dresses, John, only the children's things—and if we didn't have much doctoring—don't you think we might send him to college?"

"Send who to college—Severby?"

"I meant Tommy," said Mary, hanging her brown head, "but I know it's—"

"Yes, Mary, it is," answered John in a deep voice. "The boy must work—like his father—he must help you—he must help us all. God must help us all."

He got up and paced the little room, shook off her hand; then, returning, lifted her work-worn fingers, with the courtliness of love, close to his set, strong lips.

The woman had dropped her sewing now. Sissy's red dress-waist fell to the floor. Her mother, after a moment's silence, picked it up, folded it methodically and laid it away for the night.

"I think I'll go see if the children are covered up," she said lightly. "It has changed to the east."

The rocker of her little sewing-chair creaked as she moved; Tommy half waked and called her; and, from the inner room, she could be heard hushing the stirring baby in inarticulate, beautiful, maternal polysyllables. The east wind drove in at the open front door, and sounds from the distant village, broken, stirring and solemn, came in.

Mary came back soon enough, and they sat together and talked of many things. Her thoughts ran wild with the future that night: what trades the boys would like; how old Sissy should be when she married; whether he, John, would grow tired of her, Mary, when she grew old. They talked about a new oil-cloth in the entry and the prevention of profanity in a boy like Tom. They discussed the lining to the kitchen stove and the last lie that Sissy told. They considered the price of rump-steaks and whether, if John were a church-member, he would have family prayers. They talked of when he must have new shirts and how long they had been married. They criticised the old rooster and the new minister. They spoke of the pudding they would have to-morrow and the good they would have done if they had been rich people. They spoke of the last time they were cross to each other and of how they would love each other forty years to come.

John got himself through it all in a stern, soldierly fashion. He kept his hands clasped behind his head at first, and gave her his sad, straightforward eyes, regarding her with the pathetic reticence characteristic of certain men; his look seemed to lift her up as if she had been one of the children like Sissy or Tom, and to hold her to the heart of thoughts as unspoken as his pure and perfect love. It was as if this awful individuality of the purpose of a man, stepped out like another being between the husband and the wife, and made three of them. She apprehended it before she spoke. She was not wise enough to put it into words, but she knew, from the bottom of her heart, and felt, from the limits of her understanding, that she had for the first time come up against that in the man's nature with which she, Mary, his wife, whom he had sworn to cherish till death did part them, could not, by might or right or love or longing, hope to intermeddle.

As they talked, her face blanched sadly; but she was not a crying woman; she looked steadily on straight before her. She had been sitting in the low rocker all this while without her work, her hands, in the rare and awkward idleness of working-people's, crossed clumsily in her lap. She had not touched him.

But now, at last, she put out her fingers and slid them timidly into his. She rose then, and, still timidly, she gave him the other hand. For a moment so, she looked down at him.

"John," she said, "do you want to take me in your lap a minute?"

In the silence he held up his shaking arms. The distant drum-beat from the village sounded out as she crept to him.

"John, do you—Oh, hush! hush! Oh, I know you love me! Oh, I won't ask! I'll never be so cruel. I'll save you, dear—you shall not tell. Oh, my poor boy! my dear boy! I know you have enlisted. I knew it when you first came home!"

II

THE crimson panorama was comfortably folded away at last from our sensitive sight. The disbanded armies and the disbanded lives had dispersed as best they might. The silken battle-flags, splashed and rent, were esthetically draped in the State Houses, and still pointed out to rural visitors on a pleasant Saturday afternoon. The birds sang shrilly in the great cemeteries at Arlington, at Gettysburg, and the rest. The old uniform was cut over to make a coat for the boy. Men had learned to pass the red cap of the messenger without touching their own. Women had already dared to scold the saved soldier, for whose life they would have sold their souls. The crape was worn out, and the tears were dry. It was beginning to be too much to ask of one to follow the procession on Decoration Day. It was ten years after the war.

It was wearing to the end of a November day, and a poor sort of day even at that. The wind had blown from the east for forty-eight hours, and was rising still. The trees objected heavily to this fact with groaning bare boughs, and in these little suburban places there seemed to be a dismal superfluity of trees. They stood about forlornly in rows, like veterans who were no longer wanted. Now that the elm and maple leaves lay crushing paralytically under foot, or whirled hysterically over head and athwart through the gray air, of what use was all this gauntness of outline and tenacity of existence, except to drip into one's eyes and make the houses damp?

It was going to rain when it could make up its mind to. No one stayed out of doors who could help it. The pedestrians were few out here in these wide spaces. The afternoon drives were over. The fat horses had bowled the carriages away to the luxurious stables. Ladies prattled shivering within, and ordered the parlor-fire lighted. The gentlemen had come earlier, and crosser, than usual from their business. The lap-dogs sat in the bay-windows, occupying crimson cushions and wearing bows to match. The horse-car on the long single track made the chief sign of motion in the windy dusk, unless one noticed the milkman or had a personal stake involved in the coming of the evening express. Even the leaves had the air of trying to get in-doors, and the whirls of dust wore a dejected look, as of objects dependent on private charity for shelter.

It was no night, it was no place, for a peddler, as anybody but a peddler would have known. The poor fellow who came toiling on behind the half-past five Scotch-plaid horse-car, which had stopped to let off the stout gentleman at the large, high-art green house that stood back from the streets, looked as if he would have shown more discouragement if he had been more used to hope. He walked most wearily, and as one observed him one might have seen that it was the weariness of disease, which differs from that of healthy fatigue with a kind of distinction that the well cannot perceive. He had a little bag or knapsack strapped across his shoulders in an easy way, as if they were well used to it; he bore it, indeed, with a certain grace. He had the figure of a man who would have walked erect if he had been well. He was tall and well put together. He had a pair of fine blue eyes, but these no comfortable person would have cared to examine, for fear that he should remember them; would have gone on perhaps, as the stout gentleman did, whistling down an uneasy sense that he had seen the saddest thing yet in the whole November landscape.

"I might try it myself," said the peddler, pausing before the high-art green house. That house was a novelty then, the daring freak of a young English architect. It attracted all manner of moths like this, by the sheer barbaric force of color. The people who lived there—Hathaway by name, though that is of small importance to us or the peddler—had observed it. Mrs. Hathaway complained that she could halve the number of beggars and other tramps by a coat of cool gray paint—something after the manner of Ruskin, who doubtless had these social facts in view, in the promulgation of his architectural theories.

"I've tried most all sorts," said the peddler patiently, "the big and the little, yellow and white. I haven't tried a green house yet. There's a deal of yellow ochre in it. It's a very well painted house—unfashionable though. I might as well venture. Unfashionable folks ain't so likely to have fashionable hearts; nor their views about tape and needles ain't so stylish either," he added aloud, as he turned into the dusky avenue.

Of sane people, only the very solitary talk aloud. As he turned from the avenue to strike the little winding path that led to the back of the house, the great front door of the mansion opened, and several people came out. There were perhaps four ladies and two gentlemen. A carriage or two had now driven up, and stood waiting. The hostess herself followed her guests to the door, saying something about the Scotch-plaid car, which was overdue. They were all people of elegant dress and easy demeanor. They were talking earnestly among themselves, and lingered on the porch.

"I wonder," said a gray-headed gentleman with a classic profile and a bronchial cough, "if it would do to loan Michael Cavarini ten dollars?" The classic gentleman spoke timidly.

"I am afraid it would pauperize him," answered one of the ladies.

"I presume it would," replied the classic gentleman sighing.

"We cannot be too firm, Mrs. Wax," suggested Mrs. Hathaway, "although there must be exceptions to all theories. Do you not think Michael Cavarini has had time to become self-supporting? There is the wood-yard, and the snow-shoveling will soon come on."

"His visitor says he can't get into the wood-yard, you know," observed the youngest person present—a very young gentleman, who had a conscientious mustache.

"True," replied Mrs. Hathaway, "and snow-shoveling has not been a fruitful means of livelihood since April, poor fellow! Well, we must think again. Don't you think it would do to continue his case at the next council?"

"Unless I get more light on the subject before Tuesday," said Mr. Wax earnestly, "I shall vote for the loan. I might even advocate its being fifteen dollars, and reduce the interest."

"As to Mrs. O'Flaherty," urged the very young gentleman, "it seems to me we might give her a pair of shoes. I really don't see how she is to go out scrubbing—I think we decided she was to scrub on trial, didn't we?—without shoes. One of the committee said she could wear rubbers. Then she said she needed something flannel—I'm not clear what—some of the ladies may know. She said she preferred it red. I have been in great perplexity over Mrs. O'Flaherty. My mother offered me an old dress for her. Do you think it would demoralize her past redemption?"

"I once traced the whole downward career of a man to somebody's giving him a pair of pantaloons," said the lady who thought Michael Cavarini would be pauperized. She spoke without a smile, but the rest of the little company broke into merriment at this, and as the car came swinging round the corner they parted laughing, the ready, nervous laugh of people who have dwelt upon great responsibilities too long for their ease of heart.

"There," said one of the party, as they went down the avenue, "there is one of them this moment, Mrs. Hathaway. Your theories are at your threshold. If they don't keep away from you, what hope is there for the age? Of what use is it for us to lavish our souls and bodies on those problems when we can't keep beggars off from our own doors? Why should we—"

"I'm no beggar," said a sturdy voice from the uncertain shadow that the dusk was building by the servants' doors.

The little group stopped and stared at the peddler—all but the very young gentleman with the conscientious mustache, who ran to catch the plaid horse-car, and lost it; whereupon, I regret to say that he devoutly expressed the wish that he had never made the acquaintance of Mrs. O'Flaherty.

"What are you?" asked Mr. Wax, trying to speak sternly (he had a vague impression that the man had been impertinent), but not succeeding in the least.

"I'm a peddler," stoutly. "I've never taken charity from no man—yet."

"Very good. That is excellent. I hope you never will," said Mrs. Hathaway hastily. "You talk like a man."

"Anything would be better than to pauperize yourself," suggested the lady who did not smile. "Cold and hunger are not the worst things in the world."

"Marm," said the peddler, "did you ever try it?"

The four refined, benevolent, perplexed and comfortable faces glanced hard for the moment at the peddler's sickly, shrinking one. He had a hunted look, glaring across the dark at them, where he stood apart.

"My horses are getting restless," said the lady who thought cold and hunger were not the worst things in the world, "and I must really go."

But Mr. Wax said he should stay and see a little more of this.

"Go round into the side porch," suggested Mrs. Hathaway to the peddler. "We will look at your things there."

The peddler did as he was bidden, walking slowly. He stood on the uppermost step but one, and looked up at the lady and gentleman who waited in the open doorway against a background of bright, indefinite interior, as delicate and mysterious to the man as the heart of a rose. His arrested attitude was not without significance; it was that of one who could not go up, and would not go down.

"What is your name?" began Mrs. Hathaway promptly. The question came kindly, yet with a certain mechanism, from the delicate, philanthropic lips which had asked it so many times of so many "cases."

"Tape and needles, pins and ruffling, lace and hair-pins—oh! John True, marm."

"I will look at the needles. Do you make a comfortable living?"

"Sometimes," said the peddler evasively.

"Have you a permit?" asked Mr. Wax, with the determination of a man resolved to say the proper thing.

"Sir?—Yes. Those are American pins, marm. I've got no English to-day."

"Have you sold much to-day, John True?"

"Not much to-day, nor yet yesterday," said John True, hesitating. "I got a breakfast for a couple of box-plaits and some pink tape."

"You look hungry," said Mr. Wax, with blunt compassion.

The peddler looked at the Committee of the Association for the Prevention of Pauperism. He did not speak. The stout gentleman had come out and joined them; he called Mrs. Hathaway "My dear." The pug had followed also, and stood airing his crimson ribbons with high personal reserve on the door-sill; he had the aspect of a sub-committee not expected to give advice, but admitted to unfathomable confidence.

"We will have some supper," said the lady with vague kindness. Her thorough training as a social economist prevented her from saying, "I will give you a supper."

"Thank you, marm," said John True, "if the needles will pay for it."

"This is an excellent spirit, Mr. Wax," said Mrs. Hathaway. A child at this moment ran from somewhere and dashed at the stout gentleman's neck—plainly a boy, by his boisterous loving.

"Ah!" said the peddler, with a change of manner, "he's a pretty little fellow."

"Some of your own, perhaps?" asked the lady.

"Hush!" said Mr. Wax, who was a bachelor, "you—you hurt the man."

"Thank you, sir," said John True. There was an awkward silence. The peddler was the first to break it.

"I find it hard—" he fumbled weakly with an imitation Valenciennes ruffle, drawing it through and through his gaunt fingers—"I don't find it easy, yet, to talk about it all. I'd ought to by this time. My boy had the scarlet fever while I was in the war—him and the baby. They both died in one week. My wife wrote me about it. It broke her all up. She kind of pined away. She didn't live long after I got home, herself. That's how it comes I haven't anybody. She was a good wife. My boy's name was Tommy. He was just the size of yours, sir—much them ways. My wife wanted him to go to college. I don't think she ever thought he could die. I never thought of it myself till the letter came. I wasn't so much acquainted with the baby; but he was a cunning little thing. I suppose he would have grown up. My wife was very fond of him. My wife was a brave woman." He drew himself up. "She never asked me not to go—not once. I got wounded once or twice, and once my name got into the dead-list. It broke her up—I think it broke her up as much as the children. She said a woman had to sit at home and read the papers. She said a man didn't know. I got home unexpected one day. When I come in—Madam, if you are suited with the needles, I will go."

"Wait a little," said the lady gently; "we would like to hear some more about you before you go. Perhaps you would like your supper first?"

"If I've got to talk," answered the man after a silence, "I'd rather be over with it before I eat. But I don't want to be asked any more questions about her—nor yet the boy. I ain't in the habit of talking—about 'em. I ain't very well. It tires me. My breath don't come right."

"The man has asthma," said Mr. Wax in an undertone.

"Asthma and shakes," replied the soldier, cheerfully, "and an old wound in the hip, and some other troubles that soldiers have. There's sorts enough if that would answer."

"Helen," said the stout gentleman, speaking for the first time, "bring this man in out of the cold, and order up his supper in the hall, wouldn't you? It's warmer for us all in there. Mr. True, come in. We won't plague you about your family."

The peddler stepped in reluctantly to the great crimson-carpeted hall. He glanced at the engravings and statuary, and removed his hat, but stood uncertain.

"I'd rather eat below, sir, but I'll set a moment if you wish. I am tired." He sank back, panting, upon one of the tall carved chairs.

"Don't sell much, I take it," said Mr. Hathaway, with the directness of the business man, who had little or no time for philanthropy.

"Not much, sir—no. It's a poor business. I wouldn't be at it if I could get my pension. Folks don't like peddlers."

"But you must have had a trade," suggested Mrs. Hathaway, "and why can't you get your pension?"

"I was a house-painter, but that gives you the lead-colic, marm, if you ain't pretty tough to start with. I tried it at first, but the shakes come on, and I fell off the ladder one day. They wouldn't have me after that. Marm, I've tried everything—you needn't ask me. This is all I can get. I hoped I'd get my pension. I applied in '65. They say it's a clear claim. But it ain't come yet. I hope I'll hold out till it does. I've got a right to it, I think."

His gaunt blue eyes flashed out once—he glanced about the warm, luxurious place. It occurred to him at that moment, that the lady might not have had all these things—and her live husband—and be able to send that boy to college, if it had not been for men like him. But he thought it would be impolite to tell her so. He was her company just now.

"Take all his things, Helen," said Mr. Hathaway turning away abruptly, "and come to dinner when you can." The man made him uncomfortable. He almost wished he had not sent a substitute himself. His easy gray eyes fell before the staring blue ones of the peddler.

There was no end to the pension question if one got into it. Helen, thank fortune, had never been drawn into that yet. People had got tired of soldiers before she took up philanthropy. They were outworn, unfashionable long since. Government was supposed to look after them. There were a hundred other whims, now, for the occupation of elegant leisure and well-meaning consciences. Hear her now, with her beautiful persistence, going at that poor fellow!

"But surely, Mr. True, if you are a deserving man, you should have got your pension long before now. I do not understand this business. I have—been occupied in other—directions. I should wish to help you if I knew how. We owe a debt—we are under obligation to you."

She stopped suddenly, remembering what obligations her sheltered, happy life was under to this peddler of tape and needles, lace and hair-pins. She was a young woman yet. She was of the generation that had sprung up since 1865. Her husband was older than herself. She had never picked lint or rolled bandages. She looked upon Memorial Day as a questionable popular festival, calculated to make drunkards, and teach the poor unthrifty habits. She had never searched a list of killed and wounded in the morning papers. She was able to hear military music with composure. She did not have to lock herself away alone, with her hands pressed like the clods of the grave upon her ears, when a soldier's funeral passed the house. She could meet a blue uniform in the street without the heart-throb that tore the life, or the blinding mist in the eyes that darkened the face of the heavens and the earth. She did not have to get out of the room, when young people sang army songs, and wander about till they came calling, and wondered why she was not there to play the waltzes. She was one of the blessed among women who had not lived the war.

"We are under obligations to you," repeated the gentle philanthropist, not without embarrassment.

"There's hundreds of thousands of us," said John True, monotonously. "I hadn't ought to wonder so much if I'm one of 'em. It's queer how folks always have a feeling of surprise at their own troubles; but I guess," brightly, "I'll get my pension come January." He closed his little valise and shifted it cheerfully across his shoulder. His breath came in pants, with a painful sound. "I've got one of those holes in the lungs," he said carelessly. He thrust his hand under his thin shirt up to the knuckles in a pitiful concavity, such as his disease sometimes wears out of the living bone and tissue. "It makes me stoop," he added, "and it's bad about breathing; but I kep' my arms and legs—and eyes. I thank you, marm, for buying so much stock of me. It will keep me a good while—it will keep me several days."

"Have you consulted no physician?" asked Mr. Wax, as John True moved to the door. A great gust of the damp night swept in. The peddler coughed and shivered. It was beginning to rain.

"Oh, I have my quinine," said the soldier evasively. "There's nothing else for it."

"There are objections to medicating yourself with t'is drug and—risks," suggested Mr. Wax earnestly.

"Sir," said John True, "did you ever have the shakes under McClellan along the Potomac?"

"Well, well!" said Mr. Wax deprecatingly.

The pug was sniffing superciliously at the peddler's heels, as one who was constituted an advisory committee for the emergency, and must officially remind him that the open door would chill the house. The little boy, too, was calling his mother in to dinner. He could be seen through the open library door making darts at his father from behind, and strangling him with uproarious kisses.

"Go below for a good hot supper, and I should like to give you the address of our society," suggested Mrs. Hathaway thoughtfully. "It may serve you in some emergency. We make it a point to help honest people to be self-supporting. We have our industrial branches. I will write it for you—There. We do not give in charity, except in extremities."

"I haven't fallen that far yet," said the soldier, lifting his head. He looked at the sky, but there were no stars—it was deadly dark. "I guess I'll get my pension in January" cheerfully. "I hope I'll hold out. I thank you, marm, for the supper. Next time I come around this way I'll bring some extry crimped hair-pins for you. I have a kind in a box with a lady on it in a pink gown. Generally I ask something extry for the box. I should like to have you have it to remember me by. I wished I had something in my stock that would please that little fellow. But it's all women's gear. Good night, sir," to Mr. Wax, who held the door open and said nothing.

But the chairman of the committee of the Association for the Prevention of Pauperism, hastily excusing himself from his hostess and colleague in philanthropy, shut the door of the high-art green house, and followed the peddler down the piazza steps. The two stood for a moment in the now heavily-falling rain.

"You have no umbrella," said the representative of the Extinction of Pauperism under his breath.

"Well, sir, no. I parted with mine one day for a—well, for a supper. I hadn't had anything to eat, only a few blackberries that was pretty well dried with the drought, since the day before of a breakfast time. I haven't any umbrella, but I'll get under shelter in a place I know before long, now; thank you, sir."

"You must take mine," said Mr. Wax guiltily. "I insist upon it. And I wish—here—I—I beg your pardon," cried Mr. Wax, looking all around him with a scared air, "but I never enlisted myself. I had an invalid sister, and I—at any rate, I didn't. I do not enjoy it to see a soldier going about the State of Massachusetts in the condition you are in. I really do not enjoy it!" repeated Mr. Wax, wiping his forehead; "and if you won't look upon it as a charity—for we seldom give in charity, nor even as a loan, for our loans, you know, are subject to the advisory committee—and, in fact, if you would be so good, Mr. True, as not to look upon it—officially, anyhow—but just to give one human being the privilege of putting some comforts, such as umbrellas and other necessities of life into another human being's way," finished Mr. Wax wildly, "I should be infinitely grateful to you. As a civilian," added Mr. Wax, "who is under obligations to a soldier, I must say that I will not have you look upon this as a charity. It would be contrary to your excellent instincts; it would be contrary to all our principles; it would be— Good night, sir," cried Mr. Wax severely, and, glancing about him with the air of one detected in a felony, the chairman of the committee of the Association for the Prevention of Pauperism tucked a fat bill into the peddler's thin hand, and fled for his life.

III

THE nation had come up like a convalescent from a fever, not without a certain incredulity of the disease which it had survived. The public credit was sturdy. The reduction of the war debt had become one of the financial wonders of the world. The business outlook was clear. So long as England ate our beef, and our superfluous grain went as ballast to the merchantmen, what would we? Since the great Western crops were assured, the chinch-bug to be disposed of by kerosene and milk (one could hardly respect even a chinch-bug who refused to surrender life upon that diet), the forest fires out, the floods down, and the Hutchison and Saint Gray Railroad managed by Boston capital, who could complain? If the banking system is safe, and the kindergarten semi-annual has subscribers; if pencil-lined summer silk is fifty cents a yard, the Prohibitory law defeated, the three-and-a-half per cents afloat, and we have a country week for sick babies, "what can we want besides?" A chorus of fifty million voices adopts this national anthem from the hymn-book, and chants piously.

It is the day when we look in the morning papers for the score of the last national base-ball match. It is the day when we thrill over the accident to the stroke of the inter-collegiate regatta. It is the day when we play lawn tennis with the ladies. It is the time when all the ardor of our soul is flung into the cut of our landau; when we discuss the bang on the tails of our horses; when we camp out in the Yellowstone on an August vacation, and our wives pray for us as for men in mortal peril. It is the time when we give thirty thousand dollars for a French painting; when we agonize over the "punkin"-colored frieze claimed as old gold upon our summer villas; when we amuse ourselves chasing what we call a fox, at the watering-place affecting imported fashions and humanities; when the crack in the faience vase stirs our natures to their depths. It is the day when gamboge yellow china monsters, costing a hundred dollars a pair, sit over against our thresholds in the front hall. It is the day when we give five hundred for a lap-dog, and three dollars a visit for the calls of the dog-doctor. It is the day when we have adapted social science to the impulses of the heart. It is the day when we know to a copper how much it is right to give our starving sister. It is the day when we are generous to a fault with our thoughts, with our time, with our nerve, with our privacy, with all the sweet and sacred resources which have a value to human need, beside which, indeed, mere money may be a slight and chilly contribution. It is the day when we find ourselves proud of the extent to which we have become our brother's keeper. It is the day of harbor excursions, and women's prisons; of the society for educating you at home, and the great firm that takes you from behind its counter to send you abroad. It is the day of the flower charity and rides for invalids. It is the day when we stubbornly investigate insane hospitals, and when women on the State Boards of Charity discover that female convicts have not been supplied with night-gowns. It is the day when the merciful executioner of our superannuated dogs or horses gives a new trade to society and a new humanity to life. It is the day when the law takes a child away from a drunken parent, and a man may be arrested if he kicks a donkey. It is the day when our navy consists of fourteen unarmored cruisers, and twelve old-fashioned monitors. It is the day when the applications for pensions are coming in at the rate of three thousand a month. It is the day when two hundred thousand pension claims remain unsettled. It is the day when over one hundred Massachusetts soldiers are found in almshouses. It is twenty years after the war.

On a hot, bright day in May, 1882, the physician in charge of the State Almshouse at Tewksbury received a summons to attend a sick pauper as promptly as possible. It was not the first call; the man had troubled him before; but of late had kept more quiet. At one time there had been talk of sending him to the insane wing, but for this reason and that, it had never been done. The doctor went to the pauper's bedside with a dubious expression, as one who distrusts his own leniency.

The patient was the last in the long row in the men's ward. His cot came up blankly against the wall. Some of the men had a window.

"I get tired of the wall," said the patient abruptly, as the physician entered.

"It's always something, you know, True," answered the doctor carelessly. "Well, how is it to-day? Choking again?"

"It's always chokes, Doctor," patiently, "but it's the cannon in my head I mind the most to-day. There's flashing and firing enough to blow Lee into eternity. Off and on I feel shells—then they bust and scatter down my backbone. Seems I was blown up nigh all night. Jiggs says I kep' him awake. I think very like. I thought he was Beauregard, till it come sun-up. But I hadn't nothin' to fling at him, only the pillow, and I ain't strong enough to fling the pillow. You needn't find fault; I laid still, Doctor. It was hard not to go at 'em, but I kep' still. I'm better to-day, Doctor—if you could muzzle them cannon."

"Oh, yes, I'll muzzle the cannon," said the physician lightly. He poured a teaspoonful from a vial, which was labeled Bromide Potass.

"You can't muzzle 'em!" cried the patient contemptuously, "and you know you can't. I ain't a luny—yet, nor I ain't a born fool. That sort of talk don't help a man in his senses. We used to have a doctor to home I'd like to see. My wife was very fond of that doctor. He understood my constitution, she said. He'd know whether I was dying or not. I never thought I'd come to a poor-house doctor."

"Dying fiddlesticks!" retorted the doctor good-humoredly; but he took in the man, soul and body, at one long glance, before he left him. The eye of an anxious physician is like a sharp-shooter.

"Take the medicine, and let the cannon roar, if they will, True. They won't hurt anybody. I'll be back if you don't feel easier."

"I fought in fifteen battles, Doctor!" the patient cried after him—his voice re-echoed through the long, gaunt room—"I fought in fifteen battles. I was at Fair Oaks, and Malvern Hills, and Bull Run, and Antietam, and—oh, I've forgotten the rest. I was wounded twice. Once I got on the dead-list, and my wife read it in the papers. I was—look here, I never told you before. I don't often speak of it. I fought the war out; I didn't talk about it while I was peddlin'; I was afraid folks would say I was tradin' on my miseries. You know you couldn't be the same man after all them years if you was to try. I did the best I could at peddlin'. I never thought I'd come to Tewksbury—I never thought of it!"

His voice rose to a kind of wail which was the worst thing in the world for the paupers. Some one ordered him sharply to keep still. The doctor went down to discuss the patient with the superintendent; it was not a case exactly for the State visitors who were coming any day now; yet it seemed hard to turn him into the asylum.

"He's only quinine-crazy; it isn't like the genuine thing, you know. I don't incline to disturb him; he's a pretty sick man. He takes the whole business hard. He wasn't cut out for a pauper—the more's the pity."

"Look here, True," said Jiggs, after the doctor had gone, "I'm sorry for ye, upon my word. I'd give ye somethin' to fling at me if I had it. I'm nothin' but a dummed fool that drank himself into this, but by the Lord Harry, if I'd fit for my country—too drunk; they wouldn't have me—I should call this a dummed shame. Be as crazy as you like, for all me—I won't complain of ye."

"Thank you, Jiggs," said the sick man patiently. He fell silent after this; so silent that they thought him much improved. He turned over on his little cot with his face to the great white wall, and dropped into a stupor, half doze, half day-dream, through which his thoughts stirred with a sluggish fear, like lost things that dared not move lest they should get farther still astray. He had always had these sullen times since he had been at Tewksbury. He had been there over two years. They had found him a tractable pauper; helpless with malaria and asthma, and his other ails; deranged at times with the over-use of quinine—a poisoned wreck. His fine blue eyes were hollow, and his lips livid. He was no longer a pleasant-looking fellow. One wondered what this defender of his country might be thinking of, lying there with his face to the poor-house wall. His lost life? His last battle? More probably his next dose. He muttered a good deal and stared about. He had quite outlived his own romance (a pitiable fate for the most attractive of us), and no longer appealed to any but the most keenly imaginative sensibilities.

Some one spoke to him softly, as he lay there stupidly enough, that hot June day. At first he thought it was the robin that sang afternoons on the tree that grew across the street on the other side of the poor-house; but after a moment's attention he perceived that it was the voice of a woman. When he turned, he saw that several people were by his bedside, some gentlemen and this lady. He made a sign to intimate that he had seen her before, and that he welcomed her.

"I have often thought of you," said Mrs. Hathaway, "but I had never expected to find you here. My duties bring me here to observe the condition of the inmates. I am sorry to find you one of them."

"I want to speak to that man," said John True faintly. He pointed to Mr. Wax, who shrank a little in the background. The gentleman advanced and leaned over the cot.

"I won't tell of you," whispered the pauper.

"Don't," sighed Mr. Wax.

"But it did a heap for me, sir. I got boots and flannels come winter. It kep' me in comforts, till you seemed to me, as I thought on you, most like own folks, sir. But I never told on you."

"I'm much obliged to you," said Mr. Wax, coughing heavily. His bronchial condition explained a great deal of surplus emotion that a philanthropist must find inconvenient.

"I am very sorry to find you here," repeated Mrs. Hathaway gently. "We will hope soon to have you self-supporting and happy." She looked vaguely about; then suddenly her fine eyes filled. The peddler was greatly changed. She was not used to sick people, but she began to see that he looked very ill.

"He's crazy as a coot," volunteered the amiable

Jiggs from the next cot; "but I let him fling pillows at me," complacently. "I'm nothin' but a dummed drunkard myself."

"You're an excellent fellow," said Mr. Wax helplessly.

"Tell us," urged Mrs. Hathaway, "how you came here, Mr. True, can't you? I am so very sorry. I have a better place for you I think. I see you are not able to work at present. We are establishing a home—"

"It takes a pensionable status to get into hospitals," interrupted John True. "They wouldn't have me—I've never got my pension yet. Something was always the matter. I thought I'd get it come January when I was to your house, but it was always something. Last of all, the surgeon he up and died. I had to have his testimony as to what ailed me at time of my discharge. We got most all the other witnesses—one of 'em he'd cleared out to Indiany after a divorce, and it took all that time to captur' him—then this feller had to go and die. They said my claim warn't good for nothin' without the surgeon's testimony. That clean discouraged me," added the soldier. "I'd been in fifteen battles! I'd been wounded twice! I fought in Fair Oaks, and Malvern Hills, and Bull Run, and Antietam, and—oh, seems to me if there wasn't so many folks round I could remember the rest." He looked wildly about, panting.

"I hoped that sedative would work better," said the doctor, who had joined the group.

"But this is not to be a national hospital," persisted Mrs. Hathaway. "It is to be a state affair, where you will not have to wait for anything. There is to be as little red tape as possible. I have become very much interested in it—I am one of the committee. I confess I think it is rather late, but better late than never. We must get you into it, Mr. True."

"I don't know nothing about it," said the pauper apathetically.

"We will speak to the superintendent at once," urged the lady nervously. "We will have you made comfortable there for the rest of your days."

"Thank you, marm; but it's too late for that."

The soldier turned his face to the wall. He was tired of all these fine people. He had no faith in their homes and hospitals. It would be like the pension.

"There'll be sure to be something the matter. You'll see, they won't let me in. They'll find reasons agin it. They won't want me. I don't know why. It ain't because I didn't fight. It ain't because I wasn't wounded. It ain't because I wasn't honorably discharged. It ain't because I ain't sick. . . . Lord! I never thought I'd come to the poor-house! I never thought of it! I've been here two years and three months, and I ain't dead yet. . . . Lord, how I took on at first! I've got used to it now."

"What made you come at the last?" some one asked him gently.

"They took me, sir. They said I was starving. The selectmen found me in a corn-field of a November night. I wasn't very well. It was in a town where I hadn't sold much of anything."

"Oh, well," said Mrs. Hathaway, restraining herself with much emotion, "we will take you out of the poor-house. We will come back for you next week."

"Marm," said the pauper, "I ain't an object of interest for a lady now. I wouldn't trouble yourself if I was you."

He turned his face to the wall again, and said no more to them. Only, as the gentlemen passed out of the ward, he beckoned once, and Mr. Wax returned and asked his pleasure.

"Will this be a real thing, this place you tell of?" asked the pauper. "No play-work, an Orderly, and a flag, and other soldiers? I'd like to die under a roof where the flag belonged, if I could as well as not. It would be something not to die in the poor-house, wouldn't it, sir?"

They had moved him, although he was very weak. It was thought best, at the last moment, to make the experiment, and they bore him with what tenderness they might, on the little journey from Tewksbury to Chelsea, and so through the welcome dashes of the sea-winds up the Powder-Horn Hill and into the home which Massachusetts had provided for her scattered heroes. It was an exceedingly hot day, and as he got out of the carriage, which he tried to do without assistance, he turned his face to the salt breeze and looked pathetically about.

"It's cooler here than it was in Tewksbury," he said. "I've nothing against 'em at Tewksbury; but it was a hot place for sick folks."

Then, glancing up the height of the building, his gaunt, dull face flashed fire.

"Oh, there's the Flag! See! How she flies! Ain't she a living beauty! Oh, I'm glad to get under the Flag!"

He made the military salute gravely, then bared his head, his face upturned to the solemn symbol for which he had sacrificed youth, health, home, hope and life. Not much, to be sure, but this obscure man gave what he had. We may remember it, now and then, although we are truly busied about many other things. Thirty years are a generation. Half of the men who sent him forth are in their graves. We who remain have more modern subjects of thought and care than these poor wrecks, who have sifted through the strain of broken business habits, incurable disease, growing age and increasing friendlessness. You who have sprung up since the rank and file were our hope and our glory, to whose happy young ears a drum-tap has no more solemn meaning than a serenade, and to whose fancy a soldier presents the form of the sleek cadet disporting himself at Magnolia, or the useful messenger who carries your invitations—it is our fault if we have suffered you to forget that sacred debt whose bonds bear interest unto the third and fourth generation of them that owe it, and shall reflect the military quality of loyalty upon thousands of them that honor it and reverence its obligations.

These were our trust; how fare they at our hands?

Our saviors then; are they our heroes now?

John True went into the Soldiers' Home quietly; they helped him on either side, for the outbreak of life with which he had greeted the flag passed quickly, and he moved and breathed with difficulty.

Comrades saluted him as he crossed the threshold, and the "Orderly" about whom he had asked, was there. They took him to the place assigned him. Its coolness, size and comfort seemed to confuse him.

"These are your quarters," said the Orderly.

"Eh? Not—here?"

"Yes, these are your quarters."

"But this must be officers' quarters. I wasn't an officer."

"No; these are your quarters."

The pauper soldier began to tremble, looked appealingly about—made as if he would entreat to be left alone; then:

"My God! My God!" he cried aloud, and sank down sobbing mightily before them all.

He lingered for a little while, not in great pain, and with so much comfort that they had at first hopes of his regaining life. He knew better than this himself, but he did not try to deceive them. He lay quietly, sleeping a good deal, and smiling upon all who spoke to him. He often said :

"Oh, I am so comfortable, so comfortable!"

Sometimes he told the boys that he never thought he should have come to the poor-house; and once he said again that it was a good deal to die with the flag over your head.

One day he called the Orderly and said :

"I forgot to tell those gentlemen why my daughter couldn't support me. I had a daughter, but she married at sixteen—that's why. Sissy married a drunkard. He was a Dogberry fellow—his father drank before him. They're out West somewhere, but I haven't heard from her for a long spell. Sissy couldn't do the first thing for me. It would have been better for Sissy if she had had the scarlet fever when the boys did—but she lived instead."

At another time he said, with some anxiety :

"I forgot to ask that lady whether she ever got the extry box of hair-pins I owed her for my supper. I sent it by another peddler I knew. It had a picture on the cover—it was a pretty box. I wish I'd asked her."

It was noticeable that as he failed, the more unpleasant aspects of his appearance gave place to a certain touching refinement which might have been native to the man. As death advanced, the most painful marks of disease retreated. Fire returned to his fine blue eye. That weak drooping of the under lip fell into firmer lines. The muscles of his face began to move with a kind of precision, like men on duty under clear orders. The vacillation of pauperism departed from the soldier's face in those last days. He spoke less and less; when he did, it was usually to say something about Mary, and some one asked him one day if Mary was his wife. He nodded silently. He did not feel that he cared to talk about her to these strange men.

He thought of her—it seemed to him that he thought of her all the time. It was as if he had forgotten everything while he was in the poor-house. Now, it was like getting home again, after these twenty years.

Whether adream or awake—who should say that has not himself come to that haze which separates the facts of this which we call life from the mysteries of that which we name death?—he experienced much that had gone from his memory, leaving a blankness like that which rests in one's mind upon the lives of other men.

He remembered the row of holes perforated in the brown straw hat that he hung up in the entry the day he had enlisted. There was a little tin horse under foot, and he hit it, so it trundled away with a tinkling sound. There was a rag-mat in the entry; it had blue roses, and one of the petals was worn and pieced out with black alpaca. As he looked down at it, fumbling and delaying, dreading to tell her as he had never once since dreaded death when under fire, the child from within piped out shrilly :

"My omelzzen Ye-ev-ing, my Resizzenere;
Ven wy shoul'da ma-a-ma,
If twyalsypere?"

And Mary was hurt because he went to wash himself without first kissing her. But he was so covered with red paint! He had been painting a red house—Seth Grimace's house.

They had doughnuts and hash for supper, and Sissy was not there. Sissy was at the picnic; she had the umbrella, lest it should rain, and was coming home with Jenny Severby. Sissy looked like her great-aunt who married a dissipated fellow. Poor Sissy! But Tommy crushed the cinnamon rose in his father's pocket, leaning so close against him at supper-table. . . . How she looks with the rose in her bosom—pretty! The baby pulled at it, and she put it in her hair. That was more becoming. Mary was always neat.

See! we go out into the garden after tea to walk. He throws away the pipe, and the rooster objects to tobacco; that pleases Tommy, strangling him with kisses from behind. Tommy has on a green-checked gingham apron. Let us count the checks to steady a man's mind against this thing he has to do, that is so much worse than the deadliest battle of them all, though he fought the war out and was taken out of Tewksbury poor-house before he died. There are the currant bushes; the cherry tree is in blossom, and the flowers fall like snow. There are the cabbages in the southwest corner, doing well. The sun is setting. Where shall we put Sissy's teeter-board? Shall Tommy have a rabbit? Yes, Mary, have your geraniums, my girl, anywhere you like. She hangs upon his arm now, leaning toward him; puts up her hand. Oh, how soft it is! There were only men—men out there. In all these years, Mary, I have never touched another woman—not even her hands. You never need be jealous in your grave, my girl! . . . I'll tell you when we get into the house. Not yet! not just yet! Give me a few moments' time! I can't tell you this minute!

Then coming to himself—with a sense of suffocation—"I'm choking!—Doctor!—Sir, excuse me. I have made you trouble. I was thinking about another matter."

He drifted off again into half-dreaming soliloquy.—The baby cried and she went in. I think I'll put it off. I will not tell her to-night. I had rather get a little stronger before I tell my wife I have enlisted. . . . That was just like her! To spare me—everything. She always did. But I would have told her if she'd waited a little longer. When I felt better I'd have told her. Oh, my girl, come here! Come here!

I haven't held no other woman in my arms, Mary,—and it's fourteen years since she died. Come here, and let us talk it over if we can. . . . I say, boys, do you hear that? No? Oh, no. I see—it is some music that I heard. My little boy used to sing. This is the hymn. Why, I hear it :

"My home is in Heaven."

Don't hear it, boys, none of you?

"My home is in Heaven,
My rest is not here."

I can hear it very plain. We didn't get much home here, did we, boys? Broke up somehow—upset seems to me—come to an end before its time. I had a pleasant home before the war.

"Home is in Heaven!"

Well, maybe—I wouldn't undertake to say; but it's asking a good deal of folks . . . to wait . . . so long.

It was noon on the thirtieth of May. All over the land flags floated at half-mast, and from every United States military post came the boom of heavy guns fired in honor of the nation's dead. John True heard the solemn sound as it came at regular intervals from the distant harbor forts. It started his slow heart-beats and he roused himself with a flash of the old spirit :

"Ready! Aim! Fire! he cried. . . . Fair Oaks!—Malvern Hill!—Bull Run!—Antietam! Give it to 'em, boys! give it to 'em! Look at the Flag and think of your folks at home! Shall we give our lives for nothing? Aim low, boys! Government will look after ye, don't ye fear! Old Massachusetts won't allow us to suffer! Each mortal man of us has got the promise of the United States of America to care for him and his'n if he drops! Let 'em have it, boys! Hurrah for the old Flag! Fair Oaks!—Malvern Hill!—Bull Run!—Antietam! . . ."

They went swiftly to his bedside, and held him to the strong salt air. They spoke affectionately. There was little to say. Some one prayed aloud, but it was doubtful if he heard. He stretched his arms out with a gesture of infinite tenderness, and to the comrade nearest who supported him he said:

"I've got my discharge, old fellow, and now I'm going home to see my wife. I almost daresn't, for she isn't very strong. Do you think it will be too much for her—so sudden—when she—when she—sees me coming in?"

The minute guns timed his failing pulse-beats, but he no longer heard them, and so Private John True kept his last Decoration Day.

DECORATION DAY.

SWEET sleep our heroes, couched beneath the sod,
 Wrapped in their winding sheets of blue and gray;
 While o'er their heads the fairest flow'rets nod,
 Kissed by the breath of May.

War-wasted, weary, sank they down to rest,
 Spent with the struggle in their country's need;
 No gentle breathings heave the placid breast,
 No signs of love they heed.

And yet new life through all the world doth beat;
 Its rhythmic splendors throb through space afar;
 It blossoms in the daisies at their feet,
 It glows in yonder star.

And so the souls of heroes whom we sing
 Sleep not; but far in Heaven's fadeless clime,
 O'er all the nation's grateful offering,
 Keep watch and ward sublime.

HESTER M. POOLE.

"IDAHHO."

THE name of the great northwestern gold-fields, comprising Montana and Idaho, was originally spelled I-dah-ho, with the accent thrown heavily on the second syllable. The word is perhaps of Shoshonee derivation, but it is found in some similar form, and with the same significance, among all Indians west of the Rocky Mountains. The Nez Percé Indians, in whose country the great black and white mountain lies which first induced the white man to the use of this name, are responsible for its application to the region of the far Northwest.

The literal meaning is "sunrise mountains." Indian children among all tribes west of the Rocky Mountains, so far as I can learn, use the word to signify the place where the sun comes from. Where these tawny people live out of doors, go to bed at dusk, and rise with the first break of day, sunrise is much to them. The place where the sun comes from is a place of marvel to the children; and, indeed, it is a sort of dial-plate to every village or ranchera, and of consequence to all. The Shoshonee Indians, the true Bedouin of the American desert, hold the mountain where the first burst of dawn is discovered in peculiar reverence.

This roving and treacherous tribe of perfect savages, stretching from the Rocky Mountains almost to the Sierras, having no real habitation, or any regard for the habitation of others, but often invading and overlapping the lands of fellow savages, had some gentle sentiments about sunrise. "Idahho" with them was a sacred place; and they clothed the Rocky Mountains, where the sun rose to them, with a mystic or rather a mythological sanctity.

The Shasta Indians, with whom I spent the best years of my youth, and whose language and traditions I know entirely, as well as those of their neighbors to the north of them, the Modocs, always, whether in camp or in winter quarters, had an "Idahho," or place for the sun to rise. This was a sort of Mecca in the skies, to which every Indian lifted his face involuntarily on rising from his rest. I am not prepared to say that the act had any special religion in it. I only assert that it was always done, and done silently, and almost, if not entirely, reverently.

Yet it must be remembered that this was a very practical affair nearly always and with all Indians. The war-path, the hunt, the journey—all these pursuits entered almost daily into the Indian's life, and of course the first thing to be thought of in the morning was "Idahho." Was the day to open propitiously? Was it to be fair or stormy weather for the work in hand?

But I despair of impressing the importance of sunrise on those who rarely witness it; although to the Indian it is everything. And that is why every tribe in the mountains, wherever it was, and whatever its object in hand, had a Mount "Idahho." This word, notwithstanding its beauty and pictorial significance, found no place in our books till some twenty-one years ago, and then only in an abbreviated and unmeaning form.

Indeed, all Indian dialects, except the "Chinook," a conglomerate published by the Hudson Bay Company for their own purposes, and adopted by the missionaries, seem to have always been entirely ignored and unknown throughout the North Pacific territory. This "Chinook" answered all purposes. It was a sort of universal jargon, was the only dialect in which the Bible was printed, or that had a dictionary, and no one seemed to care to dig beyond it.

And so it was that this worthless and unmeaning "Chinook" jargon overlaid and buried our beautiful names and traditions. They were left to perish with the perishing people; so that now, instead of soft and alliterative names, with pretty meanings and traditions, we have for the most sublime mountains to be seen on earth (those of the Oregon Sierras, mis-called the Cascade Mountains) such outlandish and senseless and inappropriate appellations as Mount Hood, Mount Jefferson, Mount Washington and Mount Rainier. Changing the name of the Oregon River, however, to that of the Columbia is an impertinence that can plead no excuse but the bad taste of those perpetrating the folly. The mighty Shoshonee River, with its thousand miles of sand and lava-beds, is being changed by these same map-makers to that of Lewis and Clark River.

When we consider the lawless character of the roving Bedouins who once peopled this region, how snake-like and treacherous they were as they stole through the grasses and left no sign, surely we should allow this sinuous, impetuous and savage river to bear the name which it would almost seem nature gave it, for Shoshonee is the Indian name for serpent. How appropriate for this river and its once dreaded people!

The dominion of this tribe departed with the discovery of gold on a tributary of the Shoshonee River in 1860. The thousands who poured over this vast country on their way to the new gold-fields of the north swept them away almost entirely. Up to this time they had only the almost helpless and wholly exhausted immigrant to encounter, with now and then a brush with soldiers sent out to avenge some massacre. But this tribe perished, as I have said, before the Californians, and to-day it is not, except as one of the broken and dispirited remnants familiar to the wretched reservations scattered over the vast far West.

Captain Pierce, the discoverer of gold in the north, located "Pierce City" on the site of his discovery, in the dense wood away up in the wild spurs of the Bitter Root Mountains, about fifty miles from the Shoshonee River. Then "Orofino City" sprang up. Then "Elk City" was laid out. But the "cities" did not flourish. Indeed, all these "cities" were only laid out to be buried. The gold was scarce and hard to get at, and the mighty flood of miners that had overrun everything to reach the new mines began to set back in a reflux tide.

On the site of the earthworks thrown up by Lewis and Clark, who wintered on the banks of the Shoshonee River in 1803-4, the adventurous miners had founded a fourth and more imposing city, as they passed on their way to the mines. This they called Lewiston. It was at the head of steamboat navigation on the Shoshonee, and promised well. I remember it as an array of miles and miles of tents in the spring. In the fall, as the tide went out, there was left only a few strips of tattered canvas flapping in the wind. Here and there stood a few "shake shanties," against which little pebbles rattled in a perpetual fusillade as they were driven by the winds that howled down the swift and barren Shoshonee.

"It oughter be a gold-bearin' country," said a ragged miner, as he stood with hands in pockets shivering on the banks of the desolate river, looking wistfully away toward California; "it oughter be a gold-bearin' country, 'cause it's fit for nothin' else."

I had left California before this rush, settled down and been admitted to the bar by ex-Attorney-General George H. Williams, then Judge of Oregon, and had now come, with one law-book and two six-shooters, to offer my services in the capacity of advocate to the miners. Law not being in demand, I threw away my book, bought a horse and rode express. But even this had to be abandoned, and I, too, was being borne out with the receding tide.

Suddenly it began to be rumored that farther up the Shoshonee, and beyond a great black-white mountain, a party of miners who had attempted to cross this ugly range, and got lost, had found gold in deposits that even exceeded the palmy days of '49."

Colonel Craig, an old pioneer, who had married an Indian woman and raised a family here, proposed to set out for the new mine. The old man had long since, through his Indians, heard of gold in this black mountain, and he was ready to believe this rumor in all its extravagance. He was rich in horses, a good man—a great-brained man, in fact—who always had his pockets full of papers, reminding one of Kit Carson in this respect; and, indeed, it was his constant thirst for news that drew him toward the "expressman," and made him his friend.

I gladly accepted his offer of a fresh horse, and the privilege of making one of his party. For reasons sufficient to the old mountaineer, we set out at night, and climbed and crossed Craig's Mountain, sparsely set with pines and covered with rich brown grass, by moonlight.

As we approached the edge of Camas Prairie, then a land almost unknown, but now made famous by the battle-fields of Chief Joseph, we could see through the open pines a faint far light on the great black and white mountain beyond the valley. "Idahho!" shouted our Indian guide in the lead, as he looked back and pointed to the break of dawn on the mountain before us. "That shall be the name of the new mines," said Colonel Craig quietly, as he rode by his side.

The exclamation, its significance, the occasion and all conspired to excite deep pleasure, for I had already written something on this name and its poetical import, and made a sort of glossary embracing eleven dialects.

Looking over this little glossary now, I note that the root of the exclamation is dah! The Shasta word is Puu-dah-ho! The Klamath is Num-dah-ho! The Modoc is Lo-dah! and so on. Strangely like "Look there!" or "Lo!" is this exclamation, and with precisely that meaning.

I do not know whether this Indian guide was Nez Percé, Shoshonee, Cayuse, or from one of the many other tribes that had met and melted into this half-civilized people first named. Neither can I say certainly at this remote day whether he applied the word "Idahho" to the mountain as a permanent and established name, or used the word to point the approach of dawn. But I do know that this mountain that had become famous in a night, and was now the objective point of ten thousand pilgrims, became at once known to the world as Idahho.

Passing by the Indians' corn-fields and herds of cattle and horses, we soon crossed the Camas valley. Here, hugging the ragged base of the mountain, we struck the stormy and craggy Salmon River, a tributary of the Shoshonee, and found ourselves in the heart of the civilized and prosperous Nez Percé's habitations. Ten miles of this tortuous and ragged stream and our guide led up the steep and stupendous mountain toward which all the prospectors were now journeying. At first it was open pines and grass, then stunted fir and tamarack, then broken lava and manzanita, then the summit and snow.

A slight descent into a broad flat basin, dark with a dense growth of spruce, with here and there a beautiful little meadow of tall marsh grass, and we were in the mines—the first really rich gold-mines that had as yet ever been found outside of California.

“Lead and silver hath a lead; but gold has a place where they fine it,” says the Bible—meaning that the only certain place to look for gold is where they refine it. Certainly the text never had a more apt illustration than here; for of all places for gold in the wide world this seemed the most unlikely. The old Californian miners who came pouring in after us, almost before we had pitched tent, were disgusted. “Nobody but a parcel of fools would ever have found gold here,” said one, with a sneer at the long-haired Oregonians who had got lost and found the new mines. But the wheat-like grains of gold were there, and in such heaps as had never been found even in California; and so accessible—only a few inches under the turf or peat in the little meadows and little blind gulches here and there in this great black, bleak and wintry basin that had never yet been peopled since it came fresh from the Creator’s hand.

In less than a week the black basin was white with tents. Our party located a “city” where we first pitched tent, with the express-office for a nucleus.

Look at your map, tracing up from Lewiston over Craig’s Mountain and Camas Prairie, and you will find “Millersburg,” looking as big on the map as any town in the West. Yet it did not live even the winter through. A man soon came with a family of daughters, Dr. Furber, an author of some note at the time, and settled a half mile farther on. My “city” went with and clustered about the ladies. The doctor named the rival “city” after his eldest daughter, Florence. It flourished in the now falling snow like a bay, and was at one time the capital of the territory. There is little of it left now, however, but the populous graveyard.

And alas for the soft Indian name! The bluff miner, with his swift speech and love of brevity, soon cut the name of the new mines down to “Idao.” And so when the new gold-fields widened out during a winter of unexampled hardships and endurance into “Warren’s Diggin’s,” “Boise City,” “Bannock City,” and so on, and the new territory took upon itself a name and had a place on the map of the republic, that name was plain, simple and senseless Idaho. Should any one concerned in the preservation of our native and beautiful names care to know more particularly the facts here sketched, let him address Colonel Craig, of Craig’s Mountain, Idaho, a well-read and the best-informed man on the subject to be found in the far West; and he is the man who found and named Idaho.

JOAQUIN MILLER.

A FRAGMENT FROM THE DIARY OF MISTRESS MARY HOWARD.

BY LEILA WEBSTER.

Aug. 8th, 1580.—I cannot write often in my sweet book, for that the French Ambassadors are here, and we have nothing but feasts and spectacles, dancing and cards from one day’s end to another’s. No one knoweth what Elizabeth’s mind is toward this French marriage. She doth conceal it, and Burleigh is beside himself with anxiety. She even deceiveth the Lords of Council, sometimes seeming to approve and then to disapprove, which they do take as very willful, as that she will not show her real intention to those whose place it is to advise her.

Methinketh Elizabeth would little like to share her power and glory with a husband. She loveth to be king as well as queen; and also she feareth that her favorites would withdraw their devotion were she wedded.

She seemeth to be keeping these Ambassadors to dazzle them with the wealth and greatness of her kingdom. Then, it appeareth to me, she will dismiss them with smooth and soft promises, which, when they return to their own court, they will find are only words.

This evening we did have a great banquet in their honor on the eastern terrace. M. de Montmorenci and M. de Foix ate with Elizabeth at her own table. She was dressed in her French gown of black satin, covered with rubies and pearls. The gems we sew on each gown as she weareth it, and much time doth it take. The rest of the lords, both French and English, did sit with us maids of honor at a long table, and a gay feast we had till midnight. I wore my new bodice, powdered with gold and pearls, and the velvet suit belonging, which moved all the maids to envy. M. de Manelon called for a toast in my honor, naming me as the queen of the table, and all the lords drank it with loud praises, till Elizabeth did look at us, frowning heavily. M. de Manelon is a pretty gallant, and much I like him.

After the banquet we all went into the western court. Soon an old man appeared leading two damsels, and besought succor for them of Elizabeth. Mistress Lettice Arundel and I played the part of the damsels, and much did we enjoy it. The Earl of Essex entered, followed by ten knights in white, and, engaging to defend us, put his following in array against our pursuer, the Earl of Rutland, who led ten knights in blue. They fought stoutly on horseback with swords until the dawn of day, when Elizabeth declared that we were rescued, and dismissed all the company to bed. I did privately give Essex, as our knight, a white handkerchief sprigged with gold, and I fear Elizabeth did espy it, for she gave me many black looks.

The sun is just rising, and I must leave my book and take me to my bed, for need there is that I should be early in the Queen’s chamber, lest she give me more than black looks!

Aug. 9th.—Alack-a-day! I have indeed found out the meaning of Elizabeth’s frowns. This morning she would not let me approach her at her toilet, and gave no reason, only telling me to attend her after the council, and then I would discover the cause of her anger. The council was long, and I did tremble so that I could with difficulty help in sewing the aglets on her purple gold cloth. At last she came, dressed in my new robe, which she had secretly taken from my chamber. It was too short, and did become her most unkindly. She asked each one of the ladies how they liked it, and finally demanded of me if I did not find it too short and ill-becoming. I dared not but to agree. Then she said: "If it become not me as being too short, it shall never become thee as being too fine. Take it to thy chamber, and never put it on again." I did so, and well I know that out of the meanness of their hearts the other maids did rejoice at my disgrace. When I returned Elizabeth had discovered that the handkerchief Essex had worn was given him by me, and she was extremely wroth. She beat me cruelly, so that my arm is black and blue, and forbade me to take pleasure on the river with her to-day. So here I sit, whilst all the court, with gay music and much mirth, are floating down the river to Westminster, where there will be the grandest bull-baiting since the Ambassadors came. I have been highly desirous for this day, and had wagered the rose I wore last evening against M. de Mancelon's pearl snuff-box that my favorite bull would win; and now I am constrained by my tyrannical mistress to stay behind. Shame on a queen to be jealous of her maid of honor—her own kinswoman also!

I have here for consolation a sonnet dedicated to me by young Will Shakspeare. It is a proper, pretty sonnet, and I will copy it into my book; for I must burn his writing, lest Elizabeth find it, when she would surely consider that she had great cause for anger against both of us:

"Alack! what poverty my muse brings forth,
That, having such a scope to show her pride,
The argument all bare is of more worth
Than when it had my added praise beside!
O blame me not if I no more can write!
Look in your glass, and there appears a face
That over goes my blunt invention quite,
Dulling my lines, and doing me disgrace.
Were it not sinful striving these to mend
To mar the subject that before was well?
For to no other pass my verses tend
Than of your graces and your gifts to tell;
And more, much more, than in my verse can sit
Your own glass shows you when you look in it."

Will Shakspeare is the best rhymers in the kingdom, so my Lord Essex saith, and I must find means to give him a knot of my colors in return for this honor.

Elizabeth set me a task before she went away, and I must needs betake myself to it. Little time may I have to myself in the Queen's service.

Sept. 15th.—Not one moment have I had for writing in my dearest book in all this weary time. The French Ambassadors have at last gone with all their train, bearing proper sweet messages to the Queen Regent that will make her hopeful, but Elizabeth doth daily make sport with the ladies of d'Alençon, and I believe nothing will come of these negotiations.

The great excitement of the court now is that Elizabeth hath dispatched Sir Walter Raleigh to the Tower, for that he hath dared to marry the fair Mistress Elizabeth Throckmorton. His bride is also banished from court, and thus they must languish till the royal displeasure doth abate.

Elizabeth bitterly hateth that any one of her court should marry, and does ask us often if we love to think on marriage. But we, knowing her judgment, do conceal our liking thereto. The young Mistress Arundel, newly come to court, did not understand this, and answered that she thought much about marriage if her father did consent to the man she loved. Elizabeth said, "You seem honest, i' faith; I will sue for you to your father." And so she did, greatly to Sir Robert's surprise, who said that he had never heard that his daughter had liking to any man, but he would give free consent to whatever was most pleasing to her "Highness" will an' pleasure." "Then I will do the rest," said the Queen, and called the maiden, telling her that her father had given his free consent. "Then I will be happy, an' please your grace," replied the simpleton. "So you shall, but not be a fool and marry," quoth Elizabeth. "I have your father's consent given to me, and I vow thou shalt never get it into thy possession. So go to, to thy business. I see thou art a bold one to own thy foolishness so readily." At which the poor maid did grieve bitterly, and we have much sympathy with her.

Sept. 18th.—Francis Bacon had audience with the Queen to-day, and she bade me stay by her in the conference chamber, not that she loveth me, but that she feared I should get speech with Essex, who was present. Francis Bacon is most anxious for the Attorneyship, and yet he is so afraid lest he offend her Majesty that he endeavoreth to veil his desire under great pretence of gallantry. Quoth Elizabeth: "We have sent for you to avail ourself of your counsel in filling a vacant position most important to our safety and protection. Advise us of some one who would fulfill the duties of Attorney-General with diligence and credit." I marvel that he did not see she was but trying him, but he answered: "My liege sovereign, many there be who would fill the place with honor, I doubt not, but there is one whom I dare not name, who cherisheth such a deep admiration for his Queen that her welfare, and the dispensation of justice for her glory, would be the care of his life." "Fie on your modesty!" saith Elizabeth; "who is the man?" He did have the grace to blush when she did smite him on the shoulder and exclaim: "You need not name him; we know the man, and will consider his desire to be useful to us."

Bacon retired, thinking his cause won, but well I know that Elizabeth has already chosen another for the position, and did but question him to see if he would expose his anxiety. She doth well love to lay bare the weaknesses of her courtiers.

Essex will be greatly chagrined at this failure of his friend. He doth love Bacon like a brother; why, I see not, for I judge him to be of a cold heart, and loving no one but himself. He is as full of knowledge as an egg is of meat, but he thinketh only of his own interest, and clingeth to Essex, methinks, as he is in high favor with the Queen.

Essex is the friend of every poet and man of letters in the kingdom. They are all full of poverty, and he doth strive greatly to aid them. Elizabeth grudgeth that she hath promised to Edmund Spenser £100 for his poem, "The Faerie Queen," dedicated to herself, and Essex laboreth most earnestly to persuade her to keep her promise. Spenser himself hath addressed this epigram to her:

"I was promised, on a time,
To have reason for my rhyme;
Since that time until this season,
I have had nor rhyme nor reason."

I think me that she will consider her queenly honor as suffering if she doth not keep her promise which she hath neglected, through Burleigh's advice, who is more parsimonious even than Elizabeth herself.

Sept. 23d.—Elizabeth did change her mind twenty times yesterday as to which dress she should wear to Greenwich Fair. She did finally wear her dark blue kirtle, and over it her royal mantle of scarlet, lined with white fur. She rode behind her master of horse, I followed close, and sometimes the people did gather around the Queen to look upon her and touch her robe so thickly that we could not move forward, and were almost suffocused. The earl beat back the crowd with his whip till Elizabeth did graciously exclaim: "Prythee, my lord, take heed that you hurt not my loving people. Pray, my lord, do not hurt any of my loving people." But when he did desist, and she was again surrounded so that she might not move, she said to him in a low voice, "Cut them again, my lord, cut them again."

The fair was of great interest. To show their thankfulness at the honor of the royal presence, the people displayed many strange and wonderful things, and presented memorials at every step. On one stage they did have seven looms, actively doing divers kinds of work, such as the weaving of worsted, the weaving of crape, and many other manufactures.

At one end of the stage stood eight small women-children spinning worsted yarn, and at the other end stood as many more knitting of worsted hose; and in the midst a pretty boy stood forth and stayed her Majesty's progress with an address in verse, declaring that "in this small show our city's wealth is seen," etc. The weavers are from Norwich, and the last verse of the address did say:

"God's peace and thine we hold and prosper well;
Of every mouth the hands the charges save.
Thus through thy help and power divine,
Does Norwich live, whose hearts and goods are thine."

Elizabeth was greatly pleased with this show, and did stop and examine the works of these small women-children most carefully. She is ever kind to the common people and feeble like a mother to them. Would she were only as kind to her poor maids of honor! Of all the other things we saw at the fair I may not write now, for I am ordered to attend Elizabeth in her walk, and though it raineth dismally, she will surely go, and I shall ruin my new mantle. Perhaps Essex will walk with us this morning, and I may get word with him. He did give me a lovely brooch at the fair, and I must wear it, that he may see how it pleaseth me.

Sept. 30th.—Alas! alas! I may never write in my book again. For this week I have served Elizabeth at table, and have been the taster. It seems that she conceiveth I have misbehaved, and hath complained bitterly to Mr. Fenton. He is my friend, and hath sent Sir John Harrington to tell me of the great wrath of the Queen. She declares that I have refused to bear her mantle when she walked in the garden (which I confess is the truth, for I had my own to hold up, and Mistress Bridges could serve her as well as not); then she saith that I have given her unseemly answers when she has rebuked me, and have refused to bear her cup of grace during dinner in the Privy Chamber, and do not attend her at prayers. She swore that she would no longer show me countenance, but dismiss me "for an ungracious, flouting wench!"

Sir John advises me to be more dutiful, and not to absent myself from prayers and meals, to bear her mantle and to wait on her more than all her servants; also to go first to her chamber of any of the maids, and try in every way to win back favor. He says I must not detain my lord Essex in conversation, but rather shun his company, and be less careful in attiring myself, which Elizabeth doth imagine is done to attract the earl rather than to gain her own good will.

Indeed I little thought myself so far out of favor, and shall earnestly endeavor, by diligence and service, to win it back. Though life at court be hard, I should die to be sent away in disgrace. I dare write no more in this book, so will hide it away forever.

THE COPPER-BEECH.

WHEN, in the flowering Maytime, the restless maples have shaken
Down from their swaying branches a rustling carpet of crimson, Quickly each leaf-bud unrolls, its emerald treasures revealing.
Side by side with the maples the feathery elms are unfolding;
Delicate green are their plumelets, in the clear sunlight translucent;
Birches with slender branches, glossy and rich and low bending,
Brush rudely the long flowing tresses of willows forever a-weeping.
Out from the light-tinted maples, out from the paly-green birches,
Out from the willow and ash, stand the dark copper-beeches, so sombre—
Sombre and dark and gloomy—a cloud on the face of the morning,

Save when the sunlight strikes them, the miracle old reproducing—
Kindling a bush unconsumed, with every branch brightly burning!
Dark and rich are its robes; yet strangely its mantle of purple
Shows in the fresh-blooming spring-time—a garment befitting the autumn.
Has it forgotten the time? Or is it, like some of earth's pilgrims,
Doomed to a life with no spring-time—a life without even a summer?
Does its past hold some dark deed of midnight, to which alone it bore witness,
With shame for the treacherous act deep blushing forever and ever?
Blow gently, ye breezes of spring, ye breezes of summer and autumn!
Wave softly the garments of purple, whose secret is hid in its bosom!

THE HOUSEHOLD—EASY SOUPS.

WHY is it that so many people think it a hard matter to have soup for dinner, and why is it that those who have the most available material for this purpose often use it the least? Now, if you are rich enough to have an experienced cook, she will either know how to make a certain number of good soups, or she will scorn any simple methods you may suggest to her; but, if you are not rich—have perhaps one girl, who is only a good plain cook—there is every hope for you to begin most dinners with a tasty and nourishing soup. It has been said that a plateful of soup makes a warm place in the stomach for the dinner proper, and that digestion is much aided thereby. This may be so or not; but it is only claimed now that it is good to have soup for dinner, and that it is easy to have it, too. For example, you need not go to your butcher's and spend fifty or sixty cents for a beef-bone or a knuckle of veal. Don't you have roast beef once a week—say a rib-roast, two or three ribs? When you have had your one, two or three meals from this, take the bones remaining—crack them if you can, leave them as they are if you can't—and put them over the fire with say two quarts of boiling water. Now you need not take a big iron pot for this. It is heavy to lift, and your material does not require it. Some particular housekeepers will exclaim with horror, when I say, use a large tin saucepan or skillet. Cover this, and just let those bones cook all day, replenishing with hot water as it boils away. "You cannot have your soup till to-morrow." You ought not to have it till to-morrow. The last thing at night pour off the liquor, and throw away the bones. If you wish, strain the soup, which is now what is called stock; but it will not be very bad if you don't, for most of what is undesirable will either sink to the bottom or form a cake of fat on top.

Now, from these few bones please make the following: A rice purée, a vegetable soup, a tomato soup, a potato soup—almost anything except a clear soup. It all depends upon what you put into it. Have in the house always a bottle of celery-salt, some bay leaves and whole cloves. Five cents' worth of bay leaves, to be bought at a druggist's, will last a dozen years. Into perhaps a quart or more of soup-stock, having removed the cake of fat from the top, put, one hour before dinner, half an onion sliced and three tablespoonfuls of well-washed rice. Let this boil gently. A few minutes before dinner add a saltspoonful of celery-salt, pepper and salt to taste. Chop a little fresh parsley fine, and put into the tureen. It will not flavor much, but will look pretty. A little here means a teaspoonful when chopped. The rice meantime has boiled itself into a thickish substance, forming what is called a purée. The color of your purée will be whitish, and its taste will be good. Try it. For a vegetable soup, chop fine one medium-sized carrot, half a turnip, one large onion; add a small bay leaf and one clove, and boil with as little water as possible for one hour. If you have any cooked or uncooked tomatoes, add a few spoonfuls. Let the soup-stock come to a boil, skim, and put in the vegetables. Thicken slightly with two tablespoonfuls of corn starch or flour, and your soup is done. For a tomato soup, take the quart of stock and let half an onion and half a can of tomatoes boil together for three-quarters of an hour. Strain, add a teaspoonful of sugar, salt and pepper, one cup of milk, and, if the stock is not very rich, a small bit of butter. Thicken with about two tablespoonfuls of flour, rubbed to a smooth paste with a little cold water or milk.

For potato soup, or purée rather, boil five medium-sized potatoes and one onion together until the potatoes are ready to fall to pieces. Drain well, sprinkle with salt. Have the stock hot, skimmed. Then rub the potatoes through a collander into the hot stock, and to make it smoother stir in one or two tablespoonfuls of flour, blended smoothly in a little cold water as in the tomato soup. Add pepper and a teaspoonful of chopped parsley.

I have spoken so far only of beef bones. A leg of mutton will furnish just as much material in the way of bones as the beef. Then there are the beefsteak and veal cutlet bones, small ones, to be sure, but just put them on the fire in a small skillet, and they will be the nucleus of another soup, or give enough more for another plateful. The quantity given here is intended for a family of four. With a larger family, of course there will be more bones, therefore more soup possible. Neither is it claimed that one can make a dinner of these soups. They are simply a relish—a preliminary to the dinner, and it is hoped have been presented in such a way as to seem easy to make.

OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

"PLEASE tell me in the correspondents' column how to clean the flagee on silverware which cannot be reached by a cloth.—Mrs. W. A. M., Chicago, Ill."

"Pearline," which is a powder sold by the box, directions for the use of which accompany it, will clean flagee, which must be dipped in or allowed to lie for a time, and then dried as thoroughly and carefully as possible.

"I HAVE heard of 'jellies that would not jell,' but in that regard have no trouble myself, so would like to give my recipe for the benefit of those who suffer. For currant jelly, squeeze the freshly-picked fruit; add to a pint of juice a pound of sugar. Put juice in preserving-kettle to boil, and at the same time put required amount of sugar in the oven in large dishes, that it may be thoroughly heated, but not upon any account let brown. When juice has boiled twenty minutes, remove to a cooler part of stove, and stir in hot sugar until melted, and then pour into glasses as quickly as possible, or it will be jelly and hard to manage. It is well to have the glasses on a wet table-cloth, doubled many times, not allowing the glasses to touch; then the jelly can be poured in boiling hot without danger to glasses. I have tried this recipe for years—always with success. It is so little trouble, requiring no standing over a hot stove. The jelly has just the taste of the fresh currant, is also just the color, and will keep any length of time with paper covers over glasses. By following this recipe, one can have jelly as much of a success as 'Grandmother's' spoken of some weeks since in THE CONTINENT.

K. H. C., Baltimore."

"THE HOUSEHOLD,' THE CONTINENT: Your 'Letter from Mrs. Blossom,' in THE CONTINENT, for March 28, expressed my thoughts on the subject in consideration to a nicety. One more thinking woman coincides with Mrs. B. Could the 'Household Department' of Judge Tourgée's admirable magazine be instrumental in abolishing the 'sawdust-box nuisance' in America, many of Columbia's daughters would be only too grateful.

"ERNESTINE."

The above correspondence explains itself, and we give place to both letters with the calm dispassionateness which distinguishes the "Household" editor.

"THERE is a remedy for rats which does not poison the entire family. If directions are strictly followed in the use of a rat exterminator—by name, 'Rough on Rats,'—it will work. I have tried it, and experienced safe and satisfactory results.'—E. E. B., in THE CONTINENT, March 7th.

"KILLING HIS WIFE WITH RAT POISON.—COLUMBIA, S. C., Feb. 26.—A horrible murder was perpetrated in Chesterfield County on Saturday night. About a year ago E. J. Terrey, a farmer, married a worthy young woman, but has since fallen in love with another woman. As the divorce laws in this state have been abolished, Terrey resorted to a surer and quicker plan to make himself a free man. He purchased a box of 'Rough on Rats,' which he mixed with a quantity of whisky. On Saturday night, his wife being unwell, he gave her a drink of the mixture, and then fled. On Sunday morning the neighbors found Mrs. Terrey in bed dead.'—From the New York Tribune, March 2d.

"It seems E. J. T. has tried it, too, and 'experienced satisfactory results,' as it did not 'poison the entire family,' but the wife only. 'Rough on Rats' is arsenic, in proportion, say in a twenty-five cent box, of two cents' worth of powdered arsenic, colored, to twenty-three cents of newspaper advertising.

Our Premiums.

THE history of our Premiums, Nos. 8 and 9 (see double-sheet advertisement), has been very singular. They were suggested to us by the numerous inquiries for Judge Tourgée's works in connection with THE CONTINENT. Having control of his own works, the proprietor of the magazine concluded to put them at cost. This he was enabled to do by foregoing his own profits, as author, on the volumes of his works. By these means he was enabled to put the works to his subscribers at a lower rate than a jobber could procure them by the ten thousand volumes. It was not supposed at the time that the demand for them would be very considerable, and they were regarded as a sort of make-weight in the list of premiums of which we could very truly say that so much value was never offered for so little money to every subscriber. In this, however, we were disappointed. Wherever one of these premiums went there was sure to be a call for another. The demand was so great as to exhaust our supply, and several of the books had to be reprinted. To our very great surprise, more than 5000 of our premiums were called for in the month of March. Rather than disappoint our patrons we put forth extraordinary exertions to renew our stock. At present rates we have enough to last about a month, and to avoid any misunderstanding, we give fair notice that our list of premiums will expire on the first day of July. We shall not feel ourselves bound to supply orders for any of the premiums on our list mailed after that date. We wish also to say that we will not send Nos. 8 and 9 by mail except at the risk of the subscriber, and upon prepayment of postage. The premiums are put at the lowest possible rate, and we cannot pay freight in addition. If parties choose to take the risk of delivery, we will send by mail, on receipt of 40 cents for No. 8, and 70 cents for No. 9. Otherwise we will send by express at the subscriber's expense.

A Few Words on Irish Affairs.

"CAN you refer me to any clear, dispassionate statement of the Irish question?" The inquiry comes to us from one of the leading physicians of the country. He says he has not time to study the matter in detail, gathering his facts from isolated sources, but wishes some complete philosophical statement of the question at issue between the Irish people and the English Government. Our friend is not singular in his desire for such a work. The American mind is fully satisfied that Ireland represents many centuries of folly and injustice. It is clearly convinced that the present issue between the people of Ireland and the Government of Great Britain is the logical outcome of ages of bad government. There is no more foundation for the idea that Ireland cannot be made prosperous and contented than there was for Dr. Johnson's prejudice against Scotland. Coming to this country, when they once recover from the nightmare of ignorance and reach our average of intelligence, there is no more vigorous and successful element in our American life than the Irish. It is no question of the capacity of the Irish people for peace or self-government. It cannot be doubted by any sound-minded man that, had its government in the past been equally well adapted to the character of the people, Ireland would now have been as peaceful and prosperous as England. In other words, the evils under which Ireland suffers and which England periodically confronts with a fussy determination to put aside, are the result of misgovernment. This much is generally admitted, and our best American thought has gone farther and decided that it is the duty of the people of this country, as one of the great commonwealths of nations, to give the moral influence of their civilization toward the amelioration of the condition of the Irish people. For half a century the United States has contributed yearly immense sums to the support of the Irish people. Not only have we received year by year thousands upon thousands of the most impoverished and most degraded of her peasantry, but hardly a brother or sister, son or daughter, has come to our shores who has not remitted a part of his earnings yearly to the "ould counthry" for the aid of some needy kinsfolk that remained behind. A country that, with these advantages, still grows poorer and more squalid every year, it is pretty safe to conclude, is not only a victim of past misgovernment but also of present incapacity. Most thoughtful Americans, we venture to assert, have arrived at these two conclusions: the past misgovernment of Ireland is the cause of her present evils, and her present misgovernment is likely to continue them. These conclusions, however, have not been arrived at from any clear, comprehensive, dispassionate review of the past or statement of the present that has been given us by those calling themselves the friends of Ireland. Of impassioned protest and vehement denunciation there has been no lack. Of eloquent expostulation and angry threatening there has been more than enough; but if there has been written any work that can give to the American a fair idea of the present state of the Irish people and of the past conditions from which it sprang, we do not know it. Like our correspondent, we have long desired just such a work. We have wished for one that would define and delineate for us the Ireland of to-day—not the work of a mere reporter, who sees only what his eyes behold, but of one who can read between the lines, see beneath the surface, and show how to-day was evolved from many yesterdays. During the past three years, despite all the declamation and excitement of the struggle, no work worthy of such a crisis has been produced. Yet it is only by such a work that the relief that is desired can be obtained. After all that may be said, it is the English people who rule England and are, in fact, the English Government. To them the appeal must be made. The manhood of England must be made ashamed to stand by wrong. The appeal must be put in such a form that every one may clearly apprehend the evil, and the remedy must not be in support of any preconceived notion. What is needed by Ireland now, so far as the sympathy of the world is concerned, is not conspiracy nor dynamite, nor any form of war against England, but a clear and comprehensive statement of its ills, in order that the universal mind may consider of the remedy, and urge the English people on to its adoption.

THERE is evidently too much truth in the oft-repeated assertion of the Land Leaguers, that the present Land act is a farce. Yet it must be confessed that it was a great way for the British Government to go. It is a very radical measure, and by its interference with vested rights overturns perhaps more of the traditions of the common law than any legislative measure ever before enacted. The simple admission that the government can and will, under proper circumstances, interfere between landlord and tenant, remit a portion of the rent, and compel the acceptance of a price not the result of contract, is one that may well startle the student of English law. But that this doctrine should be affirmed by a British Parliament, representing the governing classes of a nation in which only little better than one in a thousand owns land in fee—a country in which the farmer, properly so styled, has become almost extinct by the absorption of the land by large estates—seems altogether incredible. So far as the system of land-tenure is a cause of evil in Ireland, it is the source of like evil in England. Indeed, it is probable that the middle and lower classes of the English land-workers have been more endamaged in pounds and shillings by the exactions of the land-holding class than Ireland herself. The evil has not been so acute, and the oppressed classes have been better able to secure temporary relief by emigration. Nevertheless, the evil is the same in character, and the ultimate danger the same. Already it is asserted by careful statisticians that one in every sixteen of the inhabitants of Great Britain is a pauper—at least a recipient of some form of public charity. The interference with the prescriptive right of the landlord in Ireland is only the entering wedge. What is done, no matter how languidly and indifferently, in Ireland to-day, must ere long be done thoroughly and effectually in England. That this principle, lying at the very root of all English jurisprudence, should have been overthrown and discarded in the attempt to relieve Ireland should, at least, teach the Irish people that brains are more effectual for their cause than bombs or bludgeons.

OUT of the present conflict between the Irish people and the English government have arisen two questions, which are likely to be of serious interest to us as Americans. The demand for the extradition of Sheridan and Tynan as accomplices in the Phoenix Park murders, raises questions which will not be decided without serious consideration by our government. While no one of any fair pretensions to decency or humanity can regard the murderous ravings of such fomenters of assassination as Rossa and Most with anything but horror, and while there is no doubt a growing tendency in the minds of our people toward the belief that a man ought not to be allowed to utter such infamous doctrines in any country; yet it must not be forgotten that England has herself always drawn the line between political crimes and those of a private character. The case of the Orsini bombs has often been cited as one in point. Almost a hundred lives were destroyed by them. There was no doubt that they were manufactured in London, and with the express purpose of being used for assassination; yet the British government refused to surrender accomplices of the assassins. It may be that her hatred for the Napoleonic dynasty had something to do with it, and it is certain that there was no extradition treaty to compel her to do otherwise. At the same time it must be remembered that political offenses are expressly excepted from our own extradition treaty. While the indictment is for murder, and not for treason, we must remember that it was a murder purely political in its animus. The revolt in Ireland is just as positive a fact as if the malcontents were under arms. So far as this offense is concerned the civilized world condemns it, and, for the time, there is little doubt that the public sentiment would fully approve the extradition. It is worthy of careful consideration, however, whether there is not under it a principle which it would be hazardous to abandon, even for the satisfaction of seeing such reckless scoundrels as the dynamite plotters hanged. Just at this time, too, it is a matter of some gratification to call to mind the fact that the British flag was made the cover for the most infamous and notorious conspiracies against our government during the war of rebellion. Canada was the rendezvous of the Confederate agents, who sought to weaken our armies in the field by organizing rebellion in their rear.

NOTHING shows the intimate relations between this country and England in a more striking manner than the fact that the present controversy between the mother country and Ireland seems altogether likely to become an important factor in our national politics. For many years the free-trade organizations of England have been accustomed to interfere in American politics, by the circulation of free-trade pamphlets, and, in many instances no doubt, by furnishing money to secure the election of candidates favorable to their interests. It has been freely charged that this course has been habitually pursued when the chances of success were at all reasonable. As to the distribution of such documents, there can be no real objection to it beyond the mere impropriety of the citizens of one country meddling in the affairs of another. It is very much the same as the American Land Leaguers furnishing money to secure the election of Land League candidates, or scattering Irish pamphlets broadcast through England. Now, however, English interest in free trade seems likely to have a very different influence upon our politics. Hitherto a large portion of the vote of that party most favorably disposed toward free trade has come from Irish-Americans. There is good reason to believe that a great part of this vote is now inclined in favor of a tariff that shall be almost proscriptive of English manufactures—not from any sudden change of heart as to our national polity, but from a desire to cripple English prosperity. This phase of international politics is a new and interesting one. There is no doubt that the Irish vote—which is first of all things Irish—in several states represents the balance of power, and it is quite within the range of possibility that we shall see an almost entire reorganization of parties effected by a desire to compel England to yield to the demands of Ireland.

THE "Twilight Club" of New York is a new exponent of the tendency of the over-worked business men of our cities to seek recreation by some form of co-operative association. In the ordinary acceptance of the term it can hardly be called a club. It has nothing in the nature of a lounging-house, a restaurant, reading-room, billiard-room, smoking-room or drinking-rooms, that are inseparable from the imported club idea as it has taken root and developed with us. The one feature of club life—that which it most vaunts itself upon, too—is really almost lost sight of in ordinary clubs. The man who does not play billiards or drink wine—who prefers to smoke at home, and has on his own library table all the periodical literature he has time to read—has really very little to gain from club life except the mere privilege of being reported as one of the members of the "Age," the "Haut Ton" or the "Tip Top," or whatever may be the name of the club to which he may be attached. As a restaurant it offers as good an opportunity as any other for him to get a breakfast or a luncheon, except that it is usually more inconveniently situated. As a rule, the man of brains who is a worker in any specific field is only a club man for the reason that Tom Owen gave for enlisting as a volunteer—"not for fame, not for fun, nor for patriotism, but just for the big of the thing." Of real rest, the club usually affords the worker who does not wish to take it on a billiard-table the very minimum amount obtainable for the money he expends. He helps to pay the interest on a palace, support a French caterer, pay for esthetic furniture, keep up a magnificently-bound and little-used library, and perhaps passes as many hours of unsatisfactory leisure within its walls as it costs him dollars every year. The really clubbable men, the thinkers and workers, can only afford this luxury by a self-sacrifice that it is painful to contemplate. Such a thing as a club at which a man of moderate means may pass a pleasant evening with others of like circumstances and inclination, without feeling that he is doing violence to his own sense of duty to those dependent on him, is at least very rare in our modern city life. This want is one that the "Twilight Club" is an attempt to supply. How it may succeed is yet a problem. The movement is certainly radical in its character, the club being dedicated to "the new gospel of relaxation," and laying down its platform in the following quaint formula:

OBJECTS.—To cultivate intellectual good-fellowship, and to enjoy rational recreation.

EXPENSES.—Each member pays for his own dinner.

PRINCIPLES.—No constitution; no by-laws; no president; no dues; no initiation fees; no salaries; no debts or pecuniary obligations; no defalcations; no watering stock; no decamping treasurer; no cliques; no duelling; no scandal; no profanity; no late hours; no excess in drinking; no puns; no gush; no lengthy speeches; no "papers"; no "high ideal"; no "grand reform"; in short—no red tape; no formality; no humbug.

PROGRAMME.—A dinner, without wine, at 6 o'clock, sharp, $1.00; interspersed with music, recitations, and ten-minute practical shop-talks by members.

INVITATIONS.—Members may invite friends to attend any dinner upon at least one day's written notice to the Secretary.

It is simply a company of intellectual workers who come together at an early hour, without the formality of full dress, sit down to a good toothsome dinner (served for a dollar apiece without wine), and when it is over spend an hour or two in short impromptu speeches upon some subject of which each one has specific knowledge. At a recent meeting the general subject was "the effect of Democracy upon individualism." Each one was expected to illustrate from his own standpoint some phase of this general idea. There were men of all professions present, and without any previous preparation or seeming effort each one gave from his own experience, or from the work of his own profession, something bearing more or less remotely on the subject. It was a most restful exhilaration that pervaded the gathering. Men of great wealth and men of very moderate means sat side by side, all giving and receiving equal recreation and advantage. The club at each meeting invites a few guests, so that there is always an element of freshness and variety, as well as the general feeling of good-fellowship that invests the gathering with its genial glow. The results of this movement will be watched with interest by all our tired brain-workers. If it shall be that its originators have devised a form of club-life to which a man may belong who is not a millionaire, which will give the advantages of intellectual fellowship to those who most need them, they will have deserved more of their age than many more pretentious reformers.

APROPOS of this subject we hazard the inquiry, why should not this system of securing social intercourse and relaxation, at a reasonable expense, be applied to families as well? Very few thinkers and workers can afford to be entertainers. Until a man of moderate means becomes eminent enough to be in some sort a lion, he has little chance of enjoying what we to-day call society. Even then he is likely to receive such left-handed compliments as that which a leading New York journal lately bestowed upon Oliver Wendell Holmes. "To have been invited," said this journal, "to dine with Mrs. B. should amply have satisfied his ambition." If Mrs. B. had been an intellectual star of great brilliancy this extravagance might have been pardonable; but if Mrs. B. had not been the representative of several million dollars, it would not have been made. The truth is, the necessities of our modern life are such that the bulk of our best people live almost without society. There is no half-way house between the call and the dinner of ceremony, of the reception or party, the preparation for which is a matter of terror to the household economist. The Twilight Club is really only a weekly picnic. Why not extend it and let it include the wives and daughters and sons? In our great cities there is to-day an absolute dearth of healthy society for people of moderate means. The American is, first of all things, proud. He knows that he is a king, and if he cannot do things in a royal way, he will not do them at all. Why not remand our present formal social displays to their proper sphere, and let little groups of families band together for pleasant weekly or monthly reunions at some pleasant place of public entertainment, each paying for his own dinner, and being at once host and guest? One of the pleasantest gatherings we have ever attended was a family party of twenty or thirty, who went from Philadelphia to Gloucester to a dinner of "planked shad" at a public house. There was wit, hilarity and unrestrained social intercourse. The cost was trivial and evenly divided. No one was oppressed with the consciousness that he could not afford it, and it left a green spot in every one's memory. Why should not just such a coterie of friends unite to give a dozen such receptions every winter, each inviting one or two guests, and bringing their families into close, healthy, honorable association without embarrassment or obligation to any one. A ball or a dinner at Delmonico's is good form for the highest society. Why should not co-operative social clubs take advantage of a similar method of securing unrestrained intercourse and rational recreation?

It would be difficult just now to find any one who is not more or less interested in the passenger lists of outgoing European steamers. If one is not going in person he or she at least has friends who are going, and there is a certain satisfaction in seeing their names misspelled in the papers. People talk nowadays of the pleasures and miseries of ocean voyages—by steam, of course—and Mr. John Burroughs recently published such a charming essay on the subject in The Century that the privileged few of his readers who have made the same voyage under sail, in a real ship, driven by the forces of nature—not by a mighty tea-kettle over a fierce volcano, manned by real "sailors," not by stokers and waiters—could not but regret that the author was as yet a stranger to such an experience. The writer of this paragraph is only a landsman, but he loves and longs for the sea, and has twice crossed the North Atlantic through the "roaring forties" in November. He can truly say, that after several experiences of the ocean under steam, he vastly prefers the older and more leisurely method. There are comfortable old-liners still afloat, although their ancient glory has departed.—A word to the wise is sufficient.

It is funny enough to hear an able-bodied "Reformer" like Mr. Wolfe bewailing the fact that he and his fellows have been used by the Democrats of Pennsylvania to pull chestnuts out of the fire for the delectation of the Democracy. Did Mr. Wolfe suppose that "ye hungry Democracie" aforesaid intended to give the chestnuts to him and his fellows?

THE legislature of the Empire State has been wrestling with various propositions designed to increase and improve the water supply of New York. Philadelphia has just gotten over its annual controversy as to whether clean water or sewage is most conducive to health, and has concluded to experiment a while longer with the sewage.

THE habit of daily washing the steps and pavement is so universal in Philadelphia that strangers, who only hear it laughed about, generally suppose it to be a very cleanly city. On the contrary, it is not many removes from the filthiest in the world, and will probably remain so until a pestilence comes and makes funerals too fashionable to be forgotten.

THE CONTINENT is not responsible for Mr. Joaquin Miller's rendering of Job xxviii, 1, in his charming account of "Idahho," and the derivative meaning of its musical name. The revised version of the Old Testament will shortly be published, and, in the meanwhile, independence is permissible in the matter of translation and comment thereon.

GOVERNOR BUTLER seems to have a decided penchant for Herculean jobs of cleaning up. For the first time in its history New Orleans was thoroughly cleaned under his administration. Lately he has grappled the Tewksbury Almshouse.

WITH the publication of the letters and memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle, Mr. Froude has finished what must before this have presented itself to him as a thankless task; and when we consider the results we are forced to admit that it seems altogether an unnecessary one. Left to his own judgment, he has seen fit to lay bare before the world the private life of Mr. and Mrs. Carlyle, and the reputation of his dead friends must pay the penalty.

When Mr. Froude remarks that there "ought to be no mystery about Carlyle," he doubtless strikes the keynote on which he has proceeded in the whole matter. It is a bitter irony of fate that has warped Carlyle's saying that "human portraits faithfully drawn are of all pictures the welcomest on human walls," into any recognition that such livid photographs as are given by the "Reminiscences" and by these letters are to be desired. These are not "portraits;" they are not drawn, either faithfully or otherwise; they are at best but negatives, from which we must evolve our pictures with greater or less fidelity, as we know little or much of men.

"To be honestly forgotten" Carlyle might indeed have considered an enviable destiny; to have himself thus brought to the hopeless level of the commonplace could hardly have entered into his anticipations. It is no credit to our civilization that this revelation is not more deplored; that what would be legitimate interest in the methods of work, the habits of mind, of a great thinker, such as Carlyle undoubtedly was, has degenerated into a vapid curiosity as to the private relations with his wife, and the question whether or not the life of a charming woman was miserably sacrificed to a selfish churl. Her letters may be supposed to hold the solution of this problem, and in this their value lies. The eclipse from which Mrs. Carlyle suffered in life has followed her after death, and all admiration or blame for her is bound to go into the scale against or for her husband. Indeed, Carlyle himself, with unconscious egotism, starts with us at the outset. The letters, which comprise only those written after their removal to Chelsea, are introduced by a most characteristic note, in which he recalls his own wretchedness at the time, suffering from the heat and the torture of a stiff hat, which he remembers he wore in compliance with fashion.

The altogether unlovely aspect in which he appeared in the "Reminiscences" at first sight does not seem appre-ciably toned down by these letters. But if we accept their internal evidence we are bound to acknowledge that there must have been a side he does not display in his own writings, either in the "Reminiscences" or his notes to these letters. There has been a deal of sympathy expended upon the woman who gave up wealth and social prestige to toil in poverty and loneliness for a man far beneath her in station; but here is no proof that such sympathy was needed. Human nature is alike the world over. That these two have been brought into prominence does not alter the fact that they were instigated by the same motives, possessed of the same faults and the same virtues as the rest of mankind. Jane Welsh Carlyle, viewed alone as the self-sacrificing wife of a man by no means gently bred, selfish by nature, the victim of a frightful temper, aggravated by the torments of dyspepsia in its worst form, seems little short of a martyr, who deserves sainthood for her loyalty and toil; but when we test her virtues by those of other wives we find that, though beautiful, they are, fortunately, not rare; all women are the same; given the duty to perform and the love to strengthen the heart and the hand, and toil is no burden, privation no evil. Judged in this light, Mrs. Carlyle is presented to us in these letters as a woman who chose her own path and found her happiness in it. There is no room for us to doubt but that she felt her own "Scotch thrift" a much more respectable possession than wealth.

Carlyle's ill humor she could make a subject for jest upon occasion, a good proof that it was not an unbearable crop. After that weary time at Craigenpultock she could still write merrily. "Indeed, I continue quite content with my bargain; I could wish him a little less yellow and a little more peaceable, that is all." The many letters to Carlyle are too full of apt, witty and personal allusions to which he supplies the key, not to make it evident that their intercourse was unusually pleasant and intimate. She did not hesitate to "chaff" him upon his ill temper or upon his want of foresight or of common sense; and if his harshness grieved her she told him of it with the greatest tenderness, as he himself records. It is quite evident that his letters to her must have been as loving and kind as hers to him; and Miss Jewsbury's assertion that she lived without any evidences of affection from him seems disproved by a letter from him to his mother in 1835. She writes: "I have only him, only him in the whole wide world to love me, poor little wretch that I am. Not but that numbers of people love me, after their fashion, far better than I deserve; but then his fashion is so different from all others, and seems alone to suit the crotchety creature that I am;" and we have a pleasant picture of Carlyle giving to her and her mother each a sovereign from the gold earned by his first lecture "to buy something with as handsel of this novelty." This was in trying times for them; they were very poor, their money was "most gone," and this thoughtful act on Carlyle's part has a significance we should not overlook. Her constant endeavor to shield him from anxiety about her when they were apart is good proof that such anxiety was felt, and that he was never really unmindful of her, though, with a blind selfishness, he suffered her to undergo hardships often really needless.

The misery and unhappiness of their married life appears to have been confined to the period when Mrs. Carlyle resented his constant visits to Bath House and became bitterly jealous of Lady Ashburton. Of this Carlyle has not a word to say; his moans and self-reproaches are expended upon things which really never disturbed her serenity. Extracts from her diary, these partly chosen by Mr. Froude, who adds a few explanations carefully dividing his blame between the two, and some additional words of Miss Jewsbury, who was Mrs. Carlyle's confidante, are all we have to base our judgment upon. If the evidence of the letters before and after this period of estrangement is any indication of Mrs. Carlyle's feelings, this question of neglecting his wife for Lady Ashburton's society is the only one to be made against his treatment of her. But Mr. Froude does not leave a pleasant impression with his remark that "his displeasure rushed into expressions not easily forgotten." Knowing the power of Carlyle's English, one is likely to try the imagination to find what "expressions" he visited upon the poor, jealous little wife.

The only acknowledgment we have from Carlyle that any such trouble ever existed is Mr. Froude's record of a remark of Carlyle that he had "cared for her through all that unhappy time, but she never knew it."

The diary is a sad record. Nothing could be more touching than her pathetic little entry, "I have learnt to suffer 'all to myself.' From 'only childless' to that is a far and a rough road to travel." This arouses a pity that the assurance of Miss Jewsbury that "any other wife would have laughed at Mr. Carlyle's bewitchment with Lady Ashburton" fails to lessen. But in justice to the husband we must look on the other side. The society at Bath House was just what Carlyle needed. Without some human stimulant he could not carry on his work. It was not in his nature to understand his wife's feelings. He regarded his work and his own mental state as his paramount interests. We may well believe him ignorant of any such power for suffering as his wife possessed, and it is hardly credible that Miss Jewsbury's remark that he "lingered in the primrose path of dalliance for the sake of a great lady," is literally true.

It is impossible to deprecate too much the publication of this diary, or the bringing up of this question by Mr. Froude. It is evident that the estrangement was only temporary, and that Mrs. Carlyle, upon the death of Lady Ashburton, regained her old feeling of content, and again lavished upon him the affection she had never lost. Her conduct affords a curious subject for study. For the first time in their married life she looked at him as he really was. She despised his selfishness, though he was not one whit more selfish than before. She did not spare her disdain nor her satire. For that time in his life Carlyle probably had the plain, unvarnished truth told him about his own deficiencies, an experience no man cares to go through, and no man less likely to be pleased with than he; but no sooner does Lady Ashburton die than she becomes again as oblivious of his faults and shortcomings as she was before the estrangement occurred, and in the piteous letters written during her sickness it is evident she clung to him as to none other in the world. Faithful, tender, loyal wife; unselfish in giving, but humanly demanding her own in return.

The letters must prove disappointing to those who have expected to learn from them anything of any wider interest than this. They have, it is true, a charm of their own. Their literary excellence is great; they are delightful records of every-day life. But we find little in them to inform us about her actual self; the little they show us makes us feel that her opinions and feelings were a reflex of his. It is amusing to read her charge "that Emerson had no ideas (save mad ones) he had not got from Carlyle," and her assertion that she "should be surprised and grieved to find Carlyle sentimentalizing over a pack of black brutes" (the negroes in Jamaica), indicates that her whole mental tone took its color from him. There is the same sharp comment upon the peculiarities of their friends that we find in his own "Reminiscences," and how much of mutual sympathy they may have had, there was no charity for the weaknesses of others.

With all their brightness and vivacity there is in these letters little of thought, of speculation or of ennobling sentiment, such as we might expect from such a woman to her husband; and we are forced to conclude that two volumes of purely personal matters, headaches, dyspepsia, servants, dog, birds and house-cleaning are not calculated to create any great enthusiasm regarding Carlyle's wife or himself.

"DEMOCRACY" is still in favor abroad as a historical estimate of American politics and politicians, and is now running in a French translation, a German one having already appeared.

MRS. FRANCES ELEANOR TROLLOPE shows the family capacity for continuous work, and has her usual new novel in press, the title being after the Walter Besant order—"Like Ships Upon the Sea."

THE beautiful Riverside edition of Hawthorne's works, published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., has reached the eighth volume, twelve comprising the set, and no finer workmanship has ever been given for the same money, the volumes being but $2.00 each.

THE publication of translations of three of Luther's principal works is to celebrate his fourth centenary in England, the titles being: "Christian Liberty," "The Babylonian Captivity of the Church," and the "Address to the Nobility of the German Nation."

No autograph is so rare as that of Moliere. The longest is but six lines long, being a receipt for money. One genuine and interesting signature, on Corneille's "Imitatio Christi," was cut off with the fly-leaf and lost by a country bookbinder. An example is said to have been bought for a few cents in America.

AMONG the numerous "studies" in biography now before the public, nothing is more enjoyable than the "Study of Maria Edgeworth," by Mrs. Oliver, soon to have longer notice in our columns, and worthy a permanent place as a delightful record of quite as delightful a woman. (12mo, pp. 571, $2.25; Cupples, Upham & Co., Boston).

MR. HENRY JAMES is hereafter to be enrolled as one of the regular critics of the Century corps, essays on Anthony Trollope and Alphonse Daudet following the one on the Emerson-Carlyle correspondence in the June number. To many Mr. James' critical work is of more interest and value than his stories, his trained ability showing here to the utmost advantage.

DR. D. G. BRINTON is preparing and will soon publish in his "Library of Aboriginal Literature" "The Iroquois Book of Rites," giving the original text with a literal translation, notes, glossary and introduction. The original book, which is more than a century old, is written partly in the Mohawk and partly in the Onondaga languages, and comprises the speeches, songs and ceremonial order of the United Nations. This volume will be ready in June.

REFERENCE books, more and more a necessity to the student, are to have a very desirable addition in the shape of "Folk Etymology," by the Rev. A. S. Palmer. In it Mr. Palmer gives the results of his study of the influence upon the language of the use and misuse of words, the work being done in a compact yet exhaustive manner, and likely to prove of great use to both the literary man and the careful reader.

THE many readers who have learned to prize the sweetness and devotion in the work of Frances Ridley Havergal, will welcome a volume in which several of her smaller books have been incorporated. She is both an impressive and an inspiring writer, and has become the friend and comforter of thousands who have been soothed and uplifted by her tender yet genial thought. (Square 16mo, pp. 564, $1.00; A. D. F. Randolph & Co.,

THE John W. Lovell Co. has issued Professor Ernest Haeckel's "India and Ceylon" in its cheap form, one of the best printed and most convenient in size of all the cheap "libraries." Professor Haeckel is Professor of Zoology at the University of Jena, and belongs to the Darwinian school, being one of the first German scholars who followed his lead. The field gone over in the book is an almost unknown one, and the translation by Mrs. Boggs, though very free, gives the spirit of the original excellently. (Paper, pp. 174, 20 cents).

"FANCHETTE," the latest Round Robin story, is preposterous, but then it is also amusing, and one can forgive improbabilities and impossibilities when their putting is vivacious and breezy. The ends of the earth meet together, and naturally, for much of the scene is in Washington; and a Russian prince, an American East Indian rajah, the owner of a Virginia plantation, an indefinite series of nouveaux riches, a popular actress and various newspaper men work together and separately in a series of plots and counter-plots, which in the end untangle. As a work of art the book has no place, but it will amuse the reader heartily and thoroughly, and that is much. (16mo, pp. 369, $1.00; James R. Osgood & Co., Boston).

A RECENT tourist describes Olney, Cowper's old home, as changing very little with time. Its long street of old houses, still looking fresh, because built of calcareous stone, though some bear the date of two centuries, has one unvarying aspect of dullness, if not of gloom. The tall red-brick house in which Cowper wrote "The Task" stands in a roomy angle of the street, towering most unpicturesquely above its neighbors. It is now divided into three separate tenements. The place and its associations are very little changed since the days when the postman's horn was heard as he came over the long bridge, "news from all nations lumbering at his back." Weston Underwood, the seat of the poet's friends, the Throckmortons, has lately been sold by the present baronet, who has two other estates. The old mansion was long since razed.

Books about books are multiplying swiftly, but the three little ones lately published by F. Leypoldt, whose Literary News is a standard authority as to current literature, are worthy the attention of all readers. "Libraries and Readers" (16mo, pp. 136, 50 cents), by William E. Foster, Librarian of the Providence Public Library, is, as its title indicates, devoted to the subject of how to read and how to use a library and books in general. "Libraries and Schools" (16mo, pp. 126, 50 cents) covers the same ground in its bearings on younger readers, and is made up of various addresses selected by Samuel S. Green, Librarian of the Worcester Free Public Library; while "Books for the Young" is a list prepared by Miss C. M. Hewins, of the Hartford Library, which will be found of great use to both parents and teachers. (25 cents).

A LETTER from Mr. S. C. Hall appears in the Spectator in relation to the English edition of Emerson's poems. "When Emerson was last in England, in 1873, he spent his last evening with me before sailing for Boston. When in my library, he asked me if I had an English edition of his 'May Poems,' as he said he had been asked whatever the one on 'Brahma' could mean, to which he replied, 'Call it 'Jehovah' and perhaps you will understand it better.' But another friend had said to him that it seemed only nonsense! I found the poem for him, and, on looking it over, he exclaimed: 'Well might they call it nonsense! Not only is the word "not" omitted in the third line (as you pointed out), but in the seventh line they have printed "vanquished," instead of "vanished," which, of course, spoils the whole meaning of the poem.' I have always admired this poem, as clearly giving the Brahmin belief that each soul is part of the Divinity, and hope this correction will help to make it more clear."

THE reader to whom the novel of the day has become a weariness to the flesh, and whose mental palate has tested flavors so steadily that, as with the tea-tasters, there is temporary paralysis, will find a tonic in the forty-second number of the International Scientific Series powerful enough to insure a reading of the volume, even if everything else be set aside. "Ants, Bees and Wasps" is an old story to the public, any book counting as "old" which has been out a year; but this "Record of Observations on the Habits of the Social Hymenoptera," is as fresh and vivid as it must continue to be for an indefinite time to come. Sir John Lubbock's patient and enthusiastic labor is supplemented by the ability to give the result of those labors in a style that is as charming as the stories he tells; and there is small excuse for not finding the books of our greatest English scientist more attractive than anything fiction has to offer. The readers of THE CONTINENT have already had a suggestion of the enjoyment to be found here, in Dr. McCook's valuable papers printed in the first volume, and the testimonies of both observers agree. On the whole, ants are superior in many points to man, whose strength, speed and endurance are all far less in proportion than that of these "curiously knowledgeable beasties," as Carlyle put it, while their methods with intoxicated ants offer a solution of the temperance problem that man may eventually find it best to imitate. (12mo, pp. 448, $1.50; D. Appleton & Co., New York).

ESSENTIALLY uncomfortable and disagreeable as is the atmosphere of Daudet's latest novel, "L'Evangeliste," it contains two very powerfully-drawn characters. In Jeanne Antheman, the president of the Evangelist ladies, more familiar to us as members of the Salvation Army, we have the best example of a modern fanatic. She has suffered, and believes it right that all should suffer. Human claims sink into nothingness before those of God, and she separates parent from child with the composure of a familiar of the Inquisition. The organization is represented as having something of the same power, and every act of its members is known and recorded. Eline Ebsen, the devoted daughter of a poor Danish widow, falls under Madame Antheman's spell, and, though repelled at first, finally yields, and after a six months' novitiate goes out into the world as a preacher. The mother in vain pleads with her to return, and is left heart-broken and helpless. The only gleam of light in the sad story comes from Pastor Aussondon, who has risen from the post of a simple Swiss pastor to that of the most popular preacher in Paris. He believes Madame Antheman's religion to be morbid and false, but she is the richest and most powerful member of his congregation, and he dreads to denounce her, or even seek to convince the Ebsens of her mistakes. At last he suddenly rises to the emergency, and the scene in which he repels Madame Antheman from the communion is one of the most powerful in modern fiction. Of course he is deposed and leaves his church defeated, but all the sympathy is with him and the gentle old wife, who remains his faithful co-worker and sympathizer. The book is a brilliant one, but will hardly result in any practical benefit. (16mo, paper, pp. 304, 75 cents; T. B. Peterson & Brothers).

The following rules will govern correspondence designed for this department, and readers are cordially invited to contribute either questions or answers, always bearing in mind the fact that, while a score of communications may be received, only one can ordinarily be published:

- 1—Letters designed for it should be distinctly marked with an interrogation point above the address upon the envelope in which they are sent.
- 2—The full name and address of the writer must accompany each inquiry; not for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith.
- 3—Each inquiry must be written on a separate piece of paper.
- 4—In answering inquiries always refer to the number of the query, and not to the number or page of the magazine.
- 5—Answers may be by members of the editorial staff or from other sources, in which latter case the initials, name or nom de plume of the author will be affixed.
- 6—Under answers the bracketed figures refer to the number of the original question.

Answers.

1—[1] Why cannot the Government of the United States be sued for debt? has provoked numerous and interesting replies. We can give only a few of them, and these not always in full.

C. M. E., of Weedsport, N. Y., gives an answer, which, for lawyer-like brevity and clearness, can hardly be excelled.

"Perhaps," he says, "this extract from the decisions of our highest court may be found a satisfactory answer:

'Rapallo, J., in People v. Dennison, 84, New York Court of Appeals Reports, pages 272-281, says: "While the government may, through its courts, enforce its claims against its citizens, this right is not reciprocal, and the government cannot be sued except by its own express permission. This is a universal principle applicable to every sovereignty, and often recognized in the courts of the United States. The right of a debtor of the United States Government, when sued by it, to interpose a counter-claim, or counter-credit, even to the extent necessary to protect himself against the claim of the government, is conceded in all the cases to rest upon the provisions of the act of March 3, 1797, sections 3 and 4, which require that such counter-credits be first submitted to the proper accounting officers. No action can be sustained against the government except by its own express consent under some statute allowing it.'" (11 How. 290.)

"Lex Brevis" sends us from Keokuk, Iowa, this answer:

"The theory of the English law, from which we got the large body of our American jurisprudence, is that the King is the source of all justice. Originally this was true in fact. The King heard the disputes in person, and dealt out justice between the parties. It is true now in theory under our government. All the sovereignty of the King of England was transferred to the state. It is thought to be inconsistent with the dignity of the state to allow itself to be sued. There are no means of enforcing a judgment against the United States. The proper mode for prosecuting a claim against the sovereign power is by petition, and not by demand, believing that justice will always be done by the state when it ought to be. Common law actions were commenced in the name of the King, and if he withheld his consent a party could not bring his suit. And it was not supposed that even a state would allow itself to be sued. The United States may at option become a party to a suit."

C. W. M., of Indianapolis, Ind., takes a contrary view, and says:

"The United States Government can be sued for debt. That was the purpose for which the Court of Claims was organized. Individual states cannot, nor, prior to 1855, could the National Government, the reason given being that for a citizen to sue the state would endanger its sovereignty. It is unreasonable—so the lawyers say—that a citizen should be able to coerce a sovereign. The old legal maxim is, 'The King can do no wrong.' See the case in Allen's (Massachusetts) Reports, Vol. II, p. 162, for an interesting discussion of the rule."

With this view W. B. K., of Washington City, coincides, and cites Section 1059, Revised Statutes of the United States, to the effect that the Court of Claims is given jurisdiction to hear and determine "all claims founded upon any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of an Executive Department, or upon any contract, expressed or implied, with the Government of the United States, and all claims which may be referred to it by either House of Congress."

This would seem, to the layman, at first sight to be a case where doctors disagree. Yet it is not. In no proper sense of the word can the Government or any state of the Union be sued. The proceeding in the Court of Claims lacks one vital element of a suit, to wit, the power to enforce the judgment rendered. It is, in effect, a commission which the sovereign has established to hear petitions against itself, and determine what sum ought to be allowed in satisfaction of their claims. Whether this sum will be allowed depends, even then, upon the gracious will and favor of the Government.

Perhaps it might not be uninteresting to summarize the reasons why a sovereign state cannot be sued, even by its own consent:

- 1—"Law is a rule of action prescribed by a superior."

The sovereign has no superior.

- 2—The king can do no wrong, because he is above the law, being its source, and there can be no wrong but by its violation.

- 3—The writ runs in the name of the sovereign, and is supported by his power. It would be absurd for the sovereign to call himself into court to answer for violation of his own law under penalty prescribed by himself.

- 4—There is no power to enforce judgment. The state compels the individual to obey the judgment of its courts; it cannot compel itself. The judgment of the court is the will of the sovereign, and consequently cannot be made use of to coerce the sovereign.

Claims may be prosecuted before the Court of Claims to determine the amount which, in some cases, may be paid out of appropriations already made, and, in other cases, the finding of the Court is merely recommendatory to the legislative branch of the Government. In both cases the recovery is of grace, and not of right.

2—[9] (a) "SENEX" is informed that the sentence of Andrew Low, junior, the material part of which is copied by him in his quotation, can be found in printed form in the "New Haven Colonial Records, Vol. I (1642-1658)," published in 1858 by Charles J. Hoadley, State Librarian of Connecticut. If "Senex" desires farther information as to Andrew Low, junior, I shall be pleased to place him in communication with a friend well advised as to the early settlers of this city and their history, who can give him particulars, as shown by the records, as to the career of the young man, which culminated in the sentence quoted.

New Haven, Conn., April 29, 1883.

H. G.

(b) "SENEX" will find the facts which he relates in "Barber's History and Antiquities of New Haven," published in 1870, on page 80. The planters of New Haven Colony had no written or printed code of laws. They took the Bible as their standard of faith and practice, and its "authority" was enough for them. Misdemeanors were punished by their views of justice and propriety, and they applied the rod to the fool's back with unction, as per authority.

Respectfully,
Glencoe, Minn., April 22, 1883. H. WADSWORTH.

IN Number 60 of THE CONTINENT, a correspondent complains of the use of the "gaudy, smutty-faced" sunflower in church decoration, and shows by such complaints that, however well versed in "esthetics" she may be, she is very ignorant in the matter of Christian symbolism. The use of the sunflower as a religious symbol is very old, and very far antedates the esthetic craze—indeed, unless my memory fails me, it owes its name to the idea involved in its use in churches. It is said to keep its face always turned to the sun, and thus was deemed typical of the enlightened soul, which always has its face turned to the Sun of Righteousness. Your correspondent need not go to England for an example of its use in church decoration. St. Clement's Church, in this city, has its roof decorated very beautifully with the sunflower, and it was used there for the same purpose as it was used in the English church—its symbolical teaching.

Questions.

18—PLEASE publish an account of the process of raising silkworms, their habits, etc.

R. E. B.

It would take too much space. Write to the American Silk Culturists' Association, Philadelphia.

19—WHAT is the origin of the phrase, "Pouring oil on troubled waters," or its equivalent?

20—WHAT are the real facts regarding the birthplace of the Torvaldsen referred to as an "Icelandic Sculptor," in No. 12, Vol. II, of THE CONTINENT?

G. F.
Walla Walla, W. T.

Answers are in order stating the rival claims of land and water.

21—WHO is the real author of the poem beginning:

"There is no death! the stars go down
To rise upon a fairer shore."

It has been attributed to Edward Bulwer Lytton, "Howard Glyndon" (L. C. R. Searing, née Redden), "Three Stars," etc.

H. A. L.

22—PLEASE state through THE CONTINENT who precedes the other in the case of a lady and gentleman going up a flight of stairs, and also who precedes in descending, according to the latest etiquette.

W.

This question is received in one form or another, with such alarming frequency, that it is a hopeless task to answer it every time and in all its different phases. In brief, the gentleman should always stand aside to let the lady lead the way. It is her privilege, however, to indicate her wish in the matter, and at a sign from her the gentleman should at once take the lead.

23—WILL you please inform your readers what the "O Grab Me Act" of American history is? I have consulted several college faculties and historical works, and obtained no satisfactory answer.

Yours sincerely,

WM. J. MORAN.

Do you mean the Embargo Act?

24—As you sometimes take the allowable liberty of amending the faulty verses of your poetical contributors, I cannot help wondering that you should have permitted that very creditable piece, "One Man and One Woman," to go into print with such a line as this:

"Uplift at times toward the peaks," a line which cannot be read rhythmically without a barbarous mispronunciation of the preposition toward. Since this word, in poetry especially, is often pronounced as a monosyllable, a slight transposition and a change (which the sense really requires) in the form of one word, will rectify both the rhythm and the grammar, thus:

"At times uplifted toward the peaks."

Hoping you will not regard this as either pedantic or impertinent, but rather as the result of a laudable desire on my part to render a quid pro quo, I remain,

Yours very truly,

Cresco, Iowa.

C. S. PERCIVAL.

Thanks! the criticism is good. One who bears the name of Percival is entitled to a hearing in matters poetic, but perhaps if you had to "tinker" as many verses as the editor does, and usually to receive an indignant protest from the author, you would not make unauthorized changes when you could conscientiously avoid them.

25—WILL some one inform me by what right the officials of the penitentiaries of the country deprive the inmates of their cells of the use of their lawful names, and require them to be designated by numbers only?

G. P. H.

26—IN "Migma" recently, in a paragraph headed "The Dark Horse of 1880," the phrase, "manual avocations," is used. The words do not and cannot be made to mean the same thing. It is a shame that a magazine like THE CONTINENT should lend itself to such a misuse of words. The Times, Herald, Tribune, Post all do it. But do not you!

H. G. F. W.

New York.

We beg H. G. F. W.'s pardon, and even at this late date withdraw the superfluous "a," which was somehow overlooked; but is he not a little sweeping in his strictures in this particular instance? Usage, which justifies almost anything in English, largely sustains this use of the word avocation. Still, the other is the better word, and should have been used.

27—ARE there any examples from American authors of the complete rhymed "Sestina" besides the one by H. C. Faulkner published in No. 60 of THE CONTINENT?

N.

28—WILL you please tell me the meaning of "Migma?" I have looked in the dictionary and inquired of my most learned friend, but all in vain.

PITTSBURG.

This is one of the regular CONTINENTAL questions. For a full answer see No. 42 of THE CONTINENT, or any Greek dictionary.

29—WHAT surgical operation is supposed to be in process of performance in the engraving of Eakin's portrait of Dr. Gross, published in THE CONTINENT of January 17?

SEVERAL READERS.

In order to be perfectly sure of our ground a note of inquiry was addressed to Dr. Gross, and called forth the following reply:

DEAR SIR: The operation referred to in your letter of yesterday was performed for the removal of a diseased thigh bone, seldom a bloody procedure, although so represented by the artist in my picture. Very respectfully,

S. D. GROSS.

REFERENCE CALENDAR.

April 6.—An official report published from Lieutenant Raymond P. Rogers on the state of the De Lesseps Panama Canal. Mr. Rogers inspected the whole line of works under orders from Admiral Cooper, of the North Atlantic Squadron. He believes that company is working in good faith to carry out the project, and that the canal can be finished, or at least put in working order, for the sum called for by the estimates, namely, $120,000,000. He thinks, however, that the expenses will exceed this sum, and that the work will not be actually completed until after 1888, the year contemplated by the contract.

April 9.—A bill was introduced in the English House of Commons relating to explosives, and assigning a penalty of imprisonment for life for maliciously causing an explosion by which life or property is imperilled. The mere keeping of explosives under suspicious circumstances is punishable by imprisonment for twenty years, and all accessories to these crimes are to be treated as principals. The bill was passed at once, confirmed by the House of Lords on April 10th, and at once signed by the Queen—unprecedentedly quick work for a British Parliament. Sir William Harcourt was the mover of the bill.

April 11.—The new Postmaster-General, Walter P. Gresham, took the oath of office, and at once entered upon his duties. One of his first acts was to approve the design for the new two-cent postage stamp, which will take the place of the three-cent stamp for postage after October 1st.—A bill to prohibit the manufacture and sale of infernal machines and devices for the destruction of life and property was introduced into the Pennsylvania Senate.

Rear-Admiral Edward Middleton, U. S. N., died in Washington.—General William Browne, late Assistant Secretary of State of the Southern Confederacy during the rebellion, died in Athens, Georgia.

May 1.—The new Civil Service rules were published. They provide that the general examinations for admission to the public service shall be limited to the following subjects: 1. Penmanship, orthography, copying, letter-writing. 2. Arithmetic, fundamental rules, fractions and percentage. 3. Interest, discount, and elements of book-keeping and of accounts. 4. Elements of the geography, history and government of the United States. Competitive examinations, of a suitable character to test the fitness of persons for promotion in the service, are also provided for.

May 4.—On Friday, United States officers seized a large quantity of letters in two private post-offices for the distribution of city letters and circulars in New York. These offices do a large business by delivering letters at a rate less than regular postage. This is held to be contrary to law, and it has been decided to suppress them.

May 5.—Major Phipps, extradited from Canada on the 13th inst., was convicted of forgery.

LOGICAL.

Master.—“What made your cousin stay so late last night?”
 Servant.—“Faith, sur, he wus afeared to go home, sur.”
 Master.—“Why didn't he go home earlier in the evening, then?”
 Servant.—“Shure an' it wusn't till it wus late that he wus afeared!”

“Uncle Ike's Roosters.”

Las' Sunday I was settin' 'pon de bench beside de do',
 An' feelin' sort o' chilly, kase de sun was gittin' low,
 An' wishin' dat de winter time wa'nt comin' on so fas'—
 For I pintly hates de cuttin' ob a Janewary blas'—
 An' thinkin' dat to-morrer I would git sum light wood in An' stack it in de cornder 'fo' de winter should begin.
 I knows de one what's comin', too, is gwine be stingin' cold,
 Kase de 'simmon trees is hangin' jus' as full as dey kin hold,
 De 'possums an' de squir'ls jus' as busy as kin be,
 A-storin' corn an' ches'nuts up for Krismus jubilee.
 De pigs is 'gun der squealin' when de keen win' cut 'em
 so,
 An' de wild geese, like der betters, all is flyin' “westward ho!”
 I was studyin' 'bout dem ar signs, as 'pon de bench I sot,
 When I see my two young roosters come a-struttin' 'cross de lot.
 Dey was showin' off der elegance an' dandifyin' ways,
 Same as me an' my ole mars'r used to do in courtin' days;
 A prinkin' dis 'ere way an' dat, an' watchin' all de while
 To see ef some de ladies wa'nt admirin' der style.
 De maskerlines is all alike whar eber dey is foun';
 Dey all will strut and show dersef when hens is knockin'
 'round.
 One rooster he was black like, wid some red upon he wing,
 Rale ole Virginny game stock, dat kin beat mos' anything.
 T'other one was game, too, ob the very self-same breed;
 Dey was bof de same hen's chickens, an' was raised upon one feed.
 De las' one was de han'somest, he had a golden bres',
 And he nake an' sides were yaller, like Melindy's Sunday
 dres'.
 I know jus' fum de minute dem two roosters come in sight
 Dat bof of 'em was longin' an' a-spilin' for a fight.
 Dey had'nt been to public school, nor larnt to read, you see,
 Nor hearn as how sweet bredderen mus' dwell in unity.
 So dey crowed at one anudder, an' dey wall up bof der eyes,

Jus' de same as politicians when de 'cite-ment 'gins to rise.
 Dey was bristlin' an' a-sparrin' out der in de open space,
 When a big ole 'backer worrum come a trabin' by in haste,
 Like he had a heap o' business for de public on his min',
 Or was runnin' for an office wid his 'ponent close behin'.
 No matter what he business were, dem
 roosters spied him out,
 An' bof pounce down upon him wid a crowin' sort o' shout.
 Der bills hit up togodder 'pon de 'backer
 worrum's back,
 An' dey butt 'gin one anudder wid a mighty yearnest whack.
 Den bof let gode worrum in der anger an'
 surprise,
 An' stared at one anudder wid der fury-flashin' eyes.
 Dey turn de matter over in der min's a little spell,
 (An' de indignation in 'em made dem chickens fairly swell).
 Den dey buckle to de business wid a des'- pret yearnestness,
 Kase dey's fightin' for “a principle,” an'
 boun' to do der bes'.
 Each knowed the worrum was his'n, an'
 de odder was a thief,

An' greedy an' rapacious, too, an' mean beyond belief;
 Each thought de odder's sassiness was past all standin', too,
 (An' den de hens was watchin' for to see de fightin' fru).
 When de eyes o' beauty 'gards 'em den I pintly does persume
 It would take a sorry rooster for to show de snowy plume.
 Dey fit an' fit unt'wel de blood was runnin' from der head,
 An' I thought I better part 'em 'fo' dey kill one 'nudder dead.
 I had jus' got up to do it when I see'd de big black hen
 Jus' a gobblin' up de worrum dat had made de fuss begin.
 I bus' right out a larfin', as I grab dem chickens' leg,
 An' t'un two boxes ober 'em, to cool 'em down a peg.
 It seem so awful foolish like for dem to fight an' squirm,
 An' dat ole hen come walkin' 'long an' gobble up de worm.

THE PIRATE OF THE PIANKATANK.

BY G. R. IFFLING.

AN hundred years ago and more,
The lawless ocean rover,
With black flag floating at the fore,
The southern seas sailed over.

From Mexique's Gulf to Cuba's Isle
That lay, a fair medallion,
Upon the waters to beguile
Rich freighted ship and galleon,
The pirate chief his courses bent
In search of lawful plunder—
(At least 'twas lawful in intent,
If none but foes went under).
But bold Blackbeard, and all his mates,
Have long been under hatches,

Where cruel punishment awaits
Whom e'er the devil catches;
And yet, though gone, those buccaneers
Live in the nation's story,
And unto some their fame appears
Tipt with immortal glory.
And some who live would emulate
Their deeds of lofty daring,
Though shunning every adverse fate—
The profit only sharing.
But most unlike those sea-dogs old,
Who robbed for love of royster,
As well as for their love of gold,
These latter make the oyster
The chosen object of their greed;
And where the beds are thickest—
Where those sweet morsels thrive and feed—
Their prows are turned the quickest.
And men and women plow the main (Virginia's peaceful waters),
Bold men and women without stain—
(Proud Maryland's sons and daughters)

To pillage from each thrifty bed
 The choice sub-aquean treasure,
 To barter, at so much per head,
 Or, may be, sell by measure.
 Though knowing 'twas against the peace
 To thus steal others' profit,
 They 'd not their wild marauding cease
 Though Cameron warned them of it ;
 But brooked the vengeance of the laws,
 As did Blackbeard, the pirate,
 And stole the oysters' bed, because 'Twas cheaper than to hire it.
 But soon, alas ! the doughty chief—
 Virginia's great protector—
 Resolved to bring her foes to grief ;
 And, having played detector,
 To learn what ships were prowling 'round,
 He set his fleet a-sailing
 With such effect that soon the sound
 Of warlike strife and wailing
 Resounded o'er the peaceful shore
 Where luscious bivalves sported
 In muddy depths—a goodly store—
 Though more had been deported.

Rose to his vision, and his lips
 Spoke forth in accents high Unto his crew : " Give up the ships ?
 By jiminy, not I !"
 Then sped the myriad pirate keels ;
 Then boomed the guns of strife ;

Jim Skaggs, of the Piankatank,
 A Rover bold was he—
 A pirate chief—who oft had sank
 His dredge in fathoms three Along Virginia's eastern coast,
 To scoop the oysters in—
 "Lynn Haven Bays" for stew or roast—
 And lawless profit win.
 One morn, when busily engaged,
 As honest men should be,
 Behold, the foe he had enraged
 In war's dread panoply
 Bore down upon the little fleet
 With muskets and with cannon !
 The Dredger thought not of defeat ;
 The Chesapeake and Shannon

Then showed the little craft their heels.
 The foe, endowed with life
 By fire and water, got up steam,
 And sailed and sailed away,
 Until its captain caught a gleam,
 Within a little bay,
 Of one small craft, unmanned, 'tis true—
 The Dancing Mollie named—
 Which, when he saw, he cried : "Mon Dieu !
 I 'll catch her or be—blamed !"
 Then came a sight to thrill the blood
 Of man, or maid, or child ;
 Then came a chase across the flood—
 A chase, to draw it mild,
 That showed how when a woman wills
 She's certain to succeed—
 That when a breeze her canvas fills
 She's bound to take the lead.
 Upon the Dancing Mollie's deck

No man or boy appeared
 As Cameron's steamer at his beck
 Was toward the pirate steered.
 No man or boy; but at the helm
 The oyster pirate's wife
 Stood fast, nor fears could her o'erwhelm.
 She thought not of her life;
 She only prayed for room to tack—
 To get in open water—
 And swore she'd show the foe her back.
 So shrill she called each daughter:
 "Loose the main sheet! Let fly the jib!
 Stand by!" 'Twas done as quick
 As spoken, were her words so glib.

"We'll show 'em yet a trick!"
 Again she cheered. The breezes blew;
 The schooner drew ahead,
 And, manned by petticoated crew,
 Across the waters sped.

Virginia's Gov'nor—where was he,
 That doughty chieftain, then?
 He climbed aloft the prize to see,
 And then climbed down again.
 He saw 'twas useless to contest
 With steam against such arts;
 So sadly his defeat confessed,
 And sailed for other parts.

THE PERVERSITY OF PARTNERS.

BY WILTON BURTON.

"How you comin' on deze days, Marse Jimmie?"
 "Pretty well, Uncle Toby."
 "Looks like you got a powerful sight o' stuff in dis yer sto'."

"Well, yes; we have a large stock of goods—more than we shall ever sell, I'm afraid."

The speakers were a merchant and his former slave. The latter had walked to the back part of the store, and, with the air of one that feels himself a privileged character, had taken a seat unbidden in the best chair by the fire.

The appearance of the store justified the comment. In one corner, by the fireplace, was an island of bacon surrounded by a miniature sea of brine; in the other, a group of syrup-casks, one of which rested horizontally on two billets of wood, and shed its contents, drop by drop, through a leaky faucet into a tin can. Between the fireplace and the ends of the two counters, that ran lengthwise of the room, was a tangled maze of flour-barrels, sugar hogsheads and cracker-boxes, threaded by a narrow footpath that led to the door. The counters were piled high with "domestics," gayly-colored calico and ready-made clothing, so that there was scarcely room for the two broken show-cases, with their display of cigars, neckties, pocket cutlery and pinchbeck jewelry. The shelves were filled to their utmost capacity, and up above the cornice the spiders had woven a net of cobwebs over a long array of dusty crockery and woodenware. Truly, there was a "powerful sight o' stuff" in the store.

For some time Uncle Toby sat silently smoking a clay pipe. Presently the fire made him drowsy, and he fell to nodding. This pastime might have continued indefinitely had not his pipe fallen from his lips to the hearth. The crash aroused him, and he resumed the conversation:

"Seem like to me I ain't never been see no better fire to roas' a tater in dan what dis yer fire is, ef I des had de tater."

"There are some in that barrel—help yourself."

"Thanky, sah."

And Uncle Toby buried a potato in the ashes and put two or three others in his pockets for his wife, "Marthy Ann," he said.

"You ain't got no pardner in yer, is you, Marse Jimmie?"

"Yes; Mr. Humphrey owns a half interest."
 The negro grunted disapprovingly.

"Mr. Rumpless mighty clever man. He gin me a quarter for hol'in' his horse onct. I ain't a-sayin' nothin' agin him, an' I'm hopes you an' him'll git along harmonikle; but ef ever you year tell o' me a-goin' cahoot 'long of a yuther nigger agin, you can make a hen nes' out'n my ole hat."

"Did you ever have a partner, Uncle Toby?"

"Yas, sah, I had a partner onct—a crappin' pardner—an' me an' him couldn't 'gree no ways we could fix it."

"That was bad."

"Hit was bad, but it couldn't be hope, bekase pardners is naicherly de meanes' folks in this newited worl'. But I ain't a 'sputin' but what Mr. Rumpless mighty clever man."

"I suppose you think Mr. Humphrey may be an exception to the rule."

"To be sho'."

"I can't vouch for that; but what did you and your partner disagree about?"

"Well, sah, ef you wants to know all about dat, take a seat and set down in dat cheer, bekase dat tater'll have plenty time to roas' 'fore I git done tellin' you 'bout Sandy Brooks."

"Was that your partner's name?"

"Dem was his entitlements, an' he was a biggity nigger, too. He use more big words dan what deze yere Methodis' circus-riders uses. He think hissef some punkins bekase he could read an' write. He 'low he knowed it all."

"I declar' to gracious, Marse Jimmie, dem cheese smells so good I don't b'lieve I kin tell you 'bout Sandy 'thout I has a slishe of 'em to toas' on de een' o' dis stick."

"Thanky, sah. Deze cheese is good, sho'; but cheese looks sorter lonesome 'cep'n' you has crackers to go 'long wid 'em. Thanky, sah. I always knowed you was de free-handest one o' old master's boys. Ax Marthy Ann ef I didn't tole her so."

"Well, dat Sandy nigger he w'ar sto' cloze, an' he smoke seegyars ever' time he could pick up a ole stump on de groun'."

"In dem days Mr. Waggintire use to keep a sto' in dis yer same town."

"Yes, I remember, McIntyre and Wagner."

"Yas, sah; dem's um, only dey fell out, an' Mr. Wagintire he tuck an' tuck the whole sto' to hissef.

"Well, Mr. Wagintire he had a piece o' lan', an' he rent it to me an' Sandy for the fo'th o' what we could make on it. Sandy had two big stroppin' gals, named Ritter and Suse, which he 'low dey was es good a fiel' han's es Mr. Anybody. He put hissef an' dem in, an' I put in mysef. I was to git de fo'th an' Sandy was to have three fo'ths, bekase he wuk three han's. Mr. Wagintire 'vance for us.

"Twaren't long 'fore I seed Sandy was gwine to git de egwantage o' me. Ever' day he sen' to de sto' atter sump'n ner'er. Marthy Ann 'low we better buy ever'thing we wants, or Sandy 'd git it all. Sandy keep his 'count in a little ole book; but ever' time I buy a dollar worth I make a tolerable long mark on the chimibly wid a fire-coal. Ef it warn't dat much I make a sorter short mark, 'cordin' to de 'mount. I know my 'count was de kereckes'.

"No sooner we start to pitch de crap de fuss begin. I want to plant de long slipe by de branch in cotton, an' Sandy want to plant co'n dar; I want to plant de chaueyberry fiel' in co'n an' taters an' goobers, an' Sandy swar by de pint o' his knife hit got to be plant in cotton. Me an' him 'spute an' 'spute about dat tell Mr. Wagintire had to come an' 'cide 'twix' us. An' he 'cide jes' like Sandy want it, too. Deze yer pardners dey kin always git somebody to 'cide in favor o' dere side.

"Ever' Sat'dy Sandy seem like he jes' 'bleeged to take holiday."

"Didn't you take holiday every Saturday, too?"

"Yas, sah; but don't you see, ever' time Sandy stop three han's stop; when I stop hit was jes' me one.

"When we was layin' by de co'n de sun was powerful hot. I was plowin', an' Sandy an' his two gals was follerin' me wid de hoes. Ever' few minutes Sandy gwine to de branch atter a drink o' water. Den his two gals dey stop an' listen at de peckerwood tappin' on de dead tree tell he come back.

"Atter a while I says, says I, 'Sandy, you must be got de tarryfy fever f'om de way you drinkin' de branch dry.'

"He 'low, 'You ain't got no larnin', nigger. Don't you know water 's a good Sude-er-ritter* for to make you sweat an' keep off de sunstroke?"

"I says, says I, 'Ef you talkin' 'bout Suse an' Ritter, dey look mighty jack-an'-dipper,† leanin' on dey hoe-han's an' de crab grass a growin'.'

"Well, sah, dat nigger like to bust hissef laffin'. I was a great a mine to make a rock zoon by his head, jes' to let him year how it soun'. But I hilt mysef in dat time.

"Atter dat Sandy kick up a rumpus 'bout sump'n nigh ever' day. Dey warn't no livin' in peace wid him. His wife she had to have a han' in de fuss. She 'low my ole 'possum dog suck her aigs. Marthy Ann tuck it up, an' dey had it. When womens gets mix up in a 'spute hits bound to git wuss an' wuss. My ole 'oman 'low I oughter whip Sandy, but I ain't payin' no 'tention to what she sayin', bekase I knows jes' how womens is. Dey always anxious for dey husbands to fight a ner'er man what dey 'spises, but dey don't never tink 'bout ter'er man fightin' back.

"When we went to gether de co'n Sandy says, says he, 'Look yere, I wants to have ever'thing fa'r an' squar now, an' I wants you to onderstand all 'bout it.'"

"I 'low, 'Dat 's all right.'

"Well,' says 'e, 'you know Mr. Wagintire gits one fo'th of ever'thing.'

"I says, says I, 'I knows dat,' says I, 'an' I gits a ner'er fo'th, an' you gits de yuther three fo'ths.'

"Sandy sorter smile to hissef.

"Well,' says 'e, 'de way for us to do when we hauls up de co'n is to put three loads in one pile for me and you, an' one load in a ner'er pile for Mr. Wagintire.'

"I says, says I, 'What de use o' mixin' mine an' yone? Dat jes' be makin' double trouble for nothin'. Let me 'vide dis co'n, an' I 'll 'vide it right.'

"How you gwine 'vide it?' he says, says 'e.

"I says, says I, 'Mr. Wagintire gits a fo'th an' I gits a ner'er fo'th. Ever' time we puts a load on his pile we mus' put a load on my pile. Den all de balance 'll be yone.'

"He says, 'Dat won't do,' says 'e, 'bekase dat er way you 'll git more 'n yo' share. You got to pay part de rent same es me.'

"I says, says I, 'I sees what you up to. You wants to take out Mr. Wagintire's part, an' den you ain't a gwine to give me but de third. But I-se gwine to have my rights ef somebody nose have to be mashed for it.'

"He says, 'Who nose gwine to be mash?' says 'e.

"I 'low, 'I speck you 'll ha' ter furnish de nose.'

"We kep a 'sputin' an' 'sputin'. One word brung on a ner'er, an' atter while Marthy Ann jine in, an' de fus' thing you know me an' Sandy hitched."

"You fought, did you?"

"Yas, sah, we fit—but I speck it 's time for me to be knockin' 'long home. Dis yer tater look like hit's done. I wish you mighty well, Marse Jimmie, an' I 'm hopes you an' Mr. Rumpless 'll git along harmonikle."

"But wait. You haven't told me about the fight. Who got the best of it?"

"Well, sah, Sandy he tuck an' crope up on me an' knock me down wid a 'ax hel', an' den he kick me in de short ribs. Dat was toler'ble hard to take, as you know yo'sef, Marse Jimmie, but I ain't sayin' nothin' tell Marthy Ann run up like she gwine ter 'tar up all creation, an' Sandy call her a ole heifer. Dat sorter 'xcite my riserbles."

"What did you do then?"

"I says, says I, 'Go 'way f'om yer, nigger, bekase you mought make me mad, an' ef I gets mad somebody 'll git hurt.'

"When you argy wid Mr. Rumpless an' try to show him how de bes' way to manidge, he don't knock you down wid a ax' hel', do he?"

"No, but he's as stubborn as a mule, and keeps on buying more goods in spite of my protest."

"Well, dat always de way wid pardners. Dey de contraries' folks I ever see."

"How did you come out dividin' the crop?"

"I come out de leetle en' o' de ho'n. No sooner I git up off 'en de groun' an' bresh my cloze I went to see lawyer King, bekase ever'body gin him de name o' 'bein' a hones' man, what don't know no different 'twixt a cullud gempleman an' a white man. I tole him all 'bout it, same like I done tole you. All de whiles I talkin' he settin' dar scratchin' his year wid his pen handle. Atter I git thu he 'low I couldn't git no more than salt an' batter out'n dat case. I 'low I was atter co'n an' cotton. Salt an' batter wouldn't sassify me.

"When I got back home dar stand Mr. Wagintire. Sandy sont atter him whilst I was gone. He tuck an' 'vide de crap out jes' like Sandy want him to, an' what 's more 'n dat he tuck all my share, bekase, he say, I done trade it all out in de sto'.

* Sudorific.

† Careless, unconcerned.

"Whenever you git a ner'er man to come in an' settle 'twix' you an' yo' pardner de pardner sho' to git it all. Pardners is mos' too 'ceivin' for my use."

"You are about right," said the white man. "At any rate, if I live to see New Year's this store shall be all mine or all Humphrey's, and I don't care which. I am tired of partners."

"Now you heerd me," exclaimed the negro. "You's a talkin' now, and you ain't a was'in no bref. Fur es I 'm concern, pardners kin go 'long Liza Jane."

"Marse Jimmie, you ain't got nar ole pa'r shoes 'roun' yer settin' in de cornder gapin' for bones, is you ?

'Kase ef dey 's too little for me dey 'll 'bout fit Marthy Ann."

"Yes, I believe there 's a pair in the back room you can have."

As Toby passed out with the shoes he said :

"I wish you mighty well, Marse Jimmie, an' I 'm hopes you an' Mr. Rumpless 'll git—"

But he saw that nobody was giving any heed to what he was saying, for Mr. Humphrey had come in, and the two partners were engaged in a heated discussion of some matter of business upon which it was evident they could not agree.

ALL OUT-DOORS.

By E. C. GARDNER, Author of "The House That Jill Built," etc.

HERE is a difference in architectural clients—a great difference and a great choice. Some look upon the architect as a sort of small soulless manufacturing corporation, a machine-shop for turning out plans and specifications for the general market; bound to fill any given order in a purely formal, business way; the lines of whose duty and interest are as simple and definite as those of a milkman or a bank president.

Others accept him for what he really is—or ought to be—a human being with a soul inside his body, full of sympathy and inspired by an ardent wish to help each client to the home just suited to his own peculiar, exceptional and altogether unique conditions and needs; who will not count the lines he draws, the counsels he gives and the opinions he utters at so many shillings apiece, but, like a wise and faithful family physician, will do all in his power to serve and save his patient, whatever becomes of his own fees or his personal interest. Between these two classes of clients there are various grades. The second class are the more interesting and satisfactory—by far the more likely to receive the aid and comfort they desire. Of such clients John was a bright and shining example. The entire confidence with which his wants were made known and the frank assumption that his needs, intentions, emotions and ability were understood and respected, received their sure reward. Whatever he asked in the way of aid, advice or sympathy was promptly granted. His house had been completed several years, and was slowly moving back in the long gallery of pleasant pictures "that hang on memory's wall," when it was suddenly brought into the foreground by a characteristic letter from John himself, which may be given without farther introduction.

"MY DEAR ARCHITECT: You helped me to fight one battle, now I'm ready for another, and want you to enlist. Choose your own rank—orderly sergeant, commander-in-chief or 'high private.' I expect to do all the work and pay all the bills, and I can stand the work a good deal better than I can the bills. You will think me a slow coach when I tell you it has taken me five years to build the house, and it isn't finished yet. But the neighbors think it is, and are beginning to ask why 'John's folks don't fix up a little outside. Folks that have as much taste as John's folks pretend to have shouldn't spend everything on the house and leave the yard to look like a sheep pasture.' It's a mistake about the taste. 'John's folks' never pretend to anything; but in the main the neighbors are right, and that's the worst of it. I never troubles me to have a man call me a thief and a rascal unless he proves it on the spot. Then I resent it.

"I expected to have something left after building the house, but it swallowed up every dime. I couldn't run in debt, so I've been learning to labor and to wait. If I had been as wise at first as I am at last I should have saved one or two hundred dollars somewhere on the house and planted them in the ground around it. They would have brought forth at least thirty-fold, and the place would have been five hundred dollars the better by this time. However, I've got the greenbacks at last, and want you should tell me what to do with them. If you have forgotten how the premises look, come and see; but meanwhile, perhaps you can send me something to be thinking about. Yours,

JOHN."

JOHN'S FIELD-NOTES.

Certainly it would have been better to go and see, for all the verbal descriptions and topographical surveys that can be piled upon an unoffending bit of landscape fail to convey the true spirit of it. One can easily construct an imaginary scene from such data, but this fanciful picture-making is like calling spirits from the vasty deep. It is easy to call, but the real thing never answers the summons. No place or person, however graphically described, ever "looks exactly as we expected." But it was not possible to go and see at the time, and the following reply was accordingly sent to John's appeal:

"DEAR JOHN: It is pleasant to know that you have a few hundred dollars to spend as you please; pleasanter still to find you disposed to invest the funds so wisely. The commercial value of your home, not to mention its added beauty, will surely increase every year in consequence of such a sensible outlay; while, in spite of your tenderest care, its worth would otherwise slowly diminish with age. A most conspicuous and deplorable fault in country and village homes is the custom of ornamenting the houses excessively, while the surrounding grounds, with their various accessories and adjuncts, are left in a condition woefully stale, flat and uninteresting. Undoubtedly the trouble begins with the attempt to secure too much for a given expenditure, and the owner finds, as you did, that every dime of his appropriation is absorbed by the house itself, leaving nothing either for inside or outside furnishing—if happily he escapes a worse fate. When a man, who has barely money enough to build the house he needs, wishes to make his home a bright-looking spot on the face of the earth, and to feel that he is adding to the permanent beauty of the town or village, he should omit every attempt at decoration upon the building, making it merely a protection against the elements, and thus, if there is no other way, reserve a small percentage to invest in his out-of-door surroundings.

"It would be quite within the bounds of truth to say that if one-fourth of the money that is wasted in vain endeavors to make houses themselves ornamental could be wisely applied near the house, but not upon it, the change would be almost beyond belief. After such a transformation, many a man would need to be introduced to his own house, and would be quite bewildered and lost in the strange beauty of his native village. But I remember your aversion to long sermons, and forbear.

"Mahomet cannot go to the mountain; the mountain must, therefore, come to Mahomet—on paper. You must send me a map of the premises. If you cannot afford a surveyor, and do not know how to make the map yourself, I will tell you. First draw on a large sheet of paper—no matter how roughly—a sketch, giving, as nearly as you can guess at it, the shape of your land. Then walk along each side of the lot with your customary stride—don't try to 'pace' it, unless the natural length of your pedal vibration is just thirty-nine and six-tenths inches—and count the steps, marking the number on each straight side of the rough map. Then find the number of steps from the front or rear line of the lot to one corner of the house, of the barn, or any other building, and to all small fixed objects; also from each of the same points to one of the side boundaries, taking, in all cases, the shortest route possible. Lastly, walk around the buildings, counting the steps for each side separately, and record the numbers on your sheet. If the principal angles of the lot are nearly right angles; if the fronts of the buildings are about parallel with the street, and the surface of the land not very uneven, such a memorandum will answer for a beginning. If you will also ascertain how many feet and inches ten of those natural strides carry you, it will leave nothing to be desired in the way of field notes. By-and-by it will be necessary to supplement this map of your premises, and the statement of your own intentions, by a description of what your immediate neighbors have done and propose to do; for, however highly we may value our independence and originality, we cannot ignore our partnership in the universe."

Naturally this led to a second letter from John. It was hoped there would be a convenient delay before it came, and the hope was founded on experience, for it seems to be one of the things impossible to be understood or remembered that any delay in beginning an enterprise, especially building a house, means precisely the same delay in concluding it. The argument seems to be that even if we do lose a little time in starting we can easily "push things" enough to make up for such lost time. The fact that no more pushing is possible after a tardy setting forth than would have been possible if we had set out on time, is ignored. But John was dreadfully prompt. By the very next mail came his second epistle.

"MY DEAR ARCHITECT: There's the maps and here's the explanation: A is the house, B is the barn, C the garden, D the well, and E a fine old white-oak tree that I wouldn't sell for its weight in silver. It is the only reliable and interesting vegetable on the premises, the only one that prospers and bringeth forth fruit in its season. There is a double row of maples along the street, and the remnants of an apple orchard behind the house and near the north line, but neither of them count, for everybody has maples, which seem to belong to the public; and the apple trees are hardly worth the ground they cover. Once in three or four years they groan under their burden of fruit, but when there is an active demand for mince pies and sweet cider they are certain to bear nothing but leaves. It seems almost wicked to cut down a fruit tree, even when it produces nothing but caterpillars and rose-bugs, and I should like to keep a few for conscience' sake, but don't let them interfere with your plan. Everything else on the place is movable.

"The gate is now in the centre of the front line. We drive up near the southeast corner of the house, and thence on toward the barn, which isn't convenient, because, unless we go quite out to that building, there is no chance to turn around without driving over the turf. I am bounded on the south by Mr. Job Smith, on the north by Mrs. Willoughby, east by Main Street, and west by a meadow that will remain a meadow; that is to say, it will not be devoted to 'ornamental' purposes; in fact, it will be used as a pasture after haying, and must be separated from the home lot by a fence of some sort. The ground where the house stands is about four feet higher than the street, descending a little toward the south and rising in the rear. I never graded the surface, which is just as the flood left it, except for the general leveling tendencies of age and agriculture.

"I'm not good at reporting my neighbors' doings, but imagine that Mrs. Smith has aspirations somewhat above those of the 'common herd.' I know the house is very tall and white. The walk to the front door is as 'straight as a string,' paved with bricks—which is reckoned a great extravagance in the country—and bordered in summer by parallel rows of rare and radiant 'house plants.' There are a dozen evergreen trees, that look like solid blocks of wood turned in a lathe and painted green, symmetrically stuck up near the house, and a row of the same sort just inside of the street fence. Spattered over the lawn at regular distances are flowering shrubs, also pruned with great propriety; bunches of dahlias tied to green stakes, and two flaming red flower-pots on a pair of stumps. The last-named articles stand one at each side of the walk, about half way from the house to the street. There is also a tripod of red poles suspending a vermilion iron pot; from all of which you will perceive that Mrs. Smith is 'well up' in the latest styles of out-door art.

"Mrs. Willoughby's house, on the north, is an old one, homely, but good looking. It stands on the topmost of two little terraces, and the yard contains bunches of old-fashioned red peonies, some lilacs and cinnamon roses, green grass and maple trees. The three houses toe the same mark, and face the street squarely.

"My southern neighbor generously built a fence between our domains at his own expense, in order to have it uniform with his other visible boundaries. It is a white picket. Separating my lot from Mrs. Willoughby's is an old tight board fence that must be replaced by something better, and what shall I do for a fence along the street?

"I wear number eleven boots, French heels and box toes. Ten steps carry me just twenty-six feet and three-quarters of an inch inclusive. Is that sufficiently accurate? Yours, JOHN."

SOMEBODY'S SECRET.

SOMEBODY and I, in the moonlight,
Went down where the golden-rods grow;
He told me a beautiful secret,
That nobody ever will know;
For I'll keep it well—
I never will tell
The secret he whispered so low.

He told the sweet story so softly,
It did not e'en waken a bird;
The katydids kept such a chatter,
I do not think they could have heard;
But they'd never tell,
I know very well,
No, not if they knew every word.

The moon and the stars heard the secret,
I know by the smile that they wore;
They winked at each other so slyly,
I'm sure they had heard it before;
But they'll never tell,
I know very well;
They've heard it too often before.

For, 'tis said the story's an old one;
But that I will never confess;
If old, it keeps up with the fashion,
And oftentimes wears a new dress;
And I'll keep it well—
I never will tell
The secret—I'll leave you to guess.

THE GOOSE.

Written by ALFRED TENNYSON.

I KNEW an old wife lean and poor,
Her rags scarce held together;
There strode a stranger to the door,
And it was windy weather.

He held a goose upon his arm,
He utter'd rhyme and reason,
"Here, take the goose, and keep you warm,
It is a stormy season."

She caught the white goose by the leg.
A goose—'twas no great matter.
The goose let fall a golden egg
With cackle and with clatter.

She dropp'd the goose and caught the self,
And ran to tell her neighbors;
And bless'd herself and curs'd herself,
And rested from her labors.

And feeding high, and living soft,
Grew plump and able-bodied;
Until the grave churchwarden doct'd,
The parson smirk'd and nodded.

So sitting, serv'd by man and maid,
She felt her heart grow prouder;
But ah! the more the white goose laid
It clack'd and cackled louder.

It clatter'd here, it chuckl'd there;
It stirr'd the old wife's mettle:
She shift'd in her elbow-chair,
And hur'd the pan and kettle.

PICTURED BY ALFRED HERMAN.

"A quinsy, choke thy cursed note!"
 Then wax'd her anger stronger;
 "Go, take the goose, and wring her throat,
 I will not bear it longer."

Then yelp'd the cur, and yawl'd the cat;
 Ran Gaffer, stumbled Gammer;
 The goose flew this way and flew that,
 And fill'd the house with clamor.

As head and heels upon the floor
 They flounder'd all together,
 There strode a stranger to the door,
 And it was windy weather;

He took the goose upon his arm,
 He utter'd words of scorning:
 "So keep you cold or keep you warm.
 It is a stormy morning."

The wild wind rang from park to plain,
 And round the attics rumbled,
 'Till all the tables danced again,
 And half the chimneys tumbled.

The glass blew in, the fire blew out
 The blast blew hard and harder,
 Her cap blew off, her gown blew up,
 A whirlwind cleared the larder;

And while on all sides breaching loose
 Her household fled the danger,
 Quoth she: "The Devil take the goose,
 And God forget the stranger."

A MISSISSIPPI MARTYR.

BY J. H. WALWORTH.

I.—A MAN-TRAP IS SPRUNG.

"BLAMED if I don't feel just like Job!" said Mr. Silas Dickison, addressing himself suddenly and energetically to Mrs. Silas Dickison.

The flushed face, bristling hair, snapping eyes, and general air of irateness about the speaker so completely excluded all idea of meekness as the parallel between her husband and the man of Uz, that it was quite natural Mrs. Dickison should ask, with wifely solicitude:

"Boily, dear?"

Now, it is a well-established fact in sociology that when a man has reached that pitch of exasperation which requires but one more feathery addition to carry him beyond the limits of possible self-control, he is apt to discover that final feather in whatsoever expression his wife may use to convey sympathy, curiosity or interest. Let her formulate her utterances never so discreetly, they will but act as so much fuel to a fire under certain circumstances.

This is the only solution that can be offered in explanation of the fact that Mr. Dickison's face grew a shade redder, his hair bristled a trifle higher, his eyes snapped with more vicious energy, as he roared:

"Boily! No, madam! By Jove, I have not a drop of boily blood in my veins! Do I look boily? do I walk boily? do I sleep boily?"

"Not at all, dear," Mrs. Dickison hastens to assert in her most soothing tones of apology, "only—"

"Only!" Her husband catches the word in mid-air, like an expert base-baller. "Only it is no trial to a man's patience, I suppose, none at all, to be overflowed ten feet deep; to see his orchards, that he has been half a lifetime bringing to perfection, killed in a week; to hear one day that his carriage-horses have broken through the floor of the coop they're penned up in like bantam chickens, and broken their infernal legs; to hear, the next day, that three of his very best mules are drowned; the day after, that his Alderneys are starving to death on Spanish moss; that his gin-house has been washed away; that wreck and ruin stare him in the face on every side; but next his son, his only son (only sons, you know, are generally regarded as props and stays and comforters, and all that sort of bosh), must try his hand to see what he can do to add to the general peace and comfort of the establishment!"

"What has Lewis done now?" Mrs. Dickison asks with a languid interest born of staleness; for Lewis, his deeds and misdeeds, his sins of omission and commission, his predestination to the gallows or the dogs, were more than thrice-told tales in that family circle.

"Nothing but drowned himself," Mr. Dickison says, with a faint gleam of satisfaction displacing the anger in his eyes.

"Lewis drowned!" three women shriek in chorus. "Our precious boy dead!"

"Not that I know of," says the ogre, who has thrown this bomb into the domestic camp with malice prepense.

"But you said so, father," two girlish voices insist reproachfully, vice Mrs. Dickison, removed, who had left under full head of steam to satisfy her maternal fears by ocular demonstration that Lewis was not drowned.

"Said that Lewis was dead?" Mr. Dickison asks, growing amiably cool in proportion as the feminine element waxed hot.

"Said he was drowned, and—"

"Well, a person need not necessarily remain drowned, need he? Lewis was drowned—fell out of the dug-out into ten feet of water out yonder by the gin-slough. Fortunately Moses and Bob were at the gin getting cotton-seed to feed the calves on, and saw him go down. They pulled to the place as fast as they could, and fished him out, with apparently not a breath of life left in his scampish young body. Oh, that boy! Well, he was brought to old Rachel's cabin as dead as a door-nail, to all appearances. They sent for me to come there quick, and by myself, wanting me, I suppose, to break the sad news to your mother gradually. We worked on him for about two hours, rolling him over, holding him up by the heels, rubbing him with hot flannels, and brought him round at last. He's all right now—all the better, I expect, for the scare he's had. He is sound asleep in his own room, as snug as toast, and I had just come in here to tell your mother about it quietly, when she flew off, as usual, into one of those nervous excitements of hers, which make a calm discussion of any matter almost an impossibility in this house."

Mr. Dickison paused to wipe his forehead with an injured air, and his wide-spread handkerchief veiled from him a glance of mutual understanding and congratulation which passed from Miss Sophie Dickison over to Miss Annie Dickison—two young women in the early flush of beauty, and who, their father was in the habit of declaring, by turns were his torment and delight.

It was warm weather, and the Dickison ladies had all been clustered on the front gallery when Mr. Dickison had disturbed their equanimity by the startling announcement that Lewis was drowned. And a most remarkable-looking front gallery it was, considering that the Dickison mansion was a handsome frame building, capacious and comfortable, with broad galleries front and rear, and that Mrs. Dickison was a notably neat house-keeper. But the flood was at its height, and every house and cabin of slighter elevation than the mansion-house was entirely submerged, so that the broad verandahs and the noble central hall had been dedicated to strange uses. The cooking-stove was on the back gallery, together with all the rest of the kitchen furniture. The hall was appropriated to the storage of barrels, boxes and casks of every imaginable size and description, and on the front gallery was a miscellaneous collection of everything for which no other place could be found. The family barouche reposed in exalted leisure in one corner. Bales of hay and sacks of oats crowded another. Tubs and boxes and pots of such plants and shrubs as were deemed too precious to be yielded to the waters, were standing about in irregular confusion. The Irish setter's kennel had been promoted to this social eminence. Lewis' now useless bicycle impressed its presence disagreeably upon encroaching shins. One hen of foreign extraction, the élite of the poultry-yard, was being permitted to rear her tender and ill-timed progeny as best she could amid such unfamiliar surroundings. And on this gallery all the family took their daily constitutional, finding it more than ever before necessary to be as wise as serpents (in the matter of sinuosity) and as harmless as doves.

It is more than probable that having to wind in and out of such a variety of misplaced articles—meandering between two bales of hay only to bring up suddenly against a big tub with a bigger oleander in it; steering clear of the barouche wheels for the apparent purpose of mashing a baby-chicken to death under his bewildered heels; assuaging his anguished remorse thereat by kicking the Irish setter into the nest of a setting turkey—had resulted in some of the general crookedness of things getting into Mr. Dickison himself; for although quick in temper, he was generally regarded as one of the most thoroughly good-hearted men in the world.

Trading upon this well-established fact, Miss Sophie Dickison now steered her way cautiously among the impedimenta, and seating herself sociably beside him on the bale of hay, where he had thrown himself for refuge, said soothingly, while her designing little hand roved in and out of his thick gray hair:

"Things do look pretty rough just now, papa, don't they? And you say the Alderneys are dying?"

"Fast as poisoned roaches!"

"But Lewis is spared us," Annie sighs demurely, as, with arms crossed patiently over her plump bosom, she promenades in zig-zag fashion toward and from them. "Just to think, that dear child might have been drowned sure enough! He really ought to be in some city, going to school every day. He needs civilized surroundings. A plantation is the last place on earth to rear a boy. Don't you think so, papa?"

"Hang Lewis, he's all right!" Mr. Dickison growls, looking out with a moody brow over the dead, muddy level of the waters.

"Well," says Sophie, cheerfully, "I expect it will eventuate in that. As this is the third effort he has made at drowning, I suppose he is being reserved by Providence for hanging. I feel morally convinced that Lewis is destined to make the name of Dickison famous in some fashion or other."

"Or infamous," Annie suggests.

"He is undoubtedly capable of committing as much rascality in a given space of time as any boy of his limited chances that I ever saw," Mr. Dickison grunted, rising from his seat on the hay to go and measure the depth of the water for the tenth time that morning.

It was evident that the whole family were banded together temporarily in that state of irritation against Lewis which generally succeeds to active but causeless alarm.

"What a pity about the orchard," says Sophie. "Imagine this long hot summer without a particle of fruit. Horrible!"

"Or milk, either, if the cows continue to drop off like poisoned roaches," Annie adds, industriously seconding her sister's best efforts to paint their home life in all its existing hideousness. "In fact, I can't imagine what we are going to live on. There is not a hog nor a sheep left in the country. Poultry of all kinds will be so scarce that no one will kill. They will be saving it all for a fresh start. Gardens all destroyed."

"Plenty of pickled pork left in Cincinnati and St. Louis," Mr. Dickison says, coming back from his water mark, wiping his wet hands on his handkerchief; "you can live on that."

"We can die on it!" Sophie asserts desperately.

"And of course we will be too poor this year to take ice."

"Pretty rough outlook, children, and no mistake."

"Well, sir?" turning with an air of wrathful expectation upon an anxious-looking freedman, who has just paddled his canoe through the front gate over the garden paths and up to the gallery steps.

"I come to tell you, boss, that w'en we went to de mound fur to feed de cattle we found dat de Alderney bull, which we had tied by de lef' hin' leg to a log uv wood, 'cordin' to yo' directions, to keep him from swim min' away, had tangled hisself all up in de rope, and broke his neck a strugglin' to git free."

Mr. Dickison sat suddenly down on a sack of oats and groaned.

"Papa," said both girls in pathetic chorus, "let's move off this horrid plantation. There is nothing but disappointment and misery on it from one year's end to the other. I don't care how hard you work, you are never sure of anything. You are getting old enough now to begin to take your ease. If Lewis don't get killed here he will grow up a disgrace to the family. We'll all die, anyhow," they added logically, "living on pickled pork this summer; no ice, no fruit, no vegetables."

"I'll do it!" Mr. Dickison says hastily, extending a ratifying hand to each conspirator, falling irrevocably into a trap that had been set for him years before.

Thus circumstances played into the hands of the Misses Dickison. And this is how Silas Dickison, at the mature age of sixty-five, came to turn his back on the old plantation and seek the haunts of men, or, as he himself afterwards said more concisely, "played the fool."

II.—LED TO THE STAKE.

A REMOVAL from one habitation to another is airily called "fitting" in Scottish and provincial English—a term which could be but poorly applied to the process of removing the Dickisons. The time, the day, the hour finally arrived for Mr. Silas Dickison to put into execution the rash promise he had made to his daughters under the final culmination of all his woes in the loss of his thousand-dollar bull, and remove his family from their watery surroundings to the dry and breezy bluffs of Memphis.

Secretly he had long since repented of that promise, but he was not the man to stultify himself even in the domestic circle, nor were the Misses Dickison likely to abate one jot or one tittle of their hard-earned advantage over him. The only crumb of comfort he could extract from the situation—and that was simply of an anticipatory character—was in assuring the venturesome element of the household that "they would be sick enough of this tomfoolery before the year was out, and be thankful enough to take shelter in the old nest"—a sentiment he took especial delight in enunciating with every blow of the hammer that drove a fresh nail home in one of a multitude of chests and boxes wherein were stored the Lares and Penates of the Dickison family.

So in the dusk of a chill April evening the Dickisons flitted from the old homestead, that looked drearier than ever in its abandonment to the water and the frogs, to a strip of levee on the river bank, two miles from the residence, to await in patient discomfort the arrival of the steamer on which they had engaged passage. Gloomy, low-hung clouds threatened a heavy downpour at any moment. Over the muddy waste of the waters inside the levee, the forest trees swept their swaying branches with melancholy monotony; ten thousand frogs croaked a chorus of satisfaction at the general humidity of things; outside the levee the river proper (if such an adjective is ever deserved by a river given to such periodical improprieties) rushed by with unabated fury, looking sullen enough under the sombre evening skies, and savagely suggestive of still greater mischief than it had already worked.

In the doubtful light the inanimate collection of trunks, boxes, bundles and baskets that went to make up the "bare necessities" of the flitters, loomed into huge proportions, while the animate collection of malcontents grouped themselves about the smoky fire of driftwood that they had lighted for the double purpose of keeping dry feet and warm hands, if possible, and to insure attention from the longed-for boat.

Seated on a bonnet-trunk, her feet encased in "arctics," and her hands patiently folded on her lap, Mrs. Dickison gazed into watery space with a sort of non-committal expression of countenance. Mrs. Dickison was one of those astute women who manage to figure as martyrs where in reality they are tyrants. If there was one thing above all others that gave a flavor to her existence, it was a legitimate opportunity to say, "I told you so!"

She had told Mr. Dickison so before that thousand-dollar bull had been tied by the left hind leg with such suicidal results. She had told Lewis so before and after his drowning, and in the present crisis of affairs she had managed so skillfully that, in case of success, she was prepared to tell Mr. Dickison so, or of failure, to tell her daughters—the conspirators who had wrought this universal domestic upheaval—the same unpleasant truth.

Lewis, having secured a coigne of vantage on a fallen tree, was straining his eyes through the murky obscurity in order to achieve the triumph of being the first to discover the longed-for head-lights of the boat.

Sophie and Annie stood, with waterproofs clasped tightly around their trim forms, gazing placidly into the driftwood fire, not daring to express by word or look the slightest symptom of hunger, fatigue or impatience, there being a tacit understanding in the family that they were largely responsible for the leap they were all taking in the dark—whether for better or for worse, remaining still to be decided.

Mr. Dickison worked off all superfluous energy by an occasional tour of inspection, extending from Lewis' coigne, at one extremity, to an obscure corner of the luggage pile at the other, where Snap, the Irish setter, lay curled up in mute but agonized protest against such "tomfoolery."

"My dear," says Mr. Dickison, coming back to the driftwood fire from one of these expeditions, "can you figure up for me what five hundred and fifty-five packages will cost at fifty cents a package?"

Mr. Dickison spoke with that placid amiability of voice and mien which he always indulged in toward his wife when he felt morally certain that he held the winning cards in his own hand.

"There is not one thing in that pile, Mr. Dickison, we could possibly do without in a strange place," says Mrs. Dickison, with apparent irrelevance, stooping to adjust a piece of driftwood under her left "arctic."

"I suppose it is a feminine idea of economy to pay fifty cents freight on a thing she could buy new for twenty-five cents."

"Not exactly. But when one has grown used to a thing and tested its quality, and is satisfied with its excellence, one would infinitely prefer holding on to that thing to scampering all over a strange place trying to replace it."

"That accounts for three bundles of feather-beds and a worn-out Turk's-head."

"If we have one useless item of luggage along," says Mrs. Dickison goaded to retaliation, "it is Snap! The idea of taking a dog to a city!"

"That is because the dog is mine, my dear. I don't imagine he will be alone in his glory. My notion of cities is, that they raise a larger crop of dogs than of anything else, only they can't afford to give them all four legs apiece."

"My notion of a city," said Sophie, "is that it is a refuge from the very mention of the word 'crops.' A glorious existence we have led, waiting and watching for crops that never come!"

"Pretty political economist you are! Where would your cities be without the crops? Who makes the prosperity of the merchant but the planter? Talk sense, girl, or don't talk at all. It all starts from the ground. If the planter succeeds, the merchant thrives; if the planter fails, your city folks suffer. You'll find it out to your cost, too."

But Sophie was not prepared for such large generalities, and to be called on to "talk sense" when one is conscious of wet feet, cold hands and a gnawing hunger, is trying in the extreme; so she simply drew her waterproof about her with an air of heroic endurance, and sniffing a little injured sniff, subsided for the evening.

"My notion of a city," says Annie, placing herself in the breach, "is where there is some possibility of leading a rational mental life." (Annie had literary aspirations.) "On the plantation, unless one is a mule or a cotton-bale, one is at a terrible discount."

"My notion of a city," says Mrs. Dickison, somewhat ruefully, "is a place where you have to pay three prices for everything you get; where the meat is always tough, the butter always rancid, the milk always watered, the vegetables always wilted; where no amount of soap and water insures cleanliness; where all the servants are sassy and none to be had that—"

"Where moth and rust doth corrupt and thieves break through and steal," says Sophie solemnly.

"In the name of common sense, if that's your notion, what did you help those girls with every argument under the sun to get me to break up and move to such a purgatory?" Mr. Dickison asks, planting himself, like a modern colossus, dangerously near the driftwood fire.

"I help the girls to argue you into this move, Mr. Dickison! You will please to understand I am in no manner responsible for being on this levee in the wet and the cold and the darkness this night. But I do hope I am not such a selfish wretch as to put my own personal ease against the moral and mental welfare of our children."

"Two hundred and seventy-seven dollars and fifty cents!" came just then in a shrill pipe from Lewis, who tenaciously clung to his distant log, fearful of not being the first to spy out the boat.

"What is the matter with that boy, at any rate, mamma? Has he any sense, do you suppose?" Annie asks anxiously.

"Seems he has enough to figure up what my freight bill is going to be," Mr. Dickison says, with an air of pride in his only son. "When Lewis does speak he generally speaks to the point."

"I see 'er! I see um! I see it!" yells Lewis, ecstatically, announcing the appearance of the boat, with variations on the personal pronoun.

And for the few seconds that intervened between the cry of the look-out and the shrill whistle of their boat to land, there was a mad display of useless activity on that narrow strip of levee that always betrays the rustic traveler.

Mr. Dickison picked up his own private satchel about every half second, only to dump it down again in a damp hollow. Mrs. Dickison bustled feverishly about the luggage pile, convincing herself at the eleventh hour that the very trunk that had all the flannels in it had been left behind. Lewis locked his small, dirty fingers resolutely in Snap's collar, and dragged him along like a policeman in charge of a deep-dyed criminal. Sophie and Annie shivered partly with cold, more with a general sense of nervousness, and looked at each other for moral support. The huge stage descended and the Dickisons were afloat.

III.—"AT HOME."

"God bless my soul! can't I come in yet?"

Mr. Silas Dickison's voice had an injured ring about it, and that emphatic little "yet" intimated that this was by no means his first application for the privilege of resting under his own roof.

After many trials and tribulations the Dickisons had found a house that Mrs. Dickison thought "might possibly be made to do, although it was worth a month's rent to get it cleaned; it certainly must have been occupied by a regiment of pigs;" while Sophie pronounced the rooms "awfully dark," and Annie protested against the "unstylishness" of the street. Lewis thought it was all "just bully," because there was a livery-stable at the corner, and he could enjoy the freedom of it without paying any entrance fee.

As for Mr. Dickison, having assumed the position of a martyr at the outset, he seemed disposed to act in character all the way through. Concerning the advantages and disadvantages of the house, he declared decisively: "Well, you know, it don't make a deuced bit of difference, my dears, whether it's clean or dirty, whether the rooms are light or dark, the street stylish or unstylish, I have taken it on a six-months' lease, and my notes are in bank for the payment thereof; so the sooner you get things in trim the sooner you will begin to enjoy life according to your anticipations. As for me, it's hard work teaching old dogs new tricks. I'm like a fish out of water, but I'll try not to disgrace the family by letting other folks know as much."

The martyr having thus rashly committed them to the house, like wise women as they were, they all prepared to make the best of it.

It was their first day in the new house, and Mr. Dickison had been advised by his wife to keep out of the way until lamp-light, "for his own sake if he had no consideration for anybody else."

"You know, Mr. Dickison," she had said with calm decision, "you are no manner of help when one gets in a tight place, and I am in a tight place now, so I'd so much rather have you out of the way than in it."

And he had gone away from them all early that morning, deriving some comfort from his wife's acknowledgment that she was in a tight place, and he had wandered to and fro through that strange town in the helpless, aimless fashion of a harmless lunatic, only to come back at lamp-light and have his pathetic plea for admittance answered by Sophie with a—

"You can come in, father, if you really want to!" spoken in tones that said distinctly: "But if you know what is good for you, you won't want to."

It was evident the martyr did not know what was good for him, or was rashly determined to tempt his fate, for with suppressed expletives and unsuppressed groans he surmounted a multitude of obstacles to reach the small clearing about Sophie's step-ladder. She was airily perched on the top step, attaching a hanging-basket of dried grasses to the central chandelier. Her father seated himself, with a sigh of relief, on a roll of carpeting at the foot of the ladder.

"Looks quite citified, don't it, papa?" Sophie asks, folding her hands with complaisant satisfaction over her completed job, and looking down into his perturbed countenance with exasperating coolness.

"Very!" says the martyr, glaring savagely about him at the wild confusion of the room.

"Oh, I don't mean everything!" says Sophie comprehensively. "I mean a gas chandelier and those lovely grasses."

"Where's mamma?" asks the martyr, irrelevantly, with a conjugal conviction that his gnawing hunger is likely to go unappeased until he goes to that sharer of all his woes.

"Gracious! I haven't the least idea. This is the parlor, you know, and I've undertaken to fix it up all by myself, and to keep it as my especial department," says his first-born with a sense of liberality in her voice.

"Oh, you have! And Annie?"

"She is somewhere, trying to fix some place for us to sleep in to-night, I believe."

"That sounds comforting, at least."

"Where is Lewis?"

"Lewis! I'd forgotten there was such a creature on earth. We supposed you and he were off somewhere together amusing yourselves."

"Amusing myself! Deuce take me, Sophie, if I don't think you're the coolest specimen of impudence I ever did come across! 'Amusing myself,' in a place where I don't know three men and nobody knows Silas Dickison from a side of sole leather!"

"Amuse yourself looking in the shop-windows!" says Sophie imperturbably, bending over to give one more caressing touch to her grasses.

The martyr was evidently on the eve of a violently explosive retort when Annie rushed into the room hot, flurried, exhausted: "I wish we were every one back where we came from! I don't believe that creature upstairs ever put a bedstead together in all his born-days! There's not a slat to be found that will fit into anything, and the bed-clothes are all in that trunk at the very bottom of the pile! I suppose we shall have to sleep in chairs to-night, or not at all. It was very kind indeed of you, Sophie, to take the parlor off my hands. Anybody can sit on a ladder and stick grass into a hanging-basket," she adds, turning with unreasoning fury upon Sophie, who does look provokingly comfortable in her exaltation on the step-ladder.

"Everybody cannot do it tastefully, dear. For mercy's sake, Annie, don't get excited. It's so common to fuss and fume! I suppose we shall have beds to sleep on, again, some time or other," says Sophie calmly. Sophie prided herself on her imperturbability.

"Where's mamma?" asks Mr. Dickison again, appealing this time to Annie, and with greater pathos; for the prospect of having to sit up in a chair all night had deprived the martyr of his last glimmer of spirit.

"I declare, father, I don't know; I've had my hands full enough without trotting after mamma. I suppose—"

"Mr. Dickison, do you suppose you could possibly be induced to get up from that roll of carpeting long enough to lend a helping hand for at least one second?" asks mamma herself, appearing suddenly through a side-door, the existence of which had been unsuspected up to that moment. "I know you dislike very much to give up your ease, but I am absolutely broken down and have nearly torn the nails off every finger trying to open the bureau-drawers, where all the night-clothes are. If it's not asking too much of you, I wish you would try to open them for me."

Mr. Dickison rose from his roll of carpeting, wondering, as he viewed the chaotic confusion about him, what had so completely broken down two of his family; but he suppressed his curiosity on that point, reserving all his surplus energy for the refractory bureau.

"Is this the drawer?" he asked, preparing for the onslaught by rolling up his sleeves, grasping the knobs with two determined hands, and bracing himself with both feet against the base of the bureau.

"Yes, that's the drawer. I've been working on it for an hour and a half if I've been at it one second."

"You are certain it is unlocked?"

"Of course I am, Mr. Dickison; do you take me for a goose? The drawers are swollen. I know what is the matter—everything swelled down there, where we were just soaked to the marrow with water."

"We didn't swell, my dear, heaven be praised! I could not afford to have you inflated."

"Mr. Dickison, are you going to open that drawer for me or not? If you are, please go about it; if you are not, please just say so, and let me send for a man who will exert himself a little."

Mr. Dickison gave one Samsonian tug at the bureau-drawer, totally without effect, excepting to move the bureau itself about half a foot.

"Blamed if I see what you want with night-gowns," he says, pausing after a second lunge to wipe his dripping brow, "when Annie says there's no beds for anybody to sleep on."

"Annie is not the head of this establishment yet a while, Mr. Dickison. I am going to sleep in bed to-night, like a Christian woman. My bed is already up, and I should like to sleep in a gown, as I have been accustomed to."

Thus brought back to the text, Mr. Dickison began anew his attack on the bureau-drawer, inspired with fresh strength by the knowledge that there was one bedstead up in the house. He pulled it, he punched it, he jerked it, he thumped it, he shook it, he kicked it, only to find himself and the bureau eventually about three feet and a half from their starting-point.

"The blamed thing's locked!" he roared in final wrath and exhaustion.

"It is not locked," Mrs. Dickison says emphatically, watching the martyr's antics with keen interest.

"Well, I am going to unlock it at any rate; so just hand over the keys, if you please."

Mrs. Dickison handed over the keys with an air of resignation to tyranny. Mr. Dickison inserted the one that fitted best, turned it, gave a yell of triumph over the reponsive click, and drew the conquered drawer out with a smooth glide that only served to emphasize the fury of his previous assault. Mr. Dickison smiled triumphantly; Mrs. Dickison smiled sheepishly.

"I was positive I had unlocked it. I am sure I am very much obliged to you, dear."

"I am sure you ought to be."

The distressed look came back on Mrs. Dickison's face as she raised it from an inspection of the conquered drawer.

"Mercy on me, where did I put the night-clothes?"

"You don't mean to tell me all that hard fighting was for nothing?"

"Not exactly. The drawer had been opened, you know. I wish you would open the others for me; it seems so easy to you."

Mr. Dickison smiled grimly at this sarcasm as he attacked the third and fourth drawers, wondering if his wife was cultivating irony as a necessary city qualification. Each drawer in succession was attacked with the same results. It was evident the night-clothes were "nowhere."

His wife's perplexities so worked upon the tender sympathies of the martyr that he said in his most soothing accents:

"Never mind, dearie; we won't want them anyhow until after supper, and then—"

"Supper!" Mrs. Dickison interrupts him to say in the wildest agitation of voice and manner; "you don't mean to tell me that you expect any supper in this house to-night, Mr. Dickison?"

"If not in this house, and to-night, then where and when? In the name of all the furies, where and when?"

"I do think, Mr. Dickison, if ever there was a man born without one grain of reason, you are that man! Why, there's not a stove, nor a kettle, nor a mouthful to eat in the whole house!"

"What am I to do, then?" her husband asks, with the practical assurance of a man who has carried his gastronomic complaints to the only tribunal that has jurisdiction over them.

"Do? Goodness gracious me, Mr. Dickison, that was one comfort I did look forward to in leaving the plantation!"

"What? Starving me to death?"

"Not exactly; but to feel relieved from the responsibility of every mouthful that you put in your mouth. I know there must be eating-houses in this heathenish place."

"Tens and tens of hundreds, my dear."

"And you could have gotten something to eat there, of course."

"Come now, wife, let's have a clear understanding on this point. Am I—"

"Oh, for mercy's sake, don't commence with your 'clear understandings!' They always eventuate in nobody understanding anything at all. By the way, Mr. Dickison, can you tell me where Lewis is?"

"Hanged if I don't begin to think he's like those night-gowns you've been hunting for—nowhere!"

Mrs. Dickison groaned afresh at her accumulating woes.

"Suppose, now, we kill two birds with one stone. Let's all go and hunt for Lewis and something to eat at the same time!"

"Call the girls and get your hats," says the martyr, suddenly clearing up.

This good-natured solution to all their difficulties was inspired in the martyr's breast by the genuine look of fatigue and anxiety that overclouded the homely, gentle face of the wife, who, in spite of everything, was the dearest object on earth to rough Silas Dickison.

IV.—GETTING INTO SOCIETY.

"You know, my dears, country life is not like city life. In the country, people get to knowing each other; in the city, they only become acquainted. In the country, folks get close enough to each other to measure hearts as well as purses; in the city, so long as you prove the purse the heart don't count. In the country, it don't matter if you do hide your light modestly under a bushel measure; if there's any light worth the showing somebody'll find it out and lift the bushel measure off for you; in the city you've got to blow your own trumpet from the house-top if you want it blown at all. In the country, you know pretty well who and what everybody is; in the city, your very next-door neighbor may be a felon or worse and you none the wiser for it." Thus spoke Mrs. Dickison, oracularly.

"I think that is nice," says Sophie, calmly conscious of certain social qualifications and an ability to take broadly liberal views of people and things that her more timid sister could not lay claim to.

"Nice to think that your very next-door neighbor may be a felon or worse, Sophie?" Annie asks, with holy horror in her innocent blue eyes.

"Nice to think that your next-door neighbor is a complete mystery to you, and you are to him. That is one thing I do so adore in city life. It is nobody's business how you spend your time or your money. There is absolutely no privacy in the country."

"Privacy! Goodness gracious, when whole weeks would elapse without ever seeing a soul but ourselves."

"True; but when they do get together in the country what a turning inside out there is! Everybody has to tell all they have been bottling up for weeks. Then there is such a narrow range of subjects—cows and calves, servants and gardens. Why, mamma, I've heard you and Mrs. Saunders talk for one hour straight ahead about a single rose, and your efforts to propagate it, and your failures and your successes, and your hopes and expectations for its future."

"Roses are sweet things to have, Sophie, and safe things to talk about," says Mrs. Dickison, simply. "I only wish I had a garden to potter about in now."

"Why, haven't you? I'm sure those are very nice looking beds in front of this house, if they are a trifle small."

"Them starvelings!" Mrs. Dickison sniffs with scorn, as she vents her contempt ungrammatically against the few rusty lilies, scrubby geraniums and other starvelings that she has been trying to coax into a responsive condition.

"Do you all know what I think?" says Annie, speaking up from her chair under the gas chandelier, and folding up her work, where she has been trying to impose on herself and others with a fiction of industry. "I think it is a foolish piece of extravagance for us to light four burners to that chandelier every night, and the hall jet, too, just to make believe, for the benefit of passers-by, that there's company in here. We've been here two months now, and nobody has found us out yet. It is not at all what I expected of the people here. I am sure no one can doubt our respectability."

"Respectability! Doubt Silas Dickison's respectability!" Mrs. Dickison swells with wifely pride and womanly indignation. Silas was evidently like Cæsar's wife in one respect.

"Mercy, mamma, you can get up an excitement on such very short notice! I really don't believe people are so exacting on the score of our respectability as we fancy they are. If we could convince them that we could entertain as well as be entertained, we would soon have hosts of friends. Of course, it is slow work getting into society in a big place where no one knows anything about you; but we must be patient." Sophie always took the lead when worldly wisdom was to be inculcated.

"Well, I'm getting desperately tired of being patient and seeing nothing but the outside of fine houses and inside of fine stores. I'm sick of the sight of shop windows," Annie honestly confesses.

"You always were a rustic, Annie, and I'm afraid you'll never be anything better. I wonder how people do get to knowing people where they don't know anybody," she adds, in perplexity.

"Let's advertise," says Annie, with rustic humor.

"Advertise! How and what?"

"Wanted—by a respectable family of strangers—a desirable circle of acquaintance. Must come well recommended. No Irish need apply."

"I should say not," says Mrs. Dickison, aroused from an unpremeditated nap she had fallen into by a ripple of girlish laughter. "I wish you could have seen the wretch that did apply this morning. She absolutely had the impudence to come with her whisky-bottle sticking out of her pocket."

"To call?" both girls shriek, with affected horror.

"Call! No, you simpletons. What are you talking about? She said she had heard that I wanted a cook, and I told her I did; but, as we did not like the flavor of whisky in our coffee or our soup either, I guessed I would hold out a little longer myself. To think of that good-for-nothing, trifling old Lucy refusing to come with us because we could not find room for her soap-grease and kettle! I tell you, girls, this thing of free darkeys and reconstruction will be the death of me yet."

Dreading from experience all retrograde movements in their mother's mind, Annie hastened to divert her by saying:

"Sophie and I were just concocting a scheme for getting into good society, mamma. We propose advertising for acquaintances, reference given and required. Don't you think it would be a tip-top idea?"

Mrs. Dickison's Scotch blood was too largely in excess for her to perceive a joke with alacrity, so she replied with great deliberation: "I'm not prepared to say that it would, girls. I wouldn't do anything rash. You know you might repent of it. After all, if we were sufficient for each other in the country, why should we not be so here?"

"Father's had a bite! father's had a bite," Lewis announced at this juncture, entering the room in breathless haste, and speaking in a voice that was undergoing daily—nay, hourly—tuition at his sisters' hands to reduce its volume and modulate its pitch.

"Father's had a bite? What do you mean, Lewis?"

"And landed his fish!" adds Lewis.

"Lewis, have you lost what little sense you ever did have?" Sophie demands in exasperation.

"And he ain't no sardine, neither!" the small wretch continues imperturbably.

"Mother, can't you make Lewis talk sense or go to bed?"

"Lewis, go to bed!" Mrs. Dickison says, choosing the easier alternative for her boy.

"I am talking sense. He's a whale, and father'll be here with him t'reckly."

In token whereof Lewis finally extended a crumpled bit of paper, on which were pencilled these lines:

"DEAR WIFE: Found another dead-beat like myself. Will bring him home to supper. Tell the girls I've been fishing for them—had my first nibble."

Thus were Lewis' mad capers and Mr. Dickison's intentions made clear simultaneously.

"A dead-beat!" Sophie repeated with sick apprehension. "Mother, there is just no knowing what disgrace father will put upon us, with his queer way of doing things. Who knows what disreputable wretch he may have on hand?"

"Sophia Dickison, when things have come to such a pass as you can afford to speak that disrespectfully of your father—and such a father as he has been to you—it's time I was asserting my authority as your mother. Now, not another word, if you are grown, and have got literary aspirations, and are trying to get into society, and all that sort of thing. Handle father's name right or not at all. Annie, open that jar of strawberry-jam, and, Lewis, step round to Haskell's, and tell him to send me a pone of his freshest tea-rusks. And, bless me, there's your father's latch-key rattling in the door now!"

As Mrs. Dickison had delivered her rebuke, her order for the strawberry-jam, and her directions to Lewis in the same matter-of-fact placid fashion, there was no unusual sign of disturbance in the little circle when the door was opened, and Mr. Dickison entered, closely followed by a gentleman in a sober but not quite irreproachable suit of black, who doffed his hat at the door, and advanced with the quiet, easy assurance of a man who was accustomed to finding himself in all sorts of unusual and unexpected situations, and who had learned to carry with him a sufficient quantity of miscellaneous ballast, in order to secure his safe passage through troubled waters. He looked straight into Mamma Dickison's flushed face with a pair of quiet gray eyes, as if he were challenging her to pass judgment on him. He bent with chivalric courtesy over Sophie's pretty, plump hand, which she had inadvertently extended with countrified cordiality; placed a patronizing hand on Lewis' shoulder; smiled encouragingly upon Annie, whose rustic simplicity betrayed itself in a superfluity of color, and succeeded, by some occult means, in making the entire family of Silas Dickison feel duly honored by the presence of Martin Pinkham.

By the time supper was announced Mr. Pinkham was tolerably well-informed as to the past history, present, prospects and future hopes of the whole Dickison family, while they were still profoundly ignorant of everything concerning their new friend, save that he knew how to talk as well as to listen—could smile very brilliantly and eat very heartily.

Mrs. Dickison mentally pronounced him "real genteel" before she had passed him his second cup of coffee. Annie declared to herself that father's first nibble had not proven such a bad one after all, and Sophie wondered, if that was a specimen of the "dead-beats" of the place, what its first-class beaux could be.

Mr. Dickison was flushed with success over his first "catch" and—a glass or two of beer, while Lewis was enjoying himself in the purely animal fashion of all boys, content with the fact that strawberry-jam was out in galore and "nobody could snub a fellow before company for helping himself three times."

He wished that "father could get a bite every evening;" that "dead-beats" grew on every tree and sprouted on the road-sides, if their presence was always to result in strawberry-jam, fresh tea-rusk from Haskell's, and impunity on his own part to indulge in such luxuries.

V.—NOT A "DEAD-BEAT."

"WHERE did you say you met him, father?"

"Who did you say his father was, father?"

"What made you call him a dead-beat, father?"

"When are you going to bring him to supper again, father?"

The above almost breathless interrogatories were hurled at Mr. Silas Dickison by the several members of the home circle, as the front gate of No. 90 Melborne swung rather noisily on its hinges after Mr. Pinkham's exit.

"One at a time, ladies," says the martyr, stroking his beard with the complaisant air of a man awaiting congratulations for some undoubted achievement.

"I don't know as it is exactly fair of me to call him a dead-beat at all," he continues, settling himself well into his big arm-chair in a way he had when preparing for a "good talk." "In fact, to do the fellow full justice, his face got as red as blazes when I read out to him that note I scribbled to you, mamma; but he laughed it off and said he supposed it was all right so long as I classed myself with him."

"Of course, of course," mamma responds, eagerly. "You know, if he really had been a dead-beat he would have taken offense, sure enough. Nothing like the truth for a good hard pinch. But do go on."

"Well, as to where I met him; that's what Nan" (the paternal for Annie) "wants to know. You know, girls" (Mr. Dickison generally included the wife of his bosom in this comprehensive substantive), "I've actually been little better than a dead beat or a tramp myself ever since I left the plantation. There's no use talking, I'm a fish out of water; so when I get ashamed of being hustled off the sidewalk by fellows who have something to do, and get feeling too mean in my skulking idleness even to patronize a bootblack successfully, I wander off to that cute little park up-town, where it looks so green and fresh and shady that, with the aid of a little make-believe, a fellow can almost cheat himself into the notion that he's back in the country. I don't mean to hurt your feelings, dears; but when I get in there where the blue grass grows so tall and fine (pity, though, so much good pasture should be going to waste; they could pasture ten yoke o' steers in that park), and sit under the magnolia trees, with their sweet-smelling flowers peeping out from the dark shiny leaves, and throw peanuts to the fat and saucy squirrels that go hopping about (just so many more dead-beats in fur coats), and listening to the fountain splish-splashing in a cool, steady fashion, trickling down over the flowers in the vases, and spattering the backs of the big sham geese—"

"Swans, father," said Sophie, in a tone of correction.

"That don't seem to have any more work to do than the squirrels or I—I'm happier than I can be anywhere off the old plantation. I feel at home with the squirrels and the grass. I can sit on them hard iron benches and smoke the pipe of peace with the furry little scamps winking at me with a sort of Free Mason understanding that we're none of us any better than we should be, so we can't reproach each other with our do-nothingness. Well, I was engaged in that useful occupation this evening, smoking my pipe and throwing parched peanuts to a fat old gray squirrel, who was exchanging views with me on the subject of dead-beats in general, I making the observations and he awinking his assent, when this same young fellow, Pinkham, came up and seated himself by me, asking, in that cool sort o' way of his—"

"That is exactly what I admire most about him," Sophie flings in.

"If that wasn't Mr. Silas Dickison?"

"I said, 'It was.'"

"And, 'If he was not a planter from the State of Arkansas?'"

"I said, 'He was.'"

"Had he not been a great sufferer by the recent floods?"

"I said, 'He had.'"

"And had he not moved to Memphis to reside?"

"I said, 'He had, temporarily only;' and I began to wonder if I was being interviewed by one of them pesky pieces of impudence, a newspaper reporter; but he was welcome to all he could get out of me; so mentally I said, 'Heave ahead!'"

"And was he not originally from the State of Kentucky?"

"I said, 'He was.'"

"And had he not been educated at Centreville?"

"I said, 'He had, if he could be called educated at all.'"

"And was there not at the same school and at the same time a student named Nathan Pinkham?"

"I said, 'Correct.'"

"And had not Silas Dickison and Nathan Pinkham been the most devoted friends through all their college days?"

"I said, 'Correct again.'"

"Then, my dear sir," he said, extending his hand for a shake, "I lay claim to your friendship in Nathan Pinkham's name."

"He's dead," I said, sorter suspiciously, for he sounded gushy, and I never could trust a man that gushed.

"No one knows that better than myself, his own and only son!"

"I said, 'The devil and Tom Walker!'"

"He said, 'Yes,' very polite like; 'I am the son of your best friend, Nathan Pinkham, who was devoted to you to the last.'"

"I said, 'The deuce he was!'"

"Oh, father!"

"Well, child, it wasn't exactly civil; but I never was good at making talk, and really didn't know what else to say."

"Well, go on."

"He said, 'I expect you are wondering how I found you out?'"

"I said I hadn't had time to think on the subject at all yet, but on mature reflection I supposed I should wonder some, so he might as well make it all plain at once, if it was the same thing to him."

"He said—real mournful like, girls—"Of course you knew that your old friend, my dear father, was dead?"

"I said I hadn't known it before yesterday, when I had met another old Centreville chum from Kentucky, who was passing through town on his way to Texas, and that we had lunched together at Floyd's, just to talk over old times together."

"Yes, killed in a railroad accident, poor pa."

"So Mac told me," I said.

"Mac? Mac?" he said, sort of inquiring like.

"McLean—he was another old friend of your father."

"Perhaps," he said. No doubt his father's college friends numbered by the score, but my name had always been almost a household word with them. He had often heard his father say this and that and t'other—it's hardly worth repeating; but Nath and I were good old friends—there's no going back on that."

"Then he went on, girls, and told me so much about his father and about myself, too, in those old days, and about our pranks and scrapes, and how, when he heard somebody at Gaston's telling somebody else how one of the oldest planters in Arkansas, Silas Dickison, whose land never had gone under before, had left the bottoms in complete disgust, and heard that I was actually here in town, he determined to hunt me up and claim acquaintance for the sake of 'Auld lang syne.'"

"He does talk beautifully," says rustic Annie, enthusiastically.

"So then, being convinced that he was his father's son, decency demanded that I should open my doors to Nath's boy, and I done it." The martyr adds, with ungrammatical enthusiasm, "He sort of demurred at first, looked down at himself and touched up his hair a little with his fingers, and said he really 'was not prepared to call upon ladies;' but when I told him we was nothing but a lot of simple-minded country-folks that hardly knew broadcloth from bagging, and really was a pining for some respectable city acquaintances, he smiled and agreed to come, which he done."

"Really, father," Sophie says, bridleing a little indignantly, "I cannot see that it was necessary to belittle us in order to encourage him."

"If he was the son of your very best old friend," Annie adds.

"I suppose there is no doubt on that score, Mr. Dickison?"

Mrs. Dickison plumes herself on her penetration. She is morally convinced that she cannot be taken in. From a stale egg up to the most pretentious social sham she relies implicitly upon her own powers of detection. She has not been a planter's wife for nearly half a century and in control of one of the most universally tricky tribes of human beings without acquiring some degree of accuracy in detecting the rogue's ensign. This young man has certainly impressed her favorably; but there is never anything lost by venturing a few cautious inquiries in the beginning. It is a source of comfort, you know, in case things do turn out wrong, to be able to say, "You remember I always had my doubts."

"Doubt on that score!" the martyr replies with uncalled-for explosiveness. "Thunder and lightning! how can there be? Didn't I tell you he evidently knew all about his father's and my school-days? Didn't I tell you he told me of things that nobody but Centreville folks ever heard of? Why, there's not half a dozen men in this town that know anything about me now, let alone my school-days; and if it hadn't been for Mac's passing through town yesterday, and me and him having one good old-fashioned confab over the lunch-table at Floyd's, I don't suppose the story of those old days would have found the light in this town. Of course he's Nath's boy. He don't look much like Nath, to be sure. Nath was short and red, and this fellow's tall and black; but, by a merciful dispensation of Providence, some boys are permitted to look like their mothers. Now, there's our Lewis—"

"Oh, Lewis is well enough!" Mrs. Dickison says, hastily interposing to spare Lewis' flaming red head from familiar but disagreeable comment; "and I suppose Mr. Pinkham is, too. We will hope so, at any rate. He certainly has good manners."

"He has, indeed!" is the enthusiastic indorsement of the two girls, who are, after all, "but simple-minded country-folk."

VI.—"A PRETTY KETTLE OF FISH."

"HAVE you been to see those Dickisons?"

"Have you been to see those Dickisons?"

Such is the power of emphasis, that when Mrs. Oscar Sherman asked that question of Mrs. Telfair Benton, placing the accent on the first word, and Mrs. Telfair Benton responded in the same words, simply removing the accent to the second word, whole volumes of meaning had been exchanged between two of the "best people" of the city at the expense of "those Dickisons," and with the outlay of seven small words.

"I have," was the dual response, given with the solemnity of the confessional.

"You know," Mrs. Oscar Sherman continued in an explanatory way, "I made Mr. Sherman post himself thoroughly about them before I did call. He wanted me to go, and I told him that when I was satisfied about them and their antecedents and present status at home, I would consider the matter. One cannot be too particular about taking strangers by the hand in these days of sham and shoddy, Mrs. Benton."

"Indeed one cannot," Mrs. Benton cordially assents.

"But Oscar says there 's no sham about these people. The old man actually does own a plantation, actually is free from debt, and actually is what he professes to be. They are actually said to be worth about fifty thousand. But, oh, mercy! the old lady!"

"I never should have suspected it from the way they act," Mrs. Benton says, with reference to that fifty-thousand-dollar fact.

"Act! why, as far so that goes, I am sure I found them quite ladylike and genteel, and, on the whole, I consider that they acquitted themselves very creditably. I speak particularly of the girls. I cannot say that Mrs. Dickison conveyed the idea that she was the crème de la crème of society."

Mrs. Oscar Sherman spoke as one having authority, having been, ever since her marriage to the principal banker of the place, the acknowledged leader of her circle. No one was better fitted than she to judge of cream, having, in her tender girlhood, taken no insignificant part in the active industry of the Durham Dairy, a superior institution, that flourished under the personal supervision of Mrs. Sherman's own mother.

"Well," Mrs. Benton replies very emphatically, "your experience then was decidedly more satisfactory than mine. Oh, it was too utterly ridiculous," upon which, fresh from her first call on "those Dickisons," the lady fell into such a violent and uncontrollable fit of merriment, that Mrs. Sherman was obliged to await its termination in a state of curiosity bordering on the agonized.

"Too utterly ridiculous!" Mrs. Benton repeats, wiping her eyes with a highly-perfumed handkerchief, threatening to go off afresh—an intention which Mrs. Sherman promptly nipped in the bud by saying somewhat tartly:

"I declare, Julia Benton, if you do not stop that selfish laughing and tell me all about your visit to those Dickisons, I'll get real angry with you!"

"Well, I have been to see them—am just from there. Wish to goodness you had been with me, or that I had Dickens' powers of description to do the subject full justice!"

"But, as you certainly have not," Mrs. Sherman says with candid impatience, "do exert your own."

"I suppose it all came from that boy of theirs. If he had been out of the way, and I had been permitted to ring the bell like a Christian woman, it would have been better for the whole Dickison family. But as it was—oh, my!"

"You're not going off again?" Mrs. Sherman asks in alarm.

"No; I'm going to tell you all about it as straight as ever I can. Well, Mr. Benton has been after me to call on those people just about as long as Mr. Sherman has been after you about it—in fact, told the old man that I was coming. You know he buys a great portion of his plantation supplies from Benton & Coleman—pork and meal."

"No!" says the banker's wife, with becoming hauteur, "I did not know it."

A knowledge of pork and meal might smack of familiarity with those by-gone days of butter and milk. Mrs. Sherman's dead past had buried its dead.

"The first evening Telfair appointed for me to call," the pork man's wife continues, with slightly heightened color, "I was taken sick."

"Really?"

"Well, not very really; but as I am no fonder of taking nobodies by the hand than you are, dear, I was determined to find out who else was going to call on them before I committed myself irretrievably to an acquaintance that might be very hard to shake off. When Telfair came home, and found that I had not been there, he really raged; said he never would appoint another day for me to go; I might go or stay away, just as I saw fit; that I was fond enough of visiting people who were as afraid as death to speak of their own fathers and mothers in society, for fear that the ghost of a cobbler might rise like Banquo's at the feast, or the rattle of old milk-cans be stirred up with the bones of the dead."

Mrs. Sherman fanned herself energetically, and smiled indulgently upon Mr. Benton's wrath.

"I haven't the slightest idea who the rude wretch was hitting at," Mrs. Benton says, smiling sweetly, "and told him as much. I told him that he might be afraid of the ghosts of cobblers, and the rat—"

"I believe Mr. Benton's uncle by his mother's side was in the shoe-mending business," Mrs. Sherman says, with placid malice; "and it is very much to his credit that he should not be ashamed to allude to it."

"But offending old Dickison would just be taking about three thousand dollars a year out of his pocket," Mrs. Benton returns with inconsequent haste to the text of her husband's remarks, adding, "so that settled the matter so far as I was concerned."

"Of course!"

"Well, as I was going on to tell you. When I got to No. 80 Melborne Street I found the street-door stretched wide open—"

"They are countrified."

"And on the stoop sat the red-headeddest, freckle-facedest, most utterly hideous boy I ever saw. He was sitting on the side of the portico, thumping his heels on the planks like drumsticks, keeping time with a croquet-mallet on the top step, and biting pieces as big as a trade dollar out of a slice of cold blackberry pie with every thump of the mallet. Altogether, he was such a perfectly heathenish-looking little wretch that I looked at the number over the door twice, and twice at the card Mr. Benton had given me, before I ventured to ask if Mr. Silas Dickison lived there."

"The small heathen said 'he reckoned Mrs. Silas Dickison lived there, and Miss Sophie Silas Dickison and Miss Annie Silas Dickison; but the genuine Mr. Silas Dickison and his only son, Mr. Lewis Silas Dickison, which I am, lived purty much everywhere.' Those were exactly his words, Mrs. Sherman, given between huge bites of cold blackberry pie."

"I am thankful Mr. Lewis Silas Dickison was not on hand when I called," Mrs. Sherman says, unsympathetically.

"I asked him if the ladies were at home. He said he reckoned they was for the want of some place better to be at."

"Then I gave him my card and asked him to take it into the house. The poor little heathen asked what he must do with it. I told him I wanted to see his mother and sisters. 'Well,' he said, 'there 's no use sending in the advertisement (I suppose he meant my card), he knew where they all were. Just follow him, which I did. I felt a little alarmed when he piloted me right by the open door of a decidedly genteel-looking parlor—"

"Their parlor is elegant," Mrs. Sherman asserts authoritatively.

"So I said to that red-headed young fiend, 'Had I not better wait in the parlor, dear, until you take my card to the ladies?" He grinned until he showed every one of his blackberry-stained teeth. I thought at first it was with pleasure at being called 'my dear.' I believe now his whole performance was a piece of diabolical impishness on his part."

"My! how violent you are!"

"That didn't matter," he said, 'he knew where the folks were; they were all in the back parlor.' 'Back parlor' really sounded so civilized and promising that, in the language of Jean Ingelow, 'my soul put by its fears,' and I followed him without any more compunctions; in fact, there was nothing else left to do. I don't know what reason I had to expect anything better of him, but I actually jumped when he flung the second door we reached wide open and fairly bawled, 'Ma, here's some more folks come to see you and Sis' Sophie and S' Ann.' Of course I sailed in, as if it was an every-day occurrence with me to be introduced into society by a Comanche Indian; but oh, my!"

"Don't, Julia! calm yourself. Don't go off again."

"I won't," says Julia, controlling her facial muscles with a mighty effort. "Well, there was a little fire in the fireplace, and on the hearth were three shrouded stove pans, which every housekeeper was obliged to know meant bread-rising. Bread in the back parlor! There was one rather aristocratic-looking girl, who half rose from her feet as if coming to meet me, but suddenly changing her mind, dropped back in her chair and assumed a rigid attitude, which she never altered by the fraction of an inch as long as I was in that room."

"That was Miss Sophia. She is aristocratic-looking, and she talks exceedingly well, considering she is from a plantation."

"Perhaps she did to you. She looked pale and uneasy, and scarcely spoke two dozen words to me."

"Perhaps she was sick."

"No! It didn't take me long to find out what was the matter. She had no shoes on—at least only one, and as I saw three more peeping from under her dress I took it for granted that she was trying on a new pair when I had burst upon them, and was afraid to budge an inch after that spasmodic effort at a welcome. The other sister wasn't very much better off. They were both very neatly dressed, and I suppose bangs were a novelty to them, for theirs were put up in pieces of old letters about as big as your forefinger, and stood out in huge white knobs all over their foreheads. When Mr. Lewis Silas Dickison thrust me in on them, the poor thing gave one grab at a hair-pin, jerked out one paper, producing a wild exaggeration of fluffiness that seemed to startle its owner. She shoved it back under its neighbors in such mad haste, making no farther effort to improve her appearance, but began to talk in that nervously-excited fashion folks have when they want to pretend that everything is as right as it should be, when all the time it is as wrong as it can be."

"The fiend seemed perfectly satisfied with the result of his experience, and sat quite still, staring first at me and then at his sisters for about three minutes, hatching up fresh mischief, it seemed, for then he asked, with a sort of whine, 'Sis Sophie, where is ma?' Sis Sophie did not hear him. 'S' Ann, where is ma?' S' Ann glared at him and asked me, hysterically, how long I expected to remain in the city (as if she did not know my husband was one of the oldest merchants in the place). 'Sis Sophie, where's my ball?' Sophie asked me if I had had yellow fever. 'S' Ann, where's my ball?' S' Ann asked me if I had ever had small-pox. 'Sis Sophie, where's yo' other shoe?' I thought I heard a smothered cough just then, and as it certainly came from the direction of the closet, I was just wondering if this queer establishment included a closet skeleton, when the fiend got up from his chair, and saying softly to himself, 'Jeemes River, I know where it is'—I supposed he meant his ball—I believe now he meant that cough—he jumped at the closet door before any one could imagine what he was up to, flung it wide open with another Comanche whoop, and stumbled out of the room, almost doubled up with laughing. There, with a background of glass and china to throw out her portly form, crimson face and floury arms and apron in bold relief, stood the mother of those Dickisons. She looked at me in alarm for a second, then pityingly at the girls, then came out as cool and smiling as you please."

"That comes of being ashamed of an honest act," she said, coolly taking off her floury apron and pulling down her sleeves. 'I had just set my own bread to rise (for never, never, can I bring myself to eat the sawdust they call bread here), when I heard that scamp of a Lewis rattling the door-knob. There was no chance of escape, and, to please those foolish children, I consented to hide; but you've found me out, and serves me right, too. I'll have to acknowledge, Mrs. Benton, that if making your own bread with your own hands, and setting it to rise on your own hearth when the kitchen-stove is cold, constitutes an outrage in good society, I am afraid I must plead guilty. Sorry I can't offer to shake hands with you, my dear; but, you know, you might carry away some of the flour on your kids.'

"Of course, we all tried to make the best of a very awkward situation; but, you may depend upon it, I was glad enough to get away from there before that wretched boy had time to concoct any fresh catastrophe."

"After all," said Mrs. Sherman, her mind probably reverting tenderly to the time when her own mother might have run the risk of being caught straining milk or skimming cream, "I don't see where the old lady had so disgraced herself or her daughters. I am sure knowing how to make good bread is not so very shocking!"

"Perhaps not; and I was not aware that anybody ever had thought it was. All I have to say, though, is that I think those Dickisons are a perfect godsend. The dull season on us—theatres all closed—no hopes even of a traveling circus—if we can have a farce acted for nothing, we ought to be very thankful; but I believe the next time I go to an impromptu performance at No. 80 Melborne, I will take some 'more folks' with me. It is not much fun to be the only spectator."

"What became of Mr. Lewis Silas Dickison after the dénouement?" asked Mrs. Sherman, with interest.

"Oh, when I came out he was sitting on the carriage-block in front of the house fitting china balls into a pop-gun. He grinned at me with his black teeth and said:

"'Good-by. I told 'em I'd get even with 'em for stopping me off from the livery stable, and I think I done it, don't you?'"

"I told him very emphatically that I thought he had."

BELINDA.

BY RHODA BROUGHTON,

Author of "Good-by, Sweetheart!" "Red as a Rose is She," etc., etc.

PERIOD III.—CHAPTER VI.

"BELINDA!" cries the voice of Sarah, suddenly striking in, high and mirthful; of Sarah, returned, hot and boastful, from her finished game. "Cheer up! I have some good news for you!"

Belinda gives a great start.

"Have you indeed?" she says hurriedly; "so much the better for me."

"Mr. Staveley and Mr. Bellairs and Mr. —" (she has not yet mastered the name of her third young friend, but audaciously mumbles something that is to stand for it), "and I have concocted a little junket for to-morrow. If it is not your birthday it ought to be! You are going to be taken on the river, and treated to cakes and ale at a pot-house, and towed back by moonlight. Come now, what do you say? Are you not grateful?"

Belinda laughs nervously.

"Grateful! of course I am!"

She has risen from her chair and begun to walk about upon the sward. Perhaps by changing her position she may the sooner be free of the heady fumes of this mandragora that she has been drinking; may the more easily shake off this divine drowsiness, that yet leads to death.

"It strikes me that you are not listening to a word I say," says Sarah, darting a dry look from one to the other of the culprits.

"Not listening?" repeats Belinda, with a feverish gayety; "am I not? Judge for yourself whether I am listening! I am to be taken on the river, and treated to cakes and ale, and towed home by moonlight; come, now!"

"Well, is it not a nice plan? are you not grateful to us?" cries Sarah, again appensed and jubilant.

"It would be delightful!" replies Mrs. Forth, still with that same factitious liveliness. "I should enjoy it of all things; I am so fond of the water, only—"

She stops abruptly; her rebellious eye wandering to where Rivers—he, too, has risen—stands aloof, out in the cold; obviously uninvited, uninvited in the joyous programme.

"Only Menander, I suppose," says Sarah, making a face; really, at his age, he ought to be able to shift for himself for one day."

"It is not Menander," replies Belinda with embarrassment; "as it happens, I have a whole holiday to-morrow. Mr. Forth is going to London for the day, to take the chair at an archaeological meeting."

"Only what, then?" looking at her with a point-blank directness that puts her out of countenance.

"Only," she says, and stops again, irresolute.

Reason is pouring her cold douche over her, and asking: "Why should he be invited? What sense would there be in it? unreason rather, and madness. Has she not supped enough hemlock for one while? With how many dreary days and weeks of flat revolt and saltless labor will she already have to expiate this one drunken hour! Let this be the end! let this be the end!"

"Only nothing," she says, with awkward gayety.

"I wonder why you hesitated?" asks Sarah inquisitively. "I cannot fancy ever hesitating when there is any question of amusing one's self. Do you not often go on the water?"

"Never; I am never asked; you never ask me," turning with a sort of spurious coquetry to the enraptured young men.

"We should be only too delighted," cries Bellairs; he, by right of his one minute's priority of introduction, having constituted himself spokesman and old acquaintance; "only we—we—were afraid, we—we—did not venture!"

"You must venture for the future, then," replies she with a flighty laugh. "You must take me often! I want to go! I want to enjoy myself!"

Her eye sparkles, and her cheek flames, as she speaks. Is it indeed the expectation of pleasure that has set them both so bravely alight? She throws herself with such a fury of interest into all the details of the excursion, that she has hardly time or attention to spare for bidding good-bye to Rivers, who presently comes up to make his adieux.

"Are you going?" she asks indifferently. "Good-bye."

As she speaks, she lays for one instant her hot dry hand in his cold one. She would have bidden even Bellairs good-bye more warmly. None but herself knows the strength of the temptation that assails her to clutch that poor slighted hand before them all; to lay it on her miserable heart; to drown it in her tears, smother it with her kisses, and pay it any other tribute of extravagant passionate homage.

Least of all does he suspect it, as he walks away, decently strangling his sick despair till he is out of sight. No sooner is he gone, and the need for defense ended, than she throws away her weapons. Her attention flags so obviously; her manner relapses so patently from its short summer of animation into its normal frost, that it dawns at length upon the three boys' intelligence that they are running a good chance of outstaying their welcome, and forfeiting the place that they flatter themselves they have won in Mrs. Forth's esteem. They take leave as precipitately as Sarah's many last words, commands, espègleries, jokes, will let them. She accompanies them to the door; and Belinda, since it is more tolerable to move about than to sit still, accompanies her.

The sisters lean on the low iron gate, and the bland spring evening wraps her arms around them.

Belinda has lifted her gloomy eyes to the laburnum gloriously pendent above her head. Which happy cluster was it that brushed against his hair last night in the starlight?

"He is not gone yet!" says Sarah, in that voice of shrewd, dry sense which would surprise the admirers of her butterfly phase, could they hear it. "What is he hanging about for?"

She has desisted rather suddenly from her occupation of kissing her fingers to her three adorers, who, reluctant to lose one of her last glances, are backing down the road away from her. Belinda's heart gives a bound. Not quite the end yet, then! She has done her best!

Her conscience is clear! but it is not quite the end yet, then! Can she be blamed because he still loiters near?

"I suppose the road is public property," she says doggedly; but her voice shakes.

"You did not ask him to join us to-morrow, did you?" asks Sarah, with dry rapidity.

"No."

"Ah!" (drawing a long breath) "that is right!"

"It would have been the merest civility to have invited him," says Mrs. Forth sullenly. A frown less of ill-humor than of perplexed uneasiness has gathered on Miss Churchill's satin brow.

"It is no case of civility between you and him," she says curtly.

The flush on Belinda's fagged face grows hotter.

"I am at a loss to understand what you mean," she says angrily.

"I mean," replies Sarah shrewdly, and enunciating with the greatest clearness, "that discretion is the better part of valor—that is what I mean!"

"Thank you!" cries the other fiercely, and trembling like a leaf from head to foot. "Thank you for us both for your good opinion of us!—Mr. Rivers!"

At the last two words she raises her voice into a call; but it is so unsteady and ill-modulated, and he is so comparatively distant, that one would hardly expect the sound to carry so far; but apparently it does, for he starts and looks uncertainly toward her, distrusting his own ears.

Is it likely that she should have called him? she—his high proud lady—after such a careless cruelty of good-by, too!

"Mr. Rivers!" she repeats, in a voice that is as unsteady as before, but louder. There can be no mistake this time. He can no longer distrust his good luck; and in one second, as if he could not obey her quickly enough, he is hurrying back.

Sarah lifts her arms deliberately from the gate, and rubs them gently to remove the slight numbness produced by contact with the cold iron.

"Blessed are they who let well alone!" she says, gently raising her shoulders, and turning toward the house. "I have disqualified myself for that benediction; have I not, Pug?"

So saying, she disappears. Belinda would have liked to ask her to stay, but her pride forbids it. Long before Rivers has reached her, she has repented of her perverse and devil-born impulse. Why has she called him? What has she to say to him when he comes? For the first moment she says nothing.

"You—you called me?" he asks faltering, surprised at her silence and her look.

"Did I?" she says, stammering; "yes—of course I did! I—I—you leave Oxbridge to-morrow?"

"Do I?" he answers blankly.

Is this then what she has called him back for? To tell him that he must not venture into her presence again?

"You must know your own plans best," she says, with a forced laugh; "do you not leave Oxbridge to-morrow?"

"There is no need that I should," he answers diffidently; "I have a week's holiday!"

Her rebel pulses leap. A week! A whole week! She lifts her face, on which the sunset is mirrored, and looks toward the west. On what a couch of fiery damask roses, dying into daffodil, the sun is laying himself down! What a treble sweetness the throstle is putting into his song as he addresses himself to his rest!

"A week!" she says aloud.

"Does a week in two years seem to you such a long holiday?" he asks, rather wounded by what sounds to him the cold wonder of her tone; "it need not be spent here if—"

He stops abruptly. "If you do not wish it," would be the sentence's natural ending; but so to conclude it would be to suppose an interest, with which he has no right nor any reason to credit the wife of Professor Forth in him and his affairs.

She does not ask him how he had meant to finish his phrase. She does not finish it for him. She only stands staring, beneath the level penthouse of her milky hands, at the blinding sunset. What a curve her lifted elbow makes! From what a marvel of wrist and forearm does the lawny sleeve fall back!

"Is this what you called me for?" he asks abruptly; "to tell me that I am to go to-morrow?"

For a minute she stands irresolute, still looking sunward; her outward woman a lovely pattern of harmony, grace and quiet; her inward woman, ugly chaos and dark fight. Shall she say "Yes"? To say so would be to more than retrieve her late error. Dimly she feels that if she has one ray of sober reason left her, she will say "Yes." She heaves a sigh, and lets fall her hands. Her lips have all but framed the fateful words, when:

"Belinda! Belinda!" comes an old voice, calling imperatively peevish from the house.

A week! One poor week! Only a week! What can one week matter? Her manner has suddenly changed.

"It is Mr. Forth!" she says hurriedly; "I called you back," reddening like the western cloud-fleeces, and throwing a guilty look over her shoulder, "to ask you whether, if you were not going to leave Oxbridge to-morrow, you—you would join our party on the water?"

CHAPTER VII.

"Lieb Liebchen leg's Händchen auf's Herze mein
Ach hörst du wie's pochet in's Kämmerlein
Da hauset ein Zimmerman schlimm und arg
Der zimmert mir einen Todten sarg."

"Er hämmert und Klopft bei Tag und bei nacht
Er hat mich schon längst um den Schaf gebfracht
Ach sputet euch Meister Zimmerman
Damit Ich balde schlafen kann."

In other climes, a sunset of suave sublimity usually means that it will be followed by a sunrise as nobly fair. But in our free isle this is not the case. Even the weather will submit to no tyranny, but follows its own wild and freakish will. You may close your eyes upon a distant steady heaven of molten copper and speckless blue, and open them upon a soaked-blanket sky, half an inch above your head.

During the many wakeful patches that vary the sameness of her night, Belinda has full time to repent of her evening's doings; but not once does it occur to her that the weather may possibly intervene to prohibit the excursion. Among all her half-sincere plans for evading the expedition, the alternative of a wet day has not once suggested itself; and when the morn comes, dim and sad, the poignancy of her disappointment at sight of the dripping bushes and filled flower-cups shows her how much of veracity there was in her projects of abstinence. Now she will have to endure the pang of renunciation, without having enjoyed the merit of self-conquest. And yet it is a lovely rain, not harshly driving, nor rudely strewing the earth with a ravin of torn-off petals; but gently stealing down from the cloud-roof overhead, softly thrusting itself between the blossom-lips, feeding the juicy leaves, healthful, wealthful, beneficent, yet execrated by two young eyes that are morosely watching it. It is execrated by two old ones also. The Professor tentatively throws out an idea as to the advisability of telegraphing to the Archæological Society his inability to preside over its deliberations.

"But you are not sugar or salt!" cries Belinda impatiently, as she stands, a comforter thrown over her arm, and a mackintosh extended to receive her husband's meagre person; you will be in cabs and trains all day."

"It is not always easy to secure a cab at a moment's notice on a wet day!" replies he, demurring; "as I have often explained to you, it is upon trifles that the laws of health depend; there may be delay enough to allow of my getting my feet thoroughly wet; a circumstance amply sufficient to throw a chill upon a liver already predisposed."

"But will you not be putting the Society to great inconvenience? will not its members be very much disappointed?" asks she, reddening consciously as she speaks.

What is she saying? What does she care whether they are disappointed or not? To what depths of disingenuousness has she—truthful as she has been hitherto counted her life long—already descended? But it may clear—it may clear!

"I might obviate the difficulty by taking an extra pair of socks in my pocket to change at the Club," he says thoughtfully; and then her spirits rise, for he extends his arms, not to take a parting embrace, but to insert them in the waterproof-sleeves which she, with wifely alacrity, holds ready to receive them.

He is gone. That one main obstacle to her pleasure is at all events removed. If only it would clear! She is no longer half sincere with herself. No longer does she feign a desire to extricate herself from the entanglement into which she has plunged, nor a gratitude to Mother Nature for having come to her aid. Without asking why she wishes it, she has concentrated all her being upon the one mastering desire to see that cloud-curtain raise its trailing corners, transpierced and put to flight by such a sun as yesterday's.

"It does not look in the least like lifting!" she says, in a tone which she in vain tries to make sound careless, to Sarah, as they enter the drawing-room after breakfast. "Do you think that there is any chance of its lifting?"

"Not the slightest!" replies Sarah placidly.

With that adaptability to circumstances which makes life to her one long feast, Miss Churchill has arranged herself for a wet day. A small fire—not unwelcome in the rain-chilled atmosphere—brightens the hearth; and to it she has—for to her nothing is sacred—pulled up the Professor's chair: that one of Mudie's novels which, by its large type, wide margins, and plentitude of titled names, seems to promise the least strain upon the intellect, in her hand.

"Who would have thought it yesterday?" says Mrs. Forth, in a tone of mournful irritation, totally unable to follow her philosophic sister's example, and fidgeting uneasily about the room.

"Who indeed?" rejoins Sarah equably.

There is something in the indifferent content of her voice that jars upon Belinda's mood. The dogs have taken their cue from Miss Churchill—Punch has got inside the fender as if it were winter; the cat lies lazily stretched just outside the parrot's cage; and Polly, exasperated by her air of calm security, is walking stealthily, head downward, along the side of his cage, and when he has got, as he thinks, within reach of her, is stretching out first a vicious-hooked nose, and then a long, crooked gray hand, to make a grab at her whiskers.

Sarah laughs.

"You were so anxious for it yesterday," says Belinda, with an irrationally aggrieved accent.

"Was I?" answers Sarah, yawning. "I am not the least anxious for it now; I am thoroughly comfortable, thank God! Why do you not come near the fire? I have a hundred questions to ask you; we have the house all to ourselves—excuse" (parenthetically) "my reckoning that among our advantages—and I have scores of good things to tell you about Cannes and granny; you used to be fond of grannyana!"

"I am not cold," replies Belinda, avoiding compliance by seating herself where she can at once command the window, and evade her sister's eyes. "Tell me them here."

"Well you must know," begins Sarah, prudently ignoring this ruse, and launching into her narrative. "That some Poles had the apartment above ours at the hotel—their salon was over granny's bedroom—and every night, at about ten o'clock, they began to dance sarabands, and cancons, and Highland schottisches, and the Lord knows what in it! You know how fond granny is of having her old head danced over when she is courting her beauty, sleep."

She pauses to see whether her hearer is listening; it is obvious that she is not, as for a moment or two she makes no comment, and then, becoming aware of the silence, breaks into a factitious laugh. "Ha! ha!"

"What are you laughing at?" asks Sarah sharply.

"I had not come to the point yet."

The other stops, embarrassed.

"It—it was very good even so far as you had gone," she answers in confusion.

"The end was better still," replies Miss Churchill shortly, taking up her book again; "but you shall never hear it!"

"How ill-natured!" cries Mrs. Forth, advancing eagerly toward the hearth, roused into alarm at her own self-betrayal; "and I—I was so much interested in it. I should like you to begin it all over again."

But Sarah is inexorable. Presently Belinda desists from her importunities, and not daring to return to the window, also takes up a book, occasionally from behind its shelter throwing a desperate eye on the weather.

It is a hopeless wet day. Once or twice, indeed, there has been a tantalizing thinning of, and movement among, the vapors; but it has ended only in a more resolute, inflexible fastening upon the earth. Eleven—that hour of clearing—has come and gone, and brought no clearing with it. After all, she might as well have done her plain duty, and sent him away. In that case she would at least have had the throbs of an approving conscience to keep her up. And what, pray, has she now?

The forenoon is gone; luncheon is over; they are again in the drawing-room. The novel has long ago dropped from Sarah's fingers, and she has slidden into a warm, infantile slumber. The door-bell, loudly jangling, wakes her with a jump.

"It is those hateful boys!" she cries petulantly, starting up. "Am I never to have any peace from them? and I was in such a beautiful sleep!"

One glance at her sister's face—that sister who has obviously not shared her slumbers; whose watch has been at length rewarded, though by no brightening of the material sky—tells her who is among "those hateful boys." Perhaps this fact adds a new tinge of ill humor to her tone, as she advances, childishly rubbing her drowsy eyes with her knuckles, to meet her admirers.

"You woke me!" she says, pouting. "I was in such a beautiful sleep!"

This speech is not calculated to reassure three timid young gentlemen, who have already been questioning the wisdom of their own procedure, and doubtfully discussing among themselves the probabilities as to the mood, whether of summer warmth or December ice, that they will find their hostess in. Upon Sarah, at least, they had counted to stand by them. But aid from an unexpected quarter comes to them.

"Never mind her!" says Belinda, with a young and radiant smile of welcome and reassurance. "What business has she to be asleep? A wet day? Yes, it is a wet day; but what delicious warm rain! how much good it will do to the country! the farmers are crying out for rain!"

This is the way in which she now regards the lately-execrated downpour. Is he not here? and whether in sunny boat on flashing river, gathering fritillaries in the water-meadows, or in little rain-darkened early-English drawing-room, is it not now all one to her?

"Vivre ensemble d'abord,
C'est le bien nécessaire et réel,
Après on peut choisir au hasard
Ou la terre ou le ciel."

"I hope you will forgive our calling so early," says Bellairs, a little relieved, but still not very comfortable in his spirits; "we—we wanted to know what you thought about the river."

"About the river!" cries Sarah, still cross and sleepy, casting a sarcastic glance, first at the weather, and then at the young man; "are we frogs, or young ducks?"

He looks so silly, that Miss Churchill laughs, her good-humor at once restored.

"Now that you are here, you may as well stay," she says, in a thoroughly wide-awake voice; "may they not, Belinda? If we depend upon the charms of conversation, I shall be asleep again in ten minutes; why should we not play games?"

"Why not?" responds Belinda readily.

Her cheeks are pink, and her eyes dancing. There is no pastime, however wildly, childishly hilarious, for which she is not in tune.

"Shouting Proverbs!" suggests Sarah joyously. "Not know Shouting Proverbs?" (with a reproving look at Staveley, who has murmured this objection). "Why, everybody shouts, and one guesses!" (in lucid explanation). "It makes a tremendous noise; I do not know that it has any other merit."

"The neighbors would indict us for a nuisance," says Belinda gayly, shaking her head. "Russian Scandal?"

"It does not make noise enough," says Sarah; "it is nothing but whispering; we will have no whispering," (rather curtly, and with an almost imperceptible glance toward Rivers, in application of the warning).

"Hare and Hounds is not a bad game in a house," says Mr. De Lisle, in a small, shy voice. "We played Hare and Hounds at a house I was staying at the other day; we ran all through every room, from attic to cellar; it was great fun!"

"Your friend evidently did not keep a mother-in-law out of repair up stairs," replies Sarah, dismissing at once, though with leniency, this not very bright suggestion; "we do. What does the company say to Post, eh?"

The company, who are one and all in the mood for riotous jollity in any form, hail the proposal with one-voiced effusion; and it is on the point of being carried into execution when Miss Churchill suggests an improvement upon it.

"Why not dance? dancing is better than any games! Surely some once can play, or even whistle a tune, or set the musical-box tinkling out its one waltz. Room? plenty of room! too much room! Wheel all the furniture out into the passage!"

No sooner said than done. Away trundles the early English suite of rush-bottomed chairs; away the Professor's sacred fauteuil! away Belinda's work-table! everything but the piano and the music-stool, to which little De Lisle, having weakly admitted that he can play a little dance-music, is at once ruthlessly nailed.

The rain patters, snow-soft outside. The valse strikes up. There is a moment's hesitation. Bellairs and Staveley, generously unwilling to steal a march upon each other, hang back; but Sarah settles the point by frisking up to the one nearest to her—it is all one to her with which she dances; it happens to be Bellairs, and she swoops away with him smooth and sure as a swallow darting down upon a moth. Without a word exchanged between them, Belinda finds herself in Rivers' arms. The rain plash-plashes upon the open window's sill. How long it is since she has danced! How madly exhilarating are motion and measure! Is it in heaven or upon earth that that lame waltz is being strummed? After a turn or two he feels her light and buoyant body grow heavy in his embrace.

"Stop!" she says dizzily; "the room goes round."

He obeys at once; and fearing lest she may fall, keeps for one moment his arm around her.

"It is so long since I danced," she says, lifting one white hand to her giddy eyes; "so long! so long! not since—"

She breaks off.

"Not since your—"

He also breaks off. But she is none the less firmly and irrevocably wed because of his inability to say "your marriage."

"Not since long before then," rejoins she, hurriedly interrupting, with a nervous dread lest he may complete the phrase; "not since—Dresden."

"But we never danced in—Dresden," he says, making the same slight pause as she had done before the name of the, to them, sacred city.

"You did not, perhaps," she answers with a charming saucy smile—for under the unwonted joyous excitement, her spirits are towering perilously high—"but I did. Some Gardereiters came in one evening, and I took a turn with two of them; it was before your day."

Distant as is the epoch alluded to, and satisfactorily as he had been persuaded at the time by ocular evidence of the reciprocal indifference of Belinda and the Saxon officers, he cannot avoid a feeling of biting jealousy and offense against those innocent and, both in time and space, far-off German valseurs.

"At least it is my day now," he says with emphasis; and she offering no contradiction, away they float into their trance again.

The valse ends; the patient De Lisle begins to hammer out a galop. They must part; for Bellairs, emboldened thereto by Sarah's warm approbation, is inviting Belinda, and she dare not refuse. Rivers dances with Miss Churchill. Why need he? Why need he dance at all? Why, above all, need he throw such spirit and animation into his dancing. He looks as if he were enjoying himself as much as Sarah. Staveley, after having vainly endeavored to educate Pug into a partner (Pug, on unwilling hind legs, and with tail abjectly tucked in, perhaps in the laudable intention of giving herself a more human air), galops bravely by himself. The galop ends. The musician, bringing out of his treasures things new and old, treats them to a venerable polka.

Once more he and she are together; and in what a different spirit her light feet now move! Bellairs had found her but a disappointing partner; inert, and often begging to be allowed to stop and take breath. In Rivers' arms, her life's tides are running at their highest. It is Staveley's turn to be Sarah's danseur, and Bellairs, emulating his friend's former example, polks alone. But not altogether with his friend's success. For Punch, inspired by a scientific curiosity to investigate the strange phenomena that have appeared on his horizon, unhappily runs between his legs, and brings him to the earth with some clamor. The player stops: the dancers pause.

"We have had enough of this," says Sarah, drawing her sister into the window for an aside, and speaking with some brusqueness; "it is not fair upon that poor boy" (indicating De Lisle); "he is getting cross, though he tries not to show it. As I have not three legs and arms like the Isle of Man, I cannot dance with them all at once, and you are not much help! Let us try something else."

"By all means," answers Belinda hurriedly, shrinking away from the reproach that her conscience tells her she so richly deserves; "anything! whatever you please!"

"The ball is ended," says Sarah authoritatively, returning to the young men, and clapping her hands to enforce silence; "but if the company pleases it will be immediately followed by some athletic sports. What does every one say to a game of Blind Man's Buff?"

This second proposal is received with an enthusiasm as much hotter than the former as may be expected from the universal loosening of the bonds of shyness and conventionality which has taken place since that former one was first made.

Sarah at once volunteers to be blindfolded; and in two minutes she is established in the middle of the little room, a Liberty silk handkerchief tied over her jovial eyes, and her hands outstretched in futile blind groping and grabbing.

The rest of the party, in the most approved fashion, pull her gown, tweak her hair, nip her sleeve; but not for long. With one well-directed lunge—so well directed as to rouse an instant loud cry of dishonesty—she has pounced upon Bellairs, who in his turn is blindfolded—is in his turn tweaked and nipped—and in his turn catches Rivers; Rivers catches Belinda.

The fun waxes fast and furious. They have raised every grain of dust latent in the carpet; Punch is cheering them on by volleys of delighted short barks, while Pug sits wretchedly in a corner with her face to the wall.

Most madly mirthful of all—most intemperately gay, out-Heroding Herod, outdoing Sarah in her wildest mood, with splendid poppy-cheeks and lightening eyes, is Mrs. Forth. She has been old so long—so long! She is making up the arrears of her lost youth.

The clamor is at its loudest. Scarcely less blowzed—bawling scarcely less noisily than were the Primrose family in neighbor Flamborough's kitchen, when annihilated by the entrance of Lady Blarney and Miss Caroline Wilhelmina Amelia Skeggs, is the society gathered on that wet May afternoon in Professor Forth's decent drawing-room.

Belinda, caught for the second time, stands blindfolded in the middle of the room, while shouts of uproarious laughter greet her vain efforts to gain hold of any of the assailants who lustily beset her. All of a sudden, in one instant, there is silence. The pushing, and jostling, and nipping have altogether ceased. Without any attempt at resistance some one is in her clasp.

"I have got you!" cries she, in a voice of jubilant triumph; "who are you?" and so tears the bandage from her eyes.

It is indeed true that she is grasping Rivers' coat-sleeve in indisputable conquest: but, at the moment that she verifies this fact, the cause of his having fallen so easy a prey—the cause of the instantaneous and entire muteness that has fallen upon the so boisterous little assemblage, breaks in horror upon her stunned eyes.

The door is half open, and through it Professor Forth is looking, with an expression hard to qualify upon his face, at the entertainment got up with such spirit and success in his absence. Not for long, however. In a moment he has softly closed the door and withdrawn. For several moments they stand staring at each other speechless and aghast.

COMPLETENESS.

O LOVE that all my being warms!
O love that shields my life from storms!
O love that every impulse wills,
And every fitting fancy fills!
O love that shines through all my dreams
Like starlight through the summer streams;
That thrills with melody my days,
And rounds all discord into praise!—
I lean my face upon thy breast
As bends my noon-ray to the west,
And calmly, in my open boat,
I floating sing and singing float.

I wait no more by wayside lakes,
To dally with the reeds and brakes;
Behind me fade the mountain snows,
And in my face the June wind blows;
While strong and wide the currents sweep
Toward the ever-calling deep.
O love that rocks me in its arms,
And makes me brave amidst alarms!
I know not where thy stream may lead—
Through rocky pass or flowery mead—
I only feel that I am blest;
I only know I am at rest.

JAMES G. CLARK.

THE HOUSEHOLD—MRS. BLOSSOM'S VIEWS ON RED FLANNEL.

"THE time has come! I knew it would, and that I should have to 'free my mind;' for what a shame it is to spend days and days, and not a particle of skin left on a single knuckle, and your back just one solid ache, and, after all, not one solitary thing that means six months' comfort or use! Of course you are wondering what it is this time, and why I don't begin with some definite statement, as you urged me to do in your last letter. Was it a quotation or your own unadulterated wisdom?—'Learn to detect your thought.' I meditated on it, and read over a page or two of the journal to see if there was a thought anywhere that could be detected. Not the shadow of one, and my own opinion is that the average woman—or man, either—doesn't have thoughts. We have impressions and fancies and sudden evolutions from the rag-bags we call our brains, and we knit our strips of the bits as they come, just like those new rag-rugs, and are thankful if it turns out to be a harmonious muddle of colors, or even something less definite than color—a series of neutral shadings, with a bright point here and there. And that reminds me that I have a word soon to say about this unhappy 'average woman,' that I have read about till I long to empty every inkstand and give writer's paralysis—temporary, of course—to every hand that drives a pen against her.

"In the meantime, I am tormented over the delusion bound up in red flannel. It isn't the fault of the flannel, of course, but the fault of the user, red flannel in its place being eminently cheerful in its character and tendencies, and calculated, as a fact, to increase family happiness; but when it comes to a whole parlor in red flannel, should not one rise up? It was Milly Smith's economy. Poor Milly! She wanted that parlor to be cheerful, and she had such a mere speck of money. She had been wonderfully sensible all through. Charley is only a book-keeper at present, though with more than a hint of a partnership by-and-by, and they married on only this salary and Milly's little savings as a school-teacher—a Philadelphia school-teacher at that—the worst-paid class in the whole community. But she lived at home, and so did manage to lay by a little, and Grandmother Robinson gave her two hundred for house-linen and china, and ordered her to get only the best. Milly said that she meant her bedrooms to hold the best beds that could be had for money, for a third or more of one's life went in sleeping, and she had lain awake on mean beds—with lumps and inequalities and general unpleasantness—all she ever meant to. She bought wire mattresses and the best hair mattresses and thick, soft blankets for her room and the spare-room. Perfectly plain bedsteads, but fitted up with positive luxury, though I don't know that pure comfort ought to be put under that head. She had small hair pillows instead of bolsters, and fluffy, comfortable feather ones, but not too big to sleep on.

"As for towels and every other bit of house-linen, they were all perfect and in riotous quantities. Her kitchen and dining-room were simple, but everything so thoroughly nice and substantial; but when it came to the parlor—there was a problem. Charley had his big arm-chair and desk and carpet, and she a bent-wood rocker; and before she had planned just what to do for the room, an opportunity came to buy two choice engravings at a fabulously low price, and she had done it on the spot, and one hung over the mantel, and the other—the Sistine Madonna—over the desk, and glorified the whole room. But—there wasn't a chair for a guest, nor a sofa, nor a table, and only ten dollars left; and they laughed, and then Milly half cried, and said she was an idiot, and might have squeezed a little out of Grandmother Robinson's money; and it ended as you will see.

"Milly bought two soap-boxes, and had a carpenter make a long box, six feet long and two and a half wide. Then she bought a cheap single mattress and quantities of dark red flannel, some cheese-cloth and yellow floss. The cheese-cloth she made into full curtains, with broad flannel bands, feather-stitched on with yellow floss. She had a pair of second-hand poles and rings, and hung the curtains on these. Then she covered the mattress with red flannel, tufted it all over like any upholsterer, and tacked it all down to the box, and puffed some more below it, ending with a narrow fringe, and the general effect was very nice. She covered her soap-boxes with cotton-cloth, stuffed the tops full of excelsior, and covered flannel over them to match the sofa, and ended with a flannel cover for a second-hand stained-pine table, bought for a dollar.

"The general effect was all right—in fact, very pretty indeed; but the minute you sat down on the sofa, if you moved at all, the flannel parted from the tacks; and so with the ottomans. A stout, cheap cretonne, sewed to the mattress itself, and then finished with a frill, not tacked on, but sewed, would have been a thousand times more practical. Added to this, the flannel wore on all the edges almost immediately, and there was nothing for it but to patch. As to the curtains, if she had feather-stitched her bands separately, and just run them lightly on the cheese-cloth, there would have been no trouble when the time for washing came, for they would have ripped off in two minutes and been ready to put on again. As it happened, the windows were left open in a sudden driving storm, and the curtains drenched so that they had to be done up at once, and all the work was lost.

"What better would I have done? Waited, ma'am. A chair could have been brought in from the dining-room for a guest, and in a month or two enough saved and added to the ten dollars to buy a simple, cretonne-covered lounge. A make-shift, discourse as one may about the easiness of getting up cheap furniture, is sure to end as a nuisance. And I would never 'skinch'—oh, that invaluable Jersey word!—on bed-rooms or other essentials for the sake of a parlor. Beguiled by Milly, somebody else experimented in red flannel, with the same results. And now I want you to urge the merits of cotton over any cheap wool, and implore all your constituents never, never, to be imposed upon by red flannels, or any cheap and worthless colored woolen stuff."

A FAMILY DINNER.

Chicken Soup.
Scalloped Chicken.
Salsify Fritters. Boiled Potatoes.
Stewed Tomato, with Onion.
Spanish Cream.
Tea or Coffee.

CHICKEN SOUP.—This can be made from the liquor in which a chicken has been boiled, but the present form is simply a use of all the bones and scraps left from a pair of roasted chickens which have done duty at least once. Break up the bones and add to them any bits or bones of roast meat or chops that may be on hand. Put them all over the fire with three quarts of water and a tablespoonful of salt, cutting off all bits of solid meat from the fowl and setting them aside with the dressing. Boil three hours. One hour before the soup is to be used strain it and return to the fire. Add two tablespoonfuls of washed rice, half an onion minced fine and a stalk of celery or teaspoonful of celery salt. If boiled away too much, add water enough to make two quarts when ready for the table. A teacupful of milk is an improvement, allowed to boil with it for five minutes. Serve with toasted crackers.

SCALLOPED CHICKEN.—Take one cupful of the boiling soup and pour it slowly on one spoonful of butter and one heaping one of flour, which have been beaten together to a cream and seasoned with a quarter of a teaspoonful of pepper and half an one of salt. Cut the chicken into very small bits or chop it, as preferred, with the dressing, and stir into the boiling sauce. Butter a pudding dish, and put in it a layer of bread-crumbs and one of the chicken, filling the dish in this way, and ending with a thick layer of crumbs, which must be dotted with bits of butter. Cover with a plate and bake twenty minutes, then remove it and brown.

SALSIFY FRITTERS.—Scrape the salsify, and drop into cold water, as it darkens on exposure to air. Boil till tender in well-salted water about one hour, and mash while hot. To a dozen of the roots add two tablespoonfuls of milk, one of flour and two well-beaten eggs. Drop in spoonfuls into boiling fat, and fry a bright brown.

BOILED POTATOES.—As in No. 1 of THE CONTINENT.

STEWED TOMATO, WITH ONION.—One can of tomato, one onion minced fine and slightly browned in a little butter, one teaspoonful of salt, one of sugar and a saltspoonful of pepper. Stew all together slowly for one hour. Thicken, if liked, with two rolled crackers or half a teacupful of bread-crumbs.

SPANISH CREAM.—One quart of milk, one cup of sugar, one package of gelatine, half a teaspoonful of salt, one teaspoonful of vanilla, yolks of four eggs. Soak the gelatine ten minutes in half a cup of cold water. Boil the milk and add the gelatine and other ingredients. At the last stir in the yolks, which must be beaten to a cream, and pour into moulds to harden. Use the whites for cake or meringues. They are sometimes beaten stiff and stirred in at the last; but the cream is better when made with only the yolks.

HELEN CAMPBELL.

NATURE'S BOARD OF HEALTH.

IN Nature's housekeeping the odds and ends are always utilized. Although she sets forth feasts for her creatures without stint, she permits nothing to be wasted. She converts her heaps of vegetable rubbish into hotbeds for other forms of plant life. A wonderfully varied vegetation springs from the fallen tree and fattens upon its mouldering trunk. She practices a similar economy in the management of the other branch of the organic world. Animal refuse is not only removed and the evils resulting from its presence obliterated, but every scrap is made available for building up the living tissues of other animals.

"What becomes of all the dead birds?" is a common query. What, indeed, becomes of all the dead animals of every kind? It is very necessary that some disposition be made of them. Their lifeless remains could not be allowed to fester in the sun and taint the air we breathe. Nature, in order to get rid of such substance, has adapted some members of the different classes of animals to act as scavengers in her domain, and while she is making them useful as such, she is, at the same time, providing them with suitable food. This natural Health Commission is one which, in the efficiency of workings, is worthy the imitation of more pretentious bodies under that name. Its success is due to the individual efforts of the members. Each one of them is heart and soul, so to speak—aye, tooth and nail—in the work of the "board." When there is business to be done he constitutes himself a quorum and enters upon the work with the greatest zest.

Foremost among four-footed scavengers rank the hyenas of Asia and Africa, famous for preferring their food at "second hand." An allied animal, the aard wolf of South Africa, performs the same good work for the plains in which it lives. The dog-like jackals, which have about the same distribution as the hyenas, resort to the native villages at nightfall and clean the streets of all garbage.

In the vast pampas of South America we find the mail-clad armadillos performing their share of the great work, which is the removal of the horses and cattle which perish in great numbers during the long drouths. Seventeen species are found between Texas and Sierra del Fuego.

Nature's "Sanitary Commission" has very efficient officers in the persons of the gray wolves and coyotes of our own broad prairies. They clear away the refuse of numberless camps, and the remains of buffaloes and other animals that die from various causes, and which, but for them, would fill the air of heaven with deadliest poison. They devour great numbers of dead salmon, which line the shores of Columbia River at certain seasons of the year.

The California vultures (Pseudogryphus Californicus), in company with many other species of birds, join the wolves in these ichthyophagous banquets.

The crocodiles of the Ganges are a blessing to that sacred stream. Their ever-ready jaws engulf everything adverse to the purity of the water. If perchance any decaying bodies escape the vigilant crocodiles, and are carried out to sea, they become the prey of ravenous sharks, the scavengers of all oceans. Crocodilia of one kind or another are found in all warm countries of the world.

The feathered carrion-feeders render inestimable service to man from the readiness with which they approach his habitations, and the greed they manifest for offal. Vultures are the chief bird-scavengers, and are distributed over all the habitable globe, except Australia. In many tropical countries they dwell unmolested in cities and towns, living on intimate terms with the inhabitants, and sharing with the dogs the garbage of the streets. This is notoriously the case with the turkey-buzzards and black vultures, or carrion-crows, in the southern cities of the United States. Their accommodating appetites leave the health officer little cause for exertion.

The adjutant or gigantic stork (Septoptilus argala) is the veritable scavenger of Calcutta and other Indian towns. Being protected by law, it stalks in a familiar way about the streets, and renders in return most valuable sanitary service.

Insignificant as the scavenging of insects may appear in comparison with that accomplished by large animals, the aggregation of their work far outweighs that of all others. Let those who would know the physical uses of flies, mosquitoes and other pestiferous creatures of this class, learn from their mode of life how greatly they contribute toward restoring natural equilibrium. Insects are clearly beneficial in other ways than as scavengers, but their work as such only can be mentioned here. Flies of different kinds resort to a carcass as soon as it is exposed to their attacks and deposit thousands—yes, millions—of eggs, which, in a few hours, produce the well-known white larvæ, or "maggots." Who has not seen myriads of them? May not flies exist chiefly for the sake of the benefits resulting from their larval state? From the immense number of maggots produced by a single flesh fly, perhaps twenty thousand, Linnæus estimated that three of them could devour a horse as quickly as could a lion. "Tres muscæ consumunt cadaver equi æque cito ac leo," as runs his "dog-Latin."

Mosquitoes are scavengers of almost equal rank with the flies, but their larvæ develop in stagnant pools and miasmatic marshes instead of corrupted animal matter. Thousands of them may be seen in the rain-barrel under the gutter-spout. A practical demonstration of the scavenging of beetles may be had in summer time without far seeking. From the apparently insignificant labors of such humble creatures, Nature rolls up an astonishing aggregate. Her "house-cleaning" is a work of no common proportions. Her workers, big and little, are everywhere present—on mountain and plain, in forest and stream—aye, in very ocean depths.

E. D. S.

WE begin this week the publication of "A Mississippi Martyr," a bright little serial that gives a charming view of two phases of Southern life, which are but little appreciated at the North, to wit: its domesticity and its humor. The protracted struggle of the anti-slavery era, followed by the period of war and the succeeding period of scarcely less intense hostility, have prevented the people of the North from obtaining anything like a correct view of the real domestic life of the Southern plantation. The conventional planter of the ante-bellum era was a careless, boastful, swaggering tyrant; his wife and daughters equally careless in regard to the home-life, its comforts and economies, as he of the administration of his boundless acres. Both ideas were almost equally incorrect. The Southern planter, as a rule, was a careful administrator of his estate; not in the same snug and tidy manner of which the Northern farmer boasts—he did not work and fuss and worry over all the details of farm management as much as his compeer of the North, nor was his sense of fitness outraged by a lack of completeness and order which would have driven the farmer of the Middle States into an insane asylum. There was a sort of laxity about his methods which it was hard for the Northern man to distinguish from slothfulness. Yet he watched with care the development of the crops, the progress of his work, and was no doubt a better director of labor than could generally be found upon the Northern farm. With ignorant labor and crude machinery he achieved good results. Very few Northern farmers who have attempted to compete with him since the war have found any material advantage on their side. It is especially with regard to the domestic life of the South, however, that false ideas prevailed at the North. The planter's family has always been credited with hospitality of a lavish, careless kind, but a very small proportion of the people of the North have ever supposed that the planter's wife was very generally a Martha of the most anxious and troubled variety. The difference of method betwixt the Northern and the Southern housekeeper has been so great that the former has very often been inclined to elevate a dainty nose in scorn of any professed acquirements of the latter. So too the hurly-burly of our Northern life; its sharp competition and the constant influx of the outside world have been such as to predispose us to under-estimate the charming domesticity of the Southern home. It is not often as strictly ordered nor administered with that anxiety with regard to detail that characterizes the Northern household, yet there is rarely to be found a more faithful purveyor of comforts than the mistress of a Southern plantation. The very isolation of plantation life; the rarity of strangers' visits and the care with which even the most distant family ties are remembered and acknowledged in that section, all tended to make the domestic life of the better class of the South very charming and delightful. The picture of the Dicksons, which is given in this number, is one which every person who has studied Southern life from the inside will at once recognize and appreciate. The good housewife who could not endure the baker's bread of the city, and put her loaves to rise in the back parlor because the fire was out in the kitchen, and with infinite dignity took to herself the blame of her own humiliation, is just as real and no less charming than the pretty, accomplished daughters, who took advantage of the overflow to persuade the tender-hearted but impulsive father to give them a taste of city life. We heartily commend "A Mississippi Martyr" to the attention of all those who are capable of appreciating these pleasant phases of a life whose harsher sides the logic of events has made much more familiar to the Northern reader.

It is a strange retribution that has fallen upon Carlyle since his death. Hidden in a cloud of personal obscurity during his life, he thundered against fraud and shams, cursing, in a strange jargon, all of his living fellow-men, and professing to find virtue and truth and honesty only in the dead. He claimed to be the especial champion of the true, the beautiful and the strong. Pettiness, meanness and hypocrisy were his especial objects of attack. He yearned unceasingly for an exalted manhood, of which he would have us believe that the world had no perfect type, unless, led by necessary inference, it should look for it in the life of the hermit philosopher himself. The world did look there, as he had invited it to do, and when it had looked, by the aid of the coarse, unconscious egotism of his own memoirs, and then through the disenchanting sincerity that appears on every page of his wife's letters—when it saw that the crusader against shams was at heart the most miserable of shams—then it not only tore him from the lofty pedestal to which he had climbed, but mocked at a life full of labor and power, indeed, but full, also, of false pretense and cowardice. Now Mrs. Oliphant, and a considerable following of those who prefer their idol to the truth, cry out against Mr. Froude for having lifted the veil and showed us Carlyle, the man. "If the masses knew all that we know, what would become of our religion?" said the priest of Isis. Whether the worship that requires that its object should be veiled from the vulgar gaze is worth preserving or not is the question which should be answered before Mr. Froude is praised or blamed. The man who assumed to denounce and scourge others cannot complain that his own shortcomings are not treated with lenity. The priest whose conduct degrades his call has no ground on which to plead for pity. Carlyle was a ruthless, merciless judge of other men. No excuse, no frailty, no repentance availed to make him stay his hand. He hunted for the mean, the base, the despicable in every nature, and held it up to scorn and ridicule without pity or hesitation. It is a sad but just retribution that exposes him now to a like treatment at the hands of those he scourged.

In venturing the assertion in our last number that an earnest and intelligent expression of American opinion would be far more efficient in remedying the evils of Ireland than wholesale denunciation or dynamite plottings, we hardly expected our words to receive such swift confirmation as is afforded by the remarks of the London Times on the brief speech of General Grant with reference to the subject. The "Thunderer" demands somewhat querulously that the American people should remember that misgovernment in Ireland is a thing of the past, and that the clear purpose and intent of the English Government now is to remedy with all possible despatch the resultant evils.

That there is a distinct and praiseworthy intent to better the condition of Ireland on the part of the Government and the people of Great Britain, there can be no reasonable doubt. That there is an almost universal conviction that speedy and radical relief must be administered, there is abundant evidence. That Mr. Gladstone is one of the noblest and ablest statesmen the world has produced—a man of most admirable temper and of the highest conscience—must be apparent to all who regard the course he has pursued without the bias of prejudice. That he is willing to do more than any English statesman ever did before, the Land Act of itself furnishes the most ample testimony. That the task which lies before him is one of the most difficult and delicate that any ruler ever faced, any one who will study the condition of England as affected by the evils which have culminated in Ireland cannot hesitate to admit. At the same time, when a nation boasting of its prosperity, ever mindful of its power and dignity, can find no better method of remedying the evils that afflict a portion of its people than "assisting" its pauper peasantry to emigrate to another country, it is yet too soon to declare that misgovernment is a thing of the past. If England can find nothing better for Ireland to do than to furnish five thousand "assisted" emigrants a month for the American people to feed and clothe and offer the chances of work and shelter and self-support, it had better stop prating about good intentions for a while, and try good works instead. Any country is a victim of misgovernment where, after three years of constant agitation, no remedy can be found for starvation better than expatriation. There is no sufficient ground for the claim that the soil of Ireland will not support its present population. The only question is how its productive character shall be utilized for the support of its people. That question the British Government is called upon to solve, and must solve, before it can honestly claim that misgovernment is a thing of the past.

**

THERE is hardly to be found in history a more contemptible and humiliating acknowledgment than that which a member of the British Government made in the House of Commons a few days ago. In reply to an interpellation in regard to the protest of the Governor of Massachusetts against the shipment of "assisted" Irish paupers to that state, it was said that "the government had carefully attended to securing a due proportion of productive and non-productive persons among the 'assisted' emigrants." The statement itself is a confession of the most puerile and contemptible incapacity. The English Government, with all its boasted wealth and power and dignity, does not deny that it has shipped helpless and unproductive paupers to another country; that it has tried to shift the burden of its own mismanagement upon American shoulders; but simply alleges in excuse, "We only shipped a due proportion of unproductive, helpless paupers." The first duty of any government is to care for its own poor, and the British Government, when it ships its "assisted" paupers by the thousand to the United States, is in no more dignified a position than the Swiss cantons when they send us their criminals and cretins. Our government has lately refused to allow the Chinese to land upon its shores, hardly one of whom has ever become an object of public charity. This was said to have been done in self-defense as a protection to our labor and a necessary condition of prosperity. How much more strongly would this reasoning apply to the exclusion of "assisted" emigrants? It is altogether possible that the course of the British Government in this respect may necessitate important legislation here.

THE modern school of morbid anatomists in fiction get a thorough and well-deserved scourging at the hands of the late Sidney Lanier, whose lectures on the English novel have just been published. The theory that the novelist should simply reproduce the lives he meets with, dirt and all, the only test of merit being the accuracy of the delineation and the brightness of the dialogue, is the most degrading view of the domain of art that has ever been formulated. A novel without a purpose is the counterpart of a man without an object. One written for mere amusement may be either good or bad, but, at the very best, is only the lowest form of art. A picture which tells a story is infinitely greater and better than one which has none to tell. A work of imagination which conveys a useful or ennobling thought performs the true function of the novel. It may be, like Scott's wonderful creations, designed only to make the dead past live again for the reader; or, like Dickens' "Nicholas Nickleby," Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables," or "Uncle Tom's Cabin," it may be designed to paint some form of woe for which the universal heart ought to throb with boundless pity; or it may undertake that grander and broader work which is ever unfulfilled—the depiction of the good and true in contrast with the weak and false, as a stimulus to virtue and a scourge to vice. In either case the novel, according to the theory of Lanier, becomes the message of a strong, brave individual addressed to the heart and brain of his fellow-man. It may be a message of piety or patriotism; it may be one of self-sacrifice and devotion to the right; it may be one of humility and cheerfulness—whatever it is, it must always be the story of a soul, and not the picture of a mere animal. The three most perfect examples of the story written merely to reproduce a form of life, without purpose or aim other than the mere exhibition of skill in delineation, are probably "The Decameron," "Tom Jones" and "Nana." Of these, the last is the worst in its moral effects, simply because it is the best in its execution. Zola is the most skilled artist that the school of morbid anatomists has yet produced. He depicts vileness with just the same brilliancy as purity, and cares not a fig for the contrast, save to give the proper light and shade to his picture. The novel with a purpose has rarely done any evil to the reader. The novel without a purpose has lent itself easily to human degradation. Art which debases is as much lower than art which elevates as the fallen angel is below the white-winged messenger of light and love.

OUR readers who remember the quaint chapters of "The House that Jill Built" will be glad to welcome the genial author to our pages once more. "All Out-Doors" is designed to aid every one who has a bit of ground about his house in making it more attractive and home-like. How to get the most comfort for the least money out of house and grounds seems to be the question which this author is specially fitted to answer in the most agreeable manner.

IN his latest novel,¹ Thomas Hardy has treated a delicate subject in a manner worse than unsatisfactory. The Tower itself appears to be a very harmless sort of structure. It is of pleasing design and draped with picturesque descriptions; but innocent words, like ivy, are sometimes made to cover foulness and decay.

The plan of the story is rather ingenious. Lady Viviette is the unhappy wife of Sir Blount Constantine, who travels afar while she remains in seclusion at the great house beside an English church. Across the fields, on the top of old historic Ring's Hill Tower, a handsome boy, not yet twenty, pursues his astronomical studies. She is his superior in station and intellect, and is eight years his senior; yet, though a delicate, high-minded woman, she loves this Adonis—the author calls it love—and shows that she does. Sir Blount now conveniently dies in Africa, and the lovers hasten separately to London for a secret marriage. Returning, they only meet in private. Appears on the stage a church bishop, disagreeable and conceited, who makes love to Viviette. She refuses him; then hears that Sir Blount did not die until after the date of her marriage to Swithin St. Cleeve; so that was an idle ceremony, and she is free. The boy-lover receives a bequest conditioned on his not marrying for some years, and she induces him to start on a long astronomical expedition. After his departure, she discovers a situation of affairs which drives her to accept a second offer from the bishop. She becomes a wife at once, her explanatory letter reaching Swithin after she has become the mother of their child, of whom the bishop is the supposed father. Years pass: the putative parent dies; the real one returns, "shocked at her worn and faded aspect." After meeting Viviette coldly, he finally condescends to say he has "come to marry her." But he is not compelled to make good his word, for "sudden joy had touched an overstrained heart too smartly. Viviette was dead. The bishop was avenged."

We should think so! But who avenges the public for having thrust upon it such a travesty of womanhood? Who avenges womanhood? The picture is so artistically and morally at fault, despite its careful and admirable execution, that it is a wonder to see it hung in one of the foremost galleries of the times. Let us look at its raison d'être.

It is to show how far a refined, pure woman may be driven by most frightful and perplexing circumstances; but, in order to do this, the author has overstepped the boundaries of nature. Could Viviette love a boy like St. Cleeve? Had they one thing, in the world or out of it, in common? The mature, disciplined woman was older than her years—the boy was younger than his. Evidently the only tie, which was that existing without the sanction of a higher union of intellect or sentiment or soul, is shameless and degrading. The attachment was not vital—witness the little impression made on the youth, who almost forgets her when away. And she—she is a rag-bag, painted and dressed by a man who knows little of the being he tries to copy. Mr. Hardy should have concocted a female of the Charles Reade order—a lovely kind of an animal. And what of her sudden marriage with the bishop, of her deceit in going direct from an alliance with a man she loved to another whom she did not, in doing which she concealed, not her sin, but her mistake? Could anything be more corrupt, more revolting? She is made to write, "What woman has a right to blight a coming life?" but no hint is given of the blight thrown on the innocent babe by the natural effect of such treachery and dishonor on the part of the mother. We are led to suppose she did the best she could under the conditions of the case. Have we lighted upon a time when whited sepulchres are at a premium?

But there is still greater wrong done to woman. There is a cool thrust at all that is lovely and pure. For the novelist gives no sign that such a woman could not have lived to become the wife of a man she hated while upon her was the mystery and sanctity of coming motherhood; that it was impossible for her, in fact, to become perfidious to every Divine law of her being. She could never have shielded herself under the cover of such a lie.

Never was more hideousness conveyed in a simple story—never a deadlier stab dealt to all that woman holds most precious. The realism of Zola is sufficiently atrocious, but it is not seductive. The more attractive French writers artfully veil their sophistries; but for cool sensualism, expressed in decorous ingenuousness, combined with ignorance of what woman really is, in soul, feeling and purpose, commend us to "Two on a Tower."

"THE PRINCESS OF AMÉLIE" is the title of the next novel in the "No Name" series, French court-life being the setting for the story.

THE new novel upon which Miss Noble, the author of "A Reverend Idol," is engaged, deals partly with Washington life, and is awaited with interest.

MR. H. W. WARREN'S "Recreations in Astronomy," published by the Harpers, has had an extraordinary success, ten thousand copies having been sold in the last three months.

TWO royal octavo volumes are to hold a new view of "The Real Lord Byron," the designer of this new portrait being Mr. John Cordy Jeaffreson, who has given long study to his subject.

A NEW edition of "Jocoseria" has been called for, and the demand for the various editions of Browning's poems is steadily increasing. The poet has written a song which will appear in Harper's Magazine for July, and which is to be illustrated by Rosina Emmett.

MISS LUCY LARCOM, who has recently lectured on "Women as Lyric Poets," declares Mrs. Sigourney, Hannah Gould and Alice and Phoebe Cary to be the representative American female lyrists. Those who know Miss Larcom's work will at once add her own name to the list, from which she naturally excluded it.

A NEW Congregational monthly, to be called The Andover Review, is to begin life in the autumn. The publishers will be Houghton, Mifflin & Co., and the editors, Professors Smyth, Tucker, Harris and Hicks, of Andover. With a Boston branch grafted on to the Christian Union, the Congregationalists will have full opportunity for speaking their minds.

"A WALK IN HELLAS," Mr. D. J. Snider's description of a town in Greece, was printed for private circulation some time ago, and so heartily enjoyed by all who were fortunate enough to see it, that a demand arose for an edition for the general public, which has been issued by J. R. Osgood & Co., as well as a second edition of Mrs. Greenough's poem, "Mary Magdalene."

CERVANTES' longest and most noteworthy poem, "The Voyage to Parnassus," has been translated by Mr. F. Y. Gibson, and has lately appeared in London. One or two other translations are added, the most interesting being the rhymed letter written by Cervantes, while a captive in Algiers, to Mateo Vazquez, the private secretary of Philip II. In it he tells the story of his misfortunes, and then proposes a scheme for the liberation of the Christian captives and the conquest of the Algerian kingdom.

DR. SCHLIEMANN'S work in German and English on his latest excavations is nearly ready. He wrote recently to Karl Blind: "Proofs in point of fact of your views as to the kinship between Trojans and Thracians, which latter were interpreted as belonging to the Eastern Teutonic race, I have found near and in the tumulus of Proterilaos, in the Thracian Chersonese; for the gardens all around, and the tumulus itself, are strewn with fragments of that wonderful pottery which only occurs in the first and oldest settlement of Troy, and nowhere else."

MRS. LILLIE DEVEREUX BLAKE, known as a devoted and fearless champion of woman suffrage, made it her business to reply to Dr. Dix as his Lenten Lectures to women went on, and the four lectures are now incorporated in a small volume of Lovell's Library. They are as open to criticism as those of Dr. Dix, for Mrs. Blake is as uncompromising and defiant as she is witty; but while her good taste may sometimes be questioned her earnestness and real feeling and tenderness are beyond any doubt. (Paper, pp. 173, 20 cents; John W. Lovell Company, New York).

MR. WORTHINGTON C. FORD has completed the second part of "The American Citizen's Manual: the Functions of Governments, State and Federal," embodying in it an amount of information seldom found in as small space or in as clear and intelligible English. The series of "Questions of the Day," of which this forms the fifth number, is one of the most valuable of the many before the public, and is to be increased by many other studies, which promise to prove of as much importance as the present one. (12mo, pp. 184, $1.00; G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York).

MR. WHITTIER, in discussing the recent Carlyle correspondences, said lately: "Carlyle seems to have had none of the milk of human kindness in his veins. His letters show a side of his character which none of his intimate friends suspected. It would have been better for his reputation if they had never been published. In fact, so strongly have they affected myself that I have set to work and destroyed the major part of my correspondence, covering a period of over fifty years, lest it should be published after my death and bring suffering to any. I wish that all of the letters I have written could be treated by my friends in the same manner."

THOUGH Dr. Day's treatise "On Headaches: Their Causes, Nature and Treatment," belongs to the "Octavo Series of Standard Medical Books," it is of great interest also to the general reader, who, though often requiring a medical dictionary for the explanation of technical terms, will find much information as to the causes of this affliction and many hints that will, if carried out, go far toward the cure of the tendency. The chapter on headaches in childhood and early life is especially valuable, but the section on nervous headaches will be found equally so, and to young practitioners particularly it will be of the greatest service. (8vo, pp. 147, 75 cents; P. Blakiston, Son & Co., Philadelphia).

ALPHONSE DAUDET, whose powerful, if one-sided, novel, "L'Evangeliste," has made him, for the time being, one of the most thoroughly discussed men in Paris, is an enormous worker, capable of writing sixteen hours out of the twenty-four. He rises every morning at seven, and after half an hour's fencing or sabre practice, lights his pipe and begins to write. He nearly killed himself by overwork upon "Les Rois en Exil." One night, believing that he was dying, he called his wife and had only time to say to her, "Finish my book!" when he was almost suffocated by hemorrhage, and fell back unconscious. Madame Daudet is said to be herself a delicate literary artist, and she takes her share in her husband's work as well as in his happiness.

WHOEVER recalls Nadaud's poem, "Carcassonne," translated not long ago by Mr. E. W. Sherwood, will find that for him, at least, there need not be the plaintive reflection,

"A dream I had when life was new;
Alas, our dreams! they come not true;
I thought to see fair Carcassonne,
That lovely city—Carcassonne!"

So well is it pictured in Dr. Vincent R. Marvin's graceful little volume of travels, "In the Shadow of the Pyrenees. From Basque Land to Carcassonne," that the "lovely city" is before one's eyes, and not alone the city, but the whole region of somewhat unfamiliar country. Dr. Vincent is a close observer of nature, and he is also a student of men. The book abounds in bits of keen characterization and vivid description, his chapter on "The Basques" giving the results not only of personal observation but of the best scientific researches into the history of this strange people, whose day as a distinct nation is practically over. The volume, which is a beautiful specimen of book-making, has four etchings by Smillie, Gifford and Yale, with excellent maps, and is altogether an exceedingly attractive addition to the literature of travel. (12mo, pp. 276, $2.00; Charles Scribner's Sons, New York).

FORTY essays on scientific subjects would seem a rather heavy dose for the general reader, that dreaded abstraction always before the author's and publisher's eyes, yet the most skeptical as to interest will find "Science in Short Chapters" as fascinating as a novel. Mr. W. Matthieu Williams, the author, is a thoroughly scientific man, but, unlike many of the guild, he is master of a very charming style, and he has also great felicity in his selection of titles, as witness, "The Oleaginous Products of Thames Mud," "World Smashing," "Iron Filings in Tea," and a host of others calculated to catch the attention of even a jaded reader. Profit and pleasure are very happily combined, and the book deserves a wide circulation. (Standard Library, No. 81, 12mo, pp. 308, $1.00; Funk & Wagnalls, New York).

BISHOP THOROLD'S "The Claim of Christ on the Young" is a little volume made up of six sermons preached at considerable intervals, but all with one exception, at St. Mary's, Oxford, and before the young men whom he sought to reach. Their chief aim is to develop character. "Thoroughness, both in aim and execution, is an essential condition of success in the Christian life." And this thoroughness he urges with an intensity that was part of his own nature. There is a stimulating quality in the little book not always to be found in sermons. (12mo, pp. 128, $1.00; A. D. F. Randolph & Co.). From the same publishers comes "A Blind Man's Creed, and Other Sermons," by the Rev. Charles Parkhurst, D. D., the first one having as key-note John Hay's well-known poem of the blind man before the sanhedrim. "I know not what this man may be, sinner or saint; but as for me, one thing I know, that I am he who once was blind, but now I see." Dr. Parkhurst believes more in faith than in thought, but his purpose is earnest, his style very simple and straightforward, with touches often of real poetic feeling, and the many readers of sermons will find these a valuable addition to the list. (12mo, pp. 246, $1.25; A. D. F. Randolph & Co.).

MR. HENRY J. NICOLL, in his "Landmarks of English Literature," has adopted a plan so satisfactory that it is surprising it has not been carried out before. He states a few biographical facts, and then adds the estimate of the latest and presumably best-informed writer who has summed up the author under consideration. The judgment of a fine mind always carries weight, and, even when opposed to one's own view, often serves in forming a clearer estimate; and we have had so much crude and practically valueless work of late in this direction, that it is really comforting to find an author who has judgment enough to know a good thing when he sees it, and to give us criticisms that are keen and trenchant. It is the verdict of to-day, with all the light the nineteenth century has been able to throw upon disputed points, the opinions of the last ten years being most largely represented; and thus, as a summary of recent thought, it is of rare value, though it must be used as appendage and never as substitute for the masters of work in this direction. Mr. Nicoll makes little attempt to think for himself, though his judgment, where he does, is thoughtful and sound, and the plan of the book precludes any necessity for it; but he has made a volume which every reader will find of solid value, and which can take its place on the reference shelf as an authoritative estimate of the chief periods in English literary life. (12mo, pp. 458, $2.00; D. Appleton & Co., New York).

THE "Shah-Namah," written by Ferdusi, the Persian, in the tenth century, has always been counted as one of the six great epics of the world, but the western people have practically known little of it. Sir William Jones said that if it was read in the original it would rival Homer in invention; but few scholars seem to have agreed with him; and where thousands have worked on the "Iliad," not a dozen have been attracted by Ferdusi. Several translations have, however, been attempted, but the most successful was made by Professor Jules Mohl into French. From this work Miss Helen Zimmern has drawn the material for a volume just issued by Henry Holt & Co., New York. It is illustrated by two etchings by Alma Tadema, and has a prefatory poem by Edmund W. Gosse. In the original there are at least 56,000 couplets, for each of which Ferdusi was promised a piece of gold, making the largest sum a poet laureate was ever paid. Some authorities say that he finally received 100,000 pieces of gold, but if he did he must have taken them as a tardy compensation for broken promises, for years of exile after the work was completed. The stories as given by Miss Zimmern tell of mighty kings and their sons, of Deevs, of battle and of love. They are all marked by a graceful and most kindly imagination, and the "Shah-Namah" may be said to be the most gentle and Christian of the epics. Might never makes right in these vivid pages, and the wrong always finds an avenger. There are poetic and graceful little passages constantly occurring; and although it is the translation of a translation, and so, possibly, loses vigor and color, it is an interesting and valuable work. (339 pp., $2.50).

THE "Leisure Hour Series" is always sure of readers, having, since its initial volume appeared, given us some of the best that modern fiction affords. In No. 146 a new author presents herself. "A Story of Carnival," by Mary A. M. Hoppus, is the first appearance before an American public, though an earlier venture in England has been favorably received. Distrust is the reader's attitude in the beginning, and necessarily, for we are all a little tired of Italy, and dread any farther description of scenes that are far more familiar to us than many much nearer home. But suspicion ceases with the first chapter. It is a new and vigorous touch, and a strong personality underlies every page. It is a group of artists to whom we are first introduced—Clissold and his wife and sister; Gilbert Harvey, a young Englishman who has left the law for portrait-painting; Clement Tremayne, a distant cousin and a young widower and old friend of the Clissolds; and later on, Geoffrey Harvey, Gilbert's step-brother. There is a background of picturesque models and the usual accessories of artist life, but the story hinges on Gilbert's rather weak and dilatory temperament, and his love for Christal, the youngest member of the Clissold family, whom he fancies in love with Tremayne. In a state of very wretched uncertainty, he is tormented by Manente, an intriguing Italian, who professes to have proof that his father's first and only legal marriage had been to a Roman girl, whose beauty had bewitched him in his youth, and who is still alive, thus making the subsequent marriages void. With this problem confronting him, Gilbert is accepted finally by Christal, without giving her any inkling of the toils that seem to involve them all. There is final discovery—an almost rupture with the girl who can pardon everything but deceit, and who is reconciled at last because love is strong enough to make forgiveness possible. The mystery is explained satisfactorily, though a tragedy ends the story, which is full of quiet humor, of very keen and delicate characterization, and of a dramatic power which stops just short of sensationalism. There is better work to come from the same hand. (16mo, pp. 304, $1.00; Henry Holt & Co.).

Veni!

Vidi!

Vici!

The Wreck o' the Mary Ann.

FULL oft upon the drowsy watch,
'Twixt five and seven bells,
The hardy sailor to his mates
This tale of horror tells:

She walked the roaring surf beside
When darkling was the night,
To watch the play o' the rising tide
And the billows green and white.

Her locks were of the glorious hue
That Titian loved to paint,
When on his breathing canvas grew
A Venus or a saint.

All ghostly, 'gainst the murky sky,
There gleamed a swelling sail:
Tears sprang into the maiden's eye—
The maiden's cheek was pale.

For why she wept, I may not say;
Yet well did she to weep,
Her tears went with the flying spray
And mingled with the deep.

A fated bark was that, I ween,
A fated bark was she,
With bellied sail and wild careen,
That plowed the foaming sea.

The Jersey coast was on her lee;
Yet fearlessly and fast,
With royals set and running free,
She sped before the blast.

To where the sounding breakers toss,
Upon the bar she ran:
And underwriters mourn the loss
O' the good ship Mary Ann.

For, champing bolt and iron band
In floods of angry spume,
The waves came trampling up the strand
With gaff and spanker boom.

Full far and wide her relics borne
Upon the shore are cast,
The cordage from her tackle torn,
And plank and helm and mast.

The maiden's locks were of the hue
That Titian loved to paint,
When on his breathing canvas grew
A Venus or a saint.

Her lurid hair—you need not stare—
The pilot he mistook
('Twas thus he swore the court before)
For th' light at Sandy Hook.

Still oft upon the drowsy watch,
'Twixt five and seven bells,
The reckless sailor to his mates
This tale of horror tells.

JENKINS.

The Mystery Solved.

"What is that, mother—that curious thing,
Ambling the streets with a languid swing;
With a spike-tail coat, a gorgeous vest
And eye-glass dangling on its breast;
With dog-skin gloves and bell-crowned hat,
And such poor, thin legs, and a stomach flat?
Eerie and weird it looks to me.
Oh, mother, what can the creature be?"

"Oh, hush, child! hush! 'tis no goblin rude—
'Tis only a harmless little 'dude!'"

"But what is a 'dude?' Oh, mother dear,
How did they make a thing so queer?
Did it grow while we were fast asleep,
Like the grass and the geese and the pretty sheep?
Do you think that Barnum drew the plan,
To have something new for his caravan?
It walks like a chicken. Can it fly?
Will you tell me about it by-and-by?"

"There 's little to tell, my child; 'tis plain—
'Tis the form of a man, with a monkey's brain!"

LUCY M. BLINN.

In Memoriam.

THOU art departed hence; I shall no more
Smooth down thy coat of variegated fur,
The while I hearken to thy dulcet purr.
Thy spiritual tread across the floor,
Three-cornered visage, looking in my door,
Sporadic battles with the vagrant cur—
All these with thee I mournfully inter,
And thy too certain end hereby deplore.

Now will thy shade pursue its ghostly prey;
Thou wilt thy toilette make in ghostly wise,
And with thy incorporeal kittens play,
Whose spirits fled ere they had oped their eyes;
Whose race was run upon their natal day,
When the pellucid brooklet hushed their cries.

THE PRISON-VAN.

AMONG THE JERSEY CRABBERS.

“WE MAY be slow down here, and maybe we don't know a great deal, but we can beat 'em all on boats and soft crabs, sir; yes, sir, soft-shell crabs.”

Among the crabbers of Shrewsbury River this modest but patriotic sentiment is fixed and unalterable. It is like the people themselves. Of things beyond the line of bluffs, that like a frowning wall shuts out the world, they know but little, and are therefore modest; but concerning the life along the shore, from tidewater to the sea, none could be more self-assertive or autocratic. Beyond the bluffs lies the vague, uncertain world; along the shore are things which go to make up the crabber's life; they are his own; he can grasp them and know that present facts are beyond dispute. A stranger might invade the crab country with tales of every land beneath the sun and find no objection; but let him, even for a moment, touch upon boats and soft-shell crabs, and he would find his opinions overturned, trampled upon and buried by the overwhelming array of facts which every crabber carries around in some hidden recess in his mind. It is probable that the location of the crab country determines, in a great measure, the character of the people. With New York forty miles to the northeast, and Long Branch five miles to the southwest, it does not seem strange that the crabbers should have a modest opinion of their own social standing; while the fixed intensity with which they adhere to the Shrewsbury River, and to their calling, precludes the necessity of saying that they are by nature dogmatic to a remarkable degree.

The crab country is not difficult of access when once its location is definitely fixed; but if the visitor attempt to find it without a clear idea of routes and distances he might spend the best part of his summer vacation in wandering aimlessly over the sands of New Jersey.

The quickest way either from Philadelphia or New York is by rail to Red Bank, and ultimately by stage or other uncertain conveyance to Fair Haven. A pleasanter ride from New York is by steamboat to any point on the Shrewsbury River.

The summer visitor was beginning to emerge from his winter chrysalis—the perfume of the spring was mingling with the warm breath of coming summer—when the artist and the writer, leaving thoughts of the world and the humdrum of everyday life in the little station at Red Bank, swung out into the winding country road that leads to Fair Haven and the sea beyond. Over on a hill to the right, a summer hotel flashed back from its bare white expanse and its unprotected windows a blinding, unrelenting glare. It is so widely at variance and out of harmony with the green fields, the trees and the purple hills, that the visitor instinctively wonders, without the trouble of a second thought, why summer hotels could not be built less like great white paper-boxes and more like human habitations.

There are cottages with climbing vines; there are apple orchards in full bloom along the highway; and as we stroll under the trees and trample the delicate flowers under foot, in the indolent effort to find a short path to the next turn in the road, we come upon a little cottage, half hidden among trees and vines. An aged man, almost as weather-beaten in appearance as his unpretentious dwelling, sits on the doorstep absorbed in the apparently hopeless task of fashioning a dip-net out of an old barrel hoop and a ball of twine.

"Crabs?" he says slowly, with the rising inflection, as he evidently makes a desperate effort to collect his erratic mental forces to answer a casual question. "Crabs? Ye-es; crabs. Oh, you want soft crabs, eh? O'roo!" And he fixed his shrinking eyes upon the rusty barrel hoop in utter silence.

"Well, where will we find the shipping point in the crab country?"

"Oh, yes," he exclaimed with startling suddenness, as an idea seemed to strike him. "How many crabs would you want? I might be able to get 'em for you by sundown if I can get this 'ere net made. Eh? Oh, you want to see the crab country? Well, you jest go on down to Fair Haven village and find Frank Little. He's been to New York with loads of crabs. Mebbe you've met him there?"

A shower of apple-blossoms fell upon the old man's head, and leaving him with his seemingly endless task we sauntered up a long slope and passed through Fair Haven before we had thought that we were nearing its suburbs. It was an easy matter to find "Frank" Little. The village postmaster, who acted as general directory for Fair Haven and the surrounding country, thought it likely that the entire Little family might be found on the beach below the old wharf. The road to the beach is lined with trees that toss their branches over the doorways of pretty little houses, encircled in by flowering gardens and rustic fences. Near the river the road takes a violent dip downward, and the stroller continues his way out to the bluff above the hotel. The broad river, hemmed in by far-away lines of dusky hills, shines in the sun as still and calm as an inland sea; sails that look like specks of gray against the sky hover on the horizon; black dots of boats, with flashing oars, creep across the bright expanse like sea-birds trying to spread their wings; the water sleeps beneath the moss-grown wharf and murmurs at the rude awakening against the shore; fishermen, with their nets and baskets, idling in the shade of overhanging trees; peace, plenty and content in every face—in everything. In such a place, in such an air, one might dream away his life and take no heed of time.

On the smooth bottom of an upturned boat on the beach we find two men lazily playing at cards. One of them, a young man in a blue shirt, canvas trowsers and wide-brimmed straw hat, is "Frank" Little, the autocrat of all the crabbers. His position comes to him through his family, the founder of which was the original Shrewsbury crabber. The game is "pinochle," and as we watch it the autocrat's opponent, who in addition to his dress of blue and white, wears a red handkerchief about his neck, confesses himself beaten by nine hundred points, and rises, indolently drawing:

"Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud?"

It is not known that Shakspeare made any definite connection between the tragedy of Macbeth and the game of pinochle; but any combination is possible with the genuine crabber. Mr. Little shows the chief characteristic of his family by presenting to us the freedom of the bay.

In the spring the crab makes the cardinal mistake of his life. Were it not for a seemingly insane desire to leave the mud in the bed of the river and to enjoy himself among his friends in the shallows, he might live to a good old age, secure from the follies of youth or the dip-net of the crabber. Like the human family, however, he finds that his overtaxed system needs relaxation in the summer resorts; and like his human friends, he is pretty sure to be sorry that he did not stay at home during the whole season. Late in April the crab throws prudence to the winds and swims out to shallow water, where the sun may shine down upon his delicately-tinted shell. In a week he is exposed for sale in the city markets.

Leaving my friend, the artist, in the contemplation of the lights and shadows beneath the old wharf, I went worth; and now the best man gits the crabs. You see, there's no law for crabs as there is for oysters, and we have to git up pretty early in the morning to git the bulge on one another."

"The good old days is all gone," says "Charley" Hendrickson, an old-time crabber, as he ranges alongside in his boat. "Why, a few years ago, a crabber got up at seven or eight o'clock in the mornin', caught his crabs as they was a-runnin', an' knocked off work in the afternoon. Now he gits up at two or three o'clock in the mornin', works like a pack-mule, ketches every kind of a crab that comes along, and don't make no more money than he did then. No, sir; this new-fangled way ain't no improvement to an old man like me, as can't work twenty-seven hours a day."

ALONG THE SHORE.

away with the autocrat and became a crabber for a day. The crabber's boat is a light open skiff, sixteen feet long and perhaps four feet wide amidships. It is fitted with four small water-tight compartments, which may be opened or closed by means of loosely-fitting covers. These compartments are called "wells," and are used as game-bags for the convenience of captured crabs. They fill with water through auger holes in the bottom of the boat.

"It used to be," said the autocrat as he ran the boat out into the river—"it used to be that I had all the water below the wharf, and 'Charley' Hendrickson all the water above; but the fellers down Oceanic way began to work our grounds, and though we fought 'em off time and time again, it got monotonous like, and we just sailed in and worked their grounds for all they was

In spite of all his regrets for the rosy past, "Charley" is the jolliest character on the river, and is as much of an expert in the crab industry as the autocrat himself. Our boat floats down with the tide, the autocrat standing in the bow. In his hands is a dip-net, fastened to the end of a long pole, which serves the double purpose of propelling the boat and of reaching after crabs. The crabber stands like a statue, silent and still, with the long pole thrust out over the water. The river shines like a mirror upturned to the sun, and the pebbles and the shells on the bottom are as plainly to be seen as the pebbles and the shells on shore. But for the roving eyes of the crabber the bay seems asleep in the drowsy air. The boat trembles and rocks slightly, as the crabber's position is transformed into that of intense attention. Slowly the long pole moves out over the water until the hanging net disturbs the surface. Suddenly the crabber throws it from him with a splash, and as it rises to the boat, dripping with water and stray strings of sea-grass, a crab is struggling in the meshes of the net.

"Ha! a 'comer!'" exclaims the crabber. "He's a beauty, too."

A "comer," I am told, is a hard-shell crab that will be ready to shed his shell in a short time, probably in three days. After this preliminary state of development he becomes a "shedder," showing unmistakable signs that he will crawl out of his shell in a day or two. When the "comers" and the "shedders" are captured they are transferred from the "wells" in the crabber's boat to a "car," a sort of crabber's "Black Maria," or prison-van, and towed to the stockade, a big prison-pen made of stakes driven into the bed of the river a short distance from shore. In the stockade the crabs are under the care of a crabber, who makes daily inspections of the prisoners. After remaining in the pen a short time the "shedder" becomes a "buster." In this stage of development he breaks open his shell at the point where the upper and under shells meet. He feels that he is getting too big for his old clothes, and that he ought to have a new spring outfit of the latest marine design. The sentinel at the stockade immediately seizes the ambitious crab in a dip-net and transfers him to a "car" for safe-keeping.

In two or three hours the "buster" forsakes his old shell and ventures out into the world alone and becomes a soft crab. The change is so delightful and of such importance that the happy crab expands to twice his old size, and no doubt feels greatly surprised, as he looks at the discarded shell, that he ever lived in the old place with any degree of content. It would not be difficult to imagine that, as he gazes in amazement at the discarded shell and then at his own plump proportions, he involuntarily exclaims, "Well, did I ever live in that insignificant place?"

Whatever may be the soft crab's contempt for his old home, or whatever his ambition to make the best of his new state in life, he does not leave the immediate neighborhood of the old shell until he feels convinced that he can defend himself against attacks from hard crabs that have cannibalistic instincts. It is in this soft, fat condition that the crab is best fitted for the table, and it is in this stage in life that he is packed in flat, wooden boxes and shipped to the New York markets.

In a state of freedom, as soon as the crab emerges from his shell, he at once begins to harden. In a few hours, often with the ebb of a single tide, he becomes a "buckler," and is well on the way toward the hard state. A slight pressure on the back of a "buckler" will cause his shell to snap back and forth like a piece of tin. In a single day a soft crab stretches out into a "buckler;" his fat goes into growth, and he becomes little better than shell and water. In two or three weeks he is ready to shed his shell again and to take another ambitious rise in life.

The autocrat's boat and a prison-van towing along behind were filled with "comers," "shedders" and a few "busters," as we rowed slowly back to the stockade. On the way we found "Charley" Hendrickson and old "Uncle Billy" Chadwick drawing a seine along shore. The seine was about fifty feet in length, and was worked without a windlass. "Uncle Billy" held the shore end while "Charley" waded into the shallow water in a wide semi-circle, the seine-sinkers dragging smoothly on the bottom and the corks bobbing up and down in a graceful curve. When "Charley" and "Uncle Billy" got abreast of each other, a few feet from shore, they gripped the seine handles tightly and made a rush for the smooth shingle. The seine came out half filled with struggling crabs.

"Not much of a haul this time," said "Uncle Billy," a look of unspeakable disgust chasing away his usually placid smile; "that durned seine turned over on us. Now, look a-there!" he growled, kicking at a fish that bore a strong resemblance to a particularly vicious-looking cat-fish, "ef there ain't a 'Sally Growler' a-eatin' up what little haul we did make. Com' 'ere, durn ye, an' I'll kick ye into th' middle o' next week. There! how does that suit you?" The "Sally Growler" went flying out over the water, but it still clung to the largest "buster" in the seine.

A solitary crabber was standing guard over the stockade when the autocrat's boat swung around to leeward to deposit its load of "comers" and "shedders." At spasmodic and uncertain intervals this sentinel threw into the stockade handfuls of a substance resembling Indian meal mush.

"I'm a-feedin' 'em," he said, in answer to a question. "Crabs, like most folks, can't live on nothin', an' so we mashes up some clams, some fish, or some meat, or horse-feed, or almost anything we can get right handy. It don't do to feed 'em too much, or they'd git fat an' die. If we don't feed 'em they'll eat one another, like the unfortunat crew of the Nancy Bell. P'raps you've heerd tell o' that—how them sailors eat one another till there was only one man left? Yes? Well, crabs is the same way. I don't blame a hard crab nor a 'Sally Growler' fer tryin' to eat a sof' crab; 'tis nateral. I'd do it myself." With the consciousness of having said a pretty good thing, this ancient son of Shrewsbury broke into a smile that threatened great inconvenience to the back of his head. "Uncle Billy" looked upon him with a quaint smile of mild approval, if not of actual pride.

The stockades are scattered along shore from tide-water to Oceanic. An industrious crabber, who owns several boats and buys crabs for shipment, will have a stockade forty feet square, while a crabber who owns but one boat, or who, provided with a small dip-net, wades on the grassy bottoms with a basket slung over his shoulder, will content himself with a modest little pen built of loose driftwood. At the stockade of a middle-class crabber, who owned a few boats and kept a twenty-foot pen, I found a quaint old man, shrewd, good-natured and kindly-hearted. He was sitting on an upturned basket, sorting crabs for market. After some persuasion, he told me that, although he was known as a crabber, yet he dredged for oysters in winter, fished for eels and farmed a small patch of ground in summer, and occasionally took a hand with the wreckers on the coast. He had seen many countries, and the suns and winds of many climes had given his face the appearance of old leather. While he talked of crabs and eels and summer boarders and such things, a little girl, carrying a basket, came down from the low bluff above, and asked permission to carry the crabs to the house. She was a bright, sunny child, with great black eyes and rebellious black hair—a child imbued with the spirit of absolute freedom and good-nature. She bore about her such an air of infinite grace, such a suggestion of unconscious pride, that even the most careless observer must have remarked her as different from the children of the village. It did not seem possible that this bit of sunshine could be a descendant of the rough old crabber whom she addressed as "Papa."

"My daughter," said the old man, by way of explanation, at the same time watching me from the corners of his eyes. I looked at him hard for nearly ten seconds.

"Yes?" I said; "but I had been—"

"You have been told, then?"

"Yes," I ventured, hoping for something further.

A slight spasm crossed the old crabber's face, and his eyes shrank back and turned away with an expression of actual pain. He suffered as if from fear or dread.

"It's all right, my friend," I said, laying my hand on his arm. It was but a venture, but it reassured him.

"Mister," he pleaded timidly, "you don't want her, do ye? Tell me, ye didn't come after her, did ye?"

"No," I replied, "I did not come for the little girl, but to hear the story." I felt certain that a story lay behind the old crabber's strange behavior.

"Well," said he, evidently much relieved in mind, "I can tell ye the story, but it ain't much, though it does sound like a story-book. She ain't my daughter, the little girl ain't. She's a grandee of Spain, or something o' that sort. She's a waif. She came ashore down on the coast six year ago in a ship. The ship was from some port in Spain or France, and in a gale o' wind she was blowed onto the beach, an' she was that old an' rotten that she went to pieces in less nor no time. There was a lot of us down on the beach and we went out to the wreck in a surf-boat. The captain and first mate and about half of the crew was washed into the surf an' drowned; an' there was a woman and a little two-year-old child as we took in the boat an' started for land. The boat swamped, an' the lady was never seen afterward. She must hev been carried out to sea by the undertow. I had the little one in my arms, an' as I was strung around with life-preservers, I got to shore safe. I kept the child, as there was no one to claim her; and from what the woman told me when I took the baby from her arms, I should judge that the little girl is a grandee of Spain. Yes, sir, a grandee of Spain! There was no marks on the little one's clothes, and only a little bit of a gold ring, which I keeps in the bottom of the old clock, but which I never shows to any one. Mamie, the little girl, is just the same as my own daughter, an' she always will be."

"Then you think that no one ever will come to claim her?"

"It would be a hard job for anybody to prove anything. You see, no one on board ship knew anything about her mother except the captain and first mate, and they are both dead. Maybe some one will come some day, but they'll have to prove their claim right clear, I can tell ye."

"Did you ever try to find any of her relatives?"

"Me? Why should I? She was salvage from the wreck, and I had a right to keep her. My own little daughter is lying over there in the graveyard among the trees, and it don't seem so lonesome now since Mamie came ashore. If the little girl's folks have thought her dead for six years, it ain't likely that they will make a search now, is it? And ain't Mamie just as happy with me as she would be with them?"

"She may not be."

"And why not? Don't she have enough to eat and to wear, and don't she go to school and learn as well as the rest of the children about here? And when she grows up and I'm old won't there be enough likely young fellows wantin' to take her, with me throwed into the bargain? I guess so. And if she's contented here, ain't that happiness? And does anybody want anything more 'n happiness? If she can be happy here, wouldn't it be crazy-like to want to go anywhere else?"

Gently I suggested that when the village school-days were over, and the books laid away as things of a past life, the blood of the little girl's ancestors would assert itself and cause her to feel that beyond the frowning bluffs the endless world offered greater possibilities for something greater, better, higher, and yet not knowing where to turn.

The old crabber could not understand this. He could not believe that life held out more possibilities to any one than it did to him. Beyond a good run of crabs, and peace and plenty in the little house among the trees, he had no thought, and held it impossible that any one should rise higher than the level of his content.

THE CRABBER'S HONEYMOON.

and higher pleasures than anything within the range of the crabber's imagination or ambition; that some day the crabber's little world would run on to its uttermost limits and leave the growing nature perplexed and dissatisfied, yearning

THE CRAB'S SURPRISE.

To him the stately steamboats and the white-winged vessels passing before his door meant nothing farther than means by which his crabs might be borne to market; to her they offered the possibility of an egress into that outer world of which her school-books taught, and which was covered and looked down upon by the clouds that floated away out of her sight in the distance; to him the little house and the river under the bluff met the highest thought in his life, and there could be nothing more; to her the humble crabber's life and the narrow confines that hemmed her in would soon seem meagre and unsatisfying, the village swains uncouth, and the village maidens frivolous. His nature found its level among the boats and the crabs; hers rose with the clouds, and sought to meet the level of its source. If it were possible that this little girl could loose the fetters of unknown parentage and take her place among her people in old Spain, there would be no bar between her and the happiness that may be found here on earth; but if she be compelled to remain within sight of the bluffs of her early home, and perchance mate with some honest but unlearned and unambitious toiler of the winding shore, her life, filled with a nameless longing and unrest, would wear itself away in beating against the bars that none could see or understand.

Life along shore has many simple joys that the dwellers in cities know not and cannot feel. In the lengthening shadow of the western bluff, the gossiping fishwife points out the bridal couple returning from the crabbing grounds. The bride, with bare feet and abbreviated skirts, wades through the shallow water by her husband's side. The crabs in the basket which she carries play hide-and-go-seek with her shoes and stockings, the sun kisses her blushing cheeks, and the wind tosses her hair in fitful waves about well-rounded shoulders, whose graceful curves even an ill-fitting calico dress cannot conceal. In the fading light the crabber's dip-net takes to itself the semblance of an ancient warrior's spear, the crab-basket becomes the conquering shield, and the happy bridegroom and bride are transformed into the gallant knight and his love of the days of long ago.

"A GRANDEE OF SPAIN."

As the shadows deepen and stretch out to meet the dim, dark outline of the distant hills looming up against the sky, the watcher on the bluff leans forward with the half-defined hope that the happy bridegroom will sing:

—“My love is young and fair;
My love hath golden hair:
With eyes so blue and heart so true
That none with her compare.”

But there is no sound save the murmur of the water on the shore and the creak of a swinging sail as a schooner rides at anchor.

In the evening the crabbers and their wives and children gather on the old wharf, or lounge around the boat-houses or in the open doorways, discussing the secret delights of village rumors, and watching the sullen glare of the jack-fisher's torch as it moves along with the tide in search of crabs and eels. When the moon has dipped below the horizon, and when the sky above gives out no light, jack-fishing is at its best. The crabber's boat becomes a cruiser of the night—a vague, uncertain, shadowy thing that creeps upon its prey in the darker corners with soft and stealthy step. The sleeping crab awakes to find his secret hiding-place invaded by a baleful glare upon the water, and before he can turn to flee, the unerring dip-net has been thrown at him, and he finds himself struggling with the inexorable walls of a floating prison. In the light of the jack, which hangs over the water from a thwart in the boat, the bottom of the river is as clearly to be seen as at noonday, and all crabs within reach of the crabber's dip-net are easily caught. Eels are caught by means of a three-pronged spear, and such stray fish as may be found in the shallow water become the prey of both dip-net and spear. In the bygone days, when every crabber guarded his river front with the same degree of diligence and care that he would guard his household possessions, the crab-pirates would visit the private crabbing preserves with jack-lights at the dead of night, and if they were not driven off at the muzzle of the shotgun or some other deadly weapon, they would fill their boats and sail away before day-dawn. With the jack-light extinguished, they would float along in the shadow of the bluffs without fear of detection. If closely pressed, the pirates sought refuge in the dark recesses of the old wharf, for among the dripping, moss-grown piles the pursuers dared not venture.

During nine months of the year the little hotel under the bluff at the Fair Haven landing is the only public house from Red Bank to the sea. Its patronage is neither large nor constant. In fact, a visitor or a guest is quite a phenomenon. We felt slight misgivings at first that the accommodations and attentions at the little hotel might not be all that could be wished; but when we discovered that among many other exclusive advantages advertised by the hotel were "Fishing, Bathing, Sailing, and Roads to Long Branch Unsurpassed," we felt assured that the landlord who could boldly write such an advertisement could turn every defeat into a victory and transform every annoyance into an actual comfort. We found the landlord in the bar-room playing at "pinochle" with the village weather-prophet. The walls of the little room were lined with pictures of boats and race-horses, and hand-bills of shooting-matches and last year's excursions. The landlord affected a great degree of cordiality as he invited us up stairs to the private parlor and presented us with the freedom of the house. When we mentioned the fact that we had not tasted food for twelve hours, and finally asked him at point blank range to prepare supper, a look of distress crept across his face, and settled down into the uncertain lines of his figure.

"The fact is, gentlemen," he said with dejected mildness, "my wife is not here. She went to New York yesterday, and the hired girl's off to her mother's. I'm alone here. My wife left me a cold bite to last two or three days till she got back."

He looked at us helplessly, as if his mind were utterly unable to grapple with the necessities of the occasion.

"But we must have a supper, landlord," we told him.

The lines of perplexity deepened on his forehead and around the corners of his eyes, and he wandered into the kitchen in the aimless endeavor to draw inspiration from the fireless range and the empty shelves. With his coat collar turned up, his hat slouched down over the side of his head, and the heels of his faded slippers dragging along without leaving the floor, he shuffled from room to room, prying into closets and plunging into open barrels, as if seeking things that could not be found. When he had made the tour of the rooms for the second time, he stood before us in the attitude of a criminal receiving sentence.

"My God!" he exclaimed in desperation, "what shall I do? Nothin' in the house, an' nobody here as can cook! Oh, Lord! I'll have to build a fire! How long will you want to stay?"

"Two or three days."

With a groan, he turned and fled down stairs, completely overcome.

Feeling that something must be done, we made use of the freedom of the house, and, after a hurried search, succeeded in finding a crust of bread in the pantry. If the landlord knew of the existence of this crust when he shuffled down stairs, he certainly missed it when he returned, a few moments later. The Major—we called him "Major" because we did not know that his village name was "Uncle John"—burst into the room as though an inspiration had seized him. He was mildly happy.

"Well," he said, "I've sent for a girl."

This seemed reassuring. We subsequently learned that he had sent his bar-keeper over to the "jedge's" to borrow a servant girl. In the course of an hour the borrowed servant had prepared coffee, sliced beef and bread and butter. The "Major" turned in with a will and made an honest effort to invest the occasion with something akin to festivity and ceremony. In the noon of life the "Major" had been a member of the New York Board of Aldermen and a person of some political importance. The stories of his official life, of reckless expenditures of the people's moneys, of trips to Europe and what he designated as "aldermanic jamborees" would cause the modern municipal reformer to wonder how the poor country ever lived or paid its debts.

When "Uncle Billy" Chadwick, "Frank" Little and "Charley" Hendrickson came into the diminutive private parlor after supper and told us stories of life along shore, the "Major's" brilliance as a yarn-spinner was well-nigh dazzling. With great glee the "Major" assisted Hendrickson in relating the sad circumstance the cook was a-dyin' a-laughin'. Well, that Irishman, he flumped them crabs this-a-way an' he flumped 'em to wind'ard, an' all the time the crabs seemed perfectly delighted with the sitiuation."

In the city markets the crabs are handled with iron tongs, but in the crab country they are treated with no more respect than is shown an ordinary fish. To the novice in crab-catching the most natural way in which to get rid of a pinching crab is to cut off the offending claw. This, however, is a grave mistake, for the claw, attending a young Irishman who secured employment at the hotel last summer.

"Now, this 'ere feller," the story goes, "was as green an Irishman as you 'd find in a day's travel. He said he could cook, an' he was put to work in the kitchen. He was told to boil some crabs for dinner. He must hev had a strange notion about crabs, for he reaches into the basket and scoops them up with both hands as he would handle potatoes. Now, a crab won't take no back sass nor insults from a green Irishman, and so four or five big ones fastened to his fingers with clutches like a vise an' bit like thunder. The Irishman, he howled and danced around the kitchen, an' after being severed from the crab, gives a death-grip that almost crushes the finger. The death-grip is due to a contraction of the ligaments by which the jaws of the claw are joined together. The only painless method of release from the crab's grip is by prying open the claw with a knife or a sharp stick. When roughly handled the crab will throw off a claw, trusting to nature to supply him with another. The loss of a claw in the natural way causes the crab but little inconvenience. Should the claw be cut off with a knife, however, the crab will bleed to death.

So great is the esteem with which soft crabs are regarded by that abstract personage known as the general public that the average crab rarely lives to be more than two years old or grows to be more than fourteen inches in length. The ordinary-sized crab is not more than six inches long, and is less than a year old. In the summer season, when the aimless skiff of the summer visitor may be found creeping into little inlets and oftentimes venturing out into the swell of the tide, "shedders" are in demand as bait for weak-fish, sea-bass and other salt-water fish. Inferior breeds of crabs (notably the horse-foot) are used as fertilizers, eel bait and chicken feed. The hermit crabs, known as winkles, which are sometimes eaten, live in empty conch shells. They are found in large numbers near Sandy Hook and along the coast.

Crabbers pay but little attention to the crab in its early stages of growth, and therefore know nothing more definite about the breeding than that the female crab during September carries about with her a spongy substance containing countless thousands of small eggs. The eggs remain attached to the female crab until hatched, when they develop into free-swimming little animals, and finally take the form of the adult crab. Growing crabs increase in size only when they shed the shell. During severe winters, when the river is closed with ice, the young crabs die in large numbers.

The autocrat who superintended the work of shipment told me that an average of two hundred and fifty dozen crabs were shipped at the old wharf every day during the season. Nearly one hundred and seventy-five boats, employing two hundred men, are engaged in crab-catching along the river from Oceanic, one and a half miles below Fair Haven, to tidewater, a short distance above Red Bank. In the city markets prices for crabs fluctuate from nothing to two dollars per dozen. The average price throughout the season is seventy-five cents. When crabs are a drug in the market, they are frozen in fish-preserving machines and shipped to Texas and the South and West.

The sun is struggling through haze and clouds as the last box of crabs is deposited in the bow of the Sea-Bird. The gang-plank is run in-board; the wheels dash the water into foam; the boat starts, trembles, and glides out into the smooth river. Soon Fair Haven becomes but a speck upon the water, and as the trembling steamer with roaring wheels and rushing prow sweeps downward toward the sea, the crab country takes on the semblance of a wide stretch of water, with distant blue hills shining in the morning sun.

WILLIAM WILLARD HOWARD.

ALL OUT-DOORS.—II.

By E. C. GARDNER, Author of "The House That Jill Built," etc.

JOHN'S measurements, notwithstanding the unusual character of his instruments, were fairly verified on being reduced to feet and inches, and from them a plan of the premises was evolved, sufficient, at least, for all general and preliminary suggestions. This was sent to John in a second letter from the architect, with comments somewhat as follows:

"At present I will only explain the idea in a general way, leaving details for future discussion. The front lawn ought not to be cut in two in the middle by your drive; it is not large enough. So I have moved the carriage entrance and the road to the barn over to the south side, swerving from a straight line far enough to make room for a thicket of trees, that will somewhat subdue and soften the lofty elegance of Mrs. Smith's premises, as seen from your sitting-room windows. These same trees will also prevent the barn terminus of the drive from being the most obvious conclusion of the main entrance to your grounds. Diverging from this road to the barn is the carriage-way to the house, and this, too, passes on to the barn or swings round the circle and out again to the street. These roads must not be allowed to cover more ground than they actually need—a width of nine feet is sufficient. In order to preserve an unbroken lawn between the house and the street of the largest size possible and in the most agreeable shape, I have laid the front walk at the north side, the position of the front door in the northeast corner of the house favoring this location, and have deviated slightly from the mathematical straight line for the sake of swinging gracefully around the old oak tree, and at the same time preserving a right-angled entrance from the street. Indeed, you will see that straight lines have been avoided in nearly all cases, but you will also discover, if you look closely, some real or apparent reason for the crooks, otherwise I should hardly venture to recommend, although I might privately prefer them. The dogmatic assertion that curved lines are more natural and elegant than straight ones would not convince a man that it is his duty to box the compass every time he goes from his house to the street, especially if he is tired and in a hurry, and if the lot is an unbroken plane with no visible obstructions. It might be well in some cases to invent obstacles, after the manner of novelists and metaphysicians, for the sake of displaying our skill in surmounting them, but you need not resort to such expedients.

"The apple trees near the south line 'must go.' They are too uncomely for a conspicuous situation and not gregarious enough for the desired screen. The inner row of maples must also be removed. You will notice a thicket composed of a variety of trees, evergreen and deciduous, between the house and the barn, two buildings which ought always to be upon good terms with each other, but with a barrier of becoming dignity between them to prevent undue familiarity. Seen from the street, this group of trees will lend a little enchantment to the humbler edifice, which you will clothe as to its south and east sides with grape-vines. You may leave a few of the apple trees; they stand in the right place for the fruit garden, and if not totally overcome by age and depravity, improved care may restore their productiveness. Even if they never bear fruit and blossom only once in two years I would not consent to destroy that which is the most perfect embodiment, the doubly-distilled essence, the visible soul, of all that is lovely and delicious in the spring time—an apple tree in full bloom. You will, of course, plant new trees of better promise from year to year, until you have an abundant orchard of all the finest fruits of the earth.

"The vegetable garden is also happily situated, but it is probably larger than you can keep in good order. An ill-kept garden, like many other luxuries, is both expensive and offensive. It is better to limit your horticultural efforts to a single hill of beans, or to Horace Walpole's garden of one gooseberry bush and one cabbage, than be overcome by weeds and other adverse influences.

"To give interest to what would otherwise be sources of annoyance—the narrow space at the west side of the house and the corner projecting into the lot—these points should be made so charming with ornamental trees and shrubs that their limitations as to space will be forgotten. Be careful not to shut off the view of Mrs. Willoughby's 'homely but good-looking' house; nor will an oblique view of Mrs. Smith's rectangular arrangement be half as objectionable as a high impenetrable screen between neighbors, which looks unamiable, if not positively impertinent. For the general welfare of the community, neighbors ought to appear to be on good terms, whether they are so or not.

"West of the garden is a grove of forest trees, wild natives, that will some time become 'sacred'; and, beside both entrances, near the street, are small groups of tame foreigners. Even old folks, who are not supposed to be romantic, love to linger at the gate, and surely a sweet-scented honeysuckle or a balmy balsam is a pleasanter association with a parting 'good night' than a painted wooden post.

"The little triangles lying at the intersection of the drives are for foliage and flowering plants, the beds near the well for old-fashioned flowers, and the porches will be softened and shaded by trailing plants. If it suits your fancy, the lawn encircled by the carriage-drive may have a fur-trimming of 'bordering' plants; but remember that a well-kept turf is far more beautiful than a shabby border.

THE ADVICE OF THE HARDWARE DEALER.

"Is this enough for a beginning? I have tried to give reasons as I go along, so that when the time comes for you to instruct your neighbors you will be well grounded in the first principles. I hope it will be possible for you to make your next inquiries, protests and objections in person, for a half-hour's talk is worth a great many letters."

But John couldn't leave home for a week at least, and as waiting that length of time was quite out of the question, the next day brought another letter.

"Between you and my neighbors and the fence-posts," he wrote, "I shall not lack for advice. If a multitude of counsellors is what Solomon supposed in the way of safeguard, I am the safest man you ever knew. Whether Mrs. John confidentially revealed our secret intentions, or whether they went abroad as thistle-down and cabinet rumors go—in the air—I am not prepared to say; but it is all over town that 'John's folks are going to fix up their yard in 'tremenjous' style.' The one incomprehensible, inexcusable and especially exasperating thing about it is that they couldn't do it 'out of their own heads, but must up and go and get a city fellow to tell them how.' There's one good thing about a country village—all the people know everybody and everybody knows them. If they don't all love one another, and agree like birds in their little nests, they are at least used to one another, and know pretty well what to expect. They never need suffer for want of advice and sympathy—no, nor for real substantial aid, if it comes to that. Well, as I told you, they have been nagging us because our lot isn't embellished with evergreen peg-tops and scarlet cheese-boxes, and surrounded by a picket-fence with decorated gate-posts. When they found we had actually begun to break ground, they thought as 'things have gone on so long, they might as well keep on so, but if they must do something, why not—?' and here is where the fun comes in. I don't believe there is anything under the canopy that all men and all women feel more fully competent to undertake than the arranging of these out-of-door affairs—nothing in which it is more difficult to find two of the same mind, or to convince one that the other is right. The grand total of the advice I have received within a week would 'lay out' the Island of Madagascar. As I can't possibly make any use of it, I send you a few samples. If you will take the entire lot off my hands, you can have it at cost.

ADVICE FROM THE KEEPER OF FOWLS.

"One neighbor—he is a stonemason—recommends a 'bank wall' along the street because it won't 'rot out.' Another—he lives across the way and keeps hens—suggests a 'picket fence as the pootiest thing for a door yard.' A hardware-dealing citizen advises a cast-iron fence set on granite posts, which looks to me like a slice from a cemetery. A wire-fence is warmly advocated because it 'doesn't show,' and a 'post and rail' because it does; a hedge, on account of its rural and self-sustaining qualities; and a dozen or more fancy patterns in wood have been proposed on account of their intrinsic and elaborate beauty. I have been advised to lay walks of bricks, tiles, tan-bark, cobble-stones, gravel, flagging, plank, tar, cinders, broken sewer-pipes, asphalt, concrete, corduroy and macadam. A kind neighbor offers to give me a couple of horse chestnuts—I would rather have a pair of chestnut horses. Another is ready to contribute a few elms, for the benefit of my great grandchildren—I should have more faith in birches—and one of the faithful old patriarchs begs me to accept half-a-dozen young maples, when I have too many already; 'coz, you know ther' ain't nothin' like a nice rock maple for shade, and 'twon't be sech a gre't many years afore you can make sugar out of 'em.' If all the walks and drives that have been proposed could be executed, they would intersect and overlap like the threads of a three-ply carpet. There wouldn't be a foot of turf between Mrs. Willoughby on the north and Mr. Smith on the south, nor a shovelful of earth that hadn't been moved a dozen times over. And then the mistakes I have made since the house began, that have hitherto lain heavily on the mental stomachs of my fellow-citizens, and are now, for the first time, proclaimed upon the housetops with the comforting assurance that it isn't too late to correct them. The house, it appears, 'had ought to have been sot' in the middle of the lot, so that a semicircular drive could sweep grandly up in front, with some sort of a circumstance in the centre and nobody knows what around the edges. It should have been nearer the street and farther back, higher up and lower down. The barn is in the wrong corner; the garden should go west; the well deserves to be filled with broken bottles, stones and old boots, and my brave old oak ought to have been born a pear tree. 'Ther' can't nobody eat acorns.' Two or three of my ambitious friends hope to see me the proud proprietor of a classic fountain, 'imitation' white marble with cast-iron calla leaves painted green, and sheltering a few tame turtles and bullfrogs, also made of cast-iron. Miss Angelina Boker thinks a rose-embowered arbor over the front walk would be 'excruciatingly lovely,' and I am confidentially informed that I can get cast-iron imitation bronze statuary for five cents a pound that nobody but an expert can tell from the genuine.

"Now I'm not repeating all this to make fun of my neighbors. I am really distressed, because when they ask me why I don't follow their advice I can only say I don't want to, which makes them think I'm contrary, or else I must own up that I don't know why. So, if you can go on as you have begun, and give good reasons as you go, I can stand my ground without any misgivings. Yours, JOHN."

THE LAST LANDLORD.

You who dread the cares and labors
Of the tenant's annual quest,
You who long for peace and rest
And the quietest of neighbors—
You may find them, if you will,
In the city on the hill.

One indulgent landlord leases
All the pleasant dwellings there;
He has tenants everywhere.
Every day the throng increases;
None may tell their number, yet
He has mansions still to let.

Never presses he for payment—
Gentlest of all landlords he—
And his numerous tenantry
Never lack for food or raiment;
Sculptured portal, grassy roof,
All alike are trouble-proof.

Of the quiet town's frequenters
Never one is ill at ease;
There are neither locks nor keys,
Yet no robber breaks or enters;
Not a dweller bolts his door,
Fearing for his treasure-store.

Never sound of strife or clamor
Troubles those who dwell therein—
Never toil's distracting din,
Stroke of axe or blow of hammer;
Crimson clover sheds its sweets
Even in the widest streets.

Never tenant, old or younger,
Suffers illness or decline;
There no suffering children pine—
There comes never want nor hunger;
Pain and need no longer reign—
Poverty forgets its pain.

Turmoil and unrest and hurry
Stay forevermore outside.
By the hearts which there abide Wrong, privation, doubt and worry
Are forgotten quite, or seem
Only like a long-past dream.

Never slander or detraction
Enters there, and never heard
Is a sharp or cruel word;
No unworthy thought or action,
Purpose or intent of ill
Knows the city on the hill.

There your mansion never waxes
Out of date, nor needs repairs;
There intrude no sordid cares,
There are neither rent nor taxes,
And no vexed and burdened brain
Reckons either loss or gain.

Wanderers, tired with long endeavor;
You whom, since your being's dawn,
With the stern command "Move on!"
Ruthless Fate has tracked forever—
Here at last your footsteps stay,
With no dread of moving-day!

A MISSISSIPPI MARTYR.

BY J. H. WALWORTH.

VII.—MR. DICKISON MAKES A NEW ACQUAINTANCE.

WHAT Mr. Silas Dickison had said to his family about being happier sitting in Court Square, comparing idle notes with the idle squirrels about idle folks in general, while he smoked his briar-root pipe without fear and without reproach, than he could possibly be anywhere off the old plantation, was true to a profounder depth than any one imagined. The old man was like some sturdy tree, that, having grown from a seedling to maturity in the same spot, must suffer in every fibre of its huge body if rude or ignorant hands tear it up by the roots and transplant it to a spot where water, air and earth are unlike, uncongenial to it, and combine to remind it that it is an alien and an exile. It is true the old man had consented to this uprooting—the outward pressure from the floods, accumulated disasters, and persistent coaxing of his daughters, who, pretty and ambitious, had social cravings that the plantation could not satisfy, proving too much for him. He had thought that one year in town would be well spent to destroy the glamour of city life for them; and, as things had “gone to the devil generally” in the place, he was willing to have them more pleasantly located while the work of reconstruction was going on.

With all his outbreaking petulance, there was a reserve of kindness and gentleness in this fine old Arkansas gentleman that made him incline rather to work his sulks off in the cool seclusion of the park before fashionable hours, than to carry them home for the benefit of his wife and daughters, after the more common fashion of his sex.

Going to the square one morning about noon, he found his accustomed bench occupied, and planting his feet somewhat stubbornly, with his hands thrust resolutely into his breeches pockets, he looked down upon the intruder with a face expressive of surprised resentment. Such is the force of habit, that Mr. Dickison had begun to regard that particular bench, under that particular magnolia, within a pebble's-throw of the big fountain in the middle of the square, where the wet-faced cherubs never seem to tire of spouting, and the dingy white swans never succeeded in bathing themselves any whiter, as his own private property by all the rights of squatter sovereignty.

And the squirrels, that had come to know him so well, looked up at the intruder, who evidently was not on hospitable thoughts intent, as if they, too, found this change of occupancy somewhat disquieting; and the tame, brown-coated sparrows, little exiles from England, who had come to rely for crumbs with Christian confidence in this materialized Providence, hopped about the feet of the obdurate intruder, crumbless and disconsolate.

But the stranger, a broad-shouldered, square-jawed man, leaned back sidewise on the bench, with his hat pulled down over one eye and pushed up over the opposite temple, rested his chin in the palm of his hand, supporting the arm on the back of the bench, crossed his legs over the remaining portion of the bench, as if to declare his intention of excluding participation therein, and either was or affected perfect unconsciousness of the irate old gentleman looking down on him and the indignant squirrels and sparrows looking up at him.

The intruder was a much younger man than Mr. Dickison, which aggravated the offense; and he was a much stouter man than the martyr, which rendered it advisable that the offense should be pocketed. So Mr. Dickison withdrew to the next nearest bench, mentally deciding that the fellow was either drunk, sick or sleeping, and that he would see it out, the “it” referring vaguely to any possible developments in the conduct of the sleepy-looking stranger. Having seated himself and pulled out his bag of peanuts, Mr. Dickison gave his own peculiar whistle to summon his furry retainers around him.

“If the fellow would only read a newspaper, or smoke a pipe, or whittle a stick, I'd think better of him,” Mr. Dickison had just said to himself for a third time, raising his head for another irritated inspection of the abstracted stranger, when he found the scene had altered materially.

A nursemaid, smart as bright ribbons and starched muslin could make her, stood near the usurped bench, with calmly folded arms, looking down with somewhat contemptuous serenity upon the stranger, who sat erect and alert enough now, while a small specimen of humanity, who at a first glance seemed composed exclusively of yellow curls, sumptuous apparel of curtailed proportions, and stubby legs, clambered all over him, to the mutual satisfaction apparently of the big man and the small boy.

“What you bringed me?” asked the mite presently, wriggling at last into a comfortable position on his elder's knee.

“Is that the first thing you've got to ask me, boy, when you haven't seen me for a whole week?” the stranger asked, with a touch of bitterness in his tones.

“What you bringed me?” asked the mite again, as if it were not only the first but the only thing he had to ask.

“I suppose they wouldn't have let you come but for that though,” he said, smoothing the boy's pretty yellow hair with a hand that lingered fondly in the shining meshes.

“Missis Martin tole me to tell you as how it was askin' mos' too much fur to expect her to sen' Charlie in every week. She say as how she can't spare me to come wid him.”

The stranger glanced up at her while she was speaking, with a pair of eyes that were strangely calm and quiet in their expression of patient endurance.

“Tell her, then,” he said, like a man who was used to make-shifts, “I will send out for him if she cannot spare you.”

“Charlie's gran'ma ain't goin' to trus' him to Tom, Dick and Harry. Ef I can't come, he's mighty apt to stay at home. Ole Miss Martin thinks a heap o' that boy, 'deed she do, sir.”

Charlie was swinging his legs luxuriously now, while he munched the chocolate caramels the stranger had “bringed” him, and submitted to the caressing touch of the hand in his curls with the indifferent air of a young one who had more than this quiet-eyed, squarejawed man to think "a heap o' him." Thus they sat in mute content for a long while.

"Charlie, do you love papa?" the man suddenly asks, folding him in a tight embrace, and looking hungrily down into the passionless baby face.

"Loves dam-ma!" Charlie answers, in a chocolate-choked voice.

"But don't you love papa some?"

"And loves dam-pa!"

"But how about papa?"

"And Aunt Jinny!"

"And not papa?"

"No. Mamma says Dod won't love Charlie if he loves his bad papa. Mamma's purty; you ain't purty."

"Tell them he's learning fast, and they're good teachers, Susanne. Take him home. Tell Mrs. Martin I thank her. With a sudden energy altogether out of keeping with his former dull apathy, the stranger put the child from him and strode out of the park.

Charlie scrambled to his feet and walked coolly over to where Mr. Dickison was still flinging pea-nuts to the squirrels, and leaned on the end of his bench with the confidence of a child who was always sure of his welcome.

"Whose child is that?" asked Mr. Dickison, glancing up from the pretty boy to the nurse, who had followed closely at his heels.

"His'n's," she answered, jerking her head in the direction of the retreating stranger.

"What is his name?"

"Burke. Lemuel Burke."

"Papa's bad," Charlie volunteered as his contribution to Mr. Dickison's stock of information, without taking his eyes from the squirrels.

"You shut up, Charlie! 'Tain't for you to be 'busin' of yo' own pa. There's enough folks agin him without you puttin' in."

"Mamma's dood," says Charlie, not easily "shut up."

"What's the row?" asks Mr. Dickison, with blunt curiosity and with the easy assurance of an old slave-owner used to demanding information.

"Ain't never been no row that ever I heerd on," says the nurse, with the ready loquacity of her class. "Miss Burke, she's young, an' han'some, an' frisky—ain't a bit o' harm in her, though—an' Mr. Burke, he's ole, an' slow, an' poky, an' they jes' couldn't pull together no longer, so she ups and sez as much, an' lef him, an' tole him she didn't have nothin' in particular agin him, but ef it were all the same to him, he'd better go his way an' she'd go hern."

"And it was all the same to him?" Mr. Dickison asks, indiscreetly, thrown off his balance by this insight into a curious phase of city morals.

"No, not jes' exac'ly at first. He sorter kicked agin the pricks; but his folks jined her folks into persuadin' of him to let her go in peace, an' he giv in at last. So Charlie, he lives wid the old folks—her kin—an' his ma goes there to see him, an' I fetches him in to see his pa every week. They've 'justed things very civil like betwix' 'em."

"Jerusalem the golden!" Mr. Dickison says, softly, more to himself than to the smart nursemaid. "I have heard of adjustable fixings before. Adjustable chairs, and car seats, and wagon bodies, and buggy backs, adjustable hoop-skirts and cuffs and collars, adjustable this, that and t'other; but hanged if ever I knew before that the matrimonial yoke was an adjustable piece of neckwear. Next thing in the market, I suppose, will be a double action duplex adjustable wedding-ring." And the maid-servant answered inquiringly, "Sir?"

"Now come!" the wondering ruralist resumed, after a second thoughtful period of soft whistling, during which he flung pea-nuts to his squirrels with unwonted rapidity. "You don't mean to say that this chap's mother," lifting the boy to his knees, "left his father just because she got tired of him, like he was a faded ribbon or an old-fashioned scarf?"

"'Tain't for me to say what Miss Burke lef Mr. Burke for; all I know she done quit him. Come on, Charlie; yo' pa tole me I mus' take you straight home," says Susanne, in a sudden burst of virtuous reticence.

"D—n it, you're right, too. It's none of my business to let you be telling me, either," Mr. Dickison answers, putting the boy down and rising to his feet, wroth with himself that he should have permitted his easily-aroused sympathies to get the better of his discretion.

"Good-by, Charlie!" The old man extends the right hand of friendship to the mite in short skirts, as he stands with his chubby legs very far apart and his hat pushed far back on his yellow curls, in delighted contemplation of a fight between two squirrels for the last nut.

"I'se coming some more," says Charlie, emphatically. "I'se coming some more to see 'um."

"All right, old chap. You come and we will feed the squirrels together. You shall hold the bag and I'll whistle the little rogues up for you."

With which understanding Mr. Dickison and his new acquaintance parted for the day.

VIII.—MR. PINKHAM EXPLAINS.

"PINKHAM, who is Burke?"

Mr. Dickison asked this question suddenly of the son of his old friend Nathan, as they sat together on the stoop of No. 80 Melborne, smoking their cigars, with the easy familiarity of life-time associates.

Mr. Pinkham soon secured himself a footing in the Dickison household. Sundays, it was an understood thing he was to dine with them, and as often as he chose to call of evenings; on other days he was sure of a warm welcome from all the family and a sweet, shy look of gladness from Sophie's clear gray eyes.

"Burke!" Mr. Pinkham echoes. "Burke! what Burke? There may be a hundred or more Burkes in Memphis."

"This one is a big-shouldered, square-jawed fellow. Lemuel Burke, I believe."

"Oh, yes!" Mr. Pinkham laughs softly, as he knocks the ash from his cigar.

"Well, what of him?"

"'Pon honor, sir, I don't know much to his discredit. He's a poor devil, whose wife walked off one day and left him."

"But didn't he kick up a row?"

"Before or after do you mean?"

"After—of course, man!"

"What for?"

"What for? Man alive—what for? Why—if for nothing else—d—n it, to assert his manhood."

"I think he did assert it."

"How?"

"Why, by allowing a woman, who had told him in plain language that she had no farther use for him, to go in peace. This is a good big world of ours, and if folks can't live together in amity, why not separate, instead of clinging together just to make each other miserable for life?" asks this exponent of new-fashioned morals.

"That all sounds rational enough, Pinkham, but it's a rotten sort of reasoning, rotten to the core, sir! Just start that notion a rolling, and the cardinal virtues of old-fashioned matrimonial contracts—bearing and forbearing—will grow musty for the want of use. But about this Burke business. Didn't anybody have anything against anybody, or pretend to have?"

"Oh, yes, lots! Some say he beat her, and others say she beat him!" Mr. Pinkham says lightly and impartially.

"Bosh! Go on!"

"Some say he was crazy, but she didn't know it until after they were married; others say, she takes a little wine, according to St. Paul's prescription, herself."

"Shouldn't wonder!" says the martyr, prepared to believe any evil of a woman who could forget her promise to love, honor and obey.

"Some say that she married him thinking that he was rich, and others say he let her go so quietly because he found out that she was not."

"Serves 'em both right then, if that 'some say' is correct."

"Some say his sister, who was very much opposed to the match, is at the bottom of it all; others say her mother kicked up Cain between them."

"I'd be bound they'd have to lug in a mother-in-law!" Mr. Dickison says.

"Some say he's a saint and she's a devil, and some say just vice versa."

"Of course—of course; half for and half against. We're all on some sort of a see-saw; you go up and I come down, at tolerable regular intervals."

"Mercy!" says Mrs. Dickison, Mr. Dickison's lapse into thoughtful meditation giving her an opportunity to express herself for the first time: "What awful things people do in cities!"

"Isn't human nature pretty much the same in the country as it is in the city, my dear madam?" Mr. Pinkham asks with that air of superior wisdom which he carried so successfully at No. 80 Melborne Street.

"I don't think it is," she stoutly maintained; "in the country there's so much to keep a woman busy and out of mischief. There's her poultry and her pigs and her gardens and her dairy and her sewing, if she's any account, and nobody to talk to nor to put mischief into her head, nor to coax her out gadding, when she'd much better be darning her husband's old socks, nor nobody to make her dissatisfied with the husband she's got, by comparing him with somebody else's husband—"

Mrs. Dickison's naive summary of the advantages of country life over city, for the culture of the domestic virtues, was here brought to a sudden termination by a roar of indignation from the martyr.

"I suppose we're to understand, then, that a woman is only satisfied with her own husband so long as he's the only man she sees, are we?"

"Mr. Dickison!" Mrs. Dickison's elderly cheeks flush with virtuous indignation as she turns her mild eyes reprovingly on him.

"Didn't she say so, Pinkham?"

"I certainly did not so understand her, sir."

"Well, Maria," the martyr continues with impressive solemnity, "after that I am prepared for anything the future may have in store for me. It should not surprise me at all to get up some morning and find nothing left of you but your big-ruffled night-cap and your red flannel wrapper, and a note telling me you had searched your heart and found my image warn't there, and asking me to let Lewis come to see you occasionally. But, Maria, when you do make up your mind to that rash step, let me ask one favor of you in advance—two, now I come to think of it. Take Lewis with you, by all means, and forget to send him back, and be certain before you start to put my bootjack where I can find it. My wife has a trick, Pinkham," he added in an explanatory aside, "of hiding my bootjack in the most unguessable places. It's a mania with her. I actually believe, when she goes to church and sits looking at the preacher so demurely, she's studying up where she can find a new place to hide that bootjack in."

"Mr. Dickison!" his wife says again with gently undulating sides, as she wipes the moisture of merriment from her gentle, blue eyes.

"Is she very beautiful, Mr. Pinkham?" asks Sophie.

"Who, your excellent mother here?"

"Ridiculous! I mean that Mrs. Burke—if that is her name."

"I have seen many more beautiful women," he answers, with a look of deep meaning into Sophie's soft eyes, which drop in sudden confusion to her folded hands.

"And is he very unhappy?" asks Annie, whose sympathies are always with the plaintiff in every case.

"Not to judge from his general conduct. He is a quiet business man. Pleasant in his manners, punctual in his habits, to be seen almost every day in the park and at all the places of entertainment, doesn't look especially tragical."

"Hanged if it don't beat anything I ever heard of!" Mr. Dickison says; "its coolness, its deliberation, its matter-of-courseness, is what makes it look so devilish bad in my eyes. Why, if a man's wife can quit him just because she's tired of him, when in thunder can a fellow feel sure of her? Now I expect my wife's been tired of me forty dozen times since we've been living here, and I doing nothing but playing loafer and getting in the way generally, but it never occurred to me that she had such a startling remedy at hand. Maria, when you do get tired of me don't go and tell people that I beat you nor that I let you beat me; and don't try to impose the insanity dodge on folks and I won't let out about the St. Paul prescription. And, wife, if you won't assert that I am a devil, I won't deny that you are a saint. But let what must come, come Maria, I hope I shall find the fortitude necessary to bear every ill of life—even your desertion—just so you don't forget about the bootjack, and take Lewis with you."

"I am sure," Sophie ventured to say, "Mr. Pinkham is right in saying that it was better to have done as she did than to have clung together for the mutual misery of a lifetime." Sophie rather prided herself on being an advanced thinker and given to liberal views of life in general.

"I am sure," her father answered, somewhat tartly, "I would not give much for the future happiness of any couple who regard the conjugal tie as a sort of slip-knot to be loosed or tightened according to friction and restiveness. When your mother and I concluded to put our necks into the same yoke we were aware of the fact that it was a substantial piece of business; that it meant give and take. And if she's given a little more of her mind, and I've taken a little more than we thought would probably be the case beforehand, it's nobody's blamed business but ours."

"I expect that is what the Burkes think of their domestic arrangements," says Mr. Pinkham, who, not being overburdened with rural innocence or troublesome scruples, begins to find this essay on the virtues of wives and husbands a trifle tiresome. He had much rather have Sophie all to himself yonder in the dimly-lighted parlor, and on the pretext of wanting some music he manages to get her there.

"Pinkham's right," Mr. Dickison says to his wife, as the two young people disappear from view. "It is none of my business, but I'm just fool enough to be haunted by the sight of that man trying to coax his own baby to love him. Maria, this is a queer world and it takes lots o' folks to make it."

A piece of sententious wisdom which Maria did not contradict.

IX.—A PIECE OF PERFECTION.

MR. PINKHAM had asked Mrs. Dickison, with his usual display of reverential courtesy, for permission to bring his sister, Mrs. Hayden, to call on herself and the young ladies.

The sister, as he explained, had been recently left a widow. Her dear defunct had been president of a gas company in New York City. In consequence of her recent bereavement, his sister was not going into society at all at present, which would place it out of her power to show the young ladies such attentions as her inherited consideration for their father would prompt; she, too, having grown up from childhood familiar with and revering the name of Dickison. So, if they would only permit her to come to them in a quiet way, advancing no claim but that of being Nathan Pinkham's daughter, she should be so happy to know them.

The fact of being Nathan Pinkham's daughter was a good letter of recommendation, to which the highly respectable sound of "president" and "gas company" added such a suggestion of super-excellence that Mrs. Dickison's response was warm almost to the border of gush.

So it was decided that Mr. Pinkham should bring Mrs. Hayden to call on the following Thursday afternoon. The contretemps of Mrs. Benton's never-to-be-forgotten visit had "taught them all a lesson," as they declared. The front door should never be left unlocked again! Lewis should never be allowed to eat cold blackberry pie on the front portico again! No one should ever be permitted to try on new shoes in the back parlor! The fall and rise of bread should be confined to the precincts of the kitchen, and all "bangs" should punctually emerge from the grub to the butterfly condition at a stated morning hour!—were a few of the resolutions passed to secure the household from a possibility of like disgrace in the future.

"We must all remember," Sophie had said warningly, "that we are not in the country now, with all the world for our own."

To which Mrs. Dickison had mournfully responded:

"It was not likely she ever should forget she was not in the country, as it fell to her lot to buy all the wilted vegetables and stale eggs for the family's consumption," leaving it problematical whether or not the good old lady really meant to say she bought all the wilted vegetables and stale eggs that came to market.

So everything was in city trim when the accepted time came, and Sophie, peeping down through the bowed blinds of her bed-room window, saw Mr. Pinkham holding their front gate open for a tall blonde, whose elegant mourning only served to enhance her delicate beauty.

"She's just a piece of perfection, Annie, from those fluffy little yellow bangs peeping out from her widow's cap, down to the tip of that little patent-leather boot," she says, in a confidential burst of enthusiasm, withdrawing from the window to give one last "touch up" to her own untrained frizzes before going down.

"They say patent-leather boots are becoming fashionable again for ladies," says Annie, who is turning round and round before the big glass-doored armoire, somewhat as a dog does when looking for the softest place on a rug.

"Mercy! I wonder if I ever shall learn to drape a polonaise stylishly? Sophie, don't you think there is a certain adorable something about town girls that we never shall catch?" she asks pathetically.

"Knack, I suppose! Knack is an extra sense that is accorded some women. The woman with knack can accomplish wonders on nothing; the woman without it is helpless with millions at her command. It is a gift—one that you certainly do not possess, Nan. You will pin your over-dresses back as if you were getting ready for a good hard day's scrubbing. Maybe you will take in something after a while by absorption."

Miss Dickison leans forward, in front of the glass to give one or two little dabs to the love-locks on her pretty forehead, while she delivers this final crumb of comfort to Nan, the knackless, before they both pass down stairs, with an aching sense of inferiority in their innocent hearts to meet the faultless Mrs. Hayden.

Mrs. Hayden's manners were so calmly self-possessed, so coolly polite, that she acted somewhat like an anesthetic on the two slightly-flurried country maidens that blushing accorded her the meed of superiority with their first glance. She had a most disconcerting trick of leveling her fine gray eyes upon one and forgetting to withdraw them, leaving one to imagine that she had soared involuntarily above the commonplace tittle-tattle addressed to her into realms of meditation where few dared hope to follow her, leaving one to await her return to mundane matters with what patience one could command. In the meantime one had the very best possible opportunity for discovering what fine eyes hers were.

"My brother tells me you are located here. I hope to see more of you. I wish we might be good friends," Mrs. Hayden leveled these remarks and her handsome eyes especially at Miss Sophia Dickison. She spoke in a voice of well-bred low pitch, and her words were "paid out," so to speak, with an accurate measurement, as if she were in the habit of retailing her observations at so much an inch. The curves of her well-shaped mouth were the only things that moved when she spoke. The rest of her features were as entirely at rest, as if she had been a doll provided with a hidden apparatus that gave her temporary powers of speech on the pulling of a string. Mr. Pinkham was probably aware of the intermittent nature of his sister's colloquial powers, for he exerted himself in an unusual degree to talk, and was ably seconded by Mrs. Dickison, who pronounced it "real clever" of him to bring such an elegant dame to see such simple country folk.

Sophie was a little surprised that a woman who had, of course, "seen everything," should be content to say so little, but attributed the reticence of their new friend to that elegant languor which comes of satiety.

Annie wondered, humbly, if the time ever would come when she should feel as perfectly at her ease in sumptuous raiment as the superb Mrs. Hayden looked.

What with Mrs. Hayden's amiable determination to be pleased and Mr. Pinkham's gallant resolve to show off handsome Sophie Dickison at her best, and the simple faith of all the Dickisons in the goldiness of this glitter, the visit promised to be highly satisfactory to all parties.

Sophie breathed freely when their visitors rose to depart. It had all been perfect. Not a single thing had gone wrong. Mrs. Dickison, who was acknowledged to be rather unreliable as a grammarian, had not lapsed once. Annie, whose rustic trick of exclaiming ecstatically over every pleasing novelty was such a thorn in her sister's more elegant flesh, had held her interjections well in hand. Lewis had sacredly observed his promise to "make himself scarce" until supper time, in consideration of an unlimited supply of jam. Sophie really began to feel quite hopeful of an aristocratic efflorescence in the whole family. Her satisfaction reached a climax when Mrs. Hayden, retaining her almost tremulous hand in both of her own daintily-gloved ones, said in that low, measured voice which Sophie was sure must be the acme of good breeding, "Herbert has told me about you, Miss Dickison. It is his desire that we see a great deal of each other. I hope it will be yours, too. I am an old woman now—"

"Mer—" Annie began, deprecatingly, but swallowed her surprise and exclamation at one gulp.

"So I am going to ask you not to count visits with me, but come to me often at my hotel. My life now is a very retired and a very desolate one" (in token whereof Mrs. Hayden extracted a deep black-bordered handkerchief from her velvet reticule and shook its folds out gently, as if she were preparing to hoist a signal of distress), "and I am afraid you will find many things in my 'cell,' as Herbert calls it, that might shock your tidy country notions."

(Sophie thought she hated her visitor for coupling her name with tidiness and country habits—just the recommendations for a milkmaid).

"But you must come to me prepared to be charitable. I am a sad idler—a good-for-nothing esthetic, who has never been able to sacrifice her love for the beautiful to any demands of the useful. Perhaps I might improve if you dear, good country people would let me see plenty of your simple, honest habits." (Sophie was quite sure now that she hated Mrs. Hayden.) "Promise, now, if I shock you in my at-home, you won't be naughty and criticise me too severely."

The sweet humility of this plea, spoken in such a voice and emphasized with such a glance, was too much for the tender Dickison heart.

Sophie replied, with honest adulation, that she was sure things were "just lovely wherever Mrs. Hayden was."

"Oh, Herbert! take me away from this naughty flatterer," Mrs. Hayden says, with a reproving tap of her fan on Sophie's pink cheek, and Mr. Pinkham opens the front door for their egress.

"God bless my soul, Pinkham, I'm sure I am very much obliged to you! I was just wishing I had a third hand temporarily, or could ring the bell with my nose."

It was Mr. Dickison who greeted Mr. Pinkham thus cordially as he opened the front door, and then a death-like stillness fell upon the little group.

Mr. Dickison was revealed to his crushed family holding his new silk hat between both hands with tenderest care, to guard its contents—creamy white eggs—from the possibility of rude contact. Every pocket of his stiff white duck suit, coat and trowsers, were bulging out to their utmost capacity with the same fragile cargo, while his jolly red face beamed upon the startled group from beneath the folds of his yellow silk handkerchief that he had bound about it when converting his beaver into an egg-basket. On the sight of a strange lady the martyr had involuntarily backed up against the tall wooden partition that divided the porticoes, where he stood the picture of comic despair.

The culprit was the first to recover himself, which he did with his most recklessly boisterous laugh:

"God bless my soul, mamma, when you and the girls insisted upon my adopting that stove-pipe for gentility's sake I hadn't an idea what a resource it might prove in the hour of need. Your sister, I suppose, Pinkham. Sorry can't offer you a hand, madam; regret more than ever that I haven't but two. Thought my wife would praise me for my heroism in bringing home a lot of fresh eggs I found way out on the road to Chelsea, I b'lieve they call it; says she hasn't seen a dozen good ones since she left the place; but yonder she stands glaring at me as if I was a death's head. They're real fresh ones, Mrs. D."

"I am sure you don't look at all like a death's-head, sir," Mrs. Hayden says in her even voice.

"Mr. Dickison!" his wife says in a sepulchral voice.

"God bless my soul!" and following the direction of his wife's anguished gaze, the martyr became aware of two little yellow pools settling about his feet, at which he stands in the most helpless consternation.

"Very unfortunate," he says, grinning rather feebly on the group around him.

"For your duck suit! I should say so," says Mr. Pinkham good naturedly, coming to the rescue.

"Oh, hang the suit! that'll wash. I meant for the eggs and for my reputation. This is terrible, Pinkham; by George it is, sir!"

"If the one were as indestructible as I am sure the other is, sir, there would be no broken eggs to deplore, nor duck suit to be consigned prematurely to the wash-tub," Mr. Pinkham says with ready tact.

"Hanged if I don't wish I had a hat now to take off in acknowledgement of that speech, boy! You get the gift of the gab straight from poor old Nath. He's made it all right for me, ladies, hasn't he?"

"As right as a hatless man with a yellow silk handkerchief on his head, and little sulphur-colored rivulets streaming from every pore of him can be made," says Mrs. Dickison, laughing helplessly; while Mrs. Hayden helped on the good work by saying:

"I am sure any lover of the beautiful who does not sacrifice his love of the beautiful to the useful, must acknowledge that a rubicund visage under a yellow silk handkerchief is a much more picturesque object than that same visage under a stiff black hat. You look quite esthetic, sir; really suggest a sunflower!"

"Thankee!" says the martyr dubiously. "All the same. Next time I'll take a basket along. But that hat did come in handy. They're real fresh, Mrs. D."

But Sophie looked as if she would never smile again.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

"MOONSHINERS" AND REVENUE LAWS.—NO. I.

"ALEXANDER HAMILTON," said Gallatin, "left his successor a sinecure in the office of Secretary of the Treasury." So perfect was the system of administration he devised that it continues even to this day, modified in some particulars to meet the exigencies of the present, but essentially unchanged. And no great question of finance has since arisen the principles of which were not ably discussed by that master mind, who has been called the American Turgot, but who surpassed the great Frenchman, both in genius and solidity.

Our present system of internal revenue was made necessary by the state of our finances during the War of the Rebellion, but it was not new. It was only a tool that had been laid away rusted and forgotten during many years of peace, to be reproduced when necessity called for it. New to the generation to which Chase and Boutwell announced it amid the roar of cannon in 1862, it was not new to history. Internal taxation is as old as government itself; but it is worthy of note that the essential elements of our present system were enunciated more than ninety years ago. Under the Confederation, a direct tax for the support of the central government was apportioned among the states, to be paid from their own revenues; but the levy proved futile from the lack of power to enforce it. Under the Constitution, the general government relied at first entirely for its support upon a tariff upon imports, but our commerce was then in its infancy, and the revenues proved insufficient. In 1790, Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, recommended to Congress the imposition of an excise tax upon domestic spirits, varying in amount according to its proof or alcoholic strength, and discriminating in favor of spirits distilled from domestic materials as against those distilled from molasses, sugar, and other foreign materials, and adjusting the tariff upon imported spirits accordingly.

"Duties of the kind proposed," says Secretary Hamilton, "are not novel in the United States, as has been intimated in another place. They have existed to a considerable extent under several of the state governments, particularly in Massachusetts, Connecticut and Pennsylvania. In Connecticut, a state exemplary for its attachment to popular principles, not only all ardent spirits, but foreign articles of consumption generally have been the subject of an excise or inland duty."

In support of this, however, he remarks that there appear to him two leading principles, one or the other of which must necessarily characterize whatever plan may be adopted. One of them makes the security of the revenue to depend chiefly on the vigilance of the public officers; the other rests it essentially on the integrity of the individuals interested to avoid payment of it. The first is the basis of the plan submitted by the Secretary; the last has pervaded most, if not all, the systems which have hitherto been practiced upon in different parts of the United States. The oaths of the dealers have been almost the only security for their compliance with the laws. It cannot be too much lamented that these have been found an inadequate dependence. But experience has, on every trial, manifested them to be such. Taxes or duties relying for their collection on that security wholly, or almost wholly, are uniformly unproductive. And they cannot fail to be unequal as long as men continue to be discriminated by unequal portions of rectitude. The most conscientious will pay most; the least conscientious least. It is a truth that cannot be kept too constantly in view, that all revenue laws which are so constructed as to involve a lax and defective execution, are instruments of oppression to the most meritorious part of those on whom they immediately operate, and of additional burdens on the community at large.

Following the recommendations of Secretary Hamilton, the First Congress, at its third session, passed an act, approved March 3, 1791, which is not only the basis of our present system, but contains most of its essential provisions.

It divided the country into districts, subject to alteration and to subdivision into convenient "surveys of inspection" by the President. It authorized him to appoint one supervisor and as many inspectors of survey as he should judge necessary in each district, and to locate offices of inspection in each survey. It imposed an excise tax upon all spirits distilled within the United States wholly or in part from molasses, sugar or other foreign materials, of eleven to thirty cents per gallon, according to the proof, to be determined by Dicas' hydrometer; and upon all such spirits distilled from any article of the growth or product of the United States, a tax of from nine to twenty-five cents, according to proof. Under our present system of gauging spirits, these taxes would be expressed as eleven and nine cents respectively per proof gallon. This tax was required to be paid before the removal of the spirits from the distillery, with an abatement of two cents per ten gallons, or secured by a nine-months' bond. Casks of spirits were to be branded and gauged before removal, under penalty of forfeiture, and the officer to record and certify the same; and to be removed at any other time than between sun-rising and sun-setting under the same penalty. A duty was imposed on stills of sixty cents per gallon of capacity, including the head, and the act provided that the evidence of the employment of stills should be their being erected upon masonry or brick-work in a condition to be used; that the duties on stills shall be collected semi-annually by the supervisor, and that in case of failure to pay, the duty shall be collected by an action for debt. Distillers were required to place signs over the doors of every building and apartment used for the distillation or storage of spirits, and that they shall furnish the inspector with a particular entry in writing describing the same, under a heavy penalty; that the supervisor shall inspect the distillery, and the inspector shall take an account of old stock, and give certificate of the same; that importers of distilled spirits shall make entry thereof; that distilled spirits not branded nor accompanied by certificate of inspection shall be forfeited; that officers of inspection may enter places where spirits are stored, and inspect and sample spirits, and may take away the samples, paying the market price therefor; that a penalty of one hundred dollars shall be imposed for defacing the marks or brands on any cask; that no marked vessels shall be used for other spirits; that spirits fraudulently concealed shall be forfeited, and suspected places may be searched by warrant of a judge or justice of the peace; that distillers shall keep books and make entries of the materials used and spirits distilled by them; that certain penalties shall not extend to owners of stills of the capacity of fifty gallons or less; and how the proof of spirits shall be ascertained (by Dicas' hydrometer) and marked.

Tench Coxe was appointed the first Commissioner of the Revenue. He was an honest, able and efficient officer, and, after organizing the system under the active supervision of Secretary Hamilton, administered the affairs of the office until his resignation in 1798, when he was succeeded by William Miller, Jr., of Pennsylvania.

The system was not at first a success, either politically or financially. It took time to get the machinery in running order. With but few exceptions, the salaries of officers were very low, and often insufficient, even in those halcyon days of cheap living and low prices. During the first fiscal year the receipts from domestic spirits amounted to only $208,943, instead of $655,000 as had been estimated. Numerous objections were raised to almost every provision of the act. Distillers, particularly of geneva, or gin, complained that official supervision imperiled the secrets of the trade and manufacture. Others complained of the hardship of having to keep books, and of compliance with other precautionary regulations. Rum and gin distillers held that the discriminating duties did not sufficiently protect them from the competition of imported spirits on the one hand, while they were unjustly discriminated against in the interest of distillers of native grains and fruits on the other. They complained that the excise was unequal, unjust and oppressive; that the requirement of oaths to returns was demoralizing, and that the penalties were too severe.

Congress referred all these objections and petitions to Secretary Hamilton, who, on the 5th of March, 1792, made a lengthy and masterly report upon the whole subject. "These objections," said he, beginning with a happy summary of them, "have reference to a supposed tendency of the act, first, to contravene the principles of liberty; secondly, to injure morals; thirdly, to oppress by heavy and excessive penalties; fourthly, to injure industry and interfere with the business of distilling." Then, taking them up one by one, he exposed with great clearness the sophistry of many, the mistaken ideas and erroneous statements of others; and while showing how the act might be so amended and modified as to make it at the same time more acceptable and more efficient, he sustained the system with a very able argument. Objection having been particularly directed to the weight of penalties, and to the provision taxing the capacity of country stills, instead of the spirits actually distilled, as in cities and towns, he showed, in reply to the former, that "Penalties like these, for willful and fraudulent breaches of an important law, cannot truly be deemed either unusual or excessive;" and, to the latter, that the duty of sixty cents per gallon on the capacity of stills was founded on a computation that a still of any given dimensions, worked four months in the year, the usual period of country distillation, would yield a quantity of spirits which, at the rate of nine cents per gallon, would correspond with sixty cents per gallon of capacity of the still. This was in lieu of a tax on the quantity distilled, and amounted practically, he stated, to a gallon tax of seven and a half instead of nine cents. It is proper to add that this latter objection came chiefly from Western Pennsylvania and South Carolina.

After due consideration of these objections and the Secretary's report, Congress passed "an amendatory," which was approved by the President, May 8, 1792. Its most important provisions were the repeal of the former tax and the imposition of a new tax on spirits distilled from foreign materials of ten to twenty-five cents, and on spirits distilled from domestic materials of seven to eighteen cents per gallon, according to proof. The tax on the latter class of spirits was to apply to all distilleries of one or more stills having a capacity of four hundred gallons or upward, and located in any city, town or village. At any smaller distillery, or one located elsewhere, the tax imposed was fifty-four cents per gallon upon the capacity of the still, including the head, with the option of paying ten cents per gallon of capacity per month, or seven cents per gallon on the amount actually distilled. The owners of stills were to enter them and obtain license under penalty, and were to be liable for the taxes accruing. The stills were to be identified by progressive numbers, etc. An "office of inspection" was to be opened in each county. That the secrets of the trade might be protected, officers of inspection were to forbear inspecting distilleries of geneva or sweet cordials for two hours in each day. An abatement of two per cent was to be made for leakage, and seven per cent was to be allowed for expenses of collection of the tax, not to exceed seventy thousand dollars in the aggregate.

In nearly every part of the country complaints appear to have ceased and the law was generally enforced, resulting in an internal revenue for the fiscal year 1793 of $337,706. But in certain sections discontent was unallayed, and opposition to the law was persistent and even violent. In the next year the internal revenue fell to $274,089. On the 16th of May, 1794, Mr. Moore, from the committee to which were referred petitions from Washington County, Maryland, and Chester and Lancaster Counties, Pennsylvania, praying for revision and amendment of the act, made a report to the House, in which "the committee further state that there remains some opposition to the law in two western surveys of South Carolina, in the survey of Kentucky, and the western survey of Pennsylvania; that the supervisor of the district of Pennsylvania has made no returns (although thereto duly required and repeatedly urged). Your committee, therefore, have had no proof before them that the law, so far as it respects spirits distilled from domestic materials, has been executed in any part of the state." They also report that the supervisor of that district states that "no returns from the inspectors of surveys within his district have been furnished to him to a later period than the 30th of June, 1792. This failure, the supervisor alleges, arises from the total in-execution of the law in some of the surveys, and the partial execution of it in others."

The necessity for an increased revenue being a pressing one, Congress, by acts approved June 5 and 9, 1794, imposed a tax of from one to ten dollars upon carriages for the conveyance of persons, a license tax of five dollars for selling wines and foreign distilled spirituous liquors by retail; eight cents per pound upon snuff, two cents per pound upon refined sugar, and twenty-five to fifty cents per hundred dollars upon property sold at auction; these taxes to continue in force for two years; manufacturers of snuff and refined sugar to give bond, keep books and make reports, and auctioneers to give bond and have license. At the same time, districts and surveys of inspection were created in the territories northwest and south of the Ohio, and concurrent jurisdiction of offenses under the internal revenue acts was conferred on state courts.

Meanwhile discontent and opposition in the disaffected districts, fomented and encouraged by political demagogues, as in later days, increased and assumed the proportions of armed insurrection. The marshal of Western Pennsylvania, David Lenox, was fired upon, arrested and detained until he promised to serve no more processes west of the Alleghanies. Not satisfied with this, a deputation of the insurgents afterward compelled him to surrender the processes he had served, and he was compelled to flee. On the 16th of July the house of General John Neville, the inspector of the revenue near Pittsburg, was attacked, but defended with such spirit that the assailants were forced to retire. He called in vain upon the magistrates and military for protection. The attack was soon afterward renewed by five hundred men. One of the insurgents was killed and several on both sides wounded. Neville was forced to take flight, and his house and buildings, with all they contained, were burned. The marshal and inspector made their way down the Ohio, and by a circuitous route to Philadelphia. Bradford caused the mails to be stopped and opened, and upon his demand the authors of letters giving an account of the proceedings of the insurgents were banished from Pittsburg. The house of another officer who had resigned his commission, and that of a citizen who had protected and sheltered the officers, were also burned to the ground, with all their contents. The insurgents organized themselves into armed bands, and the Mingo Creek Society openly proclaimed resistance, and called a convention of delegates to meet at Parkinson's Ferry on the 14th of August. "The government," wrote Washington, "could no longer remain a passive spectator of the contempt with which the laws were treated."

In response to a call from the executive, Secretary Hamilton made a lengthy and detailed report to the President, in which he says :

"The four most western counties of Pennsylvania, since the commencement of these laws, a period of more than three years, have been in steady and violent opposition to them. By formal public meetings of influential individuals, whose resolutions and proceedings had for undisguised objects to render the laws odious, to discountenance a compliance with them, and to intimidate individuals from accepting and executing offices under them ; by a general spirit of opposition (thus fomented) among the inhabitants ; by repeated instances of armed parties going in disguise to the houses of the officers of the revenue, and inflicting upon them personal violence and outrage ; by general combinations to forbear a compliance with the requisitions of the laws, by examples of injury to the property and insult to the persons of individuals who have shown by their conduct a disposition to comply, and by an almost universal non-compliance with the laws ; their execution within the counties in question has been completely frustrated."

Washington referred the papers to the Hon. James Wilson, an associate justice of the Supreme Court, who returned them with an opinion coinciding with that of the Secretary of the Treasury, and on the 7th of August the President issued a proclamation written by Hamilton and containing in its preamble a detailed, yet succinct, statement of the events which necessitated it. The essential differences of political opinion between Jefferson and Hamilton and their respective schools had before this been exhibited in the debates upon the latter's system of internal revenue, Mr. Madison and the followers of the Virginia statesman objecting to the principles of excise and preferring a direct ad valorem tax upon property. The same differences now found expression in Cabinet councils upon the suppression of what has become known in history as the "Whisky Rebellion." The proclamation was earnestly supported by the Secretaries of the Treasury and War and the Attorney-General, and opposed by Randolph, who had succeeded Jefferson as Secretary of State. It was also objected to by Governor Mifflin, with whom Washington held a lengthy conference on the subject, and the Democratic societies of Philadelphia. But the President, after mature consideration, had determined to sustain the position so well taken by Hamilton, and, it appears, took particular care to see that his proclamation was countersigned by the Secretary of State, a point not then so thoroughly settled by the routine of precedent as now.

The convention called by the Mingo Creek Society, undaunted by the firm attitude of the government, assembled at Parkinson's Ferry on the 14th of August. Edward Cooke was elected chairman and Albert Gallatin secretary. Bradford, who was practically the leader, proposed that the six insurgent counties of Pennsylvania and Maryland establish a new state, outside and independent of the Union, and defiant resolutions were adopted. On the other hand, the President had made requisition upon the militia of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland and Virginia, and appointed General Lee, Governor of Virginia, to the command. Washington and Hamilton left the capital at Philadelphia in September and proceeded first to Carlisle, Pennsylvania, and then in October to Cumberland, Maryland, where the army was encamped. The former then returned to the seat of government about the same time that the commissioners returned from their fruitless embassy, and on the 21st of October the army advanced in two divisions, accompanied by Secretary Hamilton, District Judge Peters and District Attorney Rawle. The route across the Alleghenies was as rugged and almost as wild as in the days of Braddock. But the little army was largely composed of veterans of the Revolution, and the insurgents fled before it when they realized the determination of the government and that its last resort was of sterner stuff than proclamations and peace commissions. Brackenridge, one of the insurgent leaders, afterward wrote that "it was the display of so strong an army that rendered unnecessary anything but the display of it." Hamilton accompanied the army to Pittsburg, and then returned to Philadelphia, leaving Judge Peters secure upon the bench, and a strong corps of observation stationed in the country for the winter, under General Morgan. "The Whisky Rebellion" was thoroughly and effectually suppressed, and it is only needful to say that the power of the government was abundantly tempered with its mercy in its treatment of the insurgents. Bradford escaped to the Spanish dominions, and other less prominent leaders scattered to the sparsely settled regions of the far West.

On the 2d of February, 1795, the Secretary recommended Congress to abolish the option of paying by the gallon on spirits distilled in cases where duties are charged on the stills. He also recommended that the tax on snuff should not be a rate per pound but an annual tax upon the mill, mortars and pestles employed in the manufacture. He advised too, that every manufacturer of refined sugar should be required to affix a ticket to every loaf, cask, barrel or other package, specifying the weight and contents ; these tickets to be furnished by the supervisors and accounted for by them.

This is the first appearance in our fiscal history of anything of the nature of a stamp to be affixed to a taxable article (aside from stamped paper), which at this day we deem the chief security to the revenue and best safeguard against fraud and evasion. Congress did not see fit to adopt the plan, but it did repeal the tax upon snuff and laid a duty upon each snuff-mortar, on every pair of mill-stones, on every pestle and on every mill in which snuff is manufactured by stampers and grinders. The operation of this act was suspended June 1, 1796, until the end of the next session, but no farther legislation appears to have been enacted until April 24, 1800, when the act was finally repealed. The tax on carriages was changed in some particulars by the act of May 28, 1796, and the act of March 3, 1797, carried into effect to some extent the above recommendation of the Secretary relative to stills. This was again altered and modified by the act of January 29, 1798. An act levying duties upon stamped vellum, parchment and paper was approved July 6, 1797, but was postponed for a time in the following December, and amended February 28, 1799. And finally, in 1802, a bill to repeal the internal taxes passed both houses without a division, and was approved by President Jefferson on the 6th of April.

The internal taxes collected under these various acts were as follows:

1792	$208,943	1798	$644,358
1793	337,706	1799	779,136
1794	274,089	1800	809,397
1795	337,755	1801	1,048,033
1796	475,290	1802	621,899
1797	575,491	1803-18	352,630

An analysis of the internal revenue for a single year gives an interesting insight into the sources from which it was derived and the geographical distribution of wealth, trade and the various taxable interests. In 1802, Commissioner Coxe made a detailed report to Congress before the final returns were all received, from which it appeared that the revenue for year ending December 31, 1801, was as follows:

From Domestic Distilled Spirits,	$178,659
" Stills (capacity tax),	257,070
" Refined Sugar,	76,540
" Licenses to Retailers,	69,174
" Sales at Auction,	66,123
" Carriages for Conveyance of Persons,	73,926
" Stamped Vellum, Parchment and Paper,	268,042

Of the gallon tax on spirits distilled at large distilleries in towns, etc., New England rum paid by far the greater amount, Massachusetts contributing $140,234, Rhode Island $20,222 and New York $8038; while of the tax on country stills, distilling grain or fruit, Pennsylvania heads the list with $89,771, followed by Virginia with $67,261, Ohio with $22,733 and Maryland with $21,492. New York and Pennsylvania each paid more than $28,000 on refined sugar, and Maryland $10,955 on the same article. Retailers' licenses amounted to $15,115 in New York, $14,880 in Massachusetts, $8075 in Pennsylvania, and $6505 in Connecticut and Virginia. New York and Massachusetts each paid more than $17,000 on auction sales, and Pennsylvania $12,327. Massachusetts paid $15,252 on carriages, Virginia $13,533, Pennsylvania $8377, and Maryland $8299. Pennsylvania paid $61,177 of the stamp tax, New York $60,994, Massachusetts $37,528 (half year), Maryland $30,950, and Virginia $23,102. Although her returns were incomplete, Massachusetts stood at the head of the schedule of total internal taxes by States, paying $232,566. Pennsylvania, in all, paid $209,545, New York $143,758, Virginia $115,444, Maryland $83,563, South Carolina $45,612, North Carolina, $32,476, and Rhode Island $32,157. When the tax on snuff and snuff-mills was in force, it was almost wholly paid by Massachusetts, Pennsylvania and New York. The highest official salaries were those paid the supervisors of Massachusetts (Nathaniel Gorham) and Virginia, who received $2500 each.

The active work of repeal was begun by Mr. Bayard's motion, December 30, 1801, to instruct the Committee on Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of repealing the internal taxes and the postages on letters. On the 8th of March, Mr. Randolph, from that committee, reported a bill to repeal the internal duties, which was adopted without serious opposition.

When again it became necessary to provide for the extraordinary expenses of the second war with Great Britain, the internal revenue or excise tax upon spirits was revived by an act which passed the House of Representatives by a vote of eighty-five to forty-nine, and was approved by President Monroe July 22, 1813. It imposed a tax on each gallon of the capacity of stills for the distillation of spirits, including the head or cap, and boilers in steam distilleries were to be taxed double the amount required of stills heated by fire alone. In the debate on the bill, Mr. Ingersoll proposed to tax successions to real estate, incomes, law suits, offices and pensions; and Mr. Fisk, of New York, moved to strike out the tax on the capacity of stills, and substitute a tax of nine or twelve cents per gallon on the spirits distilled. Mr. Duvall, of Kentucky, opposed the latter in an earnest speech as excessive and oppressive, and bearing with peculiar hardship on the West, and both motions were negatived. Mr. Fisk, however, returned to the charge the next year, and moved to tax spirits twenty-five cents per gallon in addition to the tax on the capacity of the still, and it was lost by only seven votes. Bayly, of Virginia, opposed it, as well as the system then in force, as unequal and inconvenient. The Secretary of the Treasury had reported that the tax was then equivalent to five cents per gallon on the spirits produced. Mr. Bayly thought that with some distilleries that might be the case; and that it would not amount to more than half that in the case of distilleries on a large scale and in great perfection. In small distilleries, however, such as were used by farmers—and he referred particularly to his own state—it would amount to not less than ten and often fifteen cents. Mr. Eppes, of Virginia, moved a tax of fifteen cents per gallon on the spirits distilled, which was adopted by a vote of sixty-eight to sixty-two; but, on the 29th of October, it was laid on the table on the motion of Gaston, of North Carolina.

By the act of December 21, 1814, an excise of twenty cents per gallon was imposed on all spirits distilled in addition to the license tax on capacity, and provision was made for weekly licenses. The distiller was permitted to pay an excise of twenty-five cents per gallon upon his actual product in lieu of all other taxes, and distillers of domestic materials and all persons from whose materials such spirits should be distilled, were authorized to sell in any quantity not less than one gallon without license. The result of this act was naturally unsatisfactory, both to the government and the honest distiller. Congress sought to strengthen it by more stringent provisions in the following January, relative to the bonds, books and returns of distillers, but with no avail.

Complaint having been made, particularly in the South and West, of the inequality of the tax on stills, Commissioner Smith, in 1816, referred the subject for careful examination to Dr. Samuel L. Mitchell, of New York, and Alexander Anderson, of Philadelphia. The former was then one of our first scientists, the latter a distiller of large experience and the first in this country to adopt the use of steam. Their reports are interesting reading, and discuss in a clear and practical manner how a tax upon spirits may be best and most equitably levied and collected. The object to be attained was of course to tax the actual product as equally as possible, but such a direct tax was quickly set aside as impracticable, being easily evaded and having little or no protection but the oath of the distiller. There remained, then, no feasible plan but to tax the capacity of a distillery to produce spirits, which might be done in three ways: first, by ascertaining the quantity of spirits producible from a given quantity of grain or fruit, and taxing the material used; second, by ascertaining the quantity of fuel required to distill a given quantity of spirits, and taxing the fuel used; and third, by ascertaining the capacity or boiling power of the stills in a given time and the quantity of spirits producible therefrom, and laying the tax upon that capacity. The last method was decided beyond question to be the most practical and equal in its operation, though a difference in skill and energy on the part of the distiller must always produce unequal results. Congress accordingly repealed the gallon tax by act of April 19, 1816, and, to reduce the temptation to fraud, cut down the old license or capacity taxes about one-half.

A direct tax upon lands, dwelling-houses and slaves, which had been levied under the Confederation and again in 1800, formed a part of the scheme of internal taxation; and, by the act of July 22, 1813, Congress divided the country into one hundred and ninety-one districts for that purpose, with an assessor and collector, their assistants and deputies, in each. The office of commissioner of the revenue was established, and among his duties were those which had been performed to light-houses by former commissioners of the revenue, but the nature of which is now unknown. A direct tax of three millions was distributed among the states by act of August 2—Pennsylvania's quota being $365,479.16, of which the city of Philadelphia was to pay $79,500. This was followed by another direct tax of six millions in 1815.

The excise on spirits was accompanied by internal duties of four cents per pound on refined sugar, two to twenty dollars on carriages for the conveyance of persons, one per cent on auction sales of merchandise, and one-quarter of one per cent on auction sales of ships or vessels, imposed by three other acts approved the same day, and by license taxes of from ten to twenty-five dollars on dealers in spirits and foreign merchandise and wines, by act of August 2. The necessity for additional revenue is shown by the doubling of the tax on auction sales and the increase of licenses and postage fifty per cent in December, 1814. All these acts were to remain in force for one year after the conclusion of the war with Great Britain.

On the 18th of January, 1815, two more acts were approved, imposing internal duties on manufactures, the list of which shows the small variety then existing: Pig, bar, rolled and split iron, one dollar per ton; iron castings, one dollar and a half per ton; nails, brads and sprigs, one cent per pound; white wax candles, five cents per pound; other mould candles, three cents per pound; playing and visiting cards, fifty per cent; hats, caps and bonnets worth over two dollars, eight per cent; boots and bootees worth over five dollars, five per cent; saddles and bridles, six per cent; leather, five per cent; tobacco, cigars and snuff, twenty per cent; beer, ale and porter, six per cent; paper, three per cent ad valorem; and on household furniture and watches, which latter were repealed April 9, 1816.

In February, 1817, a motion was made by Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, and supported by Mr. Johnson, of Virginia, to repeal the internal duties, but it was laid on the table. At the next session Mr. Lowndes, of South Carolina, reported from the Committee on Ways and Means a bill for that purpose, which promptly passed both houses without recorded opposition, and was approved by President Monroe, December 23, 1817.

The collections of internal duties during this period (exclusive of "direct taxes") were, in 1814, $1,662,985; in 1815, $4,678,059; in 1816, $5,124,708; in 1817, $2,678,101; and from 1818 to 1848, consisting of arrears, $1,669,432, making a total of $15,813,285. The cost of collection was stated by Mr. Lowndes, in 1817, to be five and seven-tenths per cent. The chief source of revenue was, of course, distilled spirits, which yielded $3,048,908 in 1815, $2,002,764 in 1816, and $858,971 in 1817. For forty-five years thereafter no exciseman darkened the still-house door, and the "moonshiners" paid no tribute. They might have sung with Burns:

"We'll mak our maut, and brew our drink,
We'll dance and sing, and rejoice, man;
And monie thanks to the muckle black deil
That daunc'd awa' wi' the exciseman."

FRANK J. BRAMHALL.

"AT DAWN O' DAY."

BY KATE MCPHELM.

A LONG, dun stretch of land; a darkening, ominous autumn sky; a chill misty wind blowing up from the mighty Atlantic.

And two persons, a man and a woman, walking slowly along the beach—he a great, awkward, muscular fellow, clad in the rough homespun garb of the Canadian peasantry; she a slender, fragile little creature, more child than woman. A scarlet woolen shawl, part of which formed a hood for her bent head, enveloped her. One bare hand drew the folds together beneath her chin; the other was slipped through her companion's arm and rested in his firm hold.

"Don't you mind any stories you may hear about me, Marjorie," he was saying with a suspicious airiness of manner; "don't! I'm not much of a church-going chap, to be sure, and I like to have a bit of fun, now and then, with the boys up at the Point; but I pay my dues regularly at Christmas and Easter, and—don't you mind them, Marjorie! I suppose," with a quick, side-long glance, "Pierre Lechesne has been spreading false rumors about me."

Something he saw in the grave face beside him impelled him to continue:

"We used to be good friends—he and I—when we were both boys together. But now—now there is nothing he would not do to injure me—nothing! You know why, dear."

Her silence answered him.

"They are growing wealthy rapidly, the Lechesnes. It is said that Pierre is to build a new house in spring. Already his sisters wear dresses of silk, and go to gay Ottawa in the winter time. I'm afraid," with a savage laugh, "you've made a bad bargain, Marjorie. You, too, could have worn grand gowns. You, too, might have been as fine a lady as any of them, had you so chosen."

"Don't!" she protested softly.

"It's a mean place, anyhow, this God-forgotten corner of creation!" he went on, his strong, black brows knitting in a frown. "I wish I could take you away from here—I will soon. There are no happy memories to bid you stay."

"No," she answered. And then, as though his last words had struck a chord hitherto silent, "You knew my mother well, León?"

"Yes. I was but a clumsy lad when she and your father came here, and you—ah, what a pretty wee one you were! With the money which they had brought with them from England they bought a farm. I have heard the neighbors talk much about them. They were young, full of hope, and they would be rich, by-and-by, they said. They made a staunch fight, but the winter, the work, the unaccustomed hardships conquered. He died of fever, and she—"

He broke off abruptly.

"Go on!" she said quietly.

"I don't know, of course, Marjorie, but—they—say—"

"Oh, go on!" she cried, with sudden bitterness. "I know! Speak it out! though those around should be ashamed to breathe the word—she, of starvation!"

"Mignonne! they didn't think she was so poor. She had concealed the fact. She was always very proud. Every one spoke well of her, regretted her—"

She stopped him with a gesture.

"I think," she said sadly, "that even at the cost of being less tender to the dead, we should be more gentle to the living."

He smiled down at her curiously.

"That's one of your queer notions, Marjorie. But you mustn't be too hard on the folks, dear. They had Père Michaud sing mass for her soul, and they put a tall white cross above her grave. They were very kind afterward—"

She lifted to his, blue eyes bright with scorn.

"Yes," she repeated, "afterward!"

The wind had increased in volume. As they turned, it blew against them so fiercely that Leon Pelltier flung his arm about his companion to sustain her.

On the horizon a mighty host of black scudding clouds were pitching their tents for battle. The greenish waters of the Gulf were capped with foam.

"It's coming up!" he said; "we're going to have a big storm."

She clutched his sleeve in sudden, nervous fashion.

"Oh, no! A storm!—I am afraid, Leon!"

He laughed indulgently.

"That's you, Marjorie! You're too delicate a flower to blossom up here, petite. You're not like the rest of them. You've got a lower voice and softer ways, and, as I said before, queerish notions. And now you're afraid of a storm!"

He laughed again—a good, mellow, resonant laugh.

"Not for myself, Leon," she whispered tremulously; "I do not fear for myself. I—I was thinking of that other storm, about a month ago, when the White Swan went down, and they said—"

"Stop!" he cried, his voice breaking hoarsely in on the panting words, "what do you know about such—such things? The vessel was out of repair, quite unable to stand a high sea! There! I didn't mean to be harsh just now. Come up the cliffs. Steady—so! the rocks are slippery. Now, my darling, give me your sweetest kiss. I'm off for awhile."

"Where?"

"Oh, just up to the point for an hour or two. If the storm catches me, I may stay over till morning. Good-night."

With a swift, terrified motion she flung her arms around his neck, and pressing her pale face against his breast broke down in convulsive sobbing.

"Don't go, Leon—don't go to-night, dear. Something may happen—the tide along the beach—the storm—something. Don't go!"

"Why, Marjorie! why, little one! how nervous you are!" he cried cheerily. "What can harm me? I'm used to rough weather. I've been knocking 'round in storms ever since I was able to stand alone; and I know every step along the shore as well as the path through your garden."

He was stroking her soft hair with one broad, loving hand.

"As I was saying, Marjorie, this place doesn't suit you, and as soon as the first May flowers blossom in the forest I am going to take you up to Monsieur Le Curé's house, and I shall say to him: 'Mon père, this is she whom I desire to make my dear wife.' And when he has married us we shall go away together over the wide Atlantic. We shall turn our backs forever on this northern country, where the winters are so long, the skies so bleak, the blasts so cold. In your mother's land, where the air is sunny and young hearts are young, we shall make our happy home."

She lifted up a face transfigured.

"Is it true?" she whispered. "Oh, Leon, is it true?"

"Don't you know it is, Marjorie?"

"I only know I love you!" she cried, with a queer, wild rapture. "My creed is, I love you! My future—I love you!"

He bent and kissed her. A moment more and he was scrambling down the steep cliffs, sure-footed as a chamois.

He looked up. She was still in the same spot where he had left her, her scarlet shawl a vivid dash of color against the sombre sky.

"Au revoir!" he shouted. "I'll be back, sweetheart, at dawn o' day."

She turned and walked slowly homeward. She paused before a long, low building surmounted by a rude cross—the village church. It stood some distance in from the road, and was partly surrounded by a graveyard, which latter its tombstones rendered pallidly conspicuous.

She pushed open the wooden gate and went up the path, and entered the church, that strange, smiling radiance still lingering in her eyes. It was a feast day, and within benediction had but lately been pronounced, for the air was heavy with the clouds and sweet with the perfume of incense.

The moments slipped by. The dim fragrance of the incense grew fainter. Dusk draped the unesthetic roses, the bare branches—all the rigid and pathetic poverty of the little place with gentle fingers. Brighter through the shadows gleamed the star of gold.

It was quite dark when Marjorie Grant emerged. She stood a brief space, as though in indecision. To her right lay a field, across which the villagers had worn a path. Yes, it would be shorter than the road.

Walking swiftly on, her head bent in opposition to the wind, she became conscious of a figure striding before her. At a narrow gate leading out of the inclosure they both paused in order that two men approaching from an opposite direction might pass through.

They were talking, and Marjorie instantly recognized their voices as those of young farmers of the town, neither of whom had any reputation to spare—such individuals as are generally suspected, even when not definitely accused.

"Yes," announced one, evidently under the influence of liquor, "he'll not fail us. He'll be at the Cape to-night—Leon Pelltier."

"Shut up, you fool!" commanded the other, with an oath.

Then they had passed through. The girl caught her breath gaspingly. Leon—to-night—at the Cape!

The man before her turned, and so, for the first time, caught sight of her.

"What!" he cried, "is it you, Marjorie?"

She fell back a step. Instinctively her hand sought her heart. Had he also heard?

"Yes," she answered, "it is I."

"So Pelltier is going up to the Cape to-night? Rather rash on his part," with grim insinuation.

"Let me pass, Monsieur Lechesne."

"I'll be up a bit of the road with you," carelessly.

"I'm going your way."

She walked rapidly on, he keeping step beside her.

"It isn't so long since the White Swan went down. I should think Leon would be more prudent. It is very soon for him to be at his old tricks again."

"Be careful," she said, quietly. "You may go too far, Pierre Lechesne."

She could barely discern the dark outline of his figure. The wind was tearing her shawl from her shoulders and whirling it about in fantastic frolic.

He laughed. But just as they reached the farmhouse gate he caught her by the arm and forced her to face him.

"Look here, Marjorie," he said brusquely, "where is the use of trying to deceive me? You're afraid that vagabond lover of yours is in a scrape; you know you are! You're trembling like a leaf this moment. Give him his congé. I'm a rich man, and, what's more, an honest man, and I'll marry you to-morrow if you'll only say the word. Why don't you throw him over?"

"Because I love him."

His tense grasp on her arm relaxed. He did not speak for a little while. When he did it was in a tone strangely subdued and humble.

"And I love you well enough to help you to the throne of your happiness even at the cost of my own. Listen, Marjorie! You know what you fear. I will avert it. I shall saddle Napoleon and ride up to the Cape. I shall find him and warn him, and tell him you need him. If you will only trust me I will do all this without faintest hope of reward. Will you?"

Her panting breathing alone broke the silence.

"Will you?" he repeated.

He might save him yet if—if there was need of salvation! Was it not possible that he was more generous than they had ever given him credit for being? And no other chance remained.

"I—trust you."

"Good! There is no time to be lost. If I tell him you require his presence he may not believe me. Prejudice has hardened him against the friend of his youth. Give me the ring you usually wear to show him as proof that I came from you."

"Oh, no! he gave it to me. I cannot part with it—no!"

"Quick! it grows late—perhaps too late!"

She tore the trinket from her finger—a tiny circlet, devoid of intrinsic value, but to her priceless.

He took it and strode away into the night.

She turned and went wearily up the path. A rosy-cheeked old dame looked up from her task of preparing the evening meal as she came into the tin-sparkling kitchen.

"Mère de Dieu!" she shrilled, "but we shall have a storm! And if the wreckers are out to-night—"

Horror left the sentence unfinished.

Within a quarter of an hour from the time he had parted with Marjorie Grant, Pierre Lechesne entered the village post-office and hastily scribbled a line to the authorities of a neighboring town. A moment more and it flashed over the wires:

"Wreckers and smugglers at the Cape!"

All Canadians know the Cape—a bare, narrow strip of land, crowned with a light-house, which juts out into the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

The battle began. The cannon of the thunder crashed and roared; the spray rained against the rocks like shot; the gleaming blades of the lightning outleaped and gashed the black night with wounds of flame. A few men, clustered together in a cranny of the cliffs, muttered to one another as the fierce fray went on.

"There is no danger—now," urged a voice.

"Curse you, keep cool!"

"I say, Pelltier, what would Ma'mselle Marjorie think if she saw you—"

"Sacré! hold your peace. I am a desperate man. This is my first cruise—and my last. It must be—it is the only avenue to prosperity. But don't mention her, Jacques Le Blanc—don't dare to!"

"Hark!" cried the first speaker, as a faint, peculiar whistle pierced the air. "That's Jean's signal. All's well! Come!"

They crept from their covert and up the shore like river rats. Some stationed themselves at the entrance, some scaled the stair. A cry uprose.

"They come—the constables! Voilà! let us fly! Ah, Sainte Marie! too late!"

A terrible struggle there in the night and the storm. Shrieks, blows, oaths, mad resistance. Finally, the "click-click" of handcuffs.

A man holding a lantern flashed its light full on the face of the foremost prisoner. He started back in feigned dismay.

"You! Leon Pelltier!"

The other looked at him despairingly, their enmity for the time forgotten.

"Marjorie!" he murmured.

Lechesne lifted his disengaged left hand, so that the glimmer from the lantern clearly revealed the ring which adorned his little finger.

"Oh, I'll take care of Marjorie!" he laughed significantly.

Pelltier's cheeks crimsoned. A curse crashed between his clenched teeth. He strove frantically to free his hands from their iron fetters. Again Lechesne laughed, but he also moved away.

With the first chill light of morning Marjorie Grant was down on the cliffs. She descried in the distance the figure of a man running fleetly up the winding, sandy path.

"Oh, God be thanked! Leon!"

But it was not Leon.

"Pierre—Pierre Lechesne!" she cried as he came nearer. "What news? You found him? he is coming home? he was not there at all? it was all a mistake?" in timorous joy; "a cruel mistake, and—"

"There was no mistake—none! The wreckers of the White Swan made another attempt last night to extinguish the light. This time they were unsuccessful. They were watched and captured—every man of them. They had been doing some smuggling, too, I believe.

They are mostly young fellows from Cocague, Point du Chêne and Shédiac. The constables have marched the whole crowd to Westmoreland Jail."

"But he was not among them? Ah, say he was not among them—Leon!"

She was leaning eagerly forward, her quivering lips apart. He hesitated, then he spoke with pained reluctance:

"He was the first man arrested."

"You did not warn him—save him! And you promised—I trusted you—"

"I did my best, but—I was too late!"

"Too late?"

She stood and stared at him a moment, the salt spray beating in her face like hail. Then she put both hands to her head in dull, bewildered fashion, and, turning, walked away. But the next day she was down on the cliffs at dawn, and the next and the next, and for many weary days and weeks and months after that.

Accounts few, vague, unsatisfactory, of a trial and conviction at Fredricton drifted to the desolate French hamlet.

"We always knew he was a scamp," nodded the old gossips, speaking of Leon Pelletier. "None of our daughters were ever good enough for his lordship. He must choose for his fiancée that little, yellow-haired English girl. Bien! Chacun à son goût!" And they would shrug their shoulders disdainfully.

"Marjorie is a fool!" declared others younger. "Losing her good looks and chance of a husband for the sake of a man who may not see daylight with free eyes for half a dozen years yet."

"Ah, if the foreign mam'selle had not such strange notions in her pretty head!" sighed more than one admiring swain.

May came, and the May flowers were in bloom. Marjorie went into the woods and gathered a cluster. When she went down to the beach the next morning she wore the sweet, pink things in her bosom.

That day the curé sent for her. She went up to the presbytery in obedience to the summons. He spoke to her seriously, but gently, too. "My child," he said, "he to whom you had given your heart has proved most unworthy of your love. He is parted from you by his own sin. It is but just. The grief which now controls your every action is unchristianlike. We must not rebel against the crosses which the good God may see fit to lay upon our shoulders."

"Oh, mon père," she burst out passionately, "you do not understand! You are good and wise, and I thank you. But I—I am young, and—alone. What is there—who is there I care for here? The people and I have nothing in common—nothing. I come of a different race, from a different land. There was only one heart which understood me, helped me, cherished me, and I have lost it! My life is empty. Don't talk to me of submission!"

"Your life need not be empty," he answered her. "Fill it with the noblest duties of a woman, those which cluster around the hearth of home. An honorable gentleman seeks you for his wife. What say you?"

"Whom?"

"Monsieur Lechesne."

She stepped back with a soft indrawing of her breath.

"Non, mon père!"

She had taken her May flowers from her bosom, and was arranging and rearranging them with slim, deft fingers. She would hold them away from her the better to observe the effect, and then bend her face above them to inhale their fragrance.

"Your reasons, my daughter?" Père Michaud questioned rather sternly.

"Because Leon is coming back," she replied, still busy with her task.

"When?" he cried aghast.

"Didn't you know?" she asked, smiling up at him from her flowers with softly-brilliant eyes. "He is coming back at dawn o' day."

And she went away with the blossoms in her hand.

May passed. And many Mays passed. It would be a loving eye, indeed, which could now discern beauty in Marjorie Grant's face. It had grown thin and colorless and haggard. It looked aged and ungirlish. There were pathetic wrinkles where had been velvet dimples. In the village they had come to regard her with a sort of complacent pity. When the flashy, over-dressed bride whom Pierre Lechesne had brought home from Ottawa noticed her, and inquired concerning her, her husband smiled and tapped his forehead significantly with his finger.

She had abandoned, too, all fanciful feminine attempt at adornment. She wore her rich brown hair brushed plainly away from her white cheeks, unbound by any ornament or bit of bright ribbon. Only they noticed, when the May flowers were in bloom, she it was who discovered the first and sought the last. Through the glass of time the sands of nine years ebbed dully. The winter came on intensely severe. Despite all protest and entreaty, Marjorie Grant persisted in making her way down to the cliffs in the biting cold of the early morning.

"I must go!" she would say to them. "You know he is coming at dawn o' day!"

But a time came when they found her lying upon the rocks, stark and unconscious. They bore her home, and through the long winter she lay ill unto death.

The May flowers were flushing all the mossy hollows when she rose up feeble as a child. As soon as she could walk she dragged herself out to the forest and gathered a great bunch of the delicate sprays.

"At dawn o' day!" she whispered.

All night she listened as the clock in the farm-house kitchen called the hours. It was still quite dark when she crept down the path—to the cliffs—to the beach, the May flowers in her hand. A faint grayness came into the air—the cool, fresh twilight of a summer dawn.

Hark! footsteps!

Some one was coming along the shore—a man; a big, hulking fellow with a closely-cropped head, and a skin which had been bleached to pallor by the atmosphere of a prison.

He stopped short. What was that lying there? A woman? He bent above the prone figure, with the bloodless face upturned to the brightening sky.

"God! Marjorie!"

He staggered back. She lifted herself on one shaking hand and looked up at him.

"Leon! it is—dawn!"

What bitter truth did he read in those loving, burning eyes! He crushed her to his heart with a terrible, passionate cry.

"No! it is night—black night!"

Out of a sea of pearl the sun upfloated a disk of gold. Its rare light laughed across the river on the wee waves stumbling up the sand—on the white sails of a fisherman's boat—on a little child at play.

Aye, and on something else!

It lay upon the shining beach, some rosy blooms upon its bosom.

The day had dawned!

THE HOUSEHOLD—A QUESTION OF TEMPERATURE.

I HEARD, not long ago, a distinguished physician remark at a commencement lecture: "Accustom yourselves—by degrees if you must—to a temperature of 68° Fahr., and, depend upon it, you will live the longer and enjoy life the more."

It would have been amusing, had it not been proof of the evil decried by the speaker, to see the smile of incredulity, the shrug of protest, the shiver of dismay with which the cultivated audience met the earnest appeal for lower temperature in our winter homes. It is time that others than physicians and teachers of physiology gave attention to this matter, it being undoubtedly the scapegoat upon which many evils, now borne by less guilty causes, should be laid. Nothing but actual personal experience can ever convince the native-born and nurtured American that his or her way is not the best of all; but when they are driven to the wall, and of necessity must turn, let us by all means have the other and possibly better ways well lighted for their guidance, that their blood be not indeed upon our heads. As, after being accustomed to and requiring a temperature of 72° or 74°, I am now equally comfortable in that of 68°, with increased general health, the tale of my conversion may be suggestive.

If my friends recognize their portraits, one of them at least will smile at the vigor with which I promulgate her teachings, after what she is pleased to term my painful resignation to principle. I went, several winters ago, to a Northern city to visit two schoolmates of my younger days, sisters, both married, and in their own homes. At a previous visit, I had found one so overburdened with the care of a rather delicate child, that I chose to leave her house for the later visit, determining the length of my stay by the observations I might make while staying with her sister. Here I found as perfect a home as I had ever dreamed of. The household arrangements were all that the most fastidious and painstaking housekeeper could require. My friend gave her personal untiring supervision to each detail with a carefulness and efficiency beyond all praise. Nothing that added to the comfort or pleasure of the family was held to be a trifle. Her supervision extended over the entire house; her own eye noted the temperature of each room—her own orders regulated it; each child was carefully dressed before her for the day, and visited each night in its bed. With unvarying regularity they were warmly wrapped and sent out of doors on every pleasant day, or to a large open porch in cloudy and inclement weather. Four more sturdy-looking babies than these had been it was never my good fortune to see; but, with all the thoughtful care of the mother, each year found the little ones frailer, paler, more delicate than the last.

"It is the long winter," said the mother; "they lose then all they gain during the summer."

I proposed at length spending a day at her sister's with the children, and was met with a cry of remonstrance.

"I would not let the children go there a day in this weather for the world. They would get their deaths of cold! You cannot bear the temperature of her rooms a day."

"But," I said, "her children were delicate compared with yours."

"Oh, well," she replied, "they thrive on neglect. I do not consider them half clothed, but they are always well."

It was a sharp winter day that found me at the door, where, in defiance of wind and cold, several rugged little urchins were impatiently pulling at the bell. The door opened to let me in and to let out a wee baby-boy, who shouted merrily at the flying snow and scrambled down the steps with the others. The parlor doors stood open, and within a bright open fire burned; but I confess to a feeling of chilliness, and a longing for the comfortable heat of the house I had left. A high-backed chair, with a pretty woollen shawl across the arms, was wheeled before the fire for my use, and several embroidered scarfs lay about the room.

"Put on the shawl—you will need it here," said the rosy-cheeked woman, who had lost the years her sister had found since I last saw them, and a quick turn brought a screen up to my side. "You will think we mean to freeze you till you get accustomed to our rooms."

"Pleasant rooms they are, dear, to get accustomed to; but what a pity you can't warm them!"

"Oh, we call them warm. All these wrappings are for our friends when they come. We do not need them. Look at the children—should you think they could ever be cold?" And indeed it made me warm to look at them, running and shouting with fun, their faces glowing, and not a look of discomfort about them. And when they came in-doors, no appeals for more fire nor complaints of cold. They were actually comfortable in what seemed to me chilliness, to use no severer term.

But I found no less care given the household arrangements than at the other house, but toward different ends. The orders in one house to increase the fires were contrasted with orders here to open the doors. Instead of the careful shutting out of drafts and the warm rooms at night, I saw a careful adjustment of open windows, and met a breath of cool air on opening the door of a sleeping-room. The cautions about clothing were as carefully given, but of quite different purport. I think nothing can equal my surprise when, after undressing the four-year-old boy, the mother proceeded to bathe him with cold water, ending with a brisk rubbing, and said: "To-morrow you must leave off these heavy flannel shirts, and put on your cotton stockings instead of these cashmere ones." What did it mean? In answer to my questioning, she said:

"He is too warmly clad. I find it worse than too little clothing to have the children so warm that they perspire until their clothing is wet. If I had not insisted upon that cold bath and brisk rubbing, he would have had a cold in the morning. I used to be of my sister's mind, and considered warm clothing and an equable temperature throughout the house of 76°, day and night, necessary to life. In the snug little house in which you once visited me, it was the simplest thing in the world to keep that up; but we were never free from colds, and the children, as well as myself, were delicate. This house seemed desirable to us because of the deep-shaded yard and large sunny rooms. In the summer we found it quite as well to stay in the city and enjoy our home comforts as to go to the country; but when autumn came I stood aghast. 'We can never warm this house, doctor,' I said to our physician, who made an unprofessional call to see what kept us in such unusual health. 'If you can't, so much the better,' he replied; 'and if you will try the winter without starting the furnace fire, and never let the mercury reach 70°, you'll not need me here any more than you have this summer.' My husband declares I made a virtue of necessity, but it was not so. It was rather a nice matter to accustom the children to a temperature of 70° in the day and a cooler room at night; but it worked splendidly. We escaped colds till Christmas. Then I 'warmed up' the house for company, and, in consequence, we all took cold from overheating. I could not stand that. I could not make ourselves sick nor lose my friends by freezing them. So I arrayed the parlor chairs each with its individual way—'company cosies' we call them—and with cool rooms, cold baths and plenty of out-door exercise, regardless of the weather, we are what you see us."

Would this always work? It was worth trying. If I had not succeeded, I should not have written this.

MAY COLE BAKER.

At an early day we shall have something further to say upon the subject of Heraldic America. The numerous communications we have received upon the subject show that we made no mistake in regard to its general interest.

A FEW of our subscribers are rather slow in complying with the request we made in sending out the "House-keeper's Year Book." We hope they will let us hear from them as promptly as possible, as we wish to send sample copies at once to the friends they may designate.

WE have received several letters from interested readers begging us to give longer and more frequent installments of "Belinda." We do the best we can. The advance sheets are sent us by the English publishers, and we publish as fast as received. We are already a full month ahead of the English publication, and cannot give what we cannot get.

A GEORGIA friend writes us that the health of Mr. Paul Hayne, the poet, is by no means so seriously affected as has been supposed, a fact which our readers will all be glad to learn. She tells us also of a graceful tribute which Mr. Hayne lately paid to a lady who was for a short time his hostess. On the last night of his stay she said to him: "Mr. Hayne, I wish when I am gone you would write three lines about me for Henry's (her husband) sake." The next morning Mr. Hayne handed her these lines:

"Three lines when thou art dead—it must not be!
For never more couldst thou be dead to me!
God's angels sometimes leave their native sky,
But ah! my friend, the angels cannot die."

THE CONTINENT has offered three prizes—of $50, $40 and $25—for the best specimens of wood engraving from the members of the classes in engraving at the Philadelphia School of Design for Women. The awards will be made shortly, and some of the engravings submitted will appear in an early issue of the magazine, in connection with a paper by John Sartain, the eminent engraver, on "Engraving as an Occupation for Young Women." The great advance in this art, and the increased demand for a superior grade of work, have opened an interesting, useful and lucrative career to young women of taste and skill which may be followed at their homes, and the rewards of which, in reputation and emoluments, render it a most attractive calling. The Philadelphia School of Design has done excellent work in this department, and the results of the labors of the classes in engraving, under the direction of Mr. George P. Williams, make a most creditable showing. The judges in the competition will be Mr. Thomas Johnson, the engraver, of Brooklyn, N. Y.; Mr. Fred. B. Schell, the artist, of Philadelphia, and a representative of THE CONTINENT.

OUR "bonanza" Senators, Sharon, Fair and Tabor, serve to point the danger which is likely to arise from making the Senate of the United States what it is fast becoming, a select council of millionaires. Sharon was nearly always conspicuous for his absence, and the atmosphere even of Washington would have been sweeter if the others had followed his example. Side by side with the filthy record of these men's debaucheries and the shame they have brought upon their exalted positions, the press teems with glowing descriptions of the palaces they have built and are building. There are two things that this class of men can do that the world will always be glad to have them do—build really creditable houses and die.

EVERY lover of good literature will be glad to learn that Marion Harland, whose works have done so much to promote a healthful taste and elevate the tone of American womanhood, is about to publish a new story of American life. She is one of those authors whom life abroad has only made riper and richer in thought and more earnest in her devotion to her native land. She does not regard American life as designed simply to furnish a counterfoil to foreign perfectibility. Its past she reveres; its present she respects, and its future she regards not with faint hope, but with exultant confidence. Her present work will be regarded with especial interest, as it is supposed to be, to a considerable degree, the record of her own girlhood.

"Judith—a Tale of Old Virginia"—is located in the region of her birth, and describes the scenes and society in which her youth was passed. It is of peculiar interest as the verdict of a woman of rare culture and experience upon a life whose best elements as well as its worst are fast passing into oblivion. The unlovely sides of the old Southern life have been so often painted that it is well that a loving hand should trace for us its brighter features ere the eyes that saw shall all have been closed in death. Of all this author has written, "Judith" is destined to hold the foremost place. On every page is the fire of youthful memory, tempered by the wisdom of large-hearted and loving experience.

THE CONTINENT, looking back upon its year and a half of life, is not ashamed of the tales it has offered to its readers. "Under Green Apple Boughs," "The Marquis of Carrabas," "Dust," "The House that Jill Built" and "Hot Plowshares" in the first fifteen months, more than fifty short stories of unusual excellence, and its multitude of illustrated articles, poems and weekly departments, form an array upon which we look with satisfaction. But of all that we have given we consider "Judith" the crown and masterpiece. It will begin in No. 72, and will run for some months. Subscriptions dating from that number and running till February 1 will be taken at $2.00. Or we will send THE CONTINENT from No. 72 until the end of the year, with the back numbers from January 1, for $3 00, postpaid, to any address in the United States or Canada.

THE poet was wise in his generation when he restricted to the "savage race" his remarks as to the soothing charms of music. Not that the civilized races are altogether unaffected by these charms, but it is probably true that they are less generally susceptible than are their barbarian brethren. Here, for instance, is her most gracious Majesty Victoria, Queen etc., etc., and Empress etc., etc., moved to confer the cheap honor of knighthood upon three eminent musicians, of whom the one best known to Americans is "Mr.," or as he must hereafter be known, "Sir" Arthur Sullivan. What can be more evident than that the rollicking measures of recent popular operettas have so moved the sympathies of her Majesty, or those of some of her Majesty's advisers, that she has beknighted their author. Arthur Sullivan is now on the same social plane with the imaginary Sir Georgius Midas, made famous by the pencil of Du Maurier in the pages of Punch, and with the actual Sir David —, who is only a country grocer, and who won his spurs by setting up a monument to the late Prince Consort. It was an invidious distinction to make, however, that W. S. Gilbert should be forced to remain plain Mr. What would Sir Arthur's music have been without Gilbert's wit and words? And will the next operetta be by "Sir Arthur Sullivan and Mr. Gilbert?" It is pleasant to reflect that Sir Arthur will be made the butt of no end of chaff on the part of his versatile comrade when they sit at their work with the pipes and mugs which are said to form part of their partnership outfit. Knight-errantry, as it exists at the present day, might suggest a fit subject for some future drama.

A CORRESPONDENT from Arkansas writes us that the recent session of the Legislature of that state seems to have been especially concerned in legislating to keep out immigration. It is a very unfortunate thing that this state seems not to realize the advantages which would accrue to it from turning within its borders the tide of immigration which now seeks Texas and the Northwest. The immigration to Texas is more largely from the Northwest than it would have seemed reasonable to anticipate a few years ago, and it is this immigration which it is peculiarly desirable that the Southwestern states should secure. Of mere hand-labor they have already a sufficiency. The foreign immigrant who brings merely capacity for labor, and is fettered by the conditions of his previous life, is not half as valuable in those communities as the brain and energy of Northern life. Isolated instances lose also a great part of their value. The life of the Southwest needs the inspiration of the Northern-bred enterprise and thrift—not to change or remodel what it already has, but to give it a new impetus and lift it out of the rut into which it has fallen. The disadvantages under which that region labors are very onerous—the opportunities which it offers with awakened energies and well-directed enterprise are very great. Because of its disadvantages, immigration will not seek it, as it does every nook and cranny of the Northwest, of its own free will and accord, but it must be by some means baited and encouraged to turn aside from its established course to mingle with and color the life that now holds the soil, bemoans the past, and regards the future with distrust. The Democratic party of the South cannot maintain itself much longer upon the mere boast that it has relieved those states of the oppression of carpet-bag government. Unquestionably great evils therein during the reconstruction era, and the attempt to superimpose upon those states at once the civilization and development of the North was no doubt a failure for the time being, yet the principles and ideas, the open competition and universal rivalry, which has made the North intelligent and prosperous, must underlie the future of those states if they are to maintain themselves in the race of prosperity. A full decade of growth and peace has elapsed since the Democratic party assumed the entire responsibility for the progress or decadence of this region. It is high time that it began to boast, not of what it overthrew, but of what it has builded up. The language of our correspondent applies not merely to himself, but to many thousands of the best men of that section, who are beginning to feel dissatisfied with the result. He says quaintly: "The Democratic party reminds me of an old horse that belonged to an even older negro of my acquaintance. When asked why he didn't feed the animal better, Jim replied: 'I does feed him, boss—enuff to keep him up—that's all he'll b'ar. Thet hoss won't stan' high livin'. One right good feed would founder him, shoa.' I've always been a Democrat, and am yet, but I would not care to ride behind the old nag without a good pair of reins and an air-brake. She's been ruled off the track so long that there's no telling where she'd bring up if she once got in the lead, judging from the few local spurts she has made of late."

One of the healthiest signs of our modern political life is the fact that many of the most thoughtful and intelligent of the Southern Democrats, like our correspondent, are waking up to the fact that something must be done. It is of little moment to the country what they call themselves—whether Independents or Republicans, or whatever it may be—so long as it means life instead of death, action instead of lethargy. The South has its future in its own hands; but if it keeps its hands folded, that future will not be of very lusty growth.

No traveler in this be-traveled United States has looked with more penetration or with more kindness than Mr. Edward Freeman, whose observations are now in book form.¹ These are the faults—or, perhaps, mannerisms is the better word—of Mr. Freeman's style; a double, and sometimes treble, statement of a fact or theory, as if, doubting the capacity of his hearers, he thought it best to give every practicable "point of view," and if one form proved insufficient, repeat the same thing in smaller words. He talks down to us, as seems a necessity to all Englishmen; but while there is an undeniable flavor of Mr. Barlow, he is less a prig than that immortal and ponderous expounder; in fact not a prig at all, but only a man accustomed to find his opinions of weight, and giving them with a calm diffuseness born of such certainty. He is a trifle indignant that our knowledge of England, geographically and otherwise, is not more minute, and, naturally enough, thinks that we have no right to expect full knowledge of America from educated Englishmen. Our politics are criticised thoughtfully and carefully. He sees certain dangers ahead, as the thoughtful American also sees them, but has much faith in the inherent good sense of the people and in probable reforms to come. The Irishman and the negro he regards as our weightiest problem, and while he believes in "home rule" for Ireland, and thus can never be accused as the enemy of her people, he states it as a manifest fact that the Irish element is, in the English hands on both sides of the ocean, a mischievous element, adding:

"It is the worst, and perhaps the strongest, of the causes which help to give a bad name to American politics. Political men in all times and places lie under strong temptations to say and do things which they otherwise would not say and do, in order to gain some party advantage; but on no political men of any time or place has this kind of influence been more strongly brought to bear than it is on political men in the United States who wish to gain the Irish vote. The importance of that vote grows and grows; no party, no leading man, can afford to despise it. Parties and men are therefore driven into courses to which otherwise they would have no temptation to take, and those for the most part courses which are unfriendly to Great Britain. Any ill-feeling which other causes may awaken between the two severed branches of the English people is prolonged and strengthened by the presence of the Irish settlers in America. In some minds they may really plant hostile feelings toward Great Britain which would otherwise find no place there. At any rate, they plant in many minds a habit of speaking and acting as if such hostile feelings did find a place, a habit which cannot but lead to bad effects in many ways. The mere rumor, the mere thought, of recalling Mr. Lowell from his post in England in subservency to Irish clamor is a case in point. That such a thing should even have been dreamed of, as it was last year, shows the baleful nature of Irish influence in America. It shows how specially likely it is to stir up strife and ill-feeling between Great Britain and America, even at times when, setting Irish matters aside, there is not the faintest ground of quarrel on either side. In a view of poetical justice, it is perhaps not unreasonable that English misrule in Ireland should be punished in this particular shape. It may be just that the wrongs which we have done to our neighbors should be paid off at the hands of members of our own family. But the process is certainly unpleasant to our branch of the family, and it is hard to see how it can be any real gain to the other."

There are many quotable passages, and the book must rank as a thoroughly courteous, as well as just and impartial, record of a visit which seems to have left few disagreeable memories, and the results of which mean both pleasure and profit for every reader.

THE increase of nervous diseases and the often-recurring attacks of that modern possession of devils, nervous prostration, which has come to be the inevitable fate of the overworked American, have turned popular attention to the various treatises and Health Primers on overwork and kindred topics. These, for the most part, are written in popular style, and serve an excellent purpose in defining the proper limits of work and the necessary formulas of healthful daily living. Memory, in these cases, suffers more than any other faculty; and overworked men or women find themselves at last the slave of note-book and pencil, and unable to recall the items of the day's work without reference to the memorandum. Forgetfulness being a growing tendency for all, especial interest attaches to this forty-first number in a series¹ which holds an amount of valuable information never before given so clearly. Each volume is the work of a master in that special field. All are interesting, many are absolutely unique, and interest increases rather than lessens as the series grows.

While the phenomena of memory are investigated in the present case from a pathological standpoint, and the book is, as the author describes it, "an essay in descriptive psychology," the general reader will find, that aside from certain technical words and phrases, the understanding of which requires only a good dictionary at hand, there is nothing which is not plain. Ribot's style is simple and direct, and every page of the treatise clears up long-doubtful points or suggests explanation of personal experiences. He sets aside, in the beginning, the popular belief that memory is an impression like that of a seal on wax. The basis of all memory is in the brain cells. An impression is a modification of cell-elements, and these modifications depend directly upon nutrition. In full health nutrition is perfect, the brain cells well nourished and memory vivid. With any change in nutrition comes a corresponding exaltation or depression. "A nerve cell which remembers a particular thing may be thrown out of its circuit of nutrition, and at once its function is suspended and forgetfulness reigns in that particular." Every statement or hypothesis is illustrated by numerous cases, and the whole forms the most valuable contribution ever made to this special topic.

THE remarkable book by M. Stepniak, "Underground Russia," is to be reprinted in this country by Charles Scribner's Sons.

A BALLAD by Philip Bourke Marston, said to be one of the great ballads of the century, is to be printed in The Youth's Companion.

"LATINE," Professor Shumway's little Latin periodical, now has subscribers in Europe, China and the Sandwich Islands, and its circulation is steadily increasing.

ROBERTS BROTHERS will soon issue the Rev. Edward Everett Hale's description of his tour in Spain, under the title of "Seven Spanish Cities." The favorite "Ten Times One is Ten" story is to have a second part, giving an account of Harry Wadsworth, its hero, and of the various Harry Wadsworth clubs which owe their existence to the story.

AN irreverent publisher announced the other day that there was "a boom in theology," and religious books, especially those of a speculative character, are selling in a very remarkable manner. In this light there seems more hope for the new monthly beginning life at Andover, which is to be incisive and animated, and never ponderous, if effort can keep out that unpleasant quality.

A VERY beautiful little volume is that containing the poems of Mr. William Cleaver Wilkinson, whose "Ode on Webster" has already been noticed in these columns. Several of the shorter poems are already familiar to the public; and, while the work is didactic rather than lyrical in quality, the lines are smooth and graceful, and often strong. (12mo, pp. 180, $1.50; Charles Scribner's Sons.

MRS. OLIPHANT, who is evidently sole owner of a day holding thirty-six hours, has selected and arranged a volume of Cowper's poems for the "Golden Treasury Series." The amount of work accomplished by this indefatigable writer is something incredible to ordinary minds, and it gains steadily in literary quality. She is a feminine Anthony Trollope, with a grace he never had.

MR. RUSKIN's notes to the new edition of "Modern Painters" are of a very extraordinary nature. He is convinced that people here overrated him, and says he "cannot but wonder more and more at the obstinacy of the public in calling these early books my best writing." His criticisms on himself are as unsparing as on others, and the notes bristle with condemnatory adjectives. "Pure nonsense" is the mildest term he applies, and he proceeds to add such expressions as "offensively aggressive," "heedlessly and insolently written," "a piece of pious insolence," "extremely pedantic and tiresome," "unblushing assumption."

"THE SLEEPING CAR," as an 18mo, proves itself much more easy reading than when offered by the yard, as at its first appearance in Harpers' Christmas. At present it is a dainty pocket volume, which will find favor not only with every-day readers, but with the number who find the amusing comedietta admirably adapted to amateur theatricals. (18mo, pp. 74; 50 cents; James R. Osgood & Co., Boston).

THERE is genuine poetry enough between the covers of the little volume, "The Hill of Stones and Other Poems," by S. Weir Mitchell, M. D., to have given, had it only appeared fifty years ago, permanent reputation as a poet. The misfortune is that it is only one of dozens of volumes, all holding smooth and musical verse, often of far more merit than that embalmed and referred to as classical, yet destined to have no permanent place. But there are passages here that ought to live, and that must with a few at least, even if the general reader passes on to the newcomers in the same field. (16mo, pp. 97, $1.00; Houghton, Mifflin & Co.).

"AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS" both may thank the compiler of the thin octavo bearing this title, which has just been issued by the Putnams, and which will prove invaluable to every one who plans a literary life. Nothing precisely like it has ever before been done in the way of settling all vexed and uncertain questions as to copyright, general publishing arrangements, and all the dubious points connected with the make-up of a book. Even the practiced author will find many useful hints, and the book fills a place nothing is likely to supersede. (8vo pp. 96, $1.00; G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York).

THE mountains of Western North Carolina have become familiar to many readers through Christian Reid's "Land of the Sky," but sentiment predominates in the charming volume, which, though a very accurate guide-book, ignores certain phases of interest to the hunter or more enterprising traveler. For such, nothing can be better than "The Heart of the Alleghanies, or Western North Carolina," by Wilbur G. Zeigler and Ben S. Grosscup. The book takes up the history, topography and resources of the region; gives the various legends of the wilderness and numerous hunting and fishing adventures, and with Professor Kere's admirable map and the numerous illustrations, is a valuable addition to the literature of travel. (12mo, pp. 374, $2.00; A. Williams & Co., Raleigh, N. C.).

It is seldom that fiction offers anything more forlornly amusing or amusingly forlorn—the arrangement of adjectives being according to the reader's state of mind at the end—than "My Trivial Life and Misfortune; A Gossip With No Plot in Particular, by a Plain Woman." The story forms one of the series of "Transatlantic Novels," published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, having gained great popularity in England. Certainly no more realistic record was ever given to the public. It has the minute analysis dear to the James school, with yet no particle of suggestion of James' style. It might be a journal kept from day to day, almost from hour to hour, by the heroine, who divides it into two parts, the first volume covering "Spinsterhood," the second "Meum and Tuum." In spite of keen humor, the volumes are a hopeless, wretched record of mean and unworthy lives. The good people are nearly imbecile with stupidity; the bad have no redeeming points. The heroine's mother, by whose sudden death she is left at the mercy of relatives given over to "Philistinism," is the most attractive character in the long record; and "Uncle Sherbrook," with his devotion to law-suits, his inflexible methods in daily life, and his real affectionateness under the crust of habit and narrowness, comes next. There is a cousin Denis, who cuts old friends for the sake of a half recognition from those of higher rank, and a hero who marries the heroine, Sophy Thursby, and discovers himself finally as a mere fortune-hunter in love with another woman. The most careful study is expended on Mrs. Sherbrook Stuart, a woman who reminds one at times of Mrs. Mackenzie, in "The Newcomers," and whose years of quiet plotting and scheming result finally in an alteration of Uncle Sherbrook's will, and the loss of an expected fortune to the heroine, with other catastrophes for the miserable widow, "Aunt Jane," who is left dependent and helpless upon the wretched Sophy's hands. There is not a page at which one is not likely to smile, nor is there one which is not faithless, cynical and depressing. So much power deserves a different outlet, and the brilliant author, it is hoped, will, in the next attempt, have found more lovable people to depict. (Paper, pp. 352, 375; 50 cents each).

PROBABLY there is no memorial of Shelley which is likely to give a clearer idea of him as the clear and luminous intelligence that always dominated any merely human side than the publication in the "Parchment Series" of his "Select Letters." These letters, as the title indicates, are the choicest among the correspondence of many years, the selection having been made and edited by Richard Garnett, whose introduction is a careful and sympathetic estimate of the contents of the dainty volume. He writes of Shelley: "He is armed against triviality by never writing without a legitimate motive. He was by no means a regular or systematic correspondent, and before taking the pen in hand required the visitation of an emergency or an impulse. But such dictates of the spirit were frequent, and affected him like the impulses that prompt to poetical composition; nor was the product less distinctly an emanation of the intellect and heart." There are passages which hold the first thought that later developed into some of his noblest poetry; but his prose has often almost equal power, and every lover of the poet will welcome what is really an interpreter not only of certain perplexing passages in his life, but of his methods of thought and action. (16mo, pp. 255, $1.25; D. Appleton & Co., New York).

His Portrait—As Painted by Miss Edith.

JAN lies in the grass at my feet, his fair face flushed and weary;

And really he looks, in his tennis suit, like Apollo Belvidere.

Hyacinth and fair-haired Lal, of whose locks one always hears,

Were they quite as yellow, and did they curl round such very nice small ears?

Alcibiades was handsome, and quite too awfully rash;
But I don't believe he ever had such a perfect blonde mustache.

If Samson was as tall and broad, and even near so strong,
I think the way Delilah behaved was just too horribly wrong.

She should have died of remorse for the deed she couldn't undo,

If the eyes the Philistines put out were tender, laughing and blue.

He lays his cheek to the warm, sweet grass, and I think of the perfect rose

Of Grecian sculpture, Antinous, but Jan has a curve in his nose,

Which, of course, is very much nicer. Then there's Alexander—well,

I never doubted a single word of the stories the classics tell

Of him and his wonderful horse: but then, of course, you know,

They couldn't ride like modern men so very long ago.

And—now I must stop, Jan's pulling my hair and calls me an “awful goose;”

But I know—and all his teasing is not of the slightest use.

Those good-looking chaps of old and Olympian gods above Were all very well in their way, but they were not just—my love.

“With love and kisses,
Your ever faithful JULIET”

SEND no more kisses, dear, by post
 (“Au naturel” they please me most),
For, somehow, in their slow transition

They lose their sweet and tender mission.

Their bouquet gone, their flavor vanished,

They seem like weary exiles banished.

Then keep them, darling, still with thee.

Their pale, cold wraiths so mock at me

With visions of them warm and blessing,

Born in an air of soft caressing,
Cradled in coral—dewy—fragrant,
Some royal—others idly fragrant.

A wild, mad longing fills my breast,
To seek at once their dainty nest,
And gather them, all fresh and glowing.

Sweet, would you weary of bestowing?

But since my life such rapture misses,
Still, when you write, pray add the kisses.

STEPHEN GIRARD—MARINER AND MERCHANT.

STATUE OF STEPHEN GIRARD—AT THE COLLEGE DOORWAY.

UNDER the roof of an old house in Water Street, one December day, over fifty years ago, a will was read, which made the City of Philadelphia one of the richest legatees on record. The fortune, as it then stood, amounted to nearly eight millions of dollars, but it included property which has grown so valuable that, great as are the expenses which have developed under the will, they do not consume even the interest, a portion of which is yearly added to the capital. The will provided for a plain and comfortable home which should hold at least one hundred orphan boys, and give them a support and education. The trustees instead built a marble palace, supported by pillars each of which cost thirteen thousand dollars. Everything else was in proportion, and magnificence was the only object held in view. Instead of a hundred boys, Girard College last year contained one thousand one hundred and four. The expenditures for the college the same year amounted to nearly five hundred thousand dollars. Over five hundred thousand were expended on other trusts, and yet there was a balance of over twenty thousand left unused.

This is a handsome showing for one man, and he a foreigner, who had to borrow five dollars to bring him into the city! And when Stephen Girard left this great fortune he did not leave it to perpetuate his name, or build a great monument to his memory. Each of the carefully-devised clauses showed that he meant it to be of honest, enduring use. He wanted fatherless boys educated as working men; he wanted the river front improved, and the city made safer and more healthful; the hospitals were to have larger means of helping the sick and insane, and nurses were to be educated. None of these objects were subjects of speculation with Girard; he had a personal interest in each one. He was himself an uneducated boy, and knew at what a disadvantage he had been placed. The river front had been the scene of his life-work; and no one knew better what care the insane needed, and how necessary were trained nurses to the public. He had lived in Philadelphia through days of war and blockade; through prosperity and through desolating plague.

He came to it when it was part of the British colonies, and he had been the staunch, steady friend, not only of the city but of the Country, through many heavy, dark days. Having no children of his own he adopted those who were fatherless.

And Philadelphia? How has she taken these benefits, and what has she done for the memory of her benefactor? Apart from the extravagance of building such a school-home, she has administered the Trust with honesty and fidelity. There has never been a scandal attached to the Girard Estate, nor any question of its administration. As for the man himself—Philadelphia has not only laughed at him, wondered over him, told hard stories of him, but she has also allowed others to do so. She has never taken enough interest in him to have a biography written that would do him justice. She has suffered the most unblushing stories of him and of his family to go uncontradicted—she has never taken the trouble to inquire what sort of man he really was.

Does any one believe that the morose and ancient figure with one eye—ill-clad, silent, repulsive, unob-servant—shambling through the streets of Philadelphia, which is pictured in all biographical sketches of Girard, really represents the alert, keen Frenchman, who, more than any other man, built up the city's commerce, who was the bravest in pestilence, the quickest to save the country from financial ruin, who made a fortune for himself and gave aid to the helpless?

Curious and eccentric he certainly was, but grapes grow on grape-vines, even though the vine be guarded, and out of Girard's life came his virtues. He was keen at a bargain, just—not merciful; but he was not crafty nor miserly; he was not intolerant to the helpless, nor did he sneer at religion. He had a heart as well as a brain, even if it were the weaker of the two.

Stephen Girard was a man under a possession. He had a great talent, and it dominated him. In his pursuit of business he was as keen as a lover, and as blind to outside and diverting influences. It was not money-making that was his passion, that came as a logical result; but he was absorbed in, and devoted to business. He sometimes hardly seemed to realize the value of money to other people, and that a man should be ruined because he could not command a certain sum on a certain day was almost a crime to him. No one had a right to get into such a position, and he should ask no pity. Girard had no patience with failures. If a man had feet, let him stand on them. No one found Girard willing to act as a crutch, although he could go into the houses whose very air was death, and in his arms carry out men who were dying with a pestilence. He believed in fraternity, but his employees were—his employees. In his counting-room, his bank, his house, there was but one will, and that was his own. He paid for the work done for him. Did the worker need more money? had he necessities beyond his income? What was that to his employer! He kept to his limits in all his relations in life, and never lost a clear sense of relative positions. After his brother

Jean died, he took charge of the three orphan children left in Philadelphia. He sent them to the best schools, but he paid the bills out of the little estate their father left. His house was their home, and he was kind to them. He never bought a shawl or dress for one that he did not for the others, and he remembered their girlish fancies. After they had married from his house he petted their children, and liked to have them about, and indeed felt a right to the little people, but he never adopted these girls, and never seemed to have a father's devotion for them. He corresponded with his family in France, but he was too busy watching the markets of the world to give much time to individuals, even if they were his relations.

He was born in Bordeaux, of a family characterized by a devotion to the sea and a talent for commerce. His grandfather, John Girard, was "Captain, Master, Patron," and his father and uncles repeated the record. His father, Pierre Girard, however, went farther, and was the hero of an adventure that brought the family much honor. England and France were, at the time of the story, at war, and both fleets were off Brest, watching chances to do mischief; and so England one day sent a fire-ship into the midst of the enemy and set aflame a ship of the line. At sea a ship on fire is not a desirable neighbor, and it may be imagined that the other vessels quickly drew out of danger. But Pierre Girard was the man for an emergency, so he up with his sails and went into action with the fire. He did not go to rescue the crew, but meant to put the fire out, and he succeeded. Then he sailed back to his place, and the crew of the endangered ship set themselves to work, and were soon in condition to rejoin the fleet and look for revenge. It was so bold and well-managed an affair that it was reported to Louis XV, who was greatly delighted, and, sending for Captain Girard, took the sword from his own side and knighted him by conferring on him the Order of St. Louis. He ordered a gold medal struck commemorating the act, and had the whole affair placed on record in the Admiralty of Paris. And so Captain Girard went home to Bordeaux with the order on his coat, and the king's sword by his side, and when he died the sword was, cargo. To this Girard objected; he did not know the river, and had no money to pay a pilot. The captain then backed his advice by action, and lent Girard five dollars; a pilot came on board, and so Girard ignorantly and by chance, it seemed, went to his future home in the Quaker City. In July, the ports were all blockaded by Lord Howe, and Girard sailed no more. He rented a little house on Water Street, and went into another "venture" of assorted goods. He bought everything that he thought would sell again, but the business there until September, when Lord Howe, fancying he had business in Philadelphia, occupied the city, and so drove many of the inhabitants away, and among them the young Girards. They went to Mount Holly, New Jersey, where they bought a house for five hundred dollars, and Stephen again carried on the bottling business, but now sold his wine to the British. In 1778 Lord Howe left the city, and they returned. The after story of this marriage was certainly very miserable, but there seems to be no reason for the tales of the wife's unhaphe found most profitable during all these early years was bottling wine and brandy, which were consigned to him in casks from Bordeaux.

In front of his little shop there stood a pump, and among the girls who came for water was Polly Lum. She was young, and she was pretty; her eyes were black, and her dark hair curled about her neck. Girard was not so absorbed that he could not see all this, nor was she indifferent to the conquest she made of the young Frenchman. He visited her, she asked her to marry him, and Polly laughed and said she would, and so, on the sixth of July, 1777, they went to St. Paul's church and were married by the Rev. Dr. Samuel Magaw. Then they went back to Water Street, and lived pininess from Girard's ill-treatment of her, nor of his dissatisfaction with her frivolity and ignorance. In her early and growing insanity there was misery enough to account for everything, and when at the end of eight years she had to be placed in the Pennsylvania Hospital, his brother Jean, who had had every opportunity of knowing Stephen's domestic affairs, wrote to him: "I have just received your letter of the 12th, and I cannot express how I felt at the news. I truly grieved because of the terrible state you must be in, especially because I know the friendship and love you have for your wife." He then goes on to say that only business keeps him from going at once to console his brother, but adjured him to "conquer your grief, and show yourself a man," for when we have nothing with which to reproach ourselves, nothing should crush us." This letter has especial value, for whatever else the Girards were they were not hypocrites, and Jean would not have irritated his brother by any effusive, empty condolence. There is every proof that Girard did his best for his wife. He had her under medical treatment at home, he sent her to the country, and wanted her to make a visit to France, but this was given up; and when after a seven years' residence in the hospital she seemed better, he took her home again. But she grew worse, and there was no hope, and she was finally placed permanently in the hospital, where she died in 1815; and one of Girard's old friends says that as they stood around the coffin the tears ran down the husband's cheeks, and he was neither callous nor indifferent to his wife's death, nor to her memory. The first bequest in the will, and the largest made to any of the existing corporations, was to the hospital in which she had been cared for. She is remembered as an old woman, swarthy and dark-eyed, sitting in the sun, and hardly recognizing the old housekeeper who would sometimes take Girard's little nieces, Jean's daughters, to see her.

During these years Girard was steadily at work. He had taken the oath of allegiance in 1777, and seems to have lost all desire to go to sea. He once made a trip to Leghorn, from whence he brought a table of various colored marbles; but he lived in Water Street, content and busy. His ships went everywhere, beginning with one small vessel which sailed to the West Indies and back, carrying cargoes both ways. As his profits enabled him to do so, he bought other vessels and projected long voyages. He named his ships after French philosophers, and the Montesquieu, the Voltaire and Rousseau were known in many ports. He would send a cargo to London, and there the ship would reload for another port, and so go on and on until it had sailed half around the world. He gave the most minute directions, and left nothing to the discretion of his employés, and nothing reconciled him to the slightest neglect of or change in his orders. He once sent a young supercargo with two ships on a two years' voyage. He was to go first to London, then to Amsterdam, and so from port to port, selling and buying, until at last he was to go to Mocha, buy coffee and turn back. At London, however, the young fellow was charged by the Barings not to go to Mocha, or he would fall into the hands of pirates; at Amsterdam they told him the same thing; everywhere the caution was repeated; but he sailed on until he came to the last port before Mocha. Here he was consigned to a merchant who had been an apprentice to Girard in Philadelphia—for this happened when Girard was an old and rich man—and he too told him he must not dare venture near the Red Sea. The supercargo was now in a dilemma. On one side was his master's order; on the other, two vessels, a valuable cargo, a large amount of money. The merchant knew Girard's peculiarities as well as the supercargo did, but he thought the rule to "break owners, not orders," might this time be governed by discretion. "You'll not only lose all you have made," he said, "but you'll never go home to justify yourself." The young man reflected. After all, the object of his voyages was to get coffee, and there was no danger in going to Java, so he turned his prow, and away he sailed to the Chinese Seas. He bought coffee at four dollars a sack, and sold it in Amsterdam at a most enormous advance, and then went back to Philadelphia in good order, with large profits, sure of approval. Soon after he entered the counting-room Girard came in. He looked at the young fellow from under his bushy brows, and his one eye gleamed with resentment. He did not greet him nor welcome him nor congratulate him, but, shaking his angry hand, cried: "What for you not go to Mocha, sir?" And for the moment the supercargo wished he had! But this was all Girard ever said on the subject. He rarely scolded his employés. He might express his opinion by cutting down a salary, and when a man did not suit him he dismissed him. He had no patience with incompetence, no time to educate people in business habits. Each man felt he was watched and weighed; and as long as he did his best, and his best suited, he was treated justly, if closely. The master was born with instincts that never failed him. He knew where to sell and where to buy, and could calculate what would be the market prices hundreds of miles away and a year ahead. He understood possible dangers and provided for them, and his busy brain marshaled the world to do him service. His family, however, had no faith in his establishing himself in a young country struggling in a war with so great a power as England.

In 1777 his brother Jean wrote to him from Cape François, that in every letter he receives from their father, he asks news of Stephen, "with, as I can well imagine, tears in his eyes," says the writer, and implores Jean to join him in persuading Stephen to quit exacted honesty, soberness, punctuality, and allowed none of his plans to be thwarted by any independence on the part of his subordinates. They understood that they were to leave business in the office, so no one of them gossiped to his friends over Girard's affairs.

In those days Philadelphia was the commercial port of the country. Along Water and Front Streets were shipping-offices; the wharves were busy with vessels coming and going, and there was talk of China and Japan, of the Barbadoes, of wine and silks from France. The odors of tea and coffee hung heavy in the warehouses, and no one complained because the Delaware was shallow, or the city miles up the river. Girard had found one of the best places in the world in which to build a fortune. Young as he was when he landed, he had both experience and knowledge. Back in his own family were the traditions and habits of fathers and sons who had been sailors and traders, and Stephen a hazardous traffic, and either go to the Cape and with his brother there establish a house, or else accept from his father the command of a ship. Jean does urge this very strongly, but, in conclusion, shows how well he knows what Stephen's reply will be, by adding, that if his brother is absolutely resolved to stay where he is, he had better consign some vessels to him at once, as he is in a position to have them promptly dispatched. Stephen possibly sent the vessels, but he had faith and saw that under the struggle there was vigor and coming prosperity, and he stayed where he was.

As he grew richer, the Water Street house became very comfortable, and if he did not rebuild he must have altered it thoroughly. He sent to the Isle of France for ebony, out of which he had his parlor furniture made; he imported handsome Turkey carpets; the French windows opened to the floor; the kitchen was paved with marble and the water was brought in by pipes. In the store-room everything was in abundance: sacks of coffee, boxes of tea, apples, hams, chocolate, West-India preserves, so that the table was fully furnished. Girard himself ate no meat for years, but it was regularly on the table, which was set with much solid silver. There was always company staying to meals, and when distinguished Frenchmen were in the city nothing pleased Girard better than giving them a fine dinner—and among them often came Joseph Bonaparte. The counting-room was under the same roof, and after the nieces grew up and lived in the house, the young clerks made little errands to the parlor when they knew the master was out. There was a small French organ in the room, which they would wind up, and have many a hurried dance when they were supposed to be busy over their books. The nieces had to be on the watch to secure their girlish pleasures. Their uncle was never unkind, but he saw no use in any sort of amusement. Everybody in the house, except himself, had to go to church, and each to his own. He provided the pews, and the family was expected to occupy them; but for parties and such entertainments he had only contempt. At ten o'clock the house was closed, and every one sent to bed. But every one did not go to bed, and more than once one of the girls, in her gala dress, slipped softly down the stairs and out the door to a cavalier, who took her to one of the stately parties of the time; and then at some late hour there was the waking of the housekeeper, and the stealing back again. There was no lack of life in the house, and when Girard could get a child into the circle, even as a visitor, he was very happy. He liked young girls and children and canary birds well, but best of all he liked his farm down in "The Neck." Every day, in his yellow gig, Girard drove down there, and then took off his coat and went to work. He hoed and he pruned, he looked after his fruit and his stock, and when his own table was supplied he found it easy to sell at a good profit whatever he chose to send to market, and so not only took his relaxation and together. The death-calls echoed through the silent, grass-grown streets, and at night the watcher would hear at his neighbor's door the cry, "Bring out your dead!" And the dead were brought; unwept over, unprayed for, they were wrapped in the sheet in which they died, and were hurried into a box and thrown into a great pit, rich and poor together. This was in 1793, and all summer the plague raged, until, when September came, the city lay under the blazing sun as under a great curse. Doctors were dead, nurses had broken down and gone away; there were no visitors of the poor, and even at the hospital at Bush Hill there was no one to receive or care for the victims who were carried there. No one could be hired to go there. Why should any one give his life for nothing? A meeting was called, and a few men came together and appointed a committee to devise help for the hospital. Stephen Girard was on this committee. He had not only stayed in the city but he had given himself up to nursing and doctoring. He went from house to house; he was never too wearied; he was never disheartened nor disgusted. He gave money, and commissioned others to give it for him, "except," he said to an old Quaker, "you shall not give to Frenchmen, because you like them not. You shall send them to me!" It was only a step farther for him to volunteer to go to Bush Hill and take charge. And he did so. He was there for two months. He received the fever patients at the gate; sometimes he went after them; he nursed them and never faltered; he watched until they breathed their last breath, and then, wrapping them in whatever he could find, helped carry them out and put them in the pit. He was then forty-three years old, and his family in France were terrified at what Jean calls, in his English, the "risks" he was running. In 1797 and 1798, Girard repeated this experience, and again nursed and doctored through those summers of pestilence, and lost, he wrote to one of his friends, but one patient, an Irishman, who would drink liquor.

And so the years went on, and the Frenchman prospered, and another chance came for him to do another great public work. In 1811 Girard had a million of dollars to his account in the bank of the Barings Brothers. He ordered the whole of this spent in buying the stock of the United States Bank. This institution had come to the limit of its charter, and the stock was greatly depreciated in England. Still, Girard bought it, and waited a little. The charter expired, the government refused to renew it, and then Girard bought the whole affair, the building (which still stands on Third Street), the paper on which the notes were printed, the stools on which the clerks sat; and so the merchant became a banker, and in a moment of national peril, just as we were on the eve of war, saved us from a financial crisis. It was also one of those splendid business achievements that distinguished Girard. He took his money out of danger and made a good investment, and when commerce was closing, opened a new business under capital conditions. From this moment he was the steady right hand of the government. He believed in it, and was in a position to assert his belief. In 1816 the new United States Bank was established, and stock offered at seven per cent, with twenty dollars bonus. The people hesitated; they straggled in, and at last took twenty thousand dollars' worth. They were not sure about government investments. Girard waited until the last day, when he came forward and took all the stock—three million one hundred thousand dollars. This was his stake, his “risk.”

Of course, both parties made money. The government, backed by Girard’s name, tided over the perils in its way, and Girard had the benefit of its success. He not only knew how and when to make his ventures, but once made he looked after them. When he saw fatal weakness he took no interest; yet in the moment of danger no one knew better how to run even a sinking craft on shore—but the cargo had to be worth the trouble.

In December, 1831, Girard died, an old man nearly eighty-two. For some time he had been very infirm, and his weakness had been increased by having been knocked down by a cart on the street, and having his head and face injured. He would not give up to his injuries, and even when attacked by the influenza insisted on his old practice of doctoring himself, until it was too late. The day he died he got out of bed and walked across the room to a chair, but at once turned and went feebly back again. He put his old, thin hand on his head and said, “How violent is this disorder!” and died.

There was, of course, instant interest in his will, it being generally understood that he had left his millions for public uses. Through a misapprehension on the part of one of his executors in regard to Girard’s wishes in relation to his burial place, the will had to be read very soon after his death, and so the public was soon in possession of the facts.

Girard died in the Roman Catholic Church, although a free-thinker. He had not for years attended any of the services, but he said it was best for a man to stay in the church in which he was born. The people whom he liked best were the Quakers. He had sympathy with their disdain of forms, their shrewd business habits and their integrity. In his own dress he was as neat and particular as they were, and did not look unlike them. His plain coats were made of the best broadcloth; his underwear, of silk, was imported from China. He kept a pair of shoes for each day of the week, and his nieces hemmed his square linen cravats by the dozen. The portrait we give of him is from the statue at Girard College, which was modeled from a cast taken after death, and so represents him as an old man. It was executed in Italy by Gavelot, at an expense of $30,000, and was universally pronounced an excellent likeness.

The last building enterprise which Girard contemplated and provided for by a codicil to his will was the block in which THE CONTINENT is published.

The time will come when Stephen Girard will be better understood; and even while he remains the typical man of business—allowing nothing to move him from his purposes, inflexible, impetuous, never taking back his word for good or ill, daring yet cautious, having a brain that governed his heart—he will also have credit for his sterling, manly virtues. He was one of the men to whom much was committed, and when his time came to give it up, he gave it, not as money to make money, but to the “little ones” with widowed mothers, and for the benefit of the city of his adoption.

ALL OUT-DOORS.—III.

By E. C. GARDNER, Author of “The House That Jill Built,” etc.

THE friendly counsels of zealous neighbors, like heavenly blessings without number gently falling on his head, might well confuse a clearer brain than John's. Yet it was not difficult to separate the valuable from the worthless, and to give good reasons for accepting one and rejecting the other. Weighed in the balance of a critic's eye, Miss Angelina Boker's rose-embowered arbor would surely be found wanting. It might seem a delightful thing to her, glorified by tender memories and sentimental associations; but, standing athwart the main approach to the house, in a semi-public place, where no one would care to recline for an after-dinner siesta or an hour's novel reading, much less for a rose-colored tête-à-tête, it would be as much out of place as Angelina herself at a juvenile party. A similar brief cross-examination would determine the value of all the queries and admonitions that John reported; and, as he seemed fitted by nature and by grace for an out-door home missionary, they were set in a note-book to serve as texts for future use on those occasions when a short sermon seems necessary to help on a good cause; occasions that are more rare than is commonly supposed; example is so very much better than precept, demonstration so much stronger than argument.

ANGELINA'S ROSE-EMBOWERED ARBOR.

John remarked that there is nothing on which everybody felt more competent to give advice than upon the arrangement of all out-doors. It is equally true that there is no example of faithful continuance in well-doing more contagious than this same work of beautifying, cleansing and generally improving the exterior adjuncts and surroundings of our homes. The man who keeps a smooth, hard walk along the public side of his own premises, free from snow and ice in winter, and in summer well swept and garnished, is an eloquent lay preacher, whose audience cannot escape his exhortation if they try, and who are certain to be convicted in their hearts even if they do not straightway go and do likewise.

As John's “door yard,” to use the good old-fashioned phrase, was entirely reconstructed, was advised to begin by removing everything that was not to be a part of the new order of things—the fences that already belong to him, and as many of those that do not as he can get into his possession for purposes of destruction; the maple trees that hide the view, crowd one another beyond the possibility of healthy growth or beautiful form, and hold the dew on the grass till noon; the fruit trees and all other vegetable beings that live at such a poor, dying rate as to be worthless either for use or for beauty. The last category includes superannuated fruit trees and demoralized shrubs once supposed to be ornamental, but which, for want of judicious bending and pruning in their youth, have inclined to various deformities of growth that cannot now be cured even by the most heroic treatment; likewise all green grass whose pedigree is not derived from the first families of lawn seed, and all that by neglect has degenerated into a coarse and clownish sod, with no more vitality or freshness than a peat bog. The way in which people sometimes cherish a poor, old, deformed, diseased and helpless rose-bush, lilac, spirea or other shrub that ought to be beautiful, but never can be, would be pathetic if it were not so absurd. To cast it into the fire, root and branch, setting a young, healthy, rapidly-growing plant in its place, would be both wisdom and kindness. The same is true of turf. Good seed on fruitful ground will bring forth a finer lawn in six weeks than can be made in six years by all the sprinkling, shaving and top-dressing ever applied to a shaggy old turf whose roots are coarse, cold and spongy.

In brief, John was advised to spare the old oak, the well, and everything else really worth saving, but not to spare the axe, the spade nor the plow. This clearing of the field for action being accomplished, the next thing in order is to lay the foundation of the roads, or rather to lay them out with the utmost care as to their location. For to change the location of a single rod of well-built road is almost as difficult as to remove mountains, much more difficult than it is to move an elm tree six inches in diameter. If building a road meant simply turning half a dozen furrows toward the east and another half dozen toward the west, rounding and mounding the sods, loam, sand, clay, mud, gravel, peat, roots, or whatever geological and vegetable formation happens to be lying on the surface, until it looks like the newly-made grave of an interminable sea-serpent—making and moving roads would be as easy as lying. This process, though by no means uncommon, cannot be called road-making. A good road for public or private use should be smooth, hard and dry; free from ruts, from hollows, from hummocks and loose stones; from sand beds, mud puddles, big water-bars, and other dangerous or inconvenient contrivances. It should be of such a course that sharp, ungraceful turns are avoided, and be of such form that water from rain or melting snow will never follow the paths made by the horses' feet or the carriage-wheels, but will run off at once to the well-paved gutters at each side. Such roads do not build themselves—more's the pity—especially over sandy plains, or where the ground is composed chiefly of clay or other substances that hold water.

In the matter of practical road-building John was fairly well posted. He knew that this part of his work, at least, were better to be well done than done too quickly, and therefore dug a shallow ditch the entire width of the road, and filled it with small stones—an essential preparation for all good roads—the depth of the channel varying from six to sixteen inches, according to the nature of the soil. The object of this stony bed is to prevent the softening influences of water and the action of frost. In many cases it is advisable to lay drain-tiles in the bed of the channel, either in the centre or at the edges—not to carry off surface water, but to keep the bed as dry as possible.

ROAD FORMATION (1).

ROAD FORMATION (2).

It is the absence of this thorough work that causes so many country roads to become Sloughs of Despond at certain seasons, costing every year for broken vehicles and harness, wear and tear of horseflesh and human temper, not to mention loss of time and coach varnish, ten times the interest on the requisite outlay for a good road-bed. It goes without saying that the surface of the road should be hard, smooth, and as impervious to water as possible, cinders and gravel being the most available materials in most parts of the country for hardening; and it should be shaped like the roof of a house—a very flat roof, to be sure, but still a roof—with the highest part in the centre, and with sides neither convex nor concave, but sloping straight from the ridge-pole to the gutters, these co-lateral adjuncts being scarcely less important than the road itself. The best road in the world is but half made without well-paved gutters at each side, and it betrays inexcusable slovenliness on the part of the builder. As there is no surer external index of a householder's innate refinement in this direction than the everyday condition of his "back yard," so there is no better test of the civilization of a community than the condition of the wayside gutters. It is not merely that they are indispensable to a good road, whether a private road or a king's highway, in a material sense, but they have, so to speak, a moral bearing that is of still more consequence. Front-door respectability is taken for granted—the coarsest boor cannot afford to despise it. Only a gentleman, through and through, regards the state of the unseen and the lowly with the same interest and care that are bestowed on what is seen and criticised of all men.

As a rule, in all out-door matters, what is unclean and unsightly should be removed from the face of the earth by sepulture or cremation. Most objectionable things can be destroyed by fire. A small cremating furnace or kettle attached to the kitchen range would "resolve to earth again," or to smoke, vapor and ashes, by far the larger part of the rubbish that is unavailable for kindling wood, and which is so prone to accumulate in only half-hidden by-places. What absolutely refuses to burn should be buried, and buried where it will be useful, if possible. Moreover, a wise economy would provide for saving all materials that will in any form help the earth to bring forth her increase, or that can be turned back into their original condition, or made over into some of the countless products of human skill and invention. To this end, a rag-bag for waste paper, glass bottles, worn-out boots and shoes and old iron is just as essential to nice household economy as one for bits of thread and cotton cloth. The chiefest economy of all is that which comes even to dwellers in thinly-settled regions through neighborly co-operation. It is very well to try to work out our own eternal salvation, but, in many respects, we can best secure our temporal safety and comfort by working with and for humanity at large, especially that portion of it that lies in our own township.

Accordingly, in the advice sent to John concerning his own little spot of the earth's surface, he was counseled to invoke his neighbors' assistance, and persuade his fellow-citizens to work together for the good of the village in the many lines that concern all but do not distinctly belong to any one. In brief, he was advised to organize a village improvement society, that the public ways might be improved, the streets hardened, the walks graded and paved. It happened likewise that with these and other familiar matters, he was also exhorted to "spare the town and spoil the trees," when they stood so thickly as to prevent free circulation of air, abundant sunshine upon the houses, and their own natural and beautiful growth.

"Let the heathen rage and imagine what they will, a dense grove of trees, which by its 'horrid shade' shuts out sun and air, is not the place for human habitations. Forestry is one thing; crowding five times as many trees as can possibly grow in healthy shape upon a single bit of land, because you happen to own it and believe in trees, is quite another."

If this wise and harmless piece of advice had been a dynamite plot it couldn't have caused a greater commotion, for John is one of those persons born to be reformers, and who seem by nature to take to heresy because it is heresy, and for whom ideas opposed to prevailing opinions have an especial charm.

In less than a week from the time the innocent train was laid he burst in upon me in a fine frenzy. It appeared that he had acted upon the suggestion of forming a society with characteristic zeal, and being, on account of his interest in the matter, chosen president, he had in his inaugural recommended a wholesale destruction of some of the most aristocratic shade-trees in town with so much vigor and eloquence, that half his audience were ready to beat their spades into axes, and the whole village was accordingly set by the ears.

"I talked health and sunshine and evaporation and beauty and flowers; morning mists and twilight dews; malaria, catarrh and consumption—till I was hoarse. Before I was fairly seated, there were half a dozen up; but Miss Angelina Boker had the floor, and tragically recited:

"Woodman, spare that tree!
Touch not a single bough!
In youth—in youth—in youth it shelters me—" and sat down overcome by emotion.

"Rev. Dr. Brown wished to say that trees performed certain important functions in the economy of nature which—ah—could not well be dispensed with. A treeless country was apt to be a barren country—he forgot the prairies—and, on the other hand, too many trees were of course—ah—excessive.

"Dr. Brown, the dentist, undertook to ask some conundrums about the breathing apparatus of 'souls so dead,' but was squelched by Deacon Peak, who avowed that he had 'sot out' trees from his youth up in highways and byways, and whether men would hear or whether men would forbear; and his father and grandfather afore him had 'sot out' trees from time immemorable; and as for him and his house, if any vandal undertook to destroy the work of ages, they would cry aloud and spare not. I should judge that a good many of him and his house were present, for when Dr. Moody, the M. D., got up on my side of the question, and said he was willing to stake his professional reputation on the statement that the community would be healthier if half the trees in the village were removed, they broke out in unknown strains. I didn't hear him, but was told that Jimmy Jenkins, the blacksmith, said the first man that stuck an axe into a shade tree would get an axe stuck into him. At any rate, when the meeting adjourned it seemed as if our peaceful inhabitants were more likely to turn their attention to barricades and earthworks than to any milder form of village improvement."

"Well, what are you going to do next?"

"That's precisely what I am here to find out. I've followed your advice so far to the letter, and I've come for further orders."

A FAIRY TALE.

THERE stands by the wood-path shaded,
A meek little beggar maid;
Close under her mantle faded
She is hidden like one afraid.

Yet if you but lifted lightly
That mantle of russet brown,
She would spring up slender and sightly,
In a smoke-blue silken gown.

For she is a princess, fated
Disguised in the wood to dwell,

And all her life long has awaited
The touch that should break the spell:

And the oak that has cast around her
His root like a wrinkled arm,
Is the wild old wizard that bound her
Fast with his cruel charm.

Is the princess worth your knowing?
Then haste, for the spring is brief,
And find the Hepatica growing,
Hid under a last year's leaf.

HELEN GRAY CONE.

JUNE.

COME back, O June, to my heart!
I long for thy pure white rose.
And the fresh green shelter apart
Where the daintiest fern-tip grows.

Come back with thy poppies and maize,
Let me lie in thy arms and dream;
In the languid delight of thy days,
In the smile of thy sunshine's gleam!

Come back, O June of my life!
Bring with thee the one dear face;

And my song shall leap forth with gladness rife,
Made richer by love's sweet grace.

Come back, O June of my love!
With the fragrance of elder and vine—
My love that was pure like the dove,
And whose kisses were sweeter than wine!

Ah! never again that rich perfume
On my earthly sense shall rise,
Till I gather the roses' crown of bloom
On the hills of paradise.

A. F. JENN.

A MISSISSIPPI MARTYR.

BY J. H. WALWORTH.

X.—CONTAINS AN ESSAY ON FUN.

"LET's have some fun," Annie said in her most pleasing voice, as the family lingered leisurely over their Sunday morning breakfast.

"It is Sunday!" Mrs. Dickison answers, as if that settled the whole matter.

"What sort of fun?" Sophie asks. Sophie is advanced enough to know that that does not settle the whole matter.

"Oh! I don't know. Let's do something," Annie proposes vaguely.

"We can all go to church together," her mother suggests, still contending for the right.

"They ain't much fun in that," Lewis remarks with impartial contempt for the laws of morality and the rules of grammar.

"Let's go to the cemetery!" Annie suggests desperately, feeling the whole responsibility thrown on her as the original projector of the idea.

"Well!" says Mr. Dickison, leaning back in his chair to gaze upon his youngest daughter, as if she were an interesting novelty. "I believe in fun, Nan. In fact, I may say I adore it. I seek it on all occasions. I regard it as an underrated element in the moral and physical development of our nation! It is my most deep-rooted conviction that if the American people went in more heartily for fun they would be a more interesting and successful set of folks, in many respects, than they are now. The idea of fun in the abstract, however, is as varied and as various as the peoples of the earth themselves. For instance, a Parisian belle and a Feejee Islander do not agree in their conception of what is fun. A Boston blue-stocking and a Colorado miner also are apt to hold diametrically opposite notions on that same subject. Nor do I imagine that Lewis here, for instance, and your revered mother are in perfect accord on the fun problem. But it remains for you, Nan, to discover that fun is to be extracted out of a cemetery."

"It's Decoration day," Annie says explanatorily.

"Then let us go," Sophie adds in that deciding voice of hers, and things were very apt to go as her casting vote sent them on all occasions.

"Well, at least, let us begin the day decorously," Mrs. Dickison urges. "If it's decided we're to go and listen to speeches and brass bands after dinner, all the more need for prayer and preaching beforehand."

This point conceded, Trinity was pitched upon as the morning's place of worship.

"You know the music there is simply faultless," Sophie says, "and some of Blancque's organ performances are so divinely sweet that one might imagine them produced by a more delicate agency than the human hand."

"All the best people go there, too, I suspect, judging from the elegant toilettes. I declare that lady who sat just in front of us last Sunday night had on the most perfect hat, and her polonaise was draped to perfection." Annie gives this indorsement of Trinity's claims to preference in her most enthusiastic manner.

"The seats are very comfortable, too," Mrs. Dickison observes luxuriously; "all cushioned backs and seats."

"An' that's the church with the banners and things

—let's go!" Lewis' fervor was a touching tribute to the "banners and things."

"How about the preaching?" asks the martyr, stupidly groping among the musty notions of bygone requirements.

"Oh!" says Sophie airily, "I suppose that is all right; but I declare, if the service is well rendered, and the singing up to the mark, it leaves one rather indifferent to the sermon."

It was not without secret pangs of uneasiness that Sophie rustled softly into position in the somewhat crowded pew the usher politely showed them into. The Dickisons, with Mrs. Dickison at one end and the martyr at the other, formed a pretty solid phalanx. Lewis was wedged in between his two sisters, who did all they could to extinguish him and his freckles beneath their bouffant draperies; but Lewis was a sort of materialized spook. He would not down, but persisted in using his elbows in a most exasperating series of nudges as he asked for information on a variety of subjects in a hissing whisper.

Mr. Dickison, in his fresh-shaven cleanliness and immaculate expanse of shirt-front looked harmless enough, but, as Sophie was saying to her own anxious heart, there was never any knowing at what moment he might "break out;" just as if the good old man were a sort of fatal irruption, you know. Her fears were justified when the last hymn was given out, "Come, thou fount of every blessing." It sounded so old and tender and familiar, that a glad light came into Silas Dickison's eyes. It was as if a greeting from the long ago had come suddenly to him, a stranger in a strange land. Sophie's heart beat wildly when she saw her father lean forward, take a hymnal from the rack, put his spectacles astride his nose, settle himself comfortably into position, and vigorously clear his throat for action. She trod on his foot, and gave him one imploring sidelong glance. He nodded reassuringly, and calmly awaited the termination of the prelude to the dear old familiar air. Why, hadn't he been knowing it ever since he was a shaver about as big as Lewis? How thankful he was to all those grand singers for selecting it to-day! It carried him back to the little church on Mr. Thornton's place, where all the "folks" for miles around would come every Sunday, and as there weren't many tunes that everybody could sing, "Come, thou fount of every blessing" and "Lord, dismiss us" had to do pretty active duty. The stained-glass windows faded into dim unrealities. The nodding plumes and flower-crowned hats about him might have been so many heads of wheat or cabbages for all the thought he gave to them, as, swelling with every swell of the organ, soaring into the realms of happiest meditation, with a voice never peculiarly adapted by nature or training for public singing, Mr. Dickison executed the final notes of the hymn in one ecstatic burst of vocal fervor, after which he calmly cased his steel spectacles, wiped his moist brow, and glanced shyly toward Sophie, as if to ask for kindly indorsement of his musical performance. But Sophie's eyes were fixed in rigid despair upon the organ-loft, her cheeks were flushed, and she wore a general aspect of defeat that was not quite what the good old man had looked for.

"What was the matter, Soph?" he asked when they all found themselves free to walk and talk once more on the sidewalk.

"Nothing, father, excepting that you will persist in making yourself so singular and us so conspicuous," she answers with forced calmness; "and I do hate to be conspicuous."

"Has it come to be disreputable, then, for folks to sing the praises of God?" he asks, rather sternly.

"Not exactly disreputable, father, only nobody else does it at Trinity; so of course people were excusable for staring and smiling."

"Did they stare and smile?"

"They certainly did, father."

"Maybe they were admiring my style of delivery; thought I was another sweet psalmist come to judgment, or something of that sort, you know."

"Admiration was certainly not the prevailing expression of countenance," says Sophie; "but I suppose when you come to analyze it one really has a right to sing in church, if one wants to, but so long as the choir does it so much better I don't see why one should want to."

"Maybe God A'mighty is not as critical about crochets and quavers as your Trinity folks, child. I don't guess He'll take any very serious offense at an old fellow's lifting up his voice when his feelings got too much for him; and that old tune did stir me up like the clasp of an old friend's hand when I was least expecting it—it was all so foreign and new like in your grand meeting-house."

"Poor old pap!" says Sophie, with a sudden relenting, linking her arm in her father's and giving his a tender little squeeze.

Having disposed of their dinner with a generally reckless sense of indifference as to what they ate on Decoration day, the main point at issue being to secure a seat in a car, they started out en masse in search of "fun."

"What's the row?" Mr. Dickison suddenly halted his little squad to ask this question, in view of a densely-packed crowd at the street corner, where they had been told to go to take a car to go to the cemetery.

"Waiting for a car," one of the waiters replied, with a contemptuous glance toward the ignorant questioner.

"Good Lord! Have we got to wait till all those folks are served, you reckon, mamma?"

"Not unless you choose to, sir," the same voice replied. "It isn't first come first served on occasions like this; it's purely a question of agility."

"Wife, how is your agility?" the martyr asked, turning with an air of anxious solicitude to the portly dame whose weight was an established matter of a hundred and sixty-seven pounds.

"Mr. Dickison, why do you always select me to make a butt of?" she answers with good-humored frowns. "Do behave yourself."

"A butt of! Because I'm determined you shan't be made jelly of if I can help it. Girls, 'Sauvey qui pente' is the word. When I say 'Go,' give a leap for life. We're out for fun, you know, and we're bound to have it at all hazards. Lewis, you rascal, look out for yourself. You're too good-for-nothing to be in any special danger. It's only good little boys who get damaged on Sunday outings."

Car after car unceasingly rolled by the Dickisons, with their human freight packed like herrings in the inside, and clinging like bats to the outside.

"Looks more like suffocation than fun to a careless observer," Sophie observes sarcastically; "and father, please talk English, it's so much safer, you know."

"Go! Is that good English?" yelled Mr. Dickison, without any preface, and with five leaps, such as none but country-trained muscles could possibly have achieved, the whole Dickison family were safely landed in a car where they were so fortunate as to find sitting room for its female members.

"Where is Lewis?" Mrs. Dickison asked, as soon as she found breath to ask anything at all, fanning herself furiously.

"Holding on by the skin of his teeth," Mr. Dickison answered, nodding toward the rear of the car, as he swayed backward and forward, without even the luxury of a strap to hold fast by.

"He'll fall off."

"The mischief he will! Barnacles don't drop off easy. Lewis has the tenacity of a barnacle when he is bent on fun— Beg pardon, ma'am." Mr. Dickison's closing remarks were addressed to a lady in whose lap he had involuntarily seated himself.

"There is one comfort," observed one of the Lev-rings cheerfully, "we're so full there will be no stoppage between town and the cemetery."

Alas, for the fallacy of human hopes and expectations! A lurch, half a dozen yells, four times as many shrieks, and then the car mules stood quietly gazing in upon the passengers, as if demanding plaudits for the skill with which they had managed to jerk the car clear of the track, without inflicting bodily harm on a single one of them.

"Where is Lewis?" shrieked Mrs. Dickison.

"My baby! please somebody take care of my baby!" and one of the outside bats who had summarily been transferred from the car to terra firma extended his arms to receive a small bundle of muslin and ribbons that an agonized young mother extended to him through a window.

"This yer cyar is off the track," the driver observed, putting his head in at the door, as if to impart a casual piece of news; "dog run acrost the track and skeered the mules. If there's anybody in here ambitious of gitting to the cemetery to-night it were advisable the men folks should get out and put thar shoulders to the wheels and the women folks git out to lighten up the cyar."

This sound advice being promptly followed the car was soon shoved into position again; but when the living cargo was repacked radical changes were observed, and Mrs. Dickison was found swaying helplessly to and fro, supported tenderly by the united arms of the entire family.

"Ladies," says the martyr, appealingly, "we have demonstrated this afternoon that the feminine figure is the most compressible thing on record. A bale of cotton is adamant in its powers of resistance as compared to it. Figs in a drum are expansive to it. Herrings in a box fail to convey any conception of it. Now could you not be prevailed upon to compress the compressed just a little closer in behalf of my unfortunate wife here. She came out for fun this afternoon, and as she is the best wife I ever had, I'd like to assist her in the attainment of it. Thank you; I never knew an appeal for charity to fail yet, when the object was worthy and the appellant was a woman," he adds triumphantly, as two little women accord Mrs. Dickison a wedge-shaped position between them, into which she sank with mingled sighs of relief and looks of reproof for her husband.

"Well, here we are; now what next?" the martyr asked, when they were all safely unpacked and found themselves within the sacred precincts of the cemetery.

"I hear the band," says Lewis, and broke into a fox-trot in direction of the sound.

As the band was the only guide they had, the elder members of the family followed his lead at a sedate pace, winding in and out of the lovely walks, without taking time for even a passing glance at the beauties of private lots.

"There they are!" Annie exclaims, with the enthusiasm of a Columbus just sighting the New World. They paused on the crest of a gentle eminence and looked down to where a dense mass of human beings were clustered about a small, open space, where, presumably, somebody was saying something about something; but the open air swallowed up every sound.

"Moses viewing the promised land from Pisgah's top," says Mr. Dickison, posing for the patriarch. "I insist upon asking what next."

"There's the band!" Annie repeats, with flagging interest.

"The band seems to be your one tangible idea, Nan. Let's go look at the Confederate monument that all these folks have come out to decorate. It ought to be something very gorgeous."

So, by dint of inquiring the way at every turn, the ruralists found themselves guided to a spot where a hundred or two persons had apparently sunk to the ground in a state of complete exhaustion.

"Please tell us where the Confederate graves are," Sophie asked, sweetly, of some ladies and gentlemen, who, with their empty baskets beside them, were comfortably squatted on the ground.

"Here," one of them answered, glancing about comprehensively.

"Here! Where?"

"Right here. You're standing on one—we're sitting on some."

"Mercy!" Annie exclaimed, looking down in consternation. "Where are the decorations, then, please?"

"Everywhere," says the lady, in a general way.

"Blamed if I didn't think we was walking over cotton ridges," Mr. Dickison says, as they press forward to where a lofty monument reared its graceful head far, far above a few tawdry paper wreaths that patriotic hands had festooned about its massive pedestal.

"I've found them," Sophie says in a sort of indignant whisper.

"What?"

"The decorations."

"Where?"

"There."

"Those paper wreaths? Why I can show you a dozen bar-rooms in town with finer paper fixings than those," Mr. Dickison observes incautiously.

"You seem to be remarkably familiar with such places, Mr. Dickison," his wife says, a trifle tartly.

"I am, my love; there's where I go for fun."

"Well," Sophie observes at the expiration of half an hour, during which time they had stood wedged into the motionless mass of human beings, watching the gestures of the orator of the day, dodging the blazing rays of a hot sun and trying to piece together disconnected strains of melody from the band, whose noise was almost drowned by the buzz of a thousand human voices, "If we've all had fun enough, let's go home."

There was not a dissentient voice. By leaving so soon they had tolerably good luck in reaching No. 80 Melborne.

"Well, what do you think of it?" Mrs. Dickison asked, seating herself by the lounge upon which the martyr was luxuriously stretching his cramped limbs.

"Traps for the unwary. Town's full of 'em. But I say, Nan, the next time you propose fun for the family let me sketch out the programme for you. They're mending the streets here now. Putting them in beautiful order with broken rock. I'll break rock next time for my share of the fun. Hauged if I've done such a hard day's work as this since I broke my last yoke of steers. Wonder if the Confederate dead appreciate boutonnières and paper flowers?" After which delivery the martyr spread his handkerchief over his face and fell asleep with the facility that comes of a good digestion and tremendous exhaustion.

XI.—WHO IS THY NEIGHBOR?

"It is altogether too warm to think of doing anything at all but sitting still and using the biggest palmetto fan procurable," Sophie Dickison sighs lazily, sinking on a lounge in the room she and Annie occupy together, for the heat and burden of the June days are upon them. "Annie, won't you ever outgrow that countrified trick of peering at the neighbors through bowed blinds?" she adds with heat-engendered peevishness, seeking a scapegoat.

"Well, I never!" her scapegoat answers irrelevantly.

"What?" Sophie asks with an eagerness that just falls short of joining her at the window.

"The coolness of some people!" Annie continues.

"Which people? I should really like to have the names of people who can keep cool in such an atmosphere as this."

"Oh, I don't know their names! I mean our neighbors generally."

"Who is thy neighbor?" Sophie asks, languidly waving her big fan.

"Jew and Gentile! We're in something of a 'mix-tr'y' here in Melborne Street, as old Aunt Lucy used to call it. There! I hope to goodness you scraped all the skin off your knee. If ever there was an unmitigated little nuisance it is that Levison child," Annie adds, her most venomous looks descending through the slats of the bowed blinds to the dusty little garden-plot that poor Mrs. Dickison has cultivated so assiduously as a reminder of lost country delights.

"Is that child here again?" Sophie asks with spiteful animation.

"Of course she is; and made as straight for mother's bed of pansies as if they had been planted expressly for her amusement."

"How did she get here? I just know she can't open that gate now; mother had it weighted for her special benefit."

"Why, her mother calmly lifted her over the fence between us. She wanted to go up town. You know she always puts that child off on us when she wants to get rid of her. I heard her tell her that if she went out of this yard before she came back for her she would 'skin her alive.'"

"Elegant, certainly; but according to your report she has begun the skinning process herself."

"Oh, that wasn't the Levison child! That was Mrs. Davidson's twins. One of them fell over the bricks around the calla-lily bed. But it didn't graze him or daunt. That's him now playing with the gas-meter."

"Did he hurt the lily?"

"No, it was his own knee that got the worst of it; the other twin is amusing himself now digging little round holes all over the front yard. I heard Mrs. Davidson ask them if they didn't want to go over and see 'dear, good Mrs. Dickison and sweet Miss Sophie.' The coolness of it!"

"Yes; and if 'dear, good Mrs. Dickison' wasn't quite so placid under the imposition, we wouldn't have so much to stand," Sophie says irritably.

"I expect people think we have opened a primary school here," Annie observes; "a sort of kindergarten, you know."

"Bless my heart!" says Mrs. Dickison, waddling into the room, mopping her flushed and moistened brow, "how is it possible for any one to doubt that the Jews are God's own chosen people? Everything they touch turns to gold; they never get into any sort of trouble, in this country, at least; and I do believe a special providence watches over their young. You know that little Isenberg boy?"

"We'd be very stupid not to know him. He's here four-fifths of his time," says Sophie.

"Well, I went up-stairs just now, and what do you think?"

"I think we're just about the most complaisant lot of folks I ever heard of, turning nurses for the whole neighborhood," Annie remarks with energy.

"Oh, not quite so bad as that, girls! City folks do have some queer ways though. And our neighbors are very liberal with their children. I expect they pity us because we haven't any."

"Pity us! the little pests! I wish I might never see another one as long as I live."

"Yes, but I've never told you about that Isenberg child. You know there's a sparrow's nest in the mulberry close to my window; would you believe it that I found him with both legs out of the window? he was sitting in the window while he was trying to bring the limb closer with a pair of tongs. It makes me shudder to think of it."

"I suppose if he had not belonged to God's chosen tribe he would have broken his neck. Is that the moral?"

"If there's any moral to it, it is."

"The part that hurts me worst of all," says Annie, who has inherited a goodly portion of her father's blunt honesty, "is that, when the mothers come along and gather them up, as they go back home for the night, and say a few words about hoping they haven't been any trouble to us, we'll all say 'not at all,' and 'you must let them come again.'"

"It isn't quite honest," says Mrs. Dickison in a conscience-stricken voice.

"Nobody pretends to be honest in the city," says worldly-wise Sophie. "Social honesty is a nuisance and a thoroughly impracticable virtue. What time is it, Annie? I've promised Mr. Pinkham and Mrs. Hayden to drive with them this evening."

Annie gave a hasty glance at the clock, which was out of Sophie's range of vision, and then brought her eyes back to the shutters.

"It's half-past five, and perhaps you won't believe me, but father is actually bringing another child here to torment us out of our lives."

"I know who it is, too, I expect," Mrs. Dickison says, bustling toward the outlook with eager interest. "Your father told me he was going to bring him to see me. It's that Burke child. Poor little monkey! he is a starved-looking mite. He's all eyes!"

"All legs, I should say!" is Annie's observation. "But is father going to open an infirmary for all the puny children whose mothers won't and whose fathers can't take care of them?"

"Annie, I'm ashamed of you. Who was it that said 'Suffer little children to come unto you'?"

"We all know who said it, mother; but it certainly never was meant as an excuse for careless or indifferent mothers to foist their broods off on to a lot of hapless strangers. But if you can stand it, we certainly can. I'm going to take a nap before I start for a drive. Annie, I wish you joy! The Philistines be upon you!"

"Then you'll have to come down, Annie, and talk to the boy's father. Father has taken such a fancy to him, we must all be very clever to him. A little kindness is never thrown away. But it is very hot to have to be polite," Mrs. Dickison declares—as if politeness were altogether a matter of temperature—disappearing from view.

Sophie addressed herself to slumber, and Annie "freshened up" a little, wondering before going down if there was any special formula or parlor manual to be observed in intercourse with a man who was and who wasn't married.

How Mr. Lemuel Burke came to call in Melbourne Street needs to be explained.

With the frank friendliness characteristic of him as a man, and habitual with him as a countryman, who was on "speaking terms" with every man, woman and child in his own county, Mr. Dickison did not take long to form a sort of "bench intimacy," as he called it, with Mr. Lemuel Burke.

The city man seemed to find something peculiarly refreshing in the bluff directness of the old Arkansas planter, who, in his turn, declared that Burke was a city directory and social encyclopedia combined. Their introduction was somewhat unique.

"Blamed if I see why you and I should stare at each other, day after day, like two strange cats. Let's be friendly." Which they proceeded to be, occupying the same iron seat in the park, sometimes smoking together, sometimes asking and answering questions of purely local interest, and at others making much of Charlie between them.

"Charlie looks thin," Mr. Dickison says one afternoon, holding the small pinched face up for a closer inspection.

Mr. Burke's eyes roved eagerly over his boy's face, but he answered with that mildly patient voice of his, "I am afraid he is not at his best; coddled too much on sweets; left to his nurse too much. They don't understand children out yonder, I'm afraid."

"I tell you what," Mr. Dickison says with an air of inspiration, "let's take Charlie to see Mrs. D. She's a wonderful woman. What she don't know about children, from spanking them when they're well to dosing them when they're sick, isn't worth the knowing."

"Children might annoy her. You tell me you have no small ones," Mr. Burke says diffidently.

"I told you we had no small ones. Neither did we when we came here. We have about eight now," says the martyr.

"Ah! I thought your arrival had been of recent date," says the city man, with grave politeness.

"Been here just about six months, sir!"

"Oh, indeed!" Mr. Burke lapsed into a silence that might mean either he found the riddle too hard for him or the marvelous increase in the countryman's family was a matter of utter indifference to him.

"Well, shall we go?" Mr. Dickison says, taking Charlie's small hand in his and rising to depart.

"Where?"

"To my house. I've talked about this young one so much my women folks will be real glad to see him, and you, too. I think my old wife will prove a real comfort to you."

Mr. Burke stared.

"Well, you know, not just that. Confound it, the right word never does come when I want it. Of course, you don't need comfort."

"On the contrary, that is just what I do need," Charlie's father says calmly. "I need something to restore my faith in womankind. I only wondered how—you—knew—"

"By George! if Maria can't do it no woman living can. Maria is old, and Maria ain't 'specially handsome, but she's a pearl before swine, permitting me to explain that I'm the swine."

"You are a straightforward, outspoken man. It is a pleasure to meet such once in awhile. I would like Charlie to have the benefit of your wife's opinions. I will go with you gratefully."

And so they went.

XII.—SUSPICIOUS CHARACTERS.

"NOTHING ever does turn out just as one expects it to in this world, and the more you look for the less you're likely to obtain. I never intend to prepare my mind for pleasure again, for it is certain to result in mortification and disappointment," Sophie Dickison sobs, mingling her tears and her philosophy together in the most hysterical fashion. She had come in late; the family were almost through tea; so she flung her hat and gloves on a side-table, and seated herself with an expression of countenance the reverse of satisfied; "and, father, your Mr. Lemuel Burke is a savage of the first water!"

"There's nothing sure but death and taxes, and blessed are they who expect little. Who's been abusing us now?" the martyr asks, leaning back in his chair and using his toothpick, not feeling called on to champion Mr. Lemuel Burke.

"Nobody in particular, only—"

"Fate in general. Wonder if that letter will smooth matters?" and a thick white envelope went skimming across the table-cloth to Sophie's plate from her father's side-pocket. She picked it up and glanced at it before going farther into her tale of woe—what woman would not?

"Poor old Joe! I'd almost forgotten him! He's such a goose! It will keep," she says, and thrusts it, with unbroken seal, into her pocket.

Notwithstanding the cool reception granted it, "poor old Joe's" letter had evidently acted in a soothing manner, for Sophie's voice had lost a full tone of its peevishness when she began to explain what it was that had gone wrong.

"Didn't you all understand that I was to meet Mrs. Hayden in her rooms at the Gaunt House, to go to the art store with her?"

"Of course we did!" Mrs. Dickison and Annie affirm in duet.

"Well, somehow or other, as intimate as Mrs. Hayden has begged me to be, and as often as she has asked me to come and see her in her rooms, I have never found her at home. I've always sent my card up from the parlor, and word has always come back, 'not in;' but to-day, as we were to go out together by appointment, I took it for granted that she could not possibly be out, so I asked the boy who answered my bell to tell me which was Mrs. Hayden's room, and he told me—or pretended to tell me—and I started out on a voyage of discovery. You have never been to the Gaunt House!"

Her question has the inflection of an exclamation, the fork she has rested in a vertical position, answering admirably for an exclamation point.

"No; what of it?"

"Well, they ought to furnish visitors with clues to that labyrinth, that's all! I rang the visitor's bell at the ladies' entrance—"

"Of course."

"And the man that answered it told me, in answer to my request for Mrs. Hayden's room, to go up two flights of steps, turn to the right—Mr. Pinkham says he could not have said 'right,' but I know he did—go along the corridor that pointed north—as if I had a pocket-compass with me—turn to the left into a short cross-hall, up two more flights of stairs, and the first door to my left was the one I was looking for."

"Why didn't you ask the man to show you the room?" Annie asks, always interested in Sophie's social ventures.

"I did. He said he didn't have time; couldn't leave his own floor, and half a dozen other flimsy excuses. Well—"

"Did you provide yourself with a camp-bed?"

"What for, father?"

"In case night overtook you between the long corridor and the short."

"I had more need of a smelling-bottle. The scents of that hotel! I would not be doomed to spend a night in such an atmosphere for pay."

"City people are not fastidious about the quality of air they breathe. I doubt if they know good from bad," Mrs. Dickison remarks, with a calm sense of her own superiority in that particular.

"So I started on my voyage of discovery. I went up two flights of steps, just as the man told me to, and, as I had not taken the precaution to put on blind-bridles before starting, I was obliged to see right into an open door, where a hatless, coatless and bootless man was stretched out sound asleep on a bed!"

"Mercy!" Annie exclaims.

"Sleeping men generally are hatless!" says Mr. Dickison, "and beds are very generally used for sleeping purposes;" while Mrs. Dickison, who never omits an opportunity to prove that the city man is altogether an inferior product to the country man, remarks: "He might have had the decency to close his door. But city people rarely ever are decent."

"Perhaps he preferred exposure to suffocation," says the martyr charitably.

"Well, it did not take me long to leave that door out of sight; so I turned to the right, as the man told me, and found that there was absolutely nowhere else to go to!"

"How's that?" everybody asks.

"Why, there wasn't any more corridor, right or left, long or short. There was a huge room, with ever so many big chairs and towels and soap-suddy men and things!" Sophie stopped to fan herself nervously, as memory recalled the "soap-suddy men and things!"

"A barber shop! Mercy! What did you do?" asks Annie.

"Nothing! I just stood and stared like an idiot. I suppose I would have been standing there yet but father's friend, Mr. Burke, who was waiting his turn to be soap-sudded, I suppose, came toward me, looking as stern and angry as if he would have liked to slap me, and said:

"Miss Dickison, I believe. Some mistake, I presume."

"I told him there was certainly some mistake; I was looking for a lady's room."

"May I show you to the parlor?" he asked. "Perhaps it would be safest to send for your friend. If you will give me her name—"

"What he said didn't so much matter as the way in which he said it—for all the world as if I was a bad child caught in a scrape. So I just eyed him very coolly and told him he need not trouble himself, I was quite equal to the undertaking in hand, which made him look angrier than ever; but he just said, in that exasperatingly cool voice of his:

"I would like to serve you for your father's sake; but it shall be as you say."

"So he went back to the soap-suds, and I turned around to hunt for a loop-hole of escape."

"I think you behaved very badly to Mr. Burke, Sophie; he is just splendid. Only a girl doesn't like to be served for her father's sake exclusively." Mr. Burke's pretty champion blushed at her own warm advocacy of her father's friend.

"Well, I twisted and turned until I was absolutely bewildered and dizzy enough to drop."

"Weren't there any numbers on the doors?"

"Yes; but those that weren't locked were standing wide open. City people don't care, you know. And then I am sure it's three degrees warmer there than anywhere else on earth. So I couldn't blame them much; but it did look independent."

"City people are always bold as brass," Mrs. Dickison affirms.

"Well, I asked every one I met if they could tell me which was Mrs. Hayden's room, and when I reached it I was so flurried and worn out that I did not even have the decency to knock, but bolted right in. Gracious! will I ever forget the shock of that moment! There was a lounge drawn up between two windows, and on it lay Mrs. Hayden, sound asleep. So sound, that even my boisterous entrance never caused a muscle to move. If I had not been told that it was Mrs. Hayden's room I would have shut the door and run away. Annie, she hasn't a particle more hair than Grandma Rogers has, and it's as gray as a badger's. Her skin is as yellow as a buckskin glove, and her cheeks were so sunken in that I expect she wears false teeth and plumpers and things, and takes them out when she goes to sleep. As for her form! Oh! well that was all over the chairs! And mother, I smelt—I'm quite sure—I think—I smelt beer in her room!"

"Nathan Pinkham's daughter a beer drinker! No, by George, child! you can't make me swallow that story," Mr. Dickison roars, with zealous loyalty to his old friend. "As for her make-up, that's nothing. Half the women in town are made up, I guess. It's a sort of revelation and shock to you, you little country simpleton. But beer drinking! By George, that's coming it a little too seriously, Sophie!"

"It's a safe rule to give a city woman credit for her own eyes and nose," says Mrs. Dickison; "beyond that everything is conjectural."

"Did you try to wake her?" asks Annie, in a shocked voice.

"Indeed I didn't. I slipped out as softly as if I had been stealing; backing out, while I kept my fascinated eyes on the sleeper. Just as I closed the door behind me I found myself face to face with an old hooked-nose Jew, dirty and greasy looking. He must have mistaken me for somebody else—a peddler, I reckon—for he said, 'Vell, vat you got fur me dish toime—silks un shateens?'"

"What did you answer?"

"Nothing. I ran, taking first one turn and then another, until I had gotten so nervous that I began to fancy that some one was following me. I glanced over my shoulder and saw a man slowly coming up the long corridor I was in. I ran faster, and finally found myself opposite the ladies' parlor. Just then I heard the voice of that detestable Mr. Burke at my elbow, saying, 'Pardon a seeming impertinence, Miss Dickison; but you are so young and so evidently a stranger to the ways of the city, may I not see you home? See, the gas is being lighted.'

"No, sir; you may not," I answered him, very defiantly. 'It is quite early. I have been disappointed in meeting some friends here; but I am quite able to take care of myself.'

"Your father is aware of your presence here, I presume?" he asked, in that coolly impudent way of his, which it is a wonder I felt called on to answer at all; but I did, just to show him how impertinent his interference was.

"My father is quite aware of and approves all my friendships."

"Pardon me then," and he turned off, as if he had just eased his mind of a load, and left me in such a frame of mind that I was almost ready to snifle."

"That is the last thing on earth I should think of doing in a public parlor," Annie says reproachfully.

"Well, there I stood, and there Mr. Pinkham found me. He said he had just seen me through the office-door. He seemed so distressed to think I had been left in the lurch so completely, said so many handsome and apologetic things for his sister—who, he said, had been summoned to the country by a telegram to visit a dying friend, and abused himself so roundly for having failed to send me the note she had left with him for delivery on the night previous, that I looked at him in blank amazement. Was he crazy, or was I crazy? Had I seen Mrs. Hayden, or had I not? My own eyes told me I had; her sweet little note told me she had been called out of town the night before. Here's her note to speak for itself."

"Of course you had not seen her. Nathan Pinkham's son couldn't any more lie than Nathan Pinkham's daughter could drink beer. A case of mistaken identity, that's all. And as for Burke—"

"He's simply horrid!" says Sophie, with emphasis.

"He's simply splendid!" says Annie, with equal emphasis.

"Oh, Burke's all right!" Mr. Dickison asserts stoutly. "He's had some sorry experiences in life, and is a little tart in some of his ways, but he will do to tie to, as sure as you're born. So Nath's boy brought you home, did he?"

"Yes, sir; he saw me to our gate. But, father, I assure you Mr. Burke is not all right. He is excessively impudent. I was so heated and worried by my tramp all over that hot hotel, that Mr. Pinkham proposed we should go to the park a while before coming home. I asked him if ladies ever went there so late of evenings, and he asked me, in such an injured voice, if I supposed he would carry me into any danger, that I went; and if Mr. Pinkham and I had been two escaped convicts, we could not have been treated with more impertinence by your friend Mr. Burke. He absolutely dogged our steps. Of course, no one could object to anything he did, for the park was as free to him as it was to us. I asked Mr. Pinkham if he knew him, and he said he believed it was that poor rogue Burke."

"Indeed, Mr. Dickison," his wife says in virtuous alarm, "I never did quite approve of the way you have picked up that Mr. Burke. How in the world do we know who we are taking by the hand here? We cannot be too particular. Of course, Mr. Pinkham and his sister are all right, for we know who their father was; but as for Mr. Burke—" Digitized by Google

"You're right, Maria. We're not in the country now, where everybody knows who everybody is. But Burke's face spoke so well for him. I'd trust that face of his before a dozen introductions. I'm afraid I am a little irregular in my social performances. I'll inquire into Burke."

XIII.—POOR OLD JOE!

"SOPHIE DICKISON!" says Annie, turning sternly upon her elder sister, and addressing her magisterially, as soon as they find themselves alone that night in their bed-room; "you may try to deceive father and mother, and you may succeed, but there's no manner of use in trying to fool me! You've got something on your mind; and it's something serious, too! I know you. You've not been worked up to your present pitch of nervousness by that hotel business. What is it, sis?"

For all answer to which Sophie fell to crying in the most inconsequent fashion. Annie was used to these slight irregularities of temperament in her sister; in fact, in her own commonplace humility she had always considered them rather as so many indications of Sophie's finer organism; only every-day folks like herself remained forever on the dead level of placid endurance. So she turned down the bed and tucked the bar in snugly all around, and laid Sophie's gown officiously on a chair for her, and twisted her pretty yellow hair into stiff little paper balls; and finally, seating herself in a big chair, she clasped both knees with her arms and said, "Well!"

Sophie, emerging from behind her wet pocket-handkerchief, glanced at the curled up form in the big chair and at the wreath of white paper knobs on its brow, and fell to laughing as inconsequently as she had cried.

"You are hysterical," says Annie. "Fix your bangs, it will compose your nerves, or read Joe's letter, that will soothe you to sleep, I warrant you."

"Poor old Joe! I'd almost forgotten his letter. I'll read it right now," Sophie says remorsefully, and seats herself accordingly under the gas-light. "Shall I read it out loud?"

"If you don't mind and don't think Joe would," Annie answers conscientiously.

"Of course not. 'Dear Miss Sophie.'"

"He used to call you Sophie. It's going to be an awfully solemn letter, I'm quite sure. If you hear me snore you needn't mind."

"'Dear Miss Sophie,'" the reader repeats. "'I've been intending to write you this letter for the past six weeks or more, but thinking as I'd best be sure of the ground I was standing on before making too bold, I've been waiting.'"

"He's lucky in having any ground at all to stand on," comes from the arm-chair.

"'I've found it a harder task than I thought it was going to be to keep my promise to your father about looking after his place while he was gone. Not harder work, for he couldn't ask anything of me that I'd think too hard work, but the old house looks so sad and lonely that it almost makes a woman of me every time I go over.'"

"He means tears, I suppose," Annie says explanatorily. "Some men think tears and woman synonymous terms."

"'The water has left the whole country now, and a bedraggled looking lot we are. There's a deal of mending and patching to be done before things can be made to look half-way decent yet, and I'm sorter glad that you're out of the muss; but I hope you won't be sorry to come back in the fall, for the old place will never look right, Sophie, dear, if it was never to get you back.'"

"That sounds just like Joe," says Annie.

"'I've pitched my own crop and seen to the pitching of your father's. The hands are all working well after their long resting spell; but the mules are in poor fix to do extra work, and the gnats are death on the poor brutes.'"

"Sophie, if that letter becomes any more tenderly sentimental you'll have to read it to yourself."

"'Your father's stock looks better than anybody's I've seen—he left such a good lot of feed on hand, you know. I am afraid it will distress your mother to hear that all her fine Berkshires have disappeared—killed or drowned, we can't say which.'"

"Poor old Joe! he's nothing if not practical," Sophie observes, turning over the leaf.

"He's true as gold. It's mean of us even to make fun of his letter. And you know he's lots handsomer than your Mr. Pinkham."

"'I've been thinking, Sophie, that I could content myself with beautifying my little place this year, and, when you came back in the fall, I'd just ask you to come over and crown all my work by giving the little house a mistress. But I've fallen to wondering if it wasn't mighty presumptuous in me to suppose that such a prize would go uncontested. And when the fear came over me that somebody might steal you from me, I grew hot and cold and scared, and just made up my mind to write to you, though I know I'm not anything of a penman, dear girl, for I don't understand much beside crops. I'm writing now, sure of nothing but my own heart, Sophie. Sure that it's full of true, manly love for you, dear. I know you can't walk ten steps in your city walks, dear, without meeting some fellow with a smoother face and smoother ways and smoother talk than mine, Sophie; but when it comes to loving of you and sheltering you from the storms, and easing your pathway, Joe Hinton won't be afraid to enter the lists against them all if you'll only tell him he may.'"

"Poor old Joe!" Annie says softly.

"'I'm afraid I've been making too sure of the future all this time. Your father has known and approved of my intentions. I told him when the water came up that it had hurt me worse than anybody else, for I'd meant to have asked you to marry me this spring. He said nothing would please him better, but he reckoned it would be just as well to wait until fall. And I thought he was right, for it does look like confounded impudence for a man to promise a woman to cherish her in a house two feet under water and to endow her with all his worldly goods, when he don't seem to have anything but acres of Mississippi River. But I'm coming out all right, my dear; prospects are brightening and the crops are promising, though this cold snap has made the young cotton look mighty sick. I would like to come up just about the time you're all making ready to come home, and (if this letter makes it all right, that is,) we could get married in church up there, like Christian folk. So I won't trouble you to write me a very long letter, dear, if you'll just write and say "Dear Joe, I'll wait till you come," I'll rest satisfied and happy.'"

The letter dropped into Sophie's lap, and the two girls looked at each other.

"Well?" Annie asks.

"Poor Joe!" Sophie says; "I liked him so much, and was real glad to see his handwriting to-night."

"Well?" Annie repeats, a little impatiently.

"I wonder if he'll mind—much?"

"Mind! 'What?'"

"That!" and Sophie slowly turns a ring on her third finger until she brings a flashing diamond into prominence, that has been concealed in the palm of her hand.

"Mercy!" Annie exclaims, dazzled and startled, while Sophie, folding the radiant hand over the other one, looks down at it in blushing confusion.

"Mr. Pinkham?" asks Annie, in an awe-stricken voice.

"Of course! Who else?"

"I wonder if father will like it?"

"He is not to know."

"Not to know! Why? Who says so?"

"Mr. Pinkham. I've promised him."

"Sophie," says Annie, rising to her feet excitedly, "you are older than I am, and you pretend to more worldly wisdom than I ever laid claim to. I never had a lover, so I suppose I don't exactly know how lovers ought to act and talk; but I don't believe that it's right to keep this thing from father; and it seems queer, to say the least of it, that he should be the one to insist on secrecy."

"Father brought him here. Father knows all about him. He gave me his reasons for keeping it to ourselves for the present. If you've a mind to turn tell-tale, you can do it; but I'll never forgive you—never!"

"How long is this odious secret to be kept?"

"Two little weeks."

"What about that flashing ring?"

"I am going to wear it in my bosom."

"Comfortable. I'd as soon put a brickbat inside my corsets. Poor Joe! he never would have sneaked into a family in this fashion."

"Annie, I want you to hush!"

"In fact, his honesty has been his ruin. You did like him, Sophie, and I believe in my heart you do now. You're dazzled with this Mr. Pinkham. His ways are so smooth, and his voice is so soft, and his mustache so divine, and his eyes so languishing, that you've been sampling the inner man by the outer, and think he's altogether divine."

"Annie, I didn't know you could be so cruel!"

"And I didn't know you could be so silly!"

"Mr. Pinkham is the most polished gentleman I ever met. He dresses to perfection, too."

"The coat is but the guinea's stamp; the man's the man for a' that," I'd rather have Joe Hinton without any coat than Mr. Pinkham with a thousand. You know I never have shared in the family admiration for 'Nath's boy,' as father is so fond of calling him."

"No; you prefer Mr. Burke," says Sophie maliciously.

"At least, there's no danger in that direction," Annie answers calmly. "His wife is living, and I believe him to be a man totally devoid of sentimental nonsense. At least, he has never bored me with any."

Sophie did not answer, but sat absently folding Joe's letter into smaller and smaller folds, while Annie completed her preparations for the night, and crept under the bar.

"Sophie," she says, flattening her nose against the mosquito net to fling a Parthian dart, "what are you going to do about the beer?"

"What beer?"

"Sister-in-law Hayden's. Suppose she does drink beer?"

"Annie!" but there was more fright than anger in her voice.

BELINDA.

BY RHODA BROUGHTON,

Author of "Good-by, Sweetheart!" "Red as a Rose is She," etc., etc.

BELINDA's look wanders in consternation from one to other of the faces round her. Disordered hair, red-hot cheeks, panting breath, rampagious eyes! Bedlam might easily turn out a saner-looking party. In comparison of them, Comus' crew were an orderly Philistine band.

The men are bad enough, but Sarah—but herself! Bacchante and romp mixed in just and fine proportions as her sister looks, her stricken conscience tells her that she herself far outdoes her, though she dares not ask the looking-glass for confirmation of this conviction; but during the past mad hour, has not Sarah been tame and mild when compared with her?

"Had we not better be going?" says Bellairs at last, in a lamb's voice, in which no one would recognize the hilarious bellow of five minutes ago.

"I think that there can be no two opinions on that head," replies Sarah dryly. As she speaks she turns to her dazed elder, and lowers her voice. "Had you not better go and ask him whether he feels inclined to join us?"

Belinda turns in stupid compliance toward the door.

As she makes her difficult way through the little passage, blocked with articles of furniture piled one atop of another, her consternation deepens. He must have had to climb like a cat over his own arm-chair in order to gain ingress into his own drawing-room! It is impossible! It would be adding insult to injury to present herself before him in her present dishevelment. She must needs repair to her own room; must needs, with intense repugnance, snatch a glance at her own disordered image in the toilet-glass. The case is even worse than she had feared. There is even more of the Mornad than she had apprehended in her reflection. But there is no time to be lost. Each moment that passes, leaving her offense unacknowledged, lends it a deeper dye. A brush snatched up and hastily applied to her revolted hair; two hand-palms, but they are hot too, held for a moment to her blazing cheeks in the vain effort to cool them, and she is off again.

Outside his door she hesitates an instant, listening in scared heart-sinking; but there is no sound audible within, so, plucking up what courage she may, she enters. He is seated at his writing-table, in the leathern chair in which she has passed such countless hours of ennui and fatigue, slaving in his service. The thought emboldens her a little, and she advances up the room and stands beside him.

"May I take your place?" she asks in a rather faltering voice. "I am quite ready."

It is a whole minute before he answers. There is no plainer mode of showing resentment than by letting sixty seconds elapse between a question addressed to you and your answer. Then:

"I am obliged to you," he answers woodenly, still writing; "but I think that, in its present condition, your mind is scarcely capable of serious employment!"

There is something so galling in the implication that her spirit rises.

"Do you think that I am drunk?" she asks violently; then, recollecting how gravely in the wrong she has been, she masters herself, and says apologetically: "I am very sorry; it was very foolish; but—but—I did not expect you home by so early a train."

He gives a little odious, though perhaps pardonable laugh.

"That fact was sufficiently obvious."

"I am very sorry," she repeats again, with uneasy iteration, shifting wretchedly from one foot to the other, as she stands in her culpritship before him; "but—but it was so wet, and we could not get out, and—and it was so long since I had danced or played at any games!"

There is a wistful accent audible even to herself in her voice, and she looks at him with a sort of forlorn hope that he may be touched by it. If he is, he masters it admirably.

"Indeed!" he answers cuttingly. "Well, next time that such an impulse seizes you, I should be obliged by your choosing some other spot than my house to turn into a bear-garden!"

She had thought that her cheeks were already as hot as cheeks could be, but the sudden influx of blood that his words sends pulsing into them shows her mistake. Hitherto, shame at and repentance of her frolic, joined with a sincere desire to make amends for it, have been her predominant emotions; now at once they vanish, and give place to a biting sense of injustice and aversion.

"After all, it was no such great crime," she says in a hard voice, in which is no trace of the gentle, humble key of her earlier utterance; "it was silly, perhaps," with a burning blush, "but it was an innocent enough wet-day amusement!"

"It is an innocent wet-day amusement against the recurrence of which I shall take measures to secure myself," he replies resentfully.

There is something, or she fancies so, of menace in his tone, at which her anger rises.

"You forget," she says, in a low but extremely distinct voice, "that I am young. If you had married a wife of your own age, it would have been different; but you must remember that I am at the beginning of life, and you at the end!" Having delivered herself of this amiable reminder, she walks toward the door, not giving one glance to see how far her shaft has gone home. On reaching her own room she breaks into hysterical sobbing. "If he had taken it differently, he might have made a friend for life of me!" she cries.

This is, perhaps, putting it a little strongly.

One would have thought that upon the most inveterate pleasure-seekers, such a cold-water douche could not have been poured without producing a permanently healing effect; that never again would the members of the little band, so disastrously surprised in mid-romp by the Professor of Etruscan, lift up their humbled heads from the dust, into which that one glance of his narrow eye had abased them. And yet it is but too true—such is the potency of the spring and youth spirits, when they meet in lusty embrace—that before forty-eight hours are over, they are planning another excursion.

A whole long day spent chiefly in her own society, for Belinda has had to expiate by working double tides her short idleness, has convinced Sarah of the wisdom and necessity of catering for her own amusement. By some means, whether of writing, or meeting on neutral ground, she has established a communication with Belairs and his friends; and in their eager hands, guided by her commanding spirit, the project of a new expedition for the following day—i. e., the day but one after their being put to the rout—speedily takes shape. It is indeed shorn of its former noble proportions, for it is not likely that Mrs. Forth will soon be indulged with another whole holiday; but upon a part—the latter part—of the afternoon she may, without undue sanguineness, reckon as lawfully her own; and now that the evenings are so long, it is of little consequence how late, whether lit by red sun or white moon, they return.

Belinda has no share in the formation of the plan. She knows of it, indeed. Did she not know of it, would she not have broken down under the pitiless labors of the interminable day that intervenes between it and its abortive predecessor? A sort of superstition keeps her from inquiring as to any of its details. To take for granted that it will happen, will, judging by all precedent and analogy, probably prevent it. Much less dares she ask whether Rivers is to be included in it.

"I do not even know of whom your party consists," she says at last, over-night, to her sister, emboldened by the after-dinner twilight, in which they are strolling round and round the odorous garden plat, and fondly trusting that for once that sister's acuteness may be at fault, and not detect the ill-hidden motive of her words.

"Of whom it consists?" repeats Sarah carelessly, lifting and spreading out one hand, and striking the fingers, one after one, with the index of the other. "You," touching the thumb, "I, Mr. Bellairs, Mr. Stavely, Mr. De Lisle."

She has reached the little finger, and there pauses.

"Two ladies and three men?" comments Belinda, in tremulous interrogation.

Sarah does not contradict her.

"We should have been six last time," says Mrs. Forth, after a short silence.

"Yes, six," assents Sarah.

Belinda's heart beats low. She withdraws her hand from her sister's arm, upon which it has been resting, ostensibly to hold up her gown; but in a moment that gown is again trailing unregarded behind her. Why has she been gazing with such elation at the steady roses and ambers of the west? Promise-breaking as evening skies are, surely no sky could break such a promise as this! If what Sarah implies be true, what does it matter whether that promise be kept or broken?

"You have not asked Mr. Rivers?" she says at last, with abrupt desperation, seeing that her sister volunteers no further information.

"I have certainly not asked him," replies Sarah gravely, with a slight stress upon the pronoun.

Mrs. Forth does not perceive the significant accentuation; and only gathers that her fears are realized. It is a moment or two before she can speak. Then,

"That was civil!" she says, in a resentful low key; "but I suppose that in the case of a common workman in an iron foundry—"

"Stay!" interrupts Sarah calmly, "before you say anything more, for which you might afterwards be sorry. I may as well tell you that he is invited. I had, God knows, no hand in it; but Mr. Bellairs invited him, and very officious I think it was of him!"

The morning has come. The sunset has been better than its word. No average fair day is this, upon which it simply does not rain, but one that earth, air and sky from morn to eve vie in nobly decking; such a day as that one before which old George Herbert poured the nard and spices of his curious sweet verse, which for two hundred years has risen to most hearts and lips on any day of unusual summer splendor. It is certain that this time the weather at least will throw no obstacle in her way. The forenoon, of hot labor to the one sister, of luxurious cool idling to the other, is past and gone. So is luncheon.

The hour for departure draws near. Sarah is already dressed; dressed to the last button of her Paris gloves; to the last bewitching pinch given to the fantastic rural hat, whose pulling to pieces and rebuilding has largely helped in the beguiling of her lonely morning.

Belinda, usually punctual, and to-day, as one would think, with treble motives for punctuality, has not yet appeared. But just as the impatient Sarah is turning over in her mind the advisability of hurrying her by a call, she enters. At sight of her, an exclamation of surprise and remonstrance rises to her sister's lips.

"Not dressed yet?"

For, indeed, about Mrs. Forth there is no appearance of festal preparation; her head is uncovered; she is in her usual working morning gown—a gown to which traditions of ink and folios seem continually to adhere; her steps are languid, and her eyes dead.

"I am not going," she answers doggedly, throwing herself into a chair. "I must give it up!"

"Give it up?" repeats the other, with an incredulity born of the recollection of Belinda's passionately eager watching of the sunset over-night; "why?"

"He cannot spare me," replies Belinda, in a dull, level tone; "he says that he is ill."

"Ill? What is the matter with him?"

"I really forgot to inquire whether it was his heart or his liver to-day," rejoins the other, with a sort of apathetic satire; "it is always either his heart or his liver: except now and then when it is his spleen!"

"Whichever it is," says Sarah bluntly—"and I suppose you mean to imply that it is not any of them, really—I do not see what good you can do!"

"I can give him his drops," replies Belinda, with the same artificial tameness; then, life coming back in poignant pain into her tone; "while you are on the river, I shall be giving him his drops! Oh!" turning over writhingly in her chair, and half burying her face in the cushion, "what will not the river be to-day! You will be under the willows; they will push your boat right under the branches! You have never done it; you do not know what it is to lie under the willows on a day like this!"

She ends with something not far removed from a sob; then, sitting upright again, and resentfully regarding her sister:

"You do not seem very sorry: if one were of a suspicious disposition one might almost say you looked glad."

"As usual you are beside the mark," replies Sarah calmly. "I was reflecting that in all probability the whole expedition must now fall through, as not even I dare brave Oxbridge public opinion by taking to the water with four young men and without a chaperone."

"Of course not!" cries Belinda, catching eagerly at this suggestion, and with a feeling as of a burden most unaccountably lightened; "it would be quite out of the question!"

How comparatively easy it will be to administer Professor Forth's drops, with no simultaneous mental consciousness maddening her of the dazzling water, the sheltering gray-green willow-arch, and of Rivers lying beneath it, laughing as Sarah, alas! knows how to make him laugh, stretched in lazy forgetful enjoyment at her feet. The distinctly disappointed expression painted on Miss Churchill's pink and white lineaments brings her back to a consciousness of her selfishness.

"I could ask Mrs. Baker whether she would take you," she says slowly, in reluctant suggestion; "she is fond of the river, and she lives only two houses off. Do you think?"—dragging her words somewhat, and hoping, oh, how ardently! for an answer in the negative—"that it would be worth while asking Mrs. Baker to take you?"

"Eminently worth while!" replies Sarah joyfully, the sparkle returning at a hand-gallop to her eyes.

Belinda has already repented of her offer, but shame prevents her now going back from it. She seats herself at the writing-table, and Sarah walks to the window.

"I can see them all at the corner of the road," she says, chuckling; "they dare not come any farther than the corner, and even then I can see that they are in a cold sweat of apprehension."

Belinda writes on: that most unkillable of plants—hope—sending up a little fresh shoot in her heart; after all, fate may be kind. It may have sent Mrs. Baker a previous engagement, a headache—what not? But fate disdains to be dictated to. If it is kind to us, it is out of its own free will, and not at our bidding.

"She will be delighted," says Sarah, returning in an impossibly short space of time; Sarah, who to insure the greater security and speed, has insisted upon being herself the bearer of the note. "She is very much obliged to you for thinking of her; she is putting on her things now, and will be at the corner as soon as I."

Miss Churchill is bustling away, perhaps not very anxious to take a prolonged farewell look at her sister's face; but that sister detains her.

"I will go with you as far as the corner," she says feverishly, catching up a shabby garden-hat, and throwing it on her hot head as she speaks.

Before she has gone six yards she has repented of her impulse. There seems to be in these days not one of her actions of which she does not repent before it is half way to execution. Why should she, of her own free will, forcing him to a comparison between them, set herself, poor workaday drudge as she is, beside this charming holiday creature—so delicately fine, so infectiously gay? Even now she would go back, but it is too late. The young men have caught sight of her: in a moment they have all met.

Rivers exhales a heavy sigh of relief. He has had bad dreams, and a dragging presage of ill-luck hanging about him; but both dreams and presage are as false as dreams and presages mostly are. Had they not told him that she would be prevented coming? and is she not standing here in beautiful bodily presence before him? Is he likely to observe the age of her hat or the humility of her gown? He, never one of those man-milliners who can price, to a groat, a woman's laces; he, to whom it has always seemed as if, whatever sheath his bright flower-lady wore, she informed it with her own glory.

"I hope you will enjoy yourselves," she says, letting her hand linger for an instant in his, and lifting her melancholy eyes to his face.

"We!" he says, laughing softly, though his heart misgives him; "and why not you?"

"I am not going," she answers quietly, though her eyes rivet themselves with an intentness of passionate jealousy on his face, to see whether he looks sorry enough.

He steps back a pace or two, loosing her hand.

"Not going?" he echoes blankly.

His dreams, his presage spoke true, after all—worse than true, indeed! for have they not tricked him with the shadow of a hope?

"Come along—come along!" cries Sarah blithely, marshaling her pack and whipping up the stragglers; "we are late already. Why do we not set off? Mr. Rivers, will you hold my parasol while I search for my pocket? This is a new gown, and a horrible misgiving seizes me that it has not a pocket."

She addresses him so decidedly that he has no alternative but to answer her, nor does she again let him go.

Before Belinda can realize that it is so, they are all off, walking away from her—away to the river and the willows. Without one word of regret for her absence—without even an inquiry as to the cause of that absence, he is gone—gone a-pleasuring.

His face indeed looked blank for a moment, but for how long, pray? Does it look blank still? Will it look blank under the willows? If her withdrawal from the party had been to him what his would have been to her, would he have gone at all? would he not have framed some excuse for escape at the last moment? Nor does she, in her unjust heart-bitterness, reflect that he could have taken no surer way of compromising the woman he loved! Happily perhaps for her, she is not long able to give herself up undisturbed to reflections of the above kind. She must needs return without farther delay to her treadmill. It is true that the morning, and the morning's Menander, are over—ill as is the Professor, he is not too ill for Menander—but her afternoon task-work is still unperformed; her daily two hours' ministrations to her imbecile mother-in-law—two hours during which that mother-in-law's attendant is released, and sent out into the fresh air to lay in a stock of ozone and endurance to support her through the other twenty-two. The thought of her fellow-drudge makes Belinda remorsefully hasten her steps. What business has she, with her selfish repinings, to defer and shorten that other drudge's holiday?

"Do not hurry back," she says good-naturedly, as she relieves guard. "It is a lovely day; take your time and enjoy yourself; I am in no hurry."

Oven-like as is the temperature of old Mrs. Forth's room, her easy-chair is drawn up close to the blazing fire. The chill of extremest eld is upon her. Her mind is so completely gone that she is incapable of recognizing or identifying even the persons habitually about her; nor does her daily interview with her daughter-in-law ever begin with any other phrase than:

"Who are you, my dear? If you will believe me, I do not know who you are!"

Her conversation, which never ceases, consists of this question repeated ad infinitum; of inquiries after various long-dead members of her family, supposed by her to be alive and sometimes even in the room; and of information such as that her father has been sitting with her (if he were alive, he would be one hundred and sixty years old!), and that it is wonderful how he keeps his memory.

Belinda seats herself beside her.

After all, it requires no great call upon the intellect to repeat at intervals in a slow, loud voice (for, with the other faculties, hearing, too, is gone):

"I am Belinda! Belinda Forth—James' wife; your son James' wife!" varied occasionally by such answers as these, called forth by appropriate inquiries. "He is dead!" "He died twenty-five years ago!" "Woking Cemetery!"

But between her mechanical words there is plenty of room to interpolate thoughts that but little match them.

They must have reached the river by now. Have they walked all the way in the same order as that in which they set off? He and Sarah ahead, and the rest herding behind. Of course they have. Since both are pleased with the arrangement, why change it? How murderously hot this fire is! Is it inside her that it is burning? They are embarked now. Have they chosen a punt, or a pair-oar? Perhaps both, since there are six of them. In that case the party will divide; but how? It is easy to tell, by the writhing of her hands, in what manner she pictures that division effected. Virtually, then, it will be a tête-à-tête. It will be alone together that they will lie under the willows!

Belinda's attention wanders wide. Twice she has answered, "Woking Cemetery!" when she should have answered "James' wife;" and is on the point of repeating the error a third time, when a vague fidgetiness in her interlocutor's manner—hazily conscious of something gone wrong—recalls her to herself.

The two hours march by. The nurse has taken her at her word, and is extending a little the border of her liberty.

Presently the Professor enters: enters to pay that punctual daily five minutes' visit, which is the share he contributes toward the tendance of his parent. For a wonder, she knows him, without being told who he is.

"Where is your father, James?" is her first question.

"Gone, my mother."

"Gone!" (with great animation and surprise), "gone where?"

"To the Better Land, my mother" (very loud).

"Oh indeed! Well, I only hope that they are taking good care of him: if I know that he is well looked after, that is all I care for!"

Belinda gasps. She has heard it all scores of times before: at first with pitiful wonder; then with a dreary amusement; and lastly, with the indifferent apathy of use. To-day there seems to be a new and grisly jocularity about it. This then is life! A youth of passionately craving and foregoing; long pursuing and never overtaking; of hearts that leap for a moment and ache for a year; of jealousies that poison food and massacre sleep—leading up to an old age of garrulous idiocy! She is released at last: set free to amuse herself as she best pleases. But of what amusement is a mind in such tune as hers capable? She has taken her hat in her hand, and walks along drawing in great gulps of the exquisite evening air; while her feet, without her bidding, lead her to the river-side.

Oxbridge is, as every one knows, rich in two rivers, and it is to the lesser of these streams that the boating-party has committed itself. It is this lesser stream, also, which for a short part of its course St. Ursula's green meadow and pleasant walk border.

It is without any acknowledged hope of meeting them that she takes the direction indicated. Is it likely that they will be so early returning? Is it likely that they, or any one of them, will be in much haste to abridge such an excursion? Tasting, as she now does, the delicacy of the air, viewing the homely loveliness of bushed bank and satin-sliding river, she can the better and more enviously figure to herself what its charm has been. But the air and the motion do her good. Beside her the stream steals along—a soothing, sluggish companion. No song or rush has it, like the flashing northern becks; but what green reflections in it! What long water-weeds, swinging slowly to its slow current! How the willows—pensive almost as olives in their grave dim leafage—have printed themselves on its quiet, silent heart! How riotously green are the fat low meadows that, all winter long, the floods had drowned!

Here, a May-bush has strewn the white largesse of its petals on the water, and there another, less overblown, stoops to look at its own pink face's double. There are two cuckoos: one loud and near, one soft and distant, answering each other across the meads. Beneath the bank at her foot, an undergraduate lies stretched along his boat, with his book. Three others in a punt are waggishly trying to upset each other. She sits down on a bench and idly watches them, till, with shouts of young laughter, they float out of sight. Another punt, a canoe, a skiff, a boat with ladies in it. Her heart jumps. Ah, no! not her ladies! a boat freighted with hawthorn boughs and guelder-rose branches, that tell of a joyous day's Maying in the country. Endless young gentlemen in flannel, punting, sculling, lying supine. She has fallen into a dull comparison between their gayety and her own gloom, when her attention is aroused by the sound of a loud voice coming from some bark yet unseen, that is approaching round the corner. Many of the boys' voices are loud: what is there then in the timbre of this voice that makes Belinda, at the instant that it strikes her ear, hastily rise and pursue her walk? But she might as well have remained seated on the bench.

A punt has come into sight, guided with an unskillfulness that seems almost intentional, by a young man; colliding frequently with other punts, bumping with many jars against the bank, and with an ample female form reclining complacently—superior to bumps or jars—in its stern.

"Stop! stop!" she cries, gesticulating with her umbrella in a way which alone would have been enough to identify her. "Belinda! Belinda!"

All the luxurious young gentlemen turn their heads to look. One of the white terriers seated by their masters in boats sets up his nose and howls.

Reluctant and dyed with shame, Belinda steps to the water's edge.

"George Sampson is taking me out for a row!" cries Miss Watson, in a tone which can leave no member of the University ignorant of the fact related; "his people have gone back to London. I cannot think what induced them to shorten their visit so much; they came for a week. Why should you not get in and come with us? I am sure you will be delighted" (appealing to her swain) "if Mrs. Forth will get in and come with us. We are enjoying ourselves immensely!"

The unhappy young man murmurs something that may be taken for assent. The perspiration of anguish pours from his brow, upon which is written a dogged shame and wrath too deep for words.

"No?" pursues the other, in answer to Belinda's emphatic negative of her proposal. "You are not so fond of the water as Sarah, eh? She takes to it like a young duck. I saw them setting off this afternoon; they looked such a jolly party. I offered to join them, but they evidently did not hear. Why did you not go with them? Not allowed, eh?"

Without looking, Belinda is hotly aware that a pardonable smile has stolen over the features of more than one of the listening boys, at the publication of her domestic secrets. There is not one of them who has not dropped his book.

"I will not keep you any longer," she mutters in hasty farewell.

But Miss Watson has not yet done with her.

"You should have told the Professor that you owed it to your conscience to look after Sarah," cries she, laughing resonantly. "Judging by what I saw to-day, you would not have been far out!"

Belinda's cheek, hot with shame a moment ago, grows pale. The impulse to flee leaves her; a contrary impulse, such as draws the palpitating canary to the cage-wires and the cat's claws, roots her to the spot.

"What do you mean?" she asks faltering. "Was she"—lowering her voice, so as not to be heard by any one else, hating herself for descending to such a question, and trying to carry it off with a spurious merriment—"was she—ha! ha!—flirting very nefariously with them all?"

"With them all!" repeats the other in loud irony; "pooh! that would have been nothing; there is always safety in numbers; the others were nowhere. Rivers had it all his own way!"

This is what Belinda has been angling to hear, and now she has heard it. It is not then the figment of her disordered fancy; it must indeed be obvious to have hit the eyes of so coarse and casual an observer as Miss Watson. Nor does the recollection of how much she had profited by her former prompt action upon information derived from the same source recur to her memory.

"He is a sad dog, is David, is he not?" cries the other jocosely; and then she bumps off again in her punt, bawling, as she floats down the stream, to her oppressed and silent boatman.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

I HAD my dearest folly from all eyes,
But most from his, my fondest, wisest friend.
The frailty I could love but not defend
I feared lest he should fathom and despise;
But when, one rarest hour, 'neath evening skies,
Our love her lamp to Confidence did lend,
Though wavering oft, and tremulous with his sighs,

Therewith he lit his whole heart to its end.
I smiled to see a dear and foolish thought Enshrined within his soul's most secret place.
"Fear not!" I cried, "to have thy folly shown;
No greater joy hath all thy wisdom wrought.
Now is thy love the measure of all grace,
Know, sweet my friend, thy folly is my own."

An Old Acquaintance.

TOURGÉE'S LITERARY VENTURE.—The latest of the novels of Albion W. Tourgée is announced by the publishers of this city. All his previous volumes have had large sales; but his venture in the periodical line has not yet been equally successful, if a New York advertising agent of THE CONTINENT is to be credited. He says $140,000 have thus far been sunk to make this high-toned and elegantly illustrated weekly a success.—Tribune.

There it is! About once a month, regardless of weather, the report starts in New York and goes up and down the country, that THE CONTINENT is a failure. This has been going on regularly now for something like a year and a half. Sometimes there seems to be a spice of malice about it, but as a rule it is kindly and sympathetic. At first, it was a little annoying, but after a time we learned to take it philosophically, and read these recurrent announcements of our impending demise with tolerable complacency—the more so as we found ourselves none the less lively afterward. This disregard of evil auguries oft-repeated, may perhaps be the result of a peculiar experience. During the recent war, the writer was for a time in Confederate hands, and while thus held was drawn by lot as a hostage for some poor fellow whose life was in danger at the hands of our authorities. During this time he was notified pretty regularly of the fate that the morrow would probably bring. The sensation at first was not agreeable, but after a time he got used to it, and hardly intermitted the game in hand to listen to Sergeant "Coonskin's" dolorous announcement. This may have been mere natural insensibility, but it certainly saved us a great deal of anxiety, which, after all, would, as the event proved, have been entirely wasted. We understand perfectly well that with journals, as with babies, it is the second year that is accounted perilous. At the middle of that year, however, we find THE CONTINENT cutting its eye-teeth with apparently as good a prospect of survival as its contemporaries of older growth. We cannot tell what ill-luck may be in store for us, but we advise our friends to wait for better authority than an "advertising agent," whose nose may have gotten out of plumb in some dealing with us, before ordering mourning in our behalf.

It is hardly surprising that the journalist of Gotham should regard any enterprise of the character of THE CONTINENT as destined to destruction unless founded on the Island of Manhattan. New York is unquestionably the artistic and intellectual heart of the country as well as its commercial centre, and the attempt to succeed outside of it very naturally smacks to the Gothamite of insubordination. Nothing illustrates the prevalence of this idea more strikingly than the fact that a considerable portion of our mail comes to us addressed to New York, and every week we have to arrange for the payment of money orders at that office. Indeed so close is our connection with the keen brains and skillful hands of the metropolis that we have found it advisable to open an office there and place in it an editorial representative of THE CONTINENT. Though it is more than probable that the present head of THE CONTINENT would not have selected Philadelphia as the point at which to locate a magazine of its character, yet he is free to confess that he has not found the disadvantages of location so insuperable as our New York contemporaries seem to consider it. The mail still runs to Philadelphia, and people can be found out of sight of the Schuylkill who have heard of such a city.

The Chances of a Twelvemonth.

WITHIN a year, according to that custom which has come to have the force of law, our great political parties will name the men who shall stand as their champions in the quadrennial struggle for the control of the national administration. For some months speculation has been languidly directed to the prospects of various individuals by fitful rumors in regard to their purposes and plans. At no time during the last fifty years, however, has public opinion been so wholly undetermined as to the probable result of conventions to be held within a twelvemonth as at the present. A few things have, however, become so evident that they may be safely counted as incidents of the coming struggle:

I. There will be but two candidates of any considerable following. The two great parties will be practically free from factional dissension and will stand fairly opposed to each other in thoroughly compacted array. There may be a Woman Suffrage candidate or a Temperance candidate, or a candidate designed simply as the formal protest of any other specific but impotent dogma, but there is no prospect of any third party of sufficient importance to endanger the choice of any Republican or Democratic elector. There will be no need of treaties or entangling alliances.

II. The prospects of success are sufficiently fair, and the chances of defeat sufficiently imminent to repress the aspirations of party leaders and subordinate all personal considerations to the collective advantage of each party. The adherents of each aspirant are likely to have their zeal so tempered by this fact as to be willing to submit gracefully to the verdict of the party in convention assembled. Hardly anything less than the most flagrant and undeniable fraud in the nomination could cause a "bolt" or a "split" in either party. There is no factional issue so vital as to afford an excuse such as Douglas had for his course in 1860, and there are few leaders who have either the personal following or the nerve to enable them to fly the black flag for the mere purpose of destroying the prospects of their party's choice as did Van Buren in 1848.

III. It will differ from all recent struggles in this: the nominee of neither party will be assured of success by the mere fact of his nomination and the hearty support of his entire party. Ever since 1860 there have really been but two questions requiring an answer in order to determine the result of a Presidential election:

First—Who will receive the Republican nomination?

Second—Will he receive the united support of his party?

These two queries once authoritatively answered, doubt as to the result was removed. There was hardly a question that this party, thoroughly compacted and ably led, would achieve victory. The fact that a great leader "sulked in his tent" imperiled the election of Hayes. Whether the adherents of Grant would heartily support Garfield was for a time the main element of doubt in the election of 1880. This time the struggle will not be for the nomination, but for victory afterwards.

IV. As the result of this, two things may be safely predicated :

- 1—The antecedent competition for the nomination will, in neither party, be marked with the acrimony which has recently characterized such contests. Very few adherents of any favorite will be found ready to declare their unalterable conviction that their man is the only one in all the party who either deserves the nomination or has a chance of success.
- 2—"Still hunts" will abound in an unusual degree. As the prospects of specific favorites grow less bright the hopes of the "dark horses" naturally increase. The greater the uncertainty in regard to the result, the more numerous the army of those who entertain a hope. The number of aspirants, each of whom will be counted by himself and friends a hopeful possibility, will probably be greater than in any Presidential convention ever held.

V. The questions upon which factional issues might arise are not such as are likely to be ignored in the preparation of the party platforms, or treated in a manner that will afford ground for formal dissension. Both parties will, no doubt, declare themselves in favor of civil service reform, and each will endeavor to frame a tariff plank on which those of the most diverse opinions may sit peacefully cheek by jowl. The Stalwarts and the Liberals will be hand-in-hand, and the Tammany lion will lie down with the Tilden lamb.

VI. The prestige of victory or defeat will not greatly assist or embarrass either party. The previous successes of the Republicans have been so nearly nullified by their reverses since the last Presidential election, that there is no danger of over-confidence upon their part, despite a quarter of a century of uninterrupted power. So, too, the effects of continuous disasters upon the Democratic party have been so thoroughly neutralized by unprecedented successes during the past two years as to leave no apprehension of defeat to paralyze its effort. Both parties are likely to come to the struggle with a just appreciation of the chances in their favor and the difficulties to be encountered, and, so far as can now be foreseen, the prospect is that the struggle will be one of the most hotly-contested and evenly-balanced in our political history.

VII. The probabilities daily grow stronger that the nominees of both parties will be selected from among their less prominent champions. For this there may be assigned two specific reasons :

- 1—The leading men of both parties are, to a greater extent than usually happens, men of mature age. A long term of uninterrupted power upon the one hand, and of continuous defeat on the other, naturally produces this result. It is only the whirligig of victory and defeat, the retirement of one party and the accession of its opponents, that kills off the fossils and makes way for new men and fresh blood in party organizations. The war of Rebellion brought to the front in the Republican party a host of men then in the prime of life ; their merits and services have continued them in position and prominence until the present. They are now growing old. The Democratic party, upon the other hand, having been out of power for so long a time has, until recently, absorbed but a small proportion of the young and aspiring elements of Northern life. The new men who have arisen in the political field have naturally drifted to the successful party despite the prospect of long service in subordinate positions.

Until very recently their successes, even of a local character, have been so rare and their tenure so apparently uncertain as not only to offer slight inducement to recruits, but to afford those who naturally joined their ranks on attaining majority but little chance for training or development. At the South the Democratic leaders are almost entirely men whom that struggle brought into prominence, and who are by that very fact excluded from the competition. It results, therefore, that the recognized leaders of the Democracy who would be eligible as candidates, are, in a sense, the survivors of a past epoch. They may almost be said to have arisen to their present eminence by seniority. They are deserving veterans, but are the survivors of a losing struggle. They represent traditions rather than living principles. They are the shadow of what was, rather than the incarnation of what is. In both parties, therefore, because of this peculiar coincidence of results, the occasion is very favorable to young aspirants, or (which is in effect the same thing), of men not heretofore prominent in national politics.

- 2—It is always of importance that the record of a nominee should be as nearly as possible unassailable. General harmony with party tradition is, of course, presumable of any one selected to be its standard-bearer. But the circumstances attending the application of party maxims vary so greatly that it is not unusual to find that men who have been at one time typical exponents of its principles from that very fact become at another very dangerous to select as leaders, because of too positive views upon questions yet considered orthodox by their party, but not absolutely essential in the peculiar form they once assumed. The present struggle is one especially demanding of the nominees of both parties a not too inflexible record. So far as their lives touch the old lines of conflict they must, of course, be in harmony with tradition, but the fewer and briefer the utterances of an aspirant on either side (granting him this sort of unimpeachable lineage, as it were), especially as regards the questions most recently attracting public attention, the better for his chances for the nomination.

VIII. Both parties will nominate men with a positive and creditable war record. Whatever may be said, and from whatever motives, about the time having arrived when the issues of the war should be laid aside and forgotten, the time has not arrived when a man can be elected President of the United States who did not wear a sword or carry a musket in the Federal army during the war of Rebellion. The South furnishes to the Democratic party seventy per cent of a majority in the Electoral College. This fact alone, even if that section makes no demand for representation on the ticket (as it is not unlikely to do, especially if the Speakership goes to a Northern aspirant next winter), will compel that party in this case, as heretofore, to seek to brace its record with a name which has an unmistakable odor of loyalty to the Union connected with it. The soldier vote, as it is termed, is perhaps not so necessary to be considered in connection with this matter as that of the sons of soldiers, who are now just coming to majority, and are especially jealous of the fame and prestige of their fathers. The Republican party, on the other hand, will not be at all likely to disregard the strength it may acquire by keeping prominently before the people the brightest page in its long record of power. Indeed there are but two or three men in that party on whom by any sort of chance the choice could fall, who has not a record of manful service in battles fought and won which he not only saw but of which he was a part, and the selection of either of these is made at least very problematical by considerations of an entirely different character. It is safe therefore to conclude that the next President, like the last three chosen to fill that office, and like nine out of the seventeen thus chosen, will be one who has known actual service in the army of the Union.

In our next we shall endeavor to apply the views that have been elucidated above to some of the probable aspirants for the leadership of their respective parties.

"Bossism" in Virginia.

A STRAIGHT-OUT Republican "Boss," Mr. Dezendorf, who finds his occupation gone by reason of the predominance of the coalition "Boss," General Mahone, has locked horns with the latter, and endeavored to secure the defeat of the coalition candidates, by accusing Mahone of having used his influence with the administration to secure a majority for the coalition ticket. The charges which he makes are shameful enough if true, but in the mouth of Mr. Dezendorf they become absolutely ludicrous. He has, perhaps, more reputation for a skillful use of such agencies himself than any other Republican in his state, and his Congressional career has nothing else of any moment or interest in it. From first to last he was a most industrious seeker for and farmer out of patronage. His indignation at the fact that Mahone had turned his own weapons against himself, and his lachrymose bewailing of the corruption of the public service, are just as real and worthy of just the same consideration as the woes of Punch and Judy. It is not the public service for which he is concerned, but the loaves and fishes wherewith he has himself been wont to solace his followers and thereby secure place for himself. He holds the same relation to the acts of which he complains as a conspirator to turn informer. The facts should be investigated, and if they are found to be true the guilty parties should be punished. Laws are made to be enforced, and he is a foolish man who does not recognize the fact that in a republic obedience to the law is the test of common sense, and the enforcement of law the surest pathway to improvement. At the same time, the man who seeks to pose as a reformer, even in Virginia, ought to have a little more semblance of consistency than Mr. Dezendorf can exhibit on this line.

THE partial success of Mr. Dezendorf in heading a Republican revolt against the coalitionists in Virginia may very possibly be of national importance in the election of next year. The only possibility of securing in that state an electoral vote opposed to the Democracy lay in the coalition. If the Republican party co-operates with the Mahone Democracy they have a fair prospect of defeating the regular Democracy, but neither can do it alone. Should the breach continue, therefore, Virginia must be taken out of the column of doubtful states in 1884, and marked as "certainly Democratic." This is doubtless Mr. Dezendorf's purpose. If he cannot rule and control the opposition to the Democracy in his state, he no doubt prefers to have it in the minority, in order that his chances to figure as a representative from his own district may be enhanced; or it is quite possible that he proposes by this show of power to compel a compromise with the coalition leader. Except for its relations to the general election of next year the present conflict in Virginia is unworthy of special attention. So far as "Bossism" is concerned, there is between General Mahone and Mr. Dezendorf only a choice between tainted fish. It is "Boss" Mahone versus "Boss" Dezendorf; but, so far as the national conflict is concerned, there is the difference of possible anti-Bourbon success as against certain straight-out Democratic victory.

EVER since its public opening, the four great cables of the bridge between New York and Brooklyn have borne without a tremor the passage of countless vehicles and the tread of countless feet. They take no more notice of the eight-horse team dragging, it may be, an iron safe or a huge steam-boiler than they do of the light-weight bicyclist, "who leaves but a shadow as he flies." The crowds on the ferry-boats are scarcely perceptibly diminished, though the statistics of a year may very probably show a material difference; but, be that as it may, the enormous aggregate of inter-municipal commerce is more apparent than ever. It is not generally known that Brooklyn is, in a large sense, New York's storehouse. Her water-front is lined with warehouses, her wharves are encumbered with goods and produce that is brought not because it is wanted there, but because New York is just at hand across the East River. The extra percentages paid out for lighterage, ferriage and transshipment would build a new bridge every year, so far as concerns the mere money outlay. This tide that crosses and recrosses along the lofty roadway heralds a new order of things. The warehouses are brought nearer to the exchanges and markets. New York is still the metropolis, but Brooklyn plays her part in the drama of municipal progress under more favorable conditions than ever before. Already the question is, "Where will the next bridge be?" rather than, "Will another one ever be built?" and nothing is more certain than that the close of the century will see the two cities united in some way far more closely than they are at present, even with the great bridge at its maximum of new-born popularity.

WE are glad to acknowledge numerous commendations of our monthly Reference Calendar, especially from teachers and students. The necessity for a convenient list of works bearing upon the various subjects to which current events are closely related has been apparent to every reader of our periodical literature. The value of a library is very greatly enhanced by having at hand a reference to the very subjects which our daily reading calls to mind. Mr. Charles Ledyard Norton, who has charge of this work, makes it of increased value with each number. The more it is studied and used by our readers the more highly it will be prized. Merely to know the facts of today is but a meagre part of knowledge. To learn their origin and study their growth is not less important. For this the library, public or private, is the ever ready instrumentality, and this calendar is simply designed to aid in its use.

IN adapting "John True's Decoration Day" to the requirements of an anniversary story, a few editorial changes were deemed expedient at a time when it was too late to consult the author, Miss Phelps. The date of the hero's death was changed from June to May. In so doing we made the author seem guilty of two anachronisms: By an accident of the proof-reader, June was retained in one place, and, owing to our ignorance, the hero was represented as dying in May in a hospital that was not opened for patients until a few days later. The fault was entirely our own, and the only consolation we have is in knowing that one was so apparent as to be an evident error of the types, and the other so unimportant as to hardly be noted by any one.

THE National Educational Assembly will meet at Ocean Grove, N. J., on the 9th of August and continue for four days. Its object is to promote action in favor of national education. United States Commissioner of Education Eaton, Senator Blair, and the editor of THE CONTINENT are among the invited speakers.

A LIBRARIAN of the Boston public library once said that he could always tell when a young person had been talked to on the subject of solid reading, because the immediate result was a list of books headed by "Rollins' Ancient History." He also added that another result was that the first volume of that history had been rebound many times, while the others were in perfect preservation. A convention of librarians, held in Boston in 1879, considered this point. It was agreed, without argument, that young people did not read the most strengthening literature; but there was a reason for this given in the statement that useful reading generally was not inviting. Boys and girls of average intelligence, it was said, could be made to take a real interest in the reading of the best books, if those books are entertaining and the way made easy. The discussion having come this far, the Rev. Edward Everett Hale, who never sees an evil without also seeing its remedy, being affected with what might be called a form of moral and intellectual double-sight, proposed that a series of books should be prepared which should give young people the "plums" in the standard volumes. He was at once met with approval, and a proposition that he should do the thing himself. It was not unparliamentary to make the mover of the resolution the chairman of the committee, and in this instance the suggestion was wise. The result has been that Mr. Hale has prepared four volumes of a series, the fourth of which, "Stories of Discovery," has found a warm welcome. It contains eleven chapters, each giving the story of an exploration. We have Columbus and Da Gama, Sir Francis Drake, Parry and Livingstone, Africa, the Northwest passage, the Antarctic Continent. To better carry out his proposition that standard works themselves were interesting, Mr. Hale has quoted from the originals as far as he could. Columbus tells his own story, and so does every other discoverer who could write as well as sail.

The question now is, Are the stories interesting to the average boy and girl? Mr. Hale has sugar-coated his plums by weaving into the chapters the opinions and doings of one of his bright little clubs, but in spite of all this there is a good deal that only a healthy appetite will fancy. The misfortune is that the children's appetite is cloyed by the unnumbered host of magazines, of newspapers and of story books. No child knows how to "dig," and not one in a hundred knows the healthful, stimulating exercise that comes from honest mental exertion in reading for pleasure. We teach the children arithmetic, we would like to teach them to draw, to use their muscles, to manipulate readily, to handle tools, to see what lies around them. The one thing we never teach them is to read with profit. That this talent does not come with years the librarian can answer, as for every one book of value he hands out forty of trash. The boy will read his "Robinson Crusoe" over and over, but his father and older sister want a "new" book, even if the only differences in the characters are in name. With years the appetite grows jaded, and has to have curry and red pepper in its mental food. If we are going to make readers in the proper sense we must begin young. And, after all, this is not difficult if, as Mr. Hale says, the way is made easy. In making this experiment there is no better book than these "Stories of Discovery." But it is not enough to give the book to the child. It will read it, like it, or, perhaps, find it dull, because it must be to an untrained mind surface work only. But let a family take the book for a winter's study. Let them have maps, and pictures, and arrow-heads, and specimens of all sorts, as they can collect them. They can read other books on the subjects, and, like Bedford, one of the members of Colonel Ing-ham's club, they can draw maps.

It will all take time and some trouble, but the girls and boys will like it. It will stir them to working methods, and prove to them that there is solid pleasure in solid work. It will also give the parent that too unusual consciousness of "lending a hand" in his own children's education and training.

SINCE the publication of the late Rev. J. R. Green's "Short History of the English People," in 1874, ninety thousand copies have been sold at the price originally fixed, $2.12½.

THE latest volumes in the beautiful Riverside edition of Hawthorne's works, published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., are the "American Note Books" and the "French and Italian Note Books."

MR. SWINBURNE'S new volume of "Roundels" contains no poem of marked importance, the chief one being a description of a swimming expedition in the Channel Islands with Mr. Theodore Watts.

"M. BENTZON," a brilliant French critic, has contributed an article to the Revue des Deux Mondes on Henry James, Jr., in which the statement is made that "of all the writers of his country, he is the one who least provokes to laughter. His strokes of humor are rare, and his sarcasm is somewhat sober."

"THE FREEDOM OF FAITH," by the Rev. T. T. Munger, just issued by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., has made already a profound impression. The author is pastor of the Congregational Church in North Adams, Mass. He is about forty-five years of age, and was called to his present position a few years ago, to succeed the Rev. Washington Gladden. He is known as a pronounced liberal in theology.

MR. RUSKIN'S lectures at Oxford for May were on "The Arts of England." The first was on "Mythical Schools (Burne Jones and G. F. Watts);" the second on "Classic Schools (Sir Frederick Leighton and Alma Tadema);" and the third on "Fairy Land (Mr. Allingham and Kate Greenaway)." Each lecture is repeated on the following Wednesday, and all are to be given a third time in London at some date not yet fixed.

A VERY carefully printed and handsome volume, "Historical and Biographical Sketches," by Samuel W. Pennypacker, comes from the press of Robert A. Tripple, Philadelphia, containing fifteen papers, most of which were prepared for the Pennsylvania Historical Society. The settlement of Germantown is treated at length, and those interested in the past of Pennsylvania will find here a mine of well-digested information. (8vo, pp. 416).

A VERY charming little volume of selections from the poets of the day has just been issued by Roberts Brothers, under the title of "Living English Poets, MDCCCLXXXIII." Large space had been given to Dante Gabriel Rossetti, whose death necessarily set it aside, but who had interested himself much in the collection. The younger poets find fullest place—Andrew Lang, Dobson, Robert Buchanan, and the many less known names; but Tennyson and Browning are also there, and the collection takes a place at once that nothing else has filled. (16mo, pp. 334, $2.00).

THE recent death of Wagner gives especial interest to a little book lately published by A. Williams & Co., of Boston, entitled "Richard Wagner and His Poetical Work, from Rienzi to Parsifal," by Judith Gautier; translated with the author's special permission, by L. S. J. The translation is of marked excellence, and the details, while not new, are all of deep interest. Madame Gautier is an enthusiast, and her idol can do no wrong. Even Wagner's habit in social life of constantly making very bad puns is ranked among his charming characteristics. Aside from this somewhat wearisome adulation, the study of his methods is of real value, and the estimate of his several works are, as a whole, not only thoroughly sympathetic, but just. A fine portrait is given as the frontispiece.

If travelers do not find desired points, it will not be the fault of the railroad companies, who vie with one another in providing beautifully made up guide-books, big and little, often as finely illustrated as a Christmas gift-book, with careful maps and minute instructions as to hotels and general expenses. Nothing prettier or more seductive has been done in this direction than the latest issues by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, "Cape May to Atlantic City: A Summer Note Book," and "A Paradise for Gunners and Anglers," the latter being a description of the Chesapeake and Delaware Peninsula. For tourists and sportsmen these volumes offer a wealth of attractions, and the information necessary to choose between them; while the company issuing them provides liberally for the traveler's comfort en route over its safe and expeditious highway.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Pull Mall Gazette writes: "I have just seen in the hands of a friend a volume whose history suggests an instructive comment on the practice of rewarding military services with hereditary distinctions. It was the presentation copy, given to the first Duke of Marlborough, of the congratulatory verses recited in the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford, on occasion of the victory of Blenheim. My friend had purchased it at the Sunderland sale. That an English noble in need of money should sell his books as being that part of his property which he least values is not surprising; but that a Duke of Marlborough should prefer twelve shillings—for that was the sum paid by my friend—to a volume so closely associated with the origin of his wealth and honors, argues a cynical indifference to the ordinary sentiments of mankind which will surprise even a pessimist."

A VERY thoughtful and well-considered little book is found in Dr. J. Leonard Corning's "Brain Rest," in which he discusses the morbid activity, which is a feature of nineteenth-century life, and which is so much the result of compelling circumstances that men are, in one sense, hardly responsible for the results that follow. "The hygiene of the muscles," he writes, "has received very considerable attention, and consequently has been well worked up; but the problem of the philosophical development and conservation of brain energy has as yet received but scant attention;" and he then proceeds to give the results of very thorough observation and experiment, devoting the greater portion of the treatise to "those morbid conditions which lie at the root of sleeplessness, and its accompaniment, brain exhaustion." His chapter on "The Mechanical Regulation of the Cerebral Circulation" is of especial interest. (Square 16mo, pp. 103, 50 cents; G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York).

THE Rev. Minot J. Savage has already made himself honorable place among more advanced thinkers, his work being so heartily in earnest that those who disagree the most strongly with his conclusions must still respect the strength of his convictions and the manliness of their putting. "The Modern Sphinx and Some of Her Riddles" takes up the problem of life as we find it to-day, and seeks an answer to some of its most perplexing phases. With a sympathetic sense of all the difficulties that hedge us in, Mr. Savage attacks each side in turn, and gives answers so filled with sound common sense that his hearers must have blessed him, and his readers certainly will. Ten sermons make up the volume, "What are Brains For?" being one of the most suggestive, though all deserve place in the collection, which, as the author modestly writes, is not "a bid for a permanent place in literature," but merely the calling of "the power of the printing-press to his aid, in his endeavors to address as large a cotemporary audience as possible." (12mo, pp. 160, $1.00; George H. Ellis & Co., Boston).

Two surprising facts associate themselves with the English second-rate novel; the first, its even excellence of detail and execution; the second, that anything so good should not be better. The American writer who could do as much would do far more, and a gleam of something like genius would remove the pages once for all from the mediocrity stamped upon them. "A Chelsea Householder" is a study in grays, the warmest tint admitted being a hint of russet brown. There is careful drawing, excellent perspective, the figures are all alive, but drab prevails, and a certain resentment is experienced by the reader who desires stronger coloring. Nothing could be better than the portrait of Miss Elizabeth Prettyman, the gentle, discreet, subdued little copier of miniatures, the devoted friend of Muriel Ellis, the heroine, whose complicated relationships to many varieties of people give opportunity for much excellent description and characterization. Poverty of a genteel and bearable sort is Muriel's early experience, through which she is befriended by the Prettymans, till a series of deaths on the well-connected side of the house put her in possession of a comfortable fortune. As an enthusiastic art student she has already done good work. The fortune does not turn her head. On the contrary, she makes every one as comfortable as possible, and then goes on studying, though sorely tormented by a sister-in-law of a managing turn of mind, who descends upon her and takes and keeps possession of the best the house affords. Miss Prettyman and Muriel go to the New Forest to make studies for pictures, and here the hero, Stephen Halliday, is encountered. How he refuses to recognize himself as in love, how other lovers come and go and more or less distract Muriel and everybody else, and how the course of true love at last runs smoothly—is it not all set down in the quiet and pleasant pages that will beguile any one into reading who has once opened them? SEVERAL of the royal mummies discovered last year at Dayr-el-Baharee were, it will be remembered, found garlanded with flowers; these flowers being, for the most part, in as perfect preservation as the specimen plants in a Hortus siccus. M. Authur Rhoné, in a recent letter to Le Temps, has described the extremely curious way in which these garlands are woven. They consist of the sepals and petals of various flowers detached from their stems, and enclosed each in a folded leaf of the Egyptian willow. The floral ornaments thus oddly devised were then arranged in rows (the points being all set one way), and connected by means of a thread of date-leaf fibre, woven in a kind of chain-stitch. The whole resembles a coarse "edging" of vegetable lace-work. Among the flowers thus preserved are Delphinium orientalis (a species of larkspur), Nymphaea cærulea (pond lily), Sesbania Ægyptæa (belonging to Leguminosæ), and Carthamus tinctorius, so largely employed as a dye by the ancient inhabitants of the Nile valley. The dried fruit as well as the dried, yellow blossom of the Acacia Nilotica is likewise present, and mention is also made of the blossom of a species of watermelon now extinct. The foregoing are all interwoven in the garlands in which the mummy of Amenoph First was elaborately swathed. With others of the royal mummies were found fine, detached specimens of both kinds of lotus, the blue and the white, with stems, blossoms and seed-pods complete. Still more interesting is it to learn that upon the mummy of the priest Nebsooni, maternal grandfather of King Pinotem Second (twenty-first dynasty), there was found a specimen of the lichen known to botanists as Parmelia forforacea. This plant is indigenous to the islands of the Greek Archipelago, whence it must have been brought to Egypt at or before the period of the Her-Hor dynasty (B. C. 1100 or B. C. 1200). Under the Arabic name of "Kheba," it is sold by the native druggists of Cairo to this day. These frail relics of many a vanished spring have been arranged for the Boolak Museum with exquisite skill by that eminent traveler and botanist, Dr. Schweinfurth. Classified, mounted, and, so to say, illustrated by modern examples of the same flowers and plants, they fill eleven cases—a collection absolutely unique, and likely ever to remain so. The hues of these Old World flowers are said to be as brilliant as those of their modern prototypes; and but for the labels which show them to be three thousand years apart, no ordinary observer could distinguish between those which were buried with the Pharaohs of thirty centuries ago and those which were gathered and dried only a few months since.

If the "ball" or cushion-like surface of the top joint of the thumb be examined, it can be seen that in the centre—as, indeed, in the fingers also—is a kind of spiral, formed of fine grooves in the skin. The spiral is, however, rarely, if ever, quite perfect. There are irregularities, or places where lines run into each other here and there. Examining both thumbs, it will be seen that they do not exactly match; but the figure on each thumb is the same through life. If the thumbs of any two persons are compared, it will farther be found that no two are alike. There may be, and generally is, a "family resemblance" between members of the same family, as in other features; there are also national characteristics; but the individuals differ. All this is better seen by taking "proof impressions" of the thumb. This is easily done by pressing it on a slab covered with a film of printer's ink and then pressing it on a piece of white paper; or a little aniline dye, India ink—almost anything—may be used. The Chinese take advantage of all this to identify their important criminals, at least in some parts of the empire. We photograph their faces—they take impressions from their thumbs. These are stored away, and if the delinquent should ever again fall into the hands of the police, another impression at once affords the means of comparison. The Chinese say that, considering the alterations made in the countenance by hair and beard, and the power many men have of distorting or altering the facial expression, etc., their method affords even more certain and easy means of identification than our plan of taking the criminal's photograph. Perhaps we might with advantage follow their example.

Two species of india rubber-yielding trees have recently been discovered in British Guinea of a character which insures their future profit to the colony. One is nearly allied to the Para rubber tree, and is known to the aborigines of the country by the name of Hatie, its botanical name being Hebea spuiceana. It is about sixty feet high, with a trunk diameter of twenty inches, and is found on the alluvial, oft-flooded land of the creeks and banks of the lower parts of the rivers, where in places it is abundant. The second is not scientifically known as yet, as flowering specimens of it have not been obtained. It is one of the largest trees of a forest flora peculiarly rich in large types. The trunk is four or five feet in diameter, and runs up straight sixty or seventy feet unbranched, above which the head extends many feet more. On its discovery recently a few branches only could be obtained by shooting them off with large shot. The bark is thick and wonderfully rich in milk of excellent quality, and the elasticity and tenacity of the rubber seems to be unsurpassed. It is scattered in individual trees over a wide area of the colony. The products of the trees have not been put in the market yet, collectors apparently being unacquainted with them. Samples, however, have been sent to England to be valued. The discovery of these trees was made by Mr. G. S. Jemman, government botanist, during an exploration which he lately made in British Guinea.

LAC, the substance from which shellac is made, is an excretion of an insect found in India. In most of the cyclopedias this substance is described as an exudation of certain trees, caused by the punctures of the lac insect. But it has been demonstrated that instead of exuding directly from the trees, lac is formed within the body of the insect and excreted through organs highly specialized for that purpose. Only one insect has been known to produce this substance, and that is an Asiatic species. But Professor J. Henry Comstock, in his report for 1881, describes two new species of lac insects, both of which are American. One of them was found on a mimosa at Tampico, Mexico. The other occurs on the creosote plant, a shrub growing very abundantly in certain regions in the southwestern portion of the United States and in Mexico. The amount of lac excreted by each of these insects is much less than that excreted by the Asiatic species. Their discovery, therefore, has at present more scientific interest than practical importance. But if in any way our supply of lac from India should be cut off the Arizona lac would become of commercial importance, it being sufficiently abundant to be easily collected and utilized.

The Bicycle.

WHISKING through the woodlands,
Flashing over bridges ;
Darting past the orchards,
Coasting down the ridges ;
Whirling o'er the meadows,
Glint of polished steel,
Bless me, this is pleasant,
Riding on a wheel !

With a rubber tire,
Tireless I ride ;
Passing men and horses,
Silently I glide ;
Pretty, pretty maidens
Watch me as I pass,
Wave their kerchiefs to me,
Sitting on the grass.

III. Realization (He gets it).

Rustics in the furrow
Stop the plow to stare
At the flying figure
Silent as the air.
Timid village ladies
Anxiously observe
That there must be danger
Going round the curve.

Every one is looking
At my silent flight ;
Hardly do they see me,
Ere I'm out of sight,
Down the hilly roadway
With a bugle peal.
Bless me, this is pleasant
Riding on a wheel !

AMONG THE ISLANDS.

DREAMING we sailed one summer's day,
A day so long ago,
Dreaming as only idlers may
In summer noontide's glow,
Dreaming as only light hearts can
Before the weight of years
Has fettered mirth with cruel ban
And freighted life with tears.

Sailing 'mid islands green and fair
On broad St. Lawrence tide,
Where worldly thought and worldly care
All entrance are denied—
Nothing but nature still and sweet,
Nature beyond compare,
The shining water 'neath our feet,
Around, the summer air.

White clouds move slowly o'er the blue,
 White shadows lie below ;
 They stir not at our gliding through,
 So lazily we go.
 The fisher's craft with sails unfurled
 Drift with us down the tide,
 While ships from out the busy world
 Far in the offing ride.

The isles are green, so richly green
 With leaf of birch and pine,
 The lordly oak and forest queen
 Their graceful limbs entwine.
 The slender catkins, brown and tall,
 Nod us a welcome near ;
 No sound save gurgling ripples fall
 Upon the tranced ear.

The fisher's hut beside the shore
 Seems sleeping with the tide ;
 No shadows through the open door
 Across the threshold glide.
 With dreamy drift we slowly steal,
 Heedless of passing time ;
 We hear the ripples on our keel,
 Singing their low sweet rhyme.

That low sweet music echoes yet,
 Those islands green and fair,
 That summer day we ne'er forget,
 Its balmy, blissful air.
 Relentless time has swept us down
 Life's ocean broad and deep,
 But later fortune's smile or frown
 Ne'er bids that memory sleep.

CHAPTER I.

ALL the chimneys of the Summerfield homestead were built on the outside of the house. In a nook formed by the meeting of the outer wall with the parlor chimney, I sat on a certain August afternoon. The turf was soft under my feet ; a lush trumpet-creeper ran all over the bricks and thrust tough fingers under the clapboards. I nestled among the leaves and orange-red flowers like an exaggerated June-bug. My frock was dark-blue calico, sprinkled with white dots. A sleeveless, high-necked apron left my arms bare. White home-knit stockings and stout shoes made by the plantation shoemaker covered my nether extremities.

The "New York Reader" lay on my lap. It was a volume with stiff sides. The valuable text-book was bound between covers of coarse straw pasteboard. From the blue paper covering these yellow splinters protruded at broken corners and abraded edges. I picked at one mechanically while reading of a boy who had, in defiance of his mother's warning never to taste strange flowers or grasses, made a light lunch upon a "pretty plant with a small white flower."

The catastrophe never lost its charm for me. I recognized for the fortieth time the coming of the creeping horror in reading how, "when his mother came to him, she was surprised to see that his mouth was dirty." At this point, I became aware that my Aunt Betsey was telling a story.

The back porch ran the whole length of the main building and one wing, and was the family sitting-room all summer long. White jessamine and multiflora roses curtained it, drooping low and thick at the end nearest what I had named "my chimney-place."

My Aunt Betsey was the widow of a Presbyterian clergyman, who had died in less than a year after their marriage. The sad event had occurred thirty years prior to the date of my story, but she still wore mourning weeds in obedience to the custom of the day and the inclination of such simple, loving souls. Even young matrons sported caps then. That framing Aunt Betsey's face had a veritable crown, standing up stiff and high, and a border of quilled "footing." Her brown hair, interlined with silver, lay in smooth bands above her forehead. Her eyes were gray, mild and contemplative, and, when she conversed, looked at her auditor over her spectacles. She was knitting a lamb's-wool stocking, reeling off the sentences as evenly and naturally as she drew the yarn from the fleecy ball in her lap. She sat in a splint-bottomed, straight-backed chair, cushioned with gay chintz. Her sister and my grandmother, Mrs. Judith Read, the widowed mistress of Summerfield, sat in one exactly like it, and knitted a lamb's-wool sock for one of her sons. Neither touched the back of her chair while she worked.

I could never decide whether my grandmother reminded me more of a queen or of a saint. Her portrait, taken at sixty, is that of a stately gentlewoman, with black eyes, clear brunette complexion and high-bred, placid features. The deep black of her gown is relieved by a crimped lawn ruffle running around the neck and down to the belt in front. Her mob-cap is of sheer muslin, set above dark hair and tied under her chin with black "love" ribbons. At her throat is a red rose. She used to explain, in smiling apology for the decoration, that her youngest boy had pinned it there, and begged that it should appear in the picture. I had been too strictly trained in such matters to quote hymns on secular occasions ; therefore, I never said aloud the line that forced itself into my mind at family worship and during the long sermons at Mounts Tabor and Hermon, when I fell into affectionate studies of my grandmother's face :

"Majestic sweetness sits enthroned."

Her near ancestors came of noble Huguenot stock. She had their bright eyes and radiant smile, chastened by sanctified sorrow into infinite gentleness. I never saw her angry, or heard a fretful syllable from her lips ; yet she had buried the husband of her youth when the eldest of six children was but fourteen years old, and succeeded to the ownership of a fearfully-encumbered estate. Under her administration the debts had been paid and the plantation judiciously worked until her eldest son was qualified to take charge of it.

The porch steps were five oaken beams, eight inches thick, set in an easy slope from floor to ground, polished at the edges, and hollowed in the middle by the feet of five generations of Reads. An arch of trellis-work, thatched with vines, formed a pent-house over the porch entrance. On the top step sat two girls, my Aunt Maria and Miss Virginia Dabney, a city visitor. Below them were seated my Uncle Archie, Mr. Bradley, the Summerfield tutor, and my youngest uncle, Wythe Read, a lad of fifteen. Aunt Betsey was the family story-teller—the licensed and honored receptacle of genealogies and traditions. Her auditors were now, as always, respectful and interested.

In this, our day, when every scrap of local and general intelligence is seized upon by professional scribes, held up to the light, shaken thoroughly and scraped into lint for application to the ever-fevered sore of public curiosity, the rôle of the oral raconteur is so unimportant that it is going out of fashion.

"Tell ye your children of it, and let your children hot and close, and while we talked Jo pointed out a cloud rising in the west. It was black—a sort of blue-black—and topped with white as it swelled up toward the moon. Jo said it reminded him of a gray-headed negro, and I laughed, although I was always timid in a thunder-storm. The shape was like that of an enormous man pulling himself up to his full height very slowly. When the big, broad shoulders and one arm came in sight Jo called to the others to look at it. They came, one after another, until nearly all the company was gathered about the gate, and two or three went out into the middle of the street to get a better view. The breeze had died down completely, and the sound of the falls in the river was very distinct, as it always is just before a storm. Jo said we might imagine that it was the roar of the giant advancing upon us.

"Oh, don't!" said I. "I am afraid that is a tempting of Providence."

"I can see his teeth and the white of his eyes,"

"AUNT BETSEY WAS TELLING A STORY."

tell their children, and their children another generation." is a process the simplicity of which moves us to smiles. Yet what a barren flat would be our record of happenings not yet fifty years old but for the elderly women who loved to relate unwritten reminiscences, and the young people who loved to listen on the door-steps and about the hearthstones of our homesteads when newspapers were few and popular histories unknown?

"I was in Richmond at the time of Gabriel's insurrection," the dear woman was saying when I lifted my head and hitched my cricket nearer to listen, "on a visit to Cousin Sarah Blair. There was a party at her house that night, and after supper we went out into the garden. I was sitting on a bench in a honeysuckle arbor (Cousin Sarah's flowers and fruit were famous) with Jo Pleasants. He married Lizzy Blair the year afterward. She (Lizzy) was singing 'Robin Adair' in the parlor. The windows were all open, and we could hear every word. I never hear that song to this day without a queer, creepy feeling up my back and a faintness about my heart; and the smell of honeysuckles on a warm night makes me positively sick. It was very called back one of the young men who had gone into the street.

"It did really seem as if we could. The mighty shape rose higher and higher, and broader, and the arm was raised over the head, one forefinger, yards long, pointing right at Richmond. Then this finger changed into something like a pitchfork or trident.

"It's the Old Harry himself!" said the same young man, but his laugh wasn't very natural.

"Lizzy had left the piano and ran down the steps toward us, still singing:

"What, when the ball was o'er,
What made my heart so sore?"

"When she saw the cloud she seized my arm with a little cry:

"What is it? Oh, what does it mean?"

"She shook like an aspen leaf, and Jo and I were trying to quiet her when we heard far off the beat of a horse's hoofs dashing along at full speed.

"There he comes, Miss Lizzy!" said somebody, thinking to amuse her and turn her attention.

"She gave one shriek and went off into hysterics."

"THE NEGROES ARE RISING ALL OVER THE COUNTRY!"

She was a delicate, nervous little thing, with no constitution at all. She died young, and no wonder! One ran for water and another for hartshorn, and half a dozen rushed up with fans. In the confusion we forgot the horse. I jumped as if I had been shot, when a hoarse voice said in my ear:

"'You've heard it already, then?'"

"A man had ridden up to the garden fence and leaned over toward us. He talked strangely, panting between each syllable loud enough for us all to hear him.

"'Why, Colonel Prosser!' cried Jo Pleasants, 'what is the matter?'"

"Lizzy stopped sobbing, and we stared at him, frightened already by his face and manner. He was deadly pale, and his eyes glared wildly.

"'Get the ladies in-doors directly!' he panted in the same odd way. 'Some of you fellows run to the armory. I've sent my body-servant there ahead of me. Some hurry down to the Capitol and have the barracks bell rung. The negroes are rising all over the county. I left hundreds of them on my plantation. They shot at me as I leaped the garden fence. I met squads of them—all armed—on the road. They are marching on the city. There is not a minute to be lost.'

"Scared as I was, I thought of Job's servants, with their—'I alone am escaped to tell thee.'

"While he was speaking the cloud swallowed up the moon at one gulp, as it seemed, and it grew so dark in an instant that we had to grope our way to the house. Cousin Sarah's two grown sons, Walter and Hugh, offered to stay at home to guard us, but she wouldn't hear of it. Tom was fourteen, John twelve, and she said they were able to fire through a window should the house be attacked. There were four guns on the premises, besides the sword and pistols Colonel Blair, her husband, had used in the Revolutionary war. She could pull a trigger as well as a man. Hugh and Walter must be off to the Blues' muster-room and help defend the town. Hugh was a lieutenant in the Richmond Blues, and Walter a private. When the men were gone she called us girls into the parlor and shut the door.

"'Look here, Elizabeth Scott Blair!' says she—cool and sharp like a mustard-plaster—'Go to that piano and begin to sing—directly!'"

"I could hardly believe my eyes when I saw that girl cross the room, sit down on the music-stool and run her fingers over the keys. I suppose that, her wits being clean gone for the time, her mother's will just took hold of her—possessed her—and she could do nothing but mind her. Anyhow she began to sing the very song at which she had left off playing not ten minutes before:

"'What's this dull town to me?

Robin's not here!

What's here I wish to see?

Robin Adair!"

"Cousin Sarah was gone from the room for maybe three minutes, and returned, with the boys and the guns, as Lizzy finished the last verse.

"'Now—the Battle of Prague!' she ordered—'and as loud as you can make it!'"

"She gathered the rest of us—ten in all—into a corner and set us to work cleaning and loading the guns, and filling powder-flasks and shot-pouches. I think what made me most calm was her sending me up-stairs for check aprons to keep our frocks clean. The sight and feel of the everyday working-clothes steadied me, and helped me to think. I saw, in coming down the stairs, Uncle Solomon, the butler, and three colored women in the dining-room washing up and putting away the supper things, laughing and talking, and too busy to notice me. Somehow, that brought the danger and horror to me as I had not seen them before. These were our enemies—the foes in our own household—the people who had carried us, when we were babes, in their arms and our fathers' and mothers' coffins to the grave! the people almost as dear to us as our very nearest kinsfolk!

"MASTER AND MAN DASHED STRAIGHT ACROSS THE YARD."

"Cousin Sarah treated me to a hard look when she took the aprons from me.

"This is no time for fooling, nor for thinking," she said, and gave me a bunch of greasy cotton with a pistol and a thick wire. "Clean out the barrel with that, and then I'll load it. As long as that piano is going, the servants can't hear the alarm-bell. If they get a notion that there's a fire down town the fools will be off to see it, and leave their work until they come back. I want to get them out the house as soon as possible. Besides, they mustn't suspect that we have heard anything unusual. If there is a conspiracy between the country and the town negroes, those here will wait for the others to come, unless they find out that the plot is known. An hour's time is worth a great deal to us just now."

"The Battle of Prague must have drowned the first thunder rolls, for we heard nothing of the storm until a tremendous clap burst right overhead, and the room was filled with blue fire. The girls screamed, and poor Lizzy dropped to the floor in a dead faint. We thought at first that she was struck. If she had been I doubt if her mother would have acted differently from what she did. She helped lay Lizzy on one sofa, huddled all the firearms, the sword and ammunition under another, and poked the check aprons after them, before she called Marthy, Lizzy's maid, to bring water and the camphor-bottle. Marthy had not known till then that the gentlemen had gone. Maybe I did her injustice, being excited, but I thought there was something queer in her smile when she looked around as Lizzy came to.

"Law, young ladies!" she said pertly, "is Miss 'Lizabeth done scare all the beaux away by faintin'?"

"Another crash of thunder saved us the trouble of a reply.

"The young ladies will stay here until the shower is over," said Cousin Sarah. "The gentlemen had no umbrellas. Hurry, all of you, to shut up the house, or you won't be able to get to the kitchen for the rain."

"In ten minutes we had the house to ourselves. As Marthy ran across the yard to her room we heard her scream at the blaze that wrapped heavens and earth in a sheet of flame. Cousin Sarah made Patsey Dabney—your father's oldest sister, Virginia—and me help her fasten doors and windows. We shut and bolted the solid blinds on the first floor, put bars across front and back doors, then followed our commanding officer up to Lizzy's room. It was a big, square one, with windows on three sides. The shutters of those at the back were closed. We brought in beds, bolsters and pillows to put up against the others that faced the streets in front and at the end of the house. We were to block these up at the word of command, leaving loop-holes for firing. Tom was put in charge of one gun, John of another; Deborah Chapman volunteered for a third, Janey Mosby for a fourth. Cousin Sarah had on a great, big pocket, and her pistols in it. Elvira Burton took the sword, and we divided up a box of table-knives among us.

"All this time the thunder was splitting and rolling and rattling above the house, and the white and blue streams of lightning almost blinding us. When everything was done that we could think of, Cousin Sarah made us all sit down on the feather-beds in the middle of the floor. That was the hardest thing of all!—the sitting there, waiting and listening and dreading, hearing nothing from hour to hour but the thunder-claps, and, when these were not so loud (they never ceased!), the rain pouring down in floods—waiting to be killed by bullet or knife, or maybe burned alive in the locked-up house, for we knew that Cousin Sarah would never turn a key or bolt to let us out if the roof were fired above our heads. She meant resistance unto death from the moment she set Lizzy down to the piano. We put out the lights, not to call attention to the building; but we were not in the dark for a second. About twelve o'clock we began to whisper among ourselves that they must be here very soon now. The storm was passing, the thunder fainter, and the lightning less bright. We caught by snatches, between the heavy dashes of rain on the roof and windows, the fast irregular ringing of the alarm-bells—told one another this must mean that the town was attacked at some point.

"Cousin Sarah got up and went out of the room. Presently she called to us from the garret:

"Come up here, girls!—very quietly!"

"She was in the cupola. From there we had a view of the armory. The windows were all flashing with light, and torches were moving in the yard and streets surrounding it. There were other specks of light far down town, and here and there lighted windows nearer to us. But overhead and close about us was the very blackness of darkness that might be felt—an awful sort of smothering gloom, as if we were in the heart of the cloud. For the first time in two hours, I remembered the strange shape we had seen in the heavens, and said to myself that it was certainly a sign and a warning of what was to befall us. While we stood there the blackness opened suddenly, and a cataract of lightning—I can't call it anything else—fell right down upon us. I saw the face of every person in the cupola as plainly as I do yours now. The thunder burst out with it, crashing and booming again and again, as if it would never stop.

"Cousin Sarah had to raise her voice to be heard:

"We must go down—another cloud is rising!"

"She spoke again, as we huddled together, shivering and shaking, on the pile of feather-beds:

"We are in God's hands. Let us fall into them rather than into the hands of bloody and deceitful men!"

"By-and-by we heard her say:

"The voice of the Lord divideth the flames of fire. Therefore will we not fear though the earth be removed."

"But for her we would have gone stark mad that night. Anything like the horribleness of that second storm I hope never to see again. It was like the terrors of the Judgment day. The heavens were rolled together like a scroll; the earth seemed to be on fire. The thunder was never quite still for five hours. By the time it ceased to mutter in the east it roared out again in the west, and the lightnings chased and overtook one another in mid-heaven. The rain was a deluge.

"This will make a 'fresh' in the river," Cousin Sarah said once.

"What difference will that make to us?" answered one of the girls—Abigail Burton by name.

"Even then Cousin Sarah didn't let the speech pass.

"Don't let me hear any more such talk as that!"

she said, as quick as a flash. "Is the Lord's arm shortened that it cannot save?"

"Poor little John had dropped asleep, his head on his mother's lap. By a gleam of lightning I saw her, after a while, stoop over him and kiss him two or three times on his mouth. Then she eased his head down on the pillows and walked to a window. We knew in a second that she had heard something. One by one we stole after her to the front windows and looked out, those who were nearest the wall kneeling down, that the others might see over their heads. We all heard it, though nobody spoke or moved—when the thunder-peals were furthest off—the 'splash! splash!' of men's and horses' feet and the crowding together of many people. 'Hundreds of them!' I fancied I could hear Colonel Prosser repeat the words. And we a handful of weak women and two little boys! The alarm-bells had stopped ringing long ago. Perhaps the white people had given up all idea of saving the city. How was it possible to do it when in every house there were traitors, and a countless horde of murderers marching upon us in the dead of night?"

"Cousin Sarah's voice went through and through me, although she spoke low:

"'They are going out of town—not coming in!'"

"We all seemed to think together that night. In comparing notes afterward every girl said her first thought was at that instant that the town negroes had seized the armory, killed the guard, armed themselves and were now on their way to meet Gabriel's army. A downpour of lightning lit up everything outside—the flooded street, the still houses and trees and fences, and right in front of us, a mounted company of white men! Military cloaks and blankets protected their arms from the rain, but as they broke into a slow trot we heard the clink of spurs and sabres.

"'The Blues!' said Cousin Sarah in a shrill, strangled whisper. 'I see my boys!'"

"We leaned far out of the window to shake our handkerchiefs to them. Another flash showed us twenty faces turned up toward us, but not a sound was uttered by them or by us.

"'Have they left anybody to guard the town?' whispered Lizzy, as the last of the long line disappeared.

"'The Lord of Hosts!' said Cousin Sarah, in a clear, solemn voice.

"She stood up in the middle of the room, raised both hands like she was in church.

"'Let us pray!' said she; and we all fell on our knees around her. What a prayer she made for the brave men who had gone out to meet the enemy, and for ourselves, our families, our homes, our churches, our beloved Richmond! At last she prayed for the poor, deluded creatures who had followed the lead of wicked men, and been taught to thirst for the blood of their best friends.

"At that she gave way for the first time, and we all burst out crying. For some minutes nothing was heard but weeping and sobbing. Then Cousin Sarah got back voice enough to say:

"'Father, forgive them! they know not what they do!'"

"We said, 'Amen! Amen!' We could not be fierce and angry any longer, and our hearts were stayed by hope as well as by prayer; but none of us, except the boys, slept a wink that night. Seven distinct thunder-clouds arose one after another between ten o'clock and four, and were emptied upon the earth; but the awful figure we had seen flying toward us was the angel of deliverance, not of destruction.

"The rising was on Colonel Prosser's plantation, Brook Hill, about six miles from Richmond. His family was away from home, and he was known to be an easy master, who wouldn't be apt to notice unusual movements about the place. The plan was to kill him when they were all assembled, ransack his house for weapons and ammunition (he was a colonel of militia in Henrico County), and to take his horses. His body-servant slipped out of the tobacco-barn, where they were talking it over, ran to the stable and saddled two of the best hunters. Then he went to his master's room, told him what was going on, and to ride for his life. The two were hardly mounted when some of the gang caught sight of them and gave the alarm. Master and man dashed straight across the yard and put their horses at the garden fence. Five or six shots were fired at them before they cleared the two fences between them and the public road. Colonel Prosser could never allude to his escape without shuddering. He said the negroes rushed at him from all directions, and that their yells were like a pack of wolves.

"Michael," in the same soft, even tones that had borne the story thus far, "bring that water this way, won't you?"

A bare-footed negro boy, dressed in yellow homespun, had brought a cedar-wood pail, bound with bright brass hoops, up the steps at the far end of the porch, and was in the act of setting it on a triangular shelf supported by the railings. He swung it back to his head from which he had just let it down, and obeyed the order he had received. Uncle Archie arose from the steps as the lad dexterously lowered his burden, dipped the white gourd bobbing about on the surface into the water, and handed it to his aunt, his hand held beneath to catch the drops shed by the glistening sides.

"Aunt Betsey always grows thirsty at the most interesting part of her story," laughed Aunt Maria. "I don't mind it so much this time, because I know the rest. But it is cruel to those of you who don't."

"Like 'To be continued' in a magazine serial," replied Mr. Bradley.

His speech was very unlike that of the others, more precise in articulation and unrhythmical in inflection. He pronounced i like eye in such words as "like" and "right," and sometimes u like oo.

"Mrs. Waddell plays with us as a cat with a mouse, or an angler with a fish," he continued. "It is a professional trick, meant to whet our appetites for the rest. A successful one in this case."

"Michael!"—Grandma checked him by saying as he passed her—"don't put a drinking-water pail on your head. It is not considered proper. You will learn all these little things after awhile. He has only been up from the Quarter for a few days," she mentioned apologetic of the mistake to Virginia Dabney, when the boy was out of hearing. "He comes of excellent parents, and will do well as a house-servant under Jerry's training. He is Rose's child—one of the twins, you know."

"Isn't the name of the other Gabriel?" asked the young lady, with pretty abruptness.

Uncle Archie smiled down at her from his stand against a porch pillar.

"You remember that, do you? Yes; the mother called them, of her own accord, after the archangels—Gabriel and Michael. You don't admire her taste, it would seem."

"I have nothing against Michael. I don't remember his brother. But I shall hate him at sight, on account of his name. If I were Mrs. Read he should change it or leave the plantation."

A MISSISSIPPI MARTYR.

BY J. H. WALWORTH.

XIV.—MRS. DICKISON MAKES A BARGAIN AND A DISCOVERY.

"WELL, I never!"

The emphasis Mrs. Dickison threw into this fraction of a sentence rendered it complete with indignant surprise. Mr. Dickison had not been familiar with his wife's ejaculatory style for over thirty years to be thrown off his balance by it now, so he simply asked:

"What now, Maria?"

"Mr. Dickison, this town is going to be the ruin of us, morally and financially!"

"I hope not, Maria. You feel morally rickety yourself, dear!"

"From Lewis up," 'dear' continued, too irate for any outside controversy.

"Oh, Lewis is a chronic complaint—you relieve me."

"I don't suppose Lewis is naturally any worse than other boys of his age," says his mother, rallying to the defense, "only this wicked town offers so many inducements to display the evil that's in one. I really begin to think I never did know my own children, nor my husband either, for that matter, before I left the dear, old, peaceful plantation, where it's a pity we hadn't all stayed, and been drowned, if need be. You know, Mr. Dickison, I never was in favor of this move. What's a little muddy water and a few gnat-bites to the wickedness and the cold-blooded selfishness that gets into folks as soon as they get huddled together in these pens of bricks and mortar? It's a regular scuffle for elbow-room that I never thought to see in one of my family. But I always told you so!"

"Wife, you bewilder me! Is it elbow-room or scuffling that you never expected to see in our family?"

"Oh, I expected to be made fun of! I never look for any sympathy or aid from you, Mr. Dickison."

"Easy, Maria! I'm just trying to untangle things, you know, so as to be able to place my sympathy judiciously and offer my aid intelligibly. Shall I wallop Lewis for you? As for the 'cold-blooded selfishness' you're growing so venomous over, it's my impression there's a good deal of human nature in folks everywhere, and what's in 'em is going to come out of 'em, according to opportunity and circumstances. I wouldn't give much for that virtue that couldn't stand a little friction. I never had much of an opinion of the man who first said that 'virtue was simply the absence of temptation.' I always thought he must have been a moral weakling himself."

"That sounds so wise that it ought to mean something," says Mrs. Dickison with asperity. "I suppose, then, it was in Lewis to turn rogue, so it had to come out of him, according to opportunity and circumstances."

"Rogue! Maria, that's a hard word; almost too hard to fling at Lewis, even; though I will say that boy's capacity for getting into trouble surpasses anything in my experience of boys. What's he up to now?"

"Oh, Lewis is by no means the worst boy I ever saw!" says this maternal weathercock, veering with easy grace. "It is just this wicked town, with its loose ways and million temptations. Of course, when he sees other boys buying chewing-gum by the pound, and lottery-tickets by the pack, he thinks he must turn speculator, too. And if he can't do it by fair means he'll do it by foul."

"You puzzle me, wife! Lewis hasn't been stealing, has he?"

"Not exactly. You know I missed my silver fish-knife, don't you, and laid it on that poor fool, Jane?"

"Yes."

"Well, Jane never took it! And those old-fashioned silver snuffers that Sophie insisted upon sticking on the parlor mantel, to prove to people that she had a grandmother who wasn't neither a milkmaid or a market-woman?"

"Yes."

"Well, I've found out where they all went to! And Sophie's cameo ring, that she laid on the piano that night she was playing for Mrs. Hayden, and—"

"Well, let's lump it, and say everything you've lost."

"I know where they've all gone to!"

"How did you find it out?"

"Mending Lewis' old trowsers. Found this in his pocket!"

She handed Mr. Dickison a small strip of printed matter, and leaned back in her chair with an expression of countenance betwixt triumph and despair.

"Will buy from a needle to a steamboat. G. Shelby, No. — Street," was what Mr. Dickison read on the paper.

"Well, what of it? I don't see any fish-knives nor snuffers nor cameo rings, nor signs of villainy on Lewis' part in that dirty little scrap."

"Mr. Dickison, do you suppose I would be the first one to suspect my own child of evil-doing without proof?"

"I don't know what to think, Maria, since you say we're such a badly changed lot. But where's your proofs?"

"Here!" Mrs. Dickison drew from her pocket a package of chewing-gum, two crumpled, soiled lottery-tickets, a stick of licorice, a brand new penknife, a book of cigarette paper, and laid them conspicuously on her ample lap. "How do you suppose he got all this trash?"

"Have you asked the boy about them?"

"I have not. I am afraid, father, he couldn't tell a very straight story if we did. My gold spectacles are gone, now. What shall we do with that boy?"

"How long since you missed the glasses?"

"Not two hours. I was sitting in the back parlor reading, when Mrs. Hayden called to ask Sophie to ride with her, and I laid 'em down to go help the child get ready. I never thought of my spec's again until supper-time. Find 'em I can't!"

"And Lewis had been in, in the meantime?"

"Oh, yes! I found him and Mrs. Hayden talking as glib as could be when I got back."

"I tell you what we'll do, wife. I'm not going to take circumstantial evidence against my own child. We'll go to that fellow that buys from a needle to a steamboat, and ask the point-blank question as to who's been making so free with our property."

"And if it turns out to be Lewis?" his mother asks falteringly.

With the sternness of a Brutus in voice and eye, Silas Dickison answered :

"Then—so much the worse for Lewis!"

Classing the whole mysterious transaction with deeds of darkness, Mr. and Mrs. Dickison waited until the younger members of their family were safely in bed before starting out in their new rôle of amateur detectives. Lewis had been left to wonder and exclaim over his lost possessions, without one inquiry or one word of explanation. It was not difficult to find the man who bought from a needle to a steamboat, for they had Lewis' printed slip to guide them.

The prim, dainty little old lady from the country shrank back in horror and disgust when they reached the threshold of G. Shelby's evil-looking, evil-smelling establishment; but her relentless husband drew her mercilessly forward until they stood on one side of a counter, behind which a greasy, snirking, evil-eyed Israelite promptly took position from some den in the rear.

While awaiting his coming, Mrs. Dickison had sent her eyes roving over the contents of a show-case upon which her arm rested. Sophie's cameo ring was the first object upon which her eyes rested. She pinched Mr. Dickison viciously on the arm and whispered, "There!"

Silas Dickison had but one way of getting at any information he wanted in this world, and that was by straightforward, fearless questioning, so he began :

"Some one has been making free with some of my property. I see a ring there that belongs to a member of my family. I wish to know who sold it to you?"

"De lady vich owns dot ring soles um herself."

"What does he say?" asked Mrs. Dickison, puzzled as much by the language as by the information.

"He says the lady that owned the ring sold it to him. And a fish-knife and silver snuffers and—what else, mother?"

"All dose tings—she a bootiful lady, distressed un circumstance—prings to me. I sorry for her. I tender hearted—pay big price! Vish dot I had my moneys back."

"Father!" says Mrs. Dickison, in an anguished undertone, "do you suppose Sophie could have done such a wicked thing? I'm sure, now, Lewis is innocent."

"God knows! When a girl gets her head turned on dress she's got very little brains or conscience left. You know the ring and the snuffers were hers. When does your beautiful lady come here? what time of day. I mean?" he asked, turning fiercely upon the cringing receiver of stolen goods.

"Dish time, mos'y; shoost about early bed-time."

"Good gracious! Father, we must wait here! You know the spectacles went to-day. She'll be here with them to-night. Oh! who could have believed it of one's own child?"

"Say! look here, you fellow; I'm bound to find out who's been bringing my goods here. I want to hide in your hole yonder for half an hour. If you kick up any row about it I'll have you arrested for receiving stolen goods to-morrow. If you keep quiet I'll have to let you go scot free in order to shield other folks. Hustle round and find a clean chair for this lady to sit in while we're watching for your beautiful lady."

So effective was Mr. Dickison's style of address that in less than five minutes he and his wife were seated in the back parlor of Mr. Shelby's shop on two tolerably clean chairs, in front of a small glass window, the parlor in total darkness, while the shop was illuminated by a smoky kerosene lamp.

"I feel like a thief myself," whispered Mrs. Dickison, peering about her in the dingy little parlor.

But Mr. Dickison preserved a stern silence. This matter had suddenly assumed such a grave aspect that the sturdy old Roman trembled to grapple with it. So they relapsed into a moody silence that to Mrs. Dickison appeared to have lasted hours, when they saw a closely-veiled lady glide swiftly into the shop, and, with an air of habitude, approach the proprietor, who glanced uneasily toward the little window where the amateur detectives were ensconced.

Mr. Dickison had told him that if his customer came he was to trade with her as if nothing had happened; so, when she unfolded the cambric handkerchief she held in her hand, and laid Mrs. Dickison's gold glasses on the counter, the transaction proceeded as usual, excepting for a smothered exclamation from Mrs. Dickison when the veiled lady pushed back her veil and disclosed the handsome features of Mrs. Hayden.

"Gracious goodness!" exclaimed Mrs. Dickison.

"Thank God!" exclaimed her husband.

When Mr. and Mrs. Dickison emerged from the shop of the man who bought from a needle to a steamboat, she had all her recovered valuables tied up securely in her handkerchief, bought back at very reasonable prices from the alarmed Jew.

"I declare, it was quite a bargain!" she says, tapping the handkerchief in triumph; "but, father, what are you going to do about those Pinkhams? I'm sure now there's something wrong about those people."

"If she wasn't Nath's daughter, I'd tell you in a half-dozen words how I'd deal with her, if this town has any police. But I couldn't disgrace Nath's children. I suppose love of dress has driven her to the dogs!"

"And to think I could allow myself to suppose for a moment one of my children could have been guilty of such a thing!" says the mother remorsefully.

But honest old Silas Dickison answered simply :

"Don't be boastful, Maria. We've tried to rear our children right. We've tried to teach them truth and honesty. I'd almost as soon expected to find a rogue in my own brood as in Nathan Pinkham's. I loved Nath. He was true, whatever his children may be. Don't let's judge the poor creature too hardly. She's turned out to be vain and wicked, though, and Sophie must have done with her. It's not for me to be undertaking to reform the world, but I think I would like to have one talk with Nath's girl."

"Father!" Mrs. Dickison stopped short and faced toward her liege under a gas-lamp, "we haven't accounted for the licorice and the lottery-tickets and the things in Lewis' pockets yet!"

"No; we've got to get to the bottom of that business before I leave the house. By the way, didn't you tell me there was a letter in one of his pockets that you hadn't read?"

"Yes; but it's from old Lucy. You know she's wrapped up in that boy. I have it in my pocket now."

"We'll read it when we get back to the house."

So before they went to their beds that night the father and mother read "old Lucy's" letter to Lewis, with hearts made so light by the lifting of their burden of suspicion that they laughed over it with the glee of two children.

"My dear honey chile," Aunt Lucy began, "Mosis is a-writin' ov dis letter fur me, so ef it ain't got no sense in it, which is jes' wat I 'spec's of a fool nigger's writin', yo' kin tell fur why. I write you dese few lines fur to tell you I 'se well an' doin' well, an' hope this will fin' you enjoyin' the same blessin'. We folks is gettin' very tired of havin' our w'ite folks stay 'way so long, an' we hopes yo' pa will ev had 'nough uv town-life by de comin' uv fall. The crap looks 'bout as well as could be 'spected uv a crap wid de head uv de place gone; an' tell yo' ma I 'se got a good start o' chickins agin, an' mos' a bar'l uv soap-grease saved up fur 'er. Now, my blessed honey chile, mammy knows you mus' see lots uv purty things that you wants fur to buy, an' she done sont you in dis letter three dollars to spen' fo' yo'self an' nobody else. Don' buy candy, and make yo'self sick. Be a good chile, and pray to de Lord fur his heavily salvation."

So Lewis was exonerated.

XV.—FLUTTERING HEARTS.

"MY OWN: Some unaccountable change has come over your most respected father. In an interview I had with him this morning, an interview which was of my own seeking, I was deterred from my purpose by a most violent and inexplicable explosion on his part. I had intended to ask his sanction to my suit to you, my beloved one, but my coward's heart failed me in presence of his wrath. It is evident he suspects I would steal you from his keeping, darling, and resents such desire on my part with the most passionate indignation. Can I blame him? Who would not resent the theft of such a treasure from the home circle? But he cannot hope to keep you always, my sweet. Your revered parent carried his indignation to such an extent as to demand that I should cease my visits to his house. Is this not the refinement of cruelty, my own? And are we, who love each other as creatures of human mould rarely know how to love, called upon to submit to such tyranny? This violence may mean your father's preference for some other suitor. If that be so—no, I will not doubt you, my lily-white love. I cannot give you up, Sophie. You have promised to be mine. You are my wife now in the sight of God. You gave me your solemn troth under his silent watching stars. Were it not for your gentle sake I would dare your father's wrath and come to you to-night, for my conscience proudly acquits me of having done anything to merit such capricious treatment, but I would not have his wrath vented upon you, my gentle darling, 'so you must promise to meet your unfortunate Archibald in the park at seven this eve."

With a heart fluttering, as in all her pure, simple life it never before had fluttered, Sophie Dickison stood under the gaslight in her own room, reading this model love-letter over and over.

It had been mysteriously put in her hand that morning by a tattered old woman, who had pleadingly asked the alms of an old dress, which, with ready charity, the country maiden had rolled up and handed her as she stood with crouching form and meekly-bowed head on the front stoop. It was Sophie's first love-letter. Joe's letter, she supposed, could rank in that category; but his protestations of undying love had been so mixed up with accounts of the crops and the gnats and the stock that it had partaken equally of the sublime and the ridiculous.

But here was a sure enough love-letter, with all the orthodox requirements of such documents (this cold-blooded analysis was not hers)—romance, mystery, persecution, faithfulness, danger—all that went to prove the trueness of their love by the threatened unsmoothness of its course and made the whole experience so deliciously, tremulously, delightfully terrible.

He said he would not give her up! She was to meet him at the park that evening! Something momentous must come of that meeting—something, in all likelihood, that would convert her, plain, unknown, countrified Sophie Dickison, into a heroine, whose name should be known for all time to come as one who had ventured to defy fate and a tyrant parent for the sake of truth and her love. She would have preferred consulting with Annie in this first great emergency of her life. She and Annie had always shared emotions in the old days.

But that would not be safe! Annie was Joe's ally—just one of those fierce, intense, unreasoning allies that it is most dangerous to tamper with. Moreover, she (Annie) had never cordially indorsed Mr. Pinkham, or "Archibald," as Sophie loved to call him in her heart now. Annie was so thoroughly commonplace that she never could indorse anything at all unfamiliar. She must have a precedent for everything. And how could there be a precedent for him? Her fluttering heart capitalized every letter in that tremendous little pronoun. Besides, Annie had the most trying and exasperating way of multiplying words in support of her own position and as missiles of attack on other folks.

Sophie had gotten beyond the necessity for many words. She was stirred to the depths of an intensely emotional nature.

Of course she would meet Mr. Pinkham! There was not one good reason why she should not. She knew perfectly well the secret of her father's sudden animosity toward him. Her father was in favor of her marriage with Joe Hinton. Joe was a plain practical planter after her father's own heart. He was perfectly happy when Joe would ride over from his own place, hitch his horse to the nail in the big sycamore tree in the front yard at home, and settle himself into one of the splint-bottomed arm-chairs that stood hospitably on the front gallery day and night, and talk about cotton and millet and Jersey cows by the hour. Her father was mercenary. He wanted to see Joe's place joined by the holy bonds of matrimony to his own. He was ready to sacrifice her tenderest hopes to this pet scheme of his; but he should not find in her a lamb that would be "dumb before its shearers." Oh, sophistry of love!

By the time she had read her precious letter over the fourth time, Archibald Pinkham stood out in bold relief as an injured hero of purest ray serene, and her father, good old Silas Dickison, was rapidly assuming the monstrous proportions of a jailer despot over herself. "a maiden all forlorn."

Of course she would meet him in the park at seven! Not to do so would be to convict herself of cruelty, inconsistency, fickleness and cowardice. All the jailer despots in Christendom should not keep her from her tryst!

Thus began a day for which lengthy moments, nervous intensity and vexatious contretemps forever remained unparalleled in Sophie Dickison's memory.

The iron benches in the pretty little park gave up their occupants one by one; the motionless metallic swan gleamed white and wet under the perpetual shower-bath the wet-faced cherubs forever spurted over them; the glossy leaves of the magnolias glistened in the pallid moonlight as they rustled a gentle lullaby to the sparrows and the squirrels asleep in their leafy couches. An occasional crunching of the gravel in the walks indicated the nearness of a few pedestrians who were shortening their homeward routes by cutting across the park. The bell from a neighboring steeple slowly struck nine when Sophie Dickison stood up and drew her light wrap about her with a trembling hand. Her face was white in the moonlight, and her dark eyes looked troubled in their eager upward glance into Archibald Pinkham's handsome face as he stood in front of her, tightly holding one little trembling hand between both his own.

"Take me home! Oh, please, now! quick! Let me go away from here—home!" she said in nervous eagerness.

"One moment more," and his eyes seemed to burn into the girl's very soul. "You have promised me! You dare not go back on your promise! I would never forgive you. I believe I could kill you if you deceived me! I almost believe I would! To-morrow night, eleven o'clock, I will be at the corner in a carriage."

She trembled, but was voiceless.

"Say it after me," he demanded imperiously. "Let me know that you have understood it all," and his face grew darker in its passion as he bent still closer over the trembling girl.

"To-morrow night! eleven o'clock! I will be there!" she said in a coldly mechanical way, and in a louder voice than was wise or necessary. "I have promised," she added. Then with a resistless determination she started rapidly forward in the direction of Melborne Street.

Archibald Pinkham drew her trembling hand within his arm, and the two were soon lost in the shadow of the park trees.

"To-morrow night at eleven o'clock! By God, it shall not be!" said Lemuel Burke, emerging from behind the trunk of a venerable tree that stood within ear-shot of the bench where Archibald Pinkham had unfolded his project for an elopement to Silas Dickson's daughter. "For that simple-hearted old man's sake I have consented to play eavesdropper, and, by the Lord Harry, this pretty piece of country innocence shall not bring that honest old heart to grief if I can help it! As for her—bah! she is a woman—they are all alike!" With which just peroration Mr. Burke sauntered indifferently toward the north gate. There he paused to light a cigar, and as he flung the match away he felt a timid, hesitating touch on his arm. He glanced in the direction of the touch, saying shortly:

"Who the devil—"

An elderly woman stood with her hands folded apologetically before her, while she looked imploringly up into his face. "Do you, too, love her?" she asked, without preface or explanation.

"Love who?" the man asked, surprised into an answer.

"That pretty girl that's just left the park. You watched them."

"No! a thousand noes. But what is it to you?"

"It's everything to me!"

"Do you love him?" asked Lemuel Burke, with a harsh metallic laugh.

"Hush! You have no right to insult me," said the woman, flashing an angry look up at him under the gas-lamp. She was plain and poorly dressed, but the dignity of virtue was stamped on her care-worn brow.

"I beg your pardon, madam," said Lemuel Burke, raising his hat with the deference of a gentleman greeting a lady. "I assuredly have not. What is your business with me?"

"That wretch!" she said, pointing a rigid finger in the direction that Archibald Pinkham had taken, "has ruined the peace and happiness of my home. I have an only daughter; she and I are alone in the world. He has been courting of her for a year. He put a ring on her finger. He promised to marry her this fall. He has not been near her these six months. She's just fool enough to be breaking her heart about him. I've just found out what it all means. That white-faced girl shall never have him."

"Do you mean," Lemuel Burke asked scornfully, "that you would still let your girl marry him?"

"Yes; otherwise she'll die. She's a fool, but I can't help that. She's all I've got. I'd rather have her alive as his wife than dead, that's all of it."

"You're the best judge of your own affairs," he answers coldly. "I promise you he will not get that white-faced girl. Now go."

"Thank you, and God bless you!" she said, and turned to go. "My girl's a fool, I know, but she's all I've got."

"Stop!"

She turned again, to see Mr. Burke standing thoughtfully just where she had left him.

"You called me, sir?" she asked timidly.

"Yes," he answered, making a step toward her. "It is just possible I might want to see you to-morrow morning. Where can I find you in case I should?"

"No. 105 — Avenue," she said. "We're poor folks, and it's a poor place. Daughter she works in a machine shop, and I take in sewing. We ain't much—nothing like the one he's taken up with now—but daughter—she loves him fit to kill. She's a fool, but she's all I've got. She's pining to a shadow, my Sophie is. I can't let her die."

Then these strangely-met allies parted for the night.

XVI.—HOLY BONDS OF MATRIMONY.

As the clock struck eleven the next night, Archibald Pinkham, peering anxiously from the windows of the hackney coach that he had cautiously stopped nearly half a block beyond Silas Dickson's residence, was made glad by seeing a slight, graceful form emerge from the gateway of No. 80 Melborne, and glide swiftly toward the carriage in waiting.

"Gad! she's on time. I was deuced 'fraid she would give us the slip," he said in a low voice to his sister, who sat rigidly impatient on the back seat.

"Poor little fool! no danger of that. She is entirely too much enamored of her city lover. As for my part, I am glad the game is so nearly played to an end. It is growing decidedly too exciting for my fancy. By the way, I would recommend you to leave town immediately after the ceremony. Your old love is assuming a threatening aspect, and Sophie No. 1 might prove disagreeable to Sophie No. 2."

"Sophia Barclay is tame enough herself, but that old mother of hers is—"

He sprang from the vehicle to receive almost into his arms the veiled and trembling form of the maiden who was about to dare the most that woman can for her love's sake.

"My own, my sweet, my brave, brave darling!" he ejaculated amorously, as the driver banged the door upon them, and started off at a rattling pace.

But the frightened girl, about whose shrinking form Mrs. Hayden had thrown her arms in sisterly affection, answered never a word. It was hardly to be expected that she should. Her agitation was intense and unaffected. Long, convulsive shudders succeeded one another, and her breath came in short, quick gasps that alarmed her captors beyond measure. They felt thankful to find her sufficiently in possession of her own faculties to walk between them when, the dimly-lighted church reached, they stood finally before the minister, who had been prevailed upon to overlook some little irregularities in the proceedings in view of the sad story of persecution that had been poured into his sympathetic ears, and the promise of an extra fee.

Beside the minister and the clerk and the small bridal party of three, the big church was empty, and weird shadows filled every nook and cranny of it, only one little nucleus of light gleaming about the group at the chancel from a single gas-jet.

The service that was to join those two as man and wife until death should them part proceeded smoothly. Archibald promised with a firm, unbroken voice to love and to cherish. Sophia promised in a frightened semi-whisper to honor and to obey. No voice was raised to declare just cause why they two should not be made twain. The minister was evidently too thoroughly orthodox in his training or too deeply dyed in reverence for the regulations of the church to omit one jot or one tittle of her formulas. Hence he proceeded to ask a question which, all things considered, appeared to the two or three who were gathered there together as worse than useless in its idleness and the delay it caused.

"Who gives this woman away?" The question rang out loud and distinct through the shadowy church and over the empty pews.

"I do!" The answer came with equal emphasis, and from some hidden nook near the entrance door Silas Dickison emerged and creaked heavily toward the palsied group about the altar.

Archibald Pinkham grasped the hand of his almost wife tightly in his own, resolved that mortal man should not tear her from him now. She had started violently at the sound of that harsh voice, but had not screamed. Mrs. Hayden had, however, and immediately fell upon the seat of the nearest pew, trembling in terror for the dénouement.

"God bless my soul! Go on, sir; go on, Mr. Parson; I'm not here to interrupt the proceedings," Mr. Dickison said in his blandest voice. "If this young woman wants Mr. Pinkham for a husband she's welcome to him, 'pon honor she is, sir. It don't quite accord with my old foggy notions, this thief-in-the-night business, and this midnight church-going; but everybody to his taste. Silas Dickison never was a kill-joy, and he don't mean to be one on this festive occasion. Go on, sir; do your duty, finish this job!" He addressed himself sternly to the minister, who "went on" and "did his duty" in a frightened, perfunctory manner, which, happily for the future welfare of Mr. and Mrs. Pinkham, was none the less effectual.

"Now, then," said Mr. Dickison, rubbing his hands together with unaccountable satisfaction at the close of the ceremony, "to the books; we must do it all in form. I'm glad you will be able to boast of one creditable witness to this night's performance. That's me, sir! Mrs. Pinkham, permit me," and with mock reverence he stepped forward and threw back the thick gauze veil about the bride's face, revealing the pallid features and dark, gleaming eyes of—Sophia Barclay.

A dangerous light burned in the groom's eyes as, giving his new-made wife one fierce look full of bitterest hatred, he turned upon the smiling old man, who had drawn her hand into his arm, as if to protect her from the wrath of the man who had but just promised to love and to cherish her until death did them part.

"Damnation!" was the one word that he hurled at the old man, who faced him with a wrath as fierce and palpable as his own.

Mrs. Hayden rose and tottered to her feet, exclaiming:

"Duped! Sold! Ruined! Archibald Pinkham, you were born a fool, and you will die one!" Then she turned as if to flee from them all.

"Stop her!" Mr. Dickison called out in a raised voice; "stop her, in the name of the law!"

"In the name of the law!" echoed a quiet voice; and a mild-looking blue-uniformed man stepped into the aisle and politely offered his arm to conduct Mrs. Hayden back to the bridal party.

"Friends," said Mr. Dickison, clearing his throat, "I shan't keep you long. I just want to give this young couple my benediction." Then, with fierce wrath, he turned upon Archibald Pinkham: "I've found you out, sir! found you out to be a liar and a fraud from beginning to end! When a man deceives me, sir, and I find it out, I simply shake myself loose of him, as I would of a toad or any other reptile that happened to light on my hand. You found it easy enough to impose on the simple old fool from the country with your story of being Nathan Pinkham's son; that belief did soften me, did make me overlook a good many things I didn't just quite like; but I thank God I've found one man here strong enough to call a lie a lie and a scoundrel a scoundrel. It's no credit to me that you did not succeed in your scoundrelly attempt to carry off my silly child. I deserve worse luck for being such a fool as to have been taken in by you. And while I can't say I think much of the woman who has consented to take you for 'worse' (for there ain't any 'better' in you—no, sir, by Jupiter! you're bad from beginning to end), still she's got pretty good grounds to go on, seeing as she wore your engagement ring before ever my poor girl heard of you. In case you should feel badly about any suffering you may have inflicted in that quarter, let me tell you that my Sophia dressed your Sophia for this interesting ceremony just concluded. And now for a final injunction. I know you—I know her," pointing scornfully at Mrs. Hayden. "You are confidence folks. You are a gambler, and she likes cameo rings and silver snufflers and things. If you ever do allow any one to suspect that Silas Dickison was ever fool enough to take you by the hand, so help me God you shall both sting for it. Mr. Parson, I beg pardon of the Lord's house for my share in this disgraceful scene. I owe you none, sir, for the minister who would disgrace his calling by any such midnight prowling as this, sir, don't deserve the respect nor the consideration of any honest, decent man. Mr. and Mrs. Pinkham, I wish you all the happiness that can come of such a well-assorted union. Mrs. Pinkham will kindly explain to you at her leisure, sir, how Mr. Burke and her mother were so fortunate as to be present when you extracted from my silly child a promise to elope with you to-night, and how that honest gentleman came to me with the news, and how we together went to her mother's house to interview Miss Barclay, and between us concocted a plan by which you should not be deprived of your laudable desire to turn a Benedict; and how she humbly consented to play substitute, all because she loves you, sir, with that inexplicable constancy and incomprehensible devotion that women will sometimes bestow upon the slimy creatures of this world, sir. I have heard of women petting snakes, sir. I never believed in the possibility of it before; I do now, sir! And now, sir, if I could find an honest man in this crowd, I would ask him to kick me from this altar to No. 80 Melborne Street for having been such an ass and such a dupe. It would be a kindness I should feel grateful for. It would restore my self-respect in a measure. Policeman, probably you could accommodate me in that matter!"

The policeman politely declining to officiate as kicker plenipotentiary, Mr. Dickison was compelled to find his way home unkicked, which he went about doing with one final and totally irrelevant "Yes, sir!" wrathfully hurled at the whole group of evil-doers as he slammed his hat on his head, as if it, too, partook of the universal degeneracy of its surroundings.

XVII.—HOME AGAIN.

WHEN the short autumn days came again, with their clear skies and tender, sad beauty, the Dickisons were not loth to turn their steps homeward. The exact date of their return to their country home was thus conveyed in a letter from Sophie to Jo Hinton. This is what she said:

"DEAR JO: You have had time to exhaust even your kindly store of patience in wondering over me and your own unanswered letter. If you knew why that letter remained so long neglected, dear Jo, you would never speak to me again, much less still wish to come and take me home as your wife. You shall know, too. It will be easier writing it to you from here than telling it to you, with your grave, earnest eyes looking down into my silly, guilty face. Oh! Jo, it is hard to have to write what will make you despise me just as I've come into a knowledge of your true worth, but it is all the reparation I can make you—this honest, clean confession; and here it is. I shall not blame you one particle if you just turn away from me entirely after reading it. I knew you loved me, Jo, before I left the dear old home, and I thought that I knew I loved you, but the love of such a silly, fickle thing as I have shown myself is not worth the taking, Jo, and would be but a poor return for your steadfast trust and patient devotion. I have been saved from a deed of folly, dear, so shocking to me now, looked back upon from the standpoint of recovered reason, that I feel my punishment will have been ample after I have abased myself in confession to you. I don't doubt that the good and the true and beautiful in human nature is just as abundant in the crowded cities as in the loneliest country hamlet, Jo, only there are so many more in the towns to illustrate both the good and the evil, that one is safer from the latter in the pure, friendly country, where disguises are impossible and deception difficult. Through an imposition practised upon dear, honest old father, we have been taking by the hands two very disreputable people, Jo—a brother and a sister. We have reason now to believe that our intimacy with these people has caused the better class of folks here to hold sternly aloof from us. But that would not in the least matter, for you know we only came here for a little stay. Jo—if—oh! if—(I wish I hadn't told father I must be the one to tell you all this!) I—Jo—I have been a fool! such a terrible, unforgivable, silly, silly girl, Jo—I allowed my fancy to be taken captive by a drooping mustache, a pair of dark eyes, a soft voice and a wicked, oily tongue! Can you forgive me? I forgot you, Jo! forgot myself, forgot common sense, and everything that is worth the remembering, and promised—oh, Jo!—promised to leave my home clandestinely to marry a wretch who has turned out to be one huge fraud—even his name not his own. I have no excuse to make for myself, Jo—it is not even to my credit that I am not at this moment the wretched wife of a most depraved man. To the faithful friendship of a Mr. Burke, a new friend of father's, I owe my escape. Now, I have told you all. I repeat, Jo, I have no excuse to make for myself, only I was resolved you should not come to me thinking I was a better woman than I am. If you can be better to me than I am to myself, Jo, and pardon this worse than foolishness, come and take me home—home to the shelter of your own dear, true heart. But I shall not wonder nor blame if you do not. I'll only grieve, Jo, and drink the bitter cup as part of my merited punishment.

"I've told you about this Mr. Burke. He is a man of sorrows—sorrows that he bears with a stern, quiet dignity that almost forbids one to pity him. He surprised us yesterday by a request he made of mother—a request which she cordially granted. He brought his little six-year-old boy to her, and said: 'Will you take him home with you to God's pure, free country, and keep him for me a while? I left him with his mother during his tenderest years, when no harm could come of weak examples. She has added crime to folly, and she cannot keep him longer.' So this forlorn little waif is to go home with us. Oh, this world, with all its lights and shadows, with all its pains and penalties, what a strange, wild whirl it keeps one in!

And now, dear Jo, good-by. Father has written you when we will be ready to go home; I have written you so you shall be able to decide how we shall go home.

"Yours, if you choose, SOPHIE."

Jo did choose. He came for them, took humble and contrite Sophie into his strong arms, and there, while she sobbed out anew her shame and penitence, he smoothed back the disordered hair from her tear-stained face and tenderly pressed a forgiving kiss upon the trembling lips.

They were married very quietly in church before starting for the plantation, Mr. Burke being the only invited guest; but there was more rejoicing in that small family circle over the one recovered member of it than over all the rest that went not astray.

"Well!" was Silas Dickison's hearty exclamation as he once more hung up his hat on its old familiar peg, "they say that 'God made the country and man made the town.' I can vouch for the first clause of the proposition, and may the devil fly away with me for a fool if ever I allow myself to be martyred again! Mrs. Dickison, hereafter this shoemaker proposes to 'stick to his last.'"

"So does this one, my dear. You know I never was in favor of the move. I told you so."

But the martyr looked incredulous.

XVIII.—CONCLUSION.

CHRISTMAS had come and gone and come again for the third time since the Dickisons had returned from what they were pleased to call their town experiment.

It had come again, as Christmas will come whether folks are sad or glad. This was expected to be an especially glad Christmas on the old plantation. Jo and his wife were to be over, of course. Lewis was come back for the holidays, and Charlie was to take off the mournful black ribbons that good old Mrs. Dickison had insisted upon be-knotting him all over with, when Mr. Burke had formally announced to them that his child was motherless, finally, in every sense of the word. Not that Charlie cared a rush whether the ribbons he wore were blue, black or green; but his whole young soul was in a state of wildest effervescence on this especial Christmas, for his father was to come down to spend it with them. Annie was up very early on the important morning in question. She stole quietly down stairs and opened the front doors as noiselessly as possible, and stood motionless as a devotee. Lewis and Charlie had a project on hand for supplying the house with Christmas berries and mistletoe. Lewis had made the little city exile happy by promising him he should ride behind him to the woods on Fancy, his pretty little bay mare. And Charlie, after rubbing his eyes fiercely with his knuckles to "wake 'em up" had dressed "just like a mouse" and slipped down stairs "as easy as nuffin'," to be on hand betimes.

"If St. Nicholas, the good old patron saint of the day, had whirled me skyward during the night behind his prancing steeds, depositing me bodily in his own mythical realms of ice and glitter, I am convinced that he could have shown me no more dazzlingly beautiful spectacle than this," Annie exclaimed aloud, though there was nothing but the frosty air to receive her enthusiastic exclamations.

And surely never had nature smiled more brilliantly since that first Christmas morning in the long ago, when her great heart pulsed to the glad tidings that the "Desire of all nations" was come, and she smiled a beneficent welcome down upon the babe in the manger.

A heavy white frost had crept silently over all the face of creation, glorifying the commonplace. The very weeds, whose insolent luxuriance from the rank intrusiveness of their summer growth to the stiff, stark ugliness of their winter deaths was such an eye-sore, had been found worthy of notice by the Ice King. Sparkling diadems crowned the tufted heads, which they seemed to nod at one as if bearing triumphant witness that He showereth His benefits upon the unjust as upon the just. The old cedars that guarded the front gate on either side had been metamorphosed by the same white magician from dark-browed gloomy sentinels into glittering pyramids of crystals, which, touched by the warm kisses of the new-risen sun, glowed and flashed with ten thousand prismatic splendors. Hundreds of crimson cardinal-birds, bluebirds, orioles, saucy woodpeckers and sober-hued cedar-birds swung and chattered and fussed and fluttered in the frozen branches, pecking the cedar-berries, and returning tuneful thanks for feast and sunshine to the giver of all good. Slowly, almost hesitantly, as if loth to leave so fair and glittering a scene, a white fog uprose over the calm blue waters of the lake until, catching a golden tint from the sea of liquid topaz that still enveloped the sun, it warmed and brightened to a sense of Heaven's better things, and floated swiftly skyward in fleecy, shining masses, like disembodied spirits gladly taking their upward flight.

As Annie stood there, thinking some such thoughts as these, the clatter of Fancy's heels on the frosty ground smote upon her ears, and she turned to see apparently "Birnam wood approaching Dunsinane," such a peripatetic mass of green did the boys and pony together present.

"Isn't it beautiful, my boy?" she asked, bending her sweet face, all aglow with enthusiasm, over Charlie, who danced toward her with both hands full of mistletoe. "Oh, this is a grandly beautiful world, Charlie, if people would only look nature fairly and squarely in the face, forgetting themselves the while in adoring appreciation of her majesty."

"And papa's coming, too," remarked Charlie sagely, feeling the general enthusiasm, but not quite far enough advanced in the paths of wisdom to give nature her share of the credit.

"Yes, and papa's coming, too," Annie repeated with a light laugh and brighter blush. "I'm afraid I was vaulting over the heads of my auditors in my enthusiasm over this glorious morning," and she turned to lead the way to the dining-room. She and Lewis, assisted (or hindered) by Charlie, had decorated the rooms quite to their own satisfaction, if to nobody else's, by the time the breakfast-bell brought the rest of the family from their various apartments.

The united prophesying powers of the family were brought to bear upon the coming boat that was to bring them Mr. Lemuel Burke, their honored guest. It was unanimously decided that his coming could not possibly be delayed beyond two o'clock, though with equal unanimity it was agreed that "boats always come hours later when anybody was looking for anybody."

Annie's growing restlessness sought alleviation in motion. The clock was on the dining-room mantel, so that was her favorite rendezvous. She must slip in once more to look at the clock. Aunt Lucy was engaged in a species of infantry drill intended to insure the Dickson establishment against any possibility of disgrace on the august occasion of feeding "city folks." Two very small, very black and very stupid recruits from the "Quarters" had been pressed into service to wait on the table. They rejoiced in the names of Bob and Dan. Were it not for the abject terror of Aunt Lucy, which kept them on the alert and caused their eyes to roll about in a perfect frenzy of zeal, one would be inclined to consider them but broken reeds upon which to rest the family reputation.

As Annie entered the room that petticoated martinet had just planted them in position, with a double-quick, right-wheel motion (that I'm not at all sure could be found in Upton's tactics), in which the boys could hardly be said to sustain a volunteer part, and was saying to Bob (who clasped his waiter shield-fashion before his dauntless young breast, as if resolute to die with it or on it, while he gazed into Aunt Lucy's awful countenance with wrapt attention):

"Now, you Bob! lis'n t' me, nigger! Ef you draps that waiter one mo' time, jes' one mo', min' you, whiles w'ite folks is settin' at dis table, I'll brain yer t'-nite wid de rollin'-pin! Fore de Lam', I will, nigger! He's done drapt it fo' times already, missy."

This in an explanatory aside to Annie, in extenuation of her Draconian threat.

"Now den, tell me one mo' time wot's de fus' thing you 'be gwine to do arter de folks sots down?" she asks in milder accents, having expended her stock of ready-made wrath in that one awful threat of braining Bob with the rolling-pin.

"Fotch de w'ite folks some soop," says Bob, giving a triumphant upward hitch to his new blue cottonade trowsers, as Aunt Lucy's nod of approval tells him he is so far correct.

"An' who you gwine to fotch soop t' fus' an' fo'mos'?"

"Miss Annie," says Bob, rolling the whites of his eyes in adoring admiration toward that young lady.

"No you ain't, nuther," says Aunt Lucy, ruthlessly nipping Bob's youthful affections. "Miss Annie company, you 'member that, nigger. You goes as straight as dem ant-killers o' your 'n kin carry you to de strange gentlemine from de city, Mr. Burkin, as is his name. We don't vittle city folks here every day, nigger."

"Yas 'um," says Bob with cheerful irrelevance, in no ways cast down by Aunt Lucy's animadversions on his huge flat feet.

"An' you, Dan! Wot I dun tol' you t' do fus'?"

"Marm!" Dan gasps helplessly, guiltily conscious that in contemplation of the bright flowers of the wall-paper he has entirely forgotten his chief end of man, and he looks sourly across the table at Bob, who has just executed an audible chuckle over Dan's discomfiture and his own superiority. Two back-handed "cuffs," impartially administered by Aunt Lucy, sober Bob's undue elation, and clear the cobwebs from Dan's memory.

"Yas 'm, granny, yas 'm, I 'member now; guv 'em all roun' some water."

"What out en?"

"Dar's de big gourd a hangin' on de back gallery an' de cedar bucket," Dan suggests dubiously.

At which Annie burst in untimely mirth, which Aunt Lucy took sorely amiss.

"You needn' 'be laffin' sass inter 'em, Miss Annie, fasser den I kin knock sense out er 'em. Gawd knows its hard 'nough work to git anything under der wool. Now that Dan's jes' big 'nough fool to fotch in dat gourd and water you all roun' like so many head uv cattle."

"What did you want with both of them?" Annie asked innocently, naturally imagining that drilling one fool must of necessity be an easier task than drilling two fools.

Aunt Lucy's answer came pat out of what might (if it had ever reached the dignity of print) be called the Southern Domestic Manual: "What does I want wid two of 'em? I'm a thinkin' I ought to a fotch'd a fo' of 'em. I did 'low that two half niggers would a made one whole one, but—"

"As these are nothing but Quarter boys you think it would take four of them," said Jo Hinton's familiar voice immediately behind Annie's back, and she turned to meet her brother-in-law's handsome, smiling face.

"Burke's in the parlor, Nan; I brought him out from the river in my buggy. For some unaccountable reason he has expressed a desire to see you even before he folds that young cub of his in his paternal arms."

Annie turned from him and walked with a swift, glad step to greet the man who had, even before she was well aware of it herself, found such a secure abiding place in her heart.

He was standing with his back to the door when she entered, apparently absorbed in profound admiration of the glittering outer world.

"Is it not beautiful?" she asked softly, standing beside him and laying her hand lightly on his arm.

He turned, and tightly clasping both her hands he looked earnestly down into her sweet, upturned face, saying:

"I was not thinking of that pretty outside scene, Annie. I was thinking of you, dear, and of what I have come here on purpose to say. Once in my life, when I was a younger and a brighter man, Annie, I placed my happiness, my peace of mind, my self-respect—all that a man of honor holds dear—in a woman's keeping, and a bitter wreck she made of it all. You know that old story. I have tried to bury the bitterness of that past in her grave. Once again I seek to place my happiness, my peace of mind, my self-respect—all that a man of honor holds dear—in a woman's keeping. How shall it be, dear?"

"With God's help you shall never regret it. You know that I love you and you only," she answered simply and bravely.

Lemuel Burke has never regretted it.

[THE END.]

MOSCOW.

(Translated from the original Russian of Glinka.)

(Feodor Nikoláievitch Glinka was born in 1788 and died in 1880, so that his conscious life covered the century. Like a true Slavophile he looked upon "Mátushka Moskva" as the jewel-city of Russia, and this sentiment is very apparent in the following poem. He remembered Napoleon's invasion of Russia and the burning of Moscow. The Tsar-bell, or Tsar-kolokol, is the famous cracked bell, the largest in the world (130,634 kilos.); the Tsar-pushka, or Tsar of guns, is the monstrous cannon which guards the Kreml, or Kremlin.)

"Gorod chudnui, gorod drevnui."

WONDROUS city, ancient city,
Thou enfoldest in thy walls
Villages and smiling suburbs,
Churches, palaces and halls.

Thou art girt by grassy meadows,
Gay with gardens, rich in flowers;
Seven the hills are which thou crownest
With thy temples, with thy towers.

Thou unfoldest like a parchment
Written by a giant hand,
And beside thy little river
Thou art glorious, now, and grand.

Many are thine ancient churches
Towering like the northern pine;
Where can eye see streets so noble,
Mother Moscow, as are thine?

Capture Moscow's mighty Kreml?

Who on earth could boast the power?
Who could rob the golden bonnet
From the slender Ivan tower?

Who could ever swing the Tsar-bell,
Or the Tsar-gun overthrow?
Reverence at the Sacred Gateway
Who could ever fail to show?

In thine awful hour of peril,
When thy haughty neck was bent,
All thy children, men of Russia,
Felt with thee the punishment.

White-walled city, thou wast chastened
Like a martyr in the fire;
And thy river, boiling, hastened
Onward to escape the pyre.

Once a captive and dishonored,
In thine embers thou didst lie!
Now arisen from thy ashes
Changeless, lift thy head on high!

Flourish through the countless ages,
Moscow! many-towered town.
Thou art central heart of Russia,
Russia's glory, Russia's crown!

THE SISTER OF EDGAR A. POE.

To the readers of the numerous biographies of Edgar A. Poe it must have occurred as singular that they contain so slight mention of his only sister, Rosalie. The fact is briefly stated that he had a sister of this name, who was adopted by Mrs. Mackenzie at the time when he himself found a home with Mr. Allan; but thenceforth Rosalie Poe wholly disappears from the horizon of her brother's life. In no one of his letters is she alluded to, and the only mention of her is in a letter of N. P. Willis to Poe, wherein he says: "I had a letter from your sister not long since, inquiring your whereabouts. . . . You seem as neglectful of your sister as I am of mine," alluding to the well-known estrangement between himself and Mrs. Parton.

Still, in reading the life of Poe, as of most men of genius, the inquiry is suggested to the reflective mind: "Of what stamp and character were his nearest relatives? Were they marked by any trait or peculiarity of the poet? or did he stand alone among his kindred, isolated in character as in genius? What were his relations with them? What sympathy or affection existed between them?" An investigation into points such as these will often cast upon the character and history of a man of genius a clearer light than is attainable by all the researches of philosophers and physiologists. Wherefore, I consider that in presenting this slight sketch of the sister of Edgar A. Poe I am affording a key to much that has been regarded as strange and inexplicable in the poet's own character.

The earliest existing mention of Edgar A. Poe and his sister I have from my own mother,* in whose words I will here give it:

"In 1811, when I was ten years old, there came a fine company of players to Norfolk, and, as a special treat, we children were taken to see them act "Macbeth." I remember Mr. and Mrs. Placide, Mr. and Mrs. Young, Mr. and Mrs. Green and Mr. Poe and his wife. These were all very handsome couples. Mr. Poe was tall and fine-looking and younger than his wife, who had been a widow Hopkins, formerly Elizabeth Arnold. She was remarkably pretty, fair and delicate-looking, with a round, laughing face, beautiful large eyes and regular features. She was called vain and coquettish, and was not considered a clever actress, though much admired for her grace and beauty. Mr. and Mrs. Poe occupied a garret room in a house adjoining that of my Aunt Butt,† on Bermuda Street. There was only a wooden partition between the two garrets, and through a hole in this we children used to peep at and talk to Mrs. Poe's children and their nurse. The latter was an old Welsh woman, whose odd dress and speech greatly amused us. The children were very pretty, lively and playful. The little boy was about four years old, and his sister two years younger. In the evenings the nurse would take them out and sit on a bench at the front door while they played on the pavement. The boy was her favorite. I remember how once a horse nearly ran over him, when she threw down the little girl whom she had in her arms, and rushed to save him, screaming, "Ho! Hedgar! Hedgar!"

"This company of players were very handsomely entertained by Colonel Hamilton, the then British Consul at Norfolk, who lived opposite my father, on Main Street. From there they went to Richmond, and it was shortly after that we heard of the burning of the Richmond Theatre."

A few weeks subsequent to this glimpse of the Poe family in Norfolk, we have another view of them in Richmond; and this time from the lips of Mrs. Mackenzie, who adopted Rosalie. The company above mentioned, under the management of Mr. Placide, were acting at the Richmond Theatre; all save Mr. and Mrs. Poe, who were prevented by illness. Thus, on the night of the burning of the theatre they were fortunately absent; and when, after that disastrous occurrence, the company left Richmond—Mr. Poe and his family were unable to accompany them. Soon there was a report that the actors, Mr. and Mrs. Poe, were ill and in great destitution, and Mrs. Jean Mackenzie, a benevolent Scotch lady, went to see them. She found them occupying a wretched, damp basement room, where Mrs. Poe lay ill with pneumonia, and her husband with rapid consumption. Two little children, thin, pale and half clad, were in the room, and an old Welsh woman was, with the most assiduous attention, devoting herself to the four. Struck with compassion, Mrs. Mackenzie had the children removed to her own home, and she and her equally kind-hearted husband exerted themselves to provide for the comfort of the family. In this they were assisted by Mr. John Allan and his wife, whose handsome residence stood opposite their own. Both Mr. Allan and Mr. Mackenzie were Scotch gentlemen and intimate friends.

The children, under the influence of kind care, improved rapidly, and attracted much attention and interest. They were remarkably pretty, and equally bright and lively. Mrs. Allan became especially interested in the boy, while the girl was the chosen playmate of Mrs. Mackenzie's little daughter, Mary, of the same age. On the death of the parents their relatives manifested so little interest in the children that Mrs. Mackenzie proposed to adopt Rosalie if Mrs. Allan would do the same by Edgar. Mr. Allan at first opposed the plan, but finally yielded to the wishes of his wife, and soon became much attached to the boy. This couple was rich and childless, while the Mackenzies had a large family, and were at this time in only moderate circumstances. The little orphans were legally adopted and baptized by the names of Edgar Allan and Rosalie Mackenzie.

Of the subsequent destinies of the children thus strangely cast upon the benevolence of strangers, that of Edgar is already known to the world. Surrounded by luxury, flattered and indulged, his position was far less fortunate than that of his sister, who was exposed to no such unfavorable influences. Both children were self-willed and obstinate, and, as was evident, had never been taught obedience; but while Mr. Allan conscientiously sought to subdue Edgar by occasional severity, alternating with most injudicious indulgence, Rosalie was subject to the discipline of a true, motherly kindness, directed by rare good sense and Christian principle. The writer of this sketch knew Mrs. Mackenzie well, and delights in recalling the image of one whose loveliness of disposition and dignity of character made her loved and revered by all who knew her, and whose very presence seemed ever to carry with it sunshine and happiness.

* This venerable lady, Mrs. E. F. Talley, is still living in Richmond, at the advanced age of eighty-two.

† Grandmother of the widow of Admiral Farragut.

Rosalie was also fortunate in other respects. Her guardian's sister, Miss Mackenzie, was a lady of elegant manners and accomplishments, whose educational establishment for young ladies was one of the most celebrated of its time. From its exclusive circle had gone forth many a young girl to grace, as a brilliant belle or accomplished matron, the elegant society for which Virginia was then famed. Rosalie, brought up under the special care of this lady, had all the opportunities of a first-class education, and, as she grew up, of the high social position occupied by the family of her guardian.

How did the sister of Edgar A. Poe develop under these favoring influences? The answer involves a curious condition of things calculated to strangely perplex the observer.

The children when first adopted were, in person as well as in general traits and disposition, so remarkably alike as to be generally mistaken for twins. Points of this strong resemblance remained conspicuous through life; and yet, as they grew toward youth, the two presented a contrast so extraordinary that in all biography a greater cannot be found to exist.

Edgar developed into a brilliant youth, as much noted for physical beauty, strength and activity, as for intellect and genius. Rosalie, as though some mysterious blight had fallen upon her, gradually drooped and faded into a languid, dull and uninteresting girlhood—apathetic in disposition and weak in body and mind. With features exactly those of her brother, and even possessed of his very peculiar phrenological developments, no two persons could yet have presented a more marked contrast. Her figure, naturally delicate and well-formed, drooped as lacking strength for its own support, her hands generally hanging listlessly at her side. Her eyes, dark gray, like those wonderful spiritual ones of her brother, were weak, dull and expressive only of utter vacuity. She was accustomed to sit for long intervals gazing upon vacancy, and when aroused, would answer to an inquiry: "I wasn't thinking at all; I was asleep with my eyes open." She had an invincible dislike of any mental or physical exertion; and Miss Mackenzie was accustomed to state, as a remarkable fact, that after, as a child, progressing rapidly in her studies to a certain point, she at the age of eight or ten ceased absolutely to make farther progress, and at that point remained during her life. Beyond this the most assiduous care of the best instructors could not advance her, and she thenceforth always wrote, spelled and expressed herself like a child, while her musical performance was like that of a beginner. Previous to this time, said Miss Mackenzie, she had been a bright and lively child, and particularly fond of music and dancing; but when this new phase came upon her she went reluctantly to the piano, and could with difficulty be prevailed upon to join in a dance, observing that it was "too fatiguing." She looked indeed as she often said that she felt, "but half alive," and yet was rarely if ever sick. Her infirmity appeared to be not disease but a simple fading or wasting away of the vitality of mind and body. It resembled the sudden blight of a frosted flower—it might live on, but could never recover its freshness and vigor.

There was one peculiarity of Miss Poe which cannot be passed over in silence, and indeed demands special mention as being one of the curious points of resemblance between herself and her brother. This was, without any attempt to soften it, a constant morbid craving for stimulants, coupled with a most unfortunate susceptibility to their influence. She was accustomed to frankly avow her craving for wine, accompanied by the assertion that "she did not dare to touch it, because of her poor, weak head." A mere taste of wine had the effect of dazing and confusing her, and an ordinary dinner-glass, which others could take with impunity, would throw her into a sort of stupor and heavy sleep of hours' duration, from which she would arouse in a state of extreme nervous irritability, succeeded by deep depression and melancholy. This is precisely what Poe stated was the effect upon himself of the least indulgence in alcoholic drinks, and his intimate friends have corroborated his statement. One of these has told me that "a single glass of wine had more effect upon Poe than a whole bottle upon an ordinary man." Mr. Poe always declared that he drank less upon occasion than his companions, but that it was his misfortune to be more susceptible to its influence; and this we can easily credit after seeing the same trait so strongly marked in his sister. How imperative, therefore, it is that allowance should be made for the infirmity which his enemies have seized upon as forming the darkest blot upon his character!

In regard to this peculiarity of Poe and his sister, Mrs. Mackenzie, who so well knew both, had a singular theory of her own. On occasion of her first visit to the Poes, she had observed that the children were thin and pale and very fretful. To quiet them, their old nurse—whom Mrs. Poe in her last days addressed as "Mother," while she called Mrs. Poe "Betty"—took them upon her lap and fed them liberally with bread soaked in gin, when they soon fell asleep. Subsequently, after the death of the parents, the old woman (who remained in Richmond until her death, not long after, devoting herself to the children) acknowledged to Mrs. Mackenzie that she had, from the very birth of the girl, freely administered to them gin and other spirituous liquors, with sometimes laudanum, "to make them strong and healthy," or to put them to sleep when restless. Mrs. Mackenzie was convinced that this woman, who was a simple, honest creature, was, in reality, the maternal grandmother of the children, and conscientiously acted for their good. She never doubted but that this gin diet had stunted their growth physically, had produced the abnormal craving for stimulants, and also, in the case of Rosalie, utterly paralyzed both mental and physical faculties.

"My conviction is," she was accustomed to assert seriously, "that Rosalie was naturally gifted with genius and intellect not inferior perhaps to that of Edgar, but that these were blighted by the injudicious treatment of the nurse." She referred to this cause many of Edgar's and Rosalie's weaknesses, as their nervous irritability; but on Rosalie, as having been from her very birth subject to the poisonous influence of gin and opium, the effect had been most pernicious.

It may appear to some a confirmation of this rather startling theory when it is mentioned that Rosalie Poe, with all her weakness, yet possessed certain traits which in Edgar were considered as evidences of poetic temperament. She had his instinctive love for, if not his appreciation of, beauty in all its visible forms, and an aversion to whatever was coarse, harsh or disagreeable. Both were affected to melancholy by music, whether gay or sad. She took great pleasure in the rhyme and jingle of verse—a taste which her brother has so strongly evinced in his liberal use of repetition and the refrain—and for this reason "The Raven" and "The Bells" were her favorite poems. Once she said, "I often feel as if I could write poetry. I have it all in my head, but somehow can't get it clear enough to write down." A sad, clipped-wings sort of feeling it must have been, if Mrs. Mackenzie's theory were correct. A passionate love of flowers was peculiar to both herself and her brother. I rarely saw the latter without some delicate bud or leaf in his buttonhole, and a bouquet was his sister's constant accompaniment, and the offering which she was accustomed to bestow upon those whom she called her "favorites." These favored individuals were always young and pretty; for, like Queen Elizabeth, neither she nor her brother had any "liking for an uncomely visage." She, even beyond middle age, preferred the society of young persons, whose lively sallies amused her, and were not above her capacities of appreciation. Mrs. Mackenzie was at this time residing in the city suburbs, near my mother's residence; and in both families were a gay group of young persons, to whom Miss Poe attached herself, and who, though constantly amused by her oddities of dress and manner, regarded her with good-natured indulgence as a privileged character. I remember that upon one occasion she insisted upon accompanying us to a fashionable party, for which she arrayed herself in a style which elicited from our light-hearted group an irrepressible burst of merriment. It was her habit to appropriate any article of dress or adornment, whether her own or another's, that happened to strike her fancy, or to be most conveniently at hand, and the effect was frequently absurd in the extreme, and presented a singular contrast to her brother's fastidious taste in dress. She would submit to our criticisms with easy indifference, but rarely took advice, save from Mrs. Mackenzie, to whom she accorded the obedience of a child.

For her brother Miss Poe had the most unbounded admiration. Her pride in him was really touching, accompanied, as it was, by an humble consciousness of her own inferiority. Nothing afforded her more pleasure than to hear him eulogized, or to be introduced to or noticed by strangers as "the poet's sister." He, on his part, took little or no interest in her, and never, that I am aware, replied to one of her frequent letters, except in a postscript to some member of the Mackenzie family, with whom he was on almost as intimate terms as his sister. She was not calculated to please his fastidious taste, and perhaps she was right when she said, despondingly, "I believe Edgar is ashamed of me." Sometimes she betrayed a bitter consciousness of her inferiority. "I don't see why Edgar should have all the good gifts and I all the bad." Often she was pathetic. "I know that people can't like me as they do Edgar. I am of no use to anybody. I wish it were different, but I can't help it; I did not make myself." And in these moods she would generally conclude with: "Ma loves me. She never gave me a hard word in her life." And in this protective love of her adopted mother she seemed ever to find her chief comfort and reliance.

It was singular that Mrs. Clemm, whose devotion to Edgar was so entire, should have regarded Rosalie with a coldness amounting to aversion. She, who never found fault with Edgar, was always harsh with Rosalie, who said of her: "I don't remember that Aunt Clemm ever spoke a kind word to me." This recalls to mind an incident related by Miss Poe herself. She went on a visit to her brother and his wife at Fordham, and was there told by Mrs. Clemm that they "could not afford to keep her over a week." Edgar was at this time in New York, whence he some days after wrote urgently to his mother-in-law for money for some special purpose. Finding herself unable to raise the necessary amount, Mrs. Clemm appropriated the most valuable portion of her niece's wardrobe, the sale of which enabled her to release her son-in-law from his difficulties. But Rosalie never forgot the deed. She immediately returned home with the story of her wrongs, and thenceforth "Aunt Clemm" became the object of her bitter resentment. Still it is to be noted to her credit that when, after the deaths of her daughter and son-in-law, Mrs. Clemm was reduced to soliciting charitable contributions for her support, Miss Poe generously sent to her, without being applied to, the whole of her store of pocket-money or "savings." She was rarely, however, intrusted with money to any extent, being accustomed to spend it with the indiscretion of a child, in purchasing candy or some useless and ill-judged present for her friends.

When, in 1859, Mr. Poe paid his last visit to Richmond, Mrs. Mackenzie remarked that he and Rosalie seemed on more familiar terms, and "more like brother and sister" than since their childhood. He treated her indulgently, and accompanied her about the neighborhood to be introduced to her "favorites," only now and then remarking in his quiet, half-playful, half-sarcastic manner: "Rose, why can't you dress like a civilized being?" or "behave like other people?" She took unwonted pains to please him; and when, after his departure for New York, the news of his sudden death arrived, was for a time completely overcome, manifesting deeper feeling than she had been given credit for possessing. Thenceforth she always spoke of him as "my dear brother."

In looking back upon this time, I recall the Mackenzie family as a happy and gay little circle, dwelling in luxury, and observing the most unbounded "Old Virginia hospitality." But then came the war, and all was changed. At the conclusion of that terrible four years' struggle I returned to my once beautiful home, only to find it a wreck. It was no longer "Talavera," but "Battery Ten," where a lonely half-ruined house arose in the midst of encircling fortifications studded with guns. Out-buildings, orchard, vineyard, all were swept away, and no token of the past remained save here and there the faint outlines of garden-walks and a hardy shrub or flower springing amid scattered shot and rusty bayonets. The neighbors, including the Mackenzies, had all dispersed, none knew whither. In this desolate abode I remained for some months, with one or two faithful old negroes as protectors. Each evening we would barricade the entrance to the fort as a sort of protection against the hordes of homeless freed negroes who roamed the country, subsisting upon whatever they could appropriate. One evening, when we had taken this precaution, some one was heard calling without, and mounting the ramparts I beheld a forlorn figure in black standing on the edge of the trenches. It proved to be Rosalie Poe. She was looking haggard and ill. The Mackenzies, she told me, were some of them dead and the rest living in extreme poverty somewhere in the country. "They cannot give me a home now," she said. "They have to work for their living, but I am not strong enough to work, and I don't know what is to become of me. If Ma were living, she would give me a home so long as she had a roof over her head." She shortly went to her relatives in Baltimore; but soon returned, saying that they refused to receive her, and had sent her back to the Mackenzies, which family now consisted of but one son, in wretched health, and a widowed daughter with her little children. Their sole means of subsistence was at this time a cow and the products of a garden which some person had kindly given them, and this latter they cultivated with their own hands. Miss Poe, as she declared, was not strong enough for such work, and the family, with insufficient of the necessities of life, were not able to support her.

About this time I went to New York, where I soon after received a letter from Miss Poe inclosing some photographs of her brother and an autograph letter of his, which she desired me to dispose of at whatever price I could obtain. I intrusted them first to Colonel Du Solle, editor of the Sunday Times and Messenger, and afterward to Mrs. S. H. Kidder, of Boston, both of whom kindly exerted themselves in behalf of the destitute sister of the poet. But no one cared to purchase either the letter or the pictures. And, meantime, every few days brought me an anxious note of inquiry from Miss Poe.

"Dear S.," she writes, in her characteristic style, "have you got no tidings for me about my brother's letters and pictures? Do, S., do something for me, for I am worse off now than ever. I have no home at all, and at night I have to try for a place to sleep. I really don't know what will become of me."

She writes again, on the blank leaf of a book: "None of my relations will receive me except one cousin by marriage, a widow. She is kind to me, but her house is full of boarders."

Again: "Do, dear S., try to sell the letter and pictures. . . . The place I was staying at last when I wrote to you I have left, for my cousin could not give me a bed to sleep in any longer. I walk about all day till I am most dead, and don't know where I can get a place at night. I feel like a lost sheep with no shoes nor gloves."

This last is simply a specimen of Miss Poe's peculiar manner of expressing herself, whether in speech or writing, with no attention to pause or punctuation—a peculiarity which was a source of constant amusement to others. More glaring errors of expression she was constantly guilty of; and I well remember the air of dignified unconsciousness with which Poe once, in company, received her pathetic appeal to "subscribe for her lame foot." That she should, with her social and educational advantages, have been capable of such barbarisms, is sufficient proof of her extreme mental incapacity.

Miss Poe afterward paid us a visit of some weeks in Richmond. She was utterly broken in health and spirits, but still with no special complaint. "Too little blood and muscle, and too much nerves," said an old physician who kindly attended her. Her chief pleasure seemed to be in talking about what she called "old times," and in childishly recalling the luxuries to which she had been accustomed. She had never had an ordinary appetite or eaten more than would have sufficed an infant; but now she said: "Many a time I have longed for the crusts that we used to throw to the dogs." Her desire was limited to "good bread and strong coffee," of which latter she drank inordinate quantities. Professor Valentine, brother of the Virginia sculptor, delivered a lecture in Baltimore upon the genius of Poe, and sent to her the proceeds, about fifty dollars. With this money she returned to Baltimore, where she intrusted it to a relative "to take care of for her." Subsequently, wishing to make him a present, she applied for the money, and was informed that he had appropriated it to the payment of her board while she remained in his family. Such is the story which we heard from others beside Miss Poe, who, in her indignation, consulted a lawyer in regard to the possibility of recovering her money.

Through life the course of Rosalie Poe's destiny had been much that of her brother, and its ending was destined to bear out the similitude. Her health became so utterly broken, and her condition in Baltimore so pitiable, that some persons at length exerted themselves to secure for her a home in a charitable institute—whether in that city or Washington I have not been able to ascertain. Here she died, and in such obscurity that it was some months ere her few friends were informed of it.

Mrs. Clemm, it will be remembered, met with the same fate—a refuge and a death in a charitable institute. So passed away the sister of the poet, and the woman whom he had called his "more than mother." So, also, died his parents—dependent upon charity for the last necessities of life, and a final resting-place, though even the spot of their burial is now not remembered. Truly, a strange fatality appears to have attended upon this family.

MR. JEPSTONE'S HOUSE AND THE SOLAR SYSTEM.*

BY CHARLES BARNARD.

"It is very important," said young Mrs. Jepstone; "it is the most important thing of all. We must have plenty of sunshine in every room. I'm not at all particular about the style or color of the house. Give me pleasant, sunny rooms and I shall be satisfied."

The young Jepstones had prospered recently, and had decided to give up boarding, build a house, and go to housekeeping.

"A boarder," said Mrs. Jepstone, "is practically a homeless being. In our own house we shall begin to live, and get thoroughly acquainted with each other."

This and much more was said during the busy weeks while they were looking over plans and considering estimates. At first, Mrs. Jepstone laid out a marvelous structure, with plenty of closets, a piazza on three sides, smoking-room, billiard-room, two bath-rooms, and, in fact, an admirable house—on paper. There were to be six rooms on the first floor and eight on the second and four in the attic. Mr. Jepstone suggested that the plot of ground he had bought of the receiver of the railroad at Naumkeg was really quite small, and she reluctantly took off two of the piazzas. Then they began to cut the plan down to suit the area of their available funds, and, at last, they got at the bottom facts. The house must be very small. A sitting or common-room, a dining-room and kitchen on the first floor, four chambers above, and that was all.

"Never mind," said Mrs. Jepstone, "any little box will answer, provided every room is light and pleasant. It will be my home, and I shall be perfectly satisfied to sit all day at the sunny windows. There is really nothing so important as sunshine. Every window must be sunny."

"You can hardly expect every room to be sunny."

"Why not?" said Mrs. Jepstone, with charming feminine perversity. "Does not Cousin Clara have the sun in every one of her rooms?"

"Clara lives in a flat, top floor, corner house, south side, with all the rooms in a row east and west."

"Can't we build our house in that way?"

"How would it look? Just think of a house one hundred and twenty feet long and sixteen feet wide!"

"At any rate, hospitals have sunny rooms, and the last report of the Board of Education recommended that every school-room should have a sunny aspect. I do hope our house will have the sunshine in every room. It is a sanitary necessity."

"All right, my love. I'll see the architect to-day, and tell him it must be done. You shall have the sun in every room—wherever you wish."

"Oh, I knew it could be done! I shall now be perfectly contented with everything. Will they begin to dig the cellar soon?"

"It is all finished and walled up. I found a place where some one had begun to build and then for some reason gave it up. I bought the abandoned cellar and masonry. You remember the place where they began to grade for the railroad just where it was to cross the county road?"

"Yes; that's such a pretty spot. I believe they intended to put the station there."

"Exactly; and I bought the very place where the round-house was to stand."

Mr. Jepstone went down town that morning, leaving his wife at the boarding-place. When he reached the street he looked up at the sun, and said, with a mysterious smile:

"There are only two ways in which it can be done. I must either adjust the solar system to my house or my house to the solar system. The former plan would probably prove difficult, if not impracticable."

The spot selected for the new house lay about four miles from town, in the lovely suburbs of Naumskeg. When Mrs. Jepstone first went out to inspect the site, she was charmed with everything. When she saw the cellar all complete, neatly walled up and boarded over, she naturally asked why it had such a singular shape. The cellar was in the form of a vast circle.

"It is rather curious," said Mr. Jepstone, "but I saved over two hundred dollars by buying this abandoned work. The cellar will be a trifle large for the house, yet it has one great advantage—the sun will shine on every side."

After that Mrs. Jepstone did not see the place till the frame of the house had been boarded in and the roof shingled. It was a cloudy day, and the country did not appear at its best; however, the house was charming, really artistic, and so small and snug it would be a pleasure to take care of it. She wandered through the unfinished rooms admiring everything.

"You feel quite sure all the rooms will be sunny? I'm sorry it is such a dull day, for then I could see for myself."

Her husband replied that he felt quite sure she would have the sun in every room.

"It does not seem very different from Mrs. Umbago's cottage, and I'm sure they never have the sun in their parlor after nine o'clock."

"It's all right, my dear. Every room will be sunny—even the kitchen."

"Oh! the kitchen is not so important. I dare say Katy would not mind if the sun never shone there."

It so happened that she did not again visit the house till it was finished and the women went out to clean the windows and put down the carpets. She went out with her husband in the two o'clock train, and when they left the station at Parson's Dock and walked over to Naumskeg they soon came in sight of the house.

"Why, Edward! how the house has changed! I had an impression it faced south."

"It's a little west of south."

"Well, never mind; the parlor will be sunny, and that's a comfort."

The carpet-women were at work in the parlor when they arrived, and Mrs. Jepstone at once said:

"My dear, the curtains should be put up at once: the sun will fade the carpets."

"I'll look after that at once. Come and see the dining-room."

The delights of this room kept her busy till they were ready to return to town. As they came out on the little porch the last rays of the setting sun shone full in their faces.

"How very pleasant!" said Mrs. Jepstone. "This western aspect is lovely. I always did admire a house that pointed toward the sunset."

On the following Saturday they moved out. It would have been a very happy day and they would have asked many friends to the house-warming, only it rained hard. Mrs. Jepstone suggested that they wait till Monday or pleasant weather, but their landlady politely suggested that if they stayed over Sunday she should expect a full week's board in advance. So it happened they went to their new home in a cheerful little rain-storm, and were happy.

In the night the storm cleared away. Mrs. Jepstone awoke in her new home with the bright sunshine streaming in at the window.

"How charming!" she exclaimed. "I always did love to see the sun rise."

"You can see it now as often as you wish," said her husband—"that is, if you wake up."

The breakfast-room was a new delight. It had two windows, one east one south. The sun would shine there all day. Unfortunately it clouded over again at noon and, before night, rained again. The next day was dull, and Mrs. Jepstone was too busy putting her house in order to pay much attention to the weather. At night her husband returned from town with a letter from Cousin Mary Ames.

Mrs. Jepstone read it with dismay.

"Cousin Mary Ames is coming to make us a visit. She will be here to-morrow. Of course, we shall be delighted to see her; but I do think she might have waited till we were fairly settled."

The next day came Mary Ames and fair weather. She arrived at ten o'clock, and the two ladies at once sat down in the bright and sunny dining-room to discuss the affairs of the universe.

"Yes, it is a very pretty house, and every room is just as bright and cheerful as this."

"Every room?"

"Yes, every room; even the little room I showed to you as the guest-chamber has the sun."

"It has a west window, I suppose?"

"No, both windows face north. Now, my love, tell me more. I didn't half understand your letter."

"It's simple enough. You remember that odious Mr. Timmins? He proposed to me and I declined with thanks."

"Declined, my love, with all that money?"

"Distinctly declined; and he proposed again, and I declined with some—well, with some emphasis. Last Saturday he proposed again, so I decided to come to you and stay until he got over it. No one knows I'm here except mother. You will protect me, won't you, dear?"

"Oh, certainly. He will never find you here."

"Just then the servant came in and said there was a man in the kitchen asking for something to eat."

"Mercy, Katy! Have the tramps found us out already? Give him something to eat and tell him to go away. You must never admit beggars to the house. They only want to see if it is worth while to come again."

A moment after, the man crossed the yard—a suspicious character with a furtive glance and ill-favored face. As he went out the front gate he studied the house slyly, as if to find its weak points.

"Shall you have a garden?"

"Oh, yes," said Mrs. Jepstone. "We have a little ground round the house. Will you come out and see it?"

The two ladies walked up and down the strip of grass on either side of the house, Cousin Mary Ames greatly admiring the tiny lawn.

"What is that long grassy bank beyond your fence?"

"Oh! that's the abandoned railroad. They finished the grading and started to build a round-house. Then the money gave out and the work stopped. We bought the very spot where the round-house was to stand."

"And you put your house directly over the pit where the turn-table was to be? Happy thought! Saved the trouble of digging a cellar."

"Yes, I believe so," said Mrs. Jepstone, doubtfully. "How did you know that?"

"I've a friend an engineer. He has been giving me lessons in that sort of thing."

"My love, why did you not tell me of this before? Is he handsome?"

Long and earnestly did they talk on this new and interesting theme, as they loitered on the lawn. Finally they wandered quite round the house and came to the rear of the place.

"Why, how strange! I thought your house was pearl-gray, with straw-colored blinds. This side is olive-green, with maroon trimmings and brown blinds."

Mrs. Jepstone gazed upon the back of her house in surprise and dismay. What could the painters have been about? This side of the house was wholly different from the front. If she had not known it was her home she would have been obliged to be presented and properly introduced to it.

"It is the most mortifying thing I ever knew. I don't believe Edward knows anything about it. Come; it's clouding over again. Let us go into the house."

About five o'clock Cousin Mary Ames said she would take a walk and go to the village post-office. There might be a letter for her.

She returned in about an hour in a high state of excitement.

"Oh! what shall I do? He has followed me here."

"Who, the engineer?"

"No; Mr. Timmins. I found a letter from mother, saying he left town within an hour after I did. You see mother's seamstress sometimes works for his mother. He wanted to know where I lived. Of course, I couldn't be rude, so I told him I was staying at the little pearl-colored house with straw-colored blinds."

That night Mr. Jepstone came out with a number of books, and said he should stay at home the next day to read up on a certain matter. Of course, he heard all about the tramp, the engineer and Mr. Timmins.

"I'll fix Timmins," said he. "He will never find the pearl-colored house with straw-colored blinds."

The next day was warm and sunny. Immediately after breakfast Cousin Mary Ames again set out for the post-office. She had not been gone five minutes before she returned breathless with emotion.

"Oh, he's coming to call on me! I saw him on the street. I'm going to my room. Tell him I'm very busy to-day—too ill to do a thing—tell him anything, only keep him away."

"Who? Not the engineer?"

"No; Timmins."

With that she went up to her own room at the rear of the house. Mr. Jepstone heard all that she said, and he immediately went to the kitchen. As she went up the stairs the house seemed to whirl round and her head swam.

"Mercy!" she cried, as she entered the room and sat down by the window. "Am I going to be dizzy? Why, how strange! I did not observe before what a good view of the road this window gives. Oh, there he comes! looking at every house along the way. I'll hide behind the curtain."

She watched him from the shelter of the lace curtain with interest. He seemed puzzled, and looked at the house doubtfully. Then he paused and took out a bit of paper on which he had evidently written a memorandum of the pearl-colored house with straw-colored blinds. He looked at the house steadily for a moment, and seemed to think there was some mistake, and then he walked on out of sight.

"Stupid man! He must see that this is the house. I'm thankful he's gone. I never could marry such a simpleton!"

She returned to the dining-room and found Mrs. Jepstone busy over her sewing.

"He went right past and never recognized the place at all. I saw him from my window."

"How could you, dear? Your room is at the back of the house."

"At any rate, he did not come in. I was a trifle dizzy as I went up-stairs, yet I'm quite sure I saw him."

"It's very late," replied Mrs. Jepstone. "The sun has gone from this window. I must see Katy about lunch."

"Lunch! Why, it's not ten o'clock!"

"Then the sun must have gone behind a cloud."

"Not at all, dear. It's a lovely day."

Absorbed in her work, Mrs. Jepstone made no reply except to say absently:

"Shall I use box or knife plaiting?"

"Box, of course."

"Nothing more of importance happened till the family met at lunch. Just as the meal was over Mr. Jepstone said to his wife:

"Will you have the sun in the parlor or the dining-room?"

She made no reply, but rising quickly she dipped her napkin in the water and began to nervously bathe his head.

"Oh! you poor, poor dear! You have been working too hard again. Your mind is giving way under the terrible strain of business."

"I'm only trying to please you, my dear. You said you liked a sunny room, and I have arranged everything to have the sun shine there this afternoon."

"Don't speak of it. I prefer the shade. Have some tea, dear. You'll feel better presently. Mary, run up to my room for a shawl. Perhaps Edward will lie down on the sofa?"

"Nonsense!" said Mr. Jepstone. "I'm going out for a walk."

At dinner-time Mrs. Jepstone remarked that it was very pleasant to be able to see the glowing sunset out the east window.

They retired early, though it was a lovely night with a fine full moon. Mary Ames lay for a long time sleepless and restless, and wondering why some one had not called. He must be able to find the pearl-colored house with straw-colored blinds. He, surely, was not so stupid as the odious Timmins.

"Hark! what was that? Burglars?"

Being naturally a brave girl, and knowing that it was just possible a certain young gentleman in the engineering profession might be near, she rose and hastily threw on a blue wrap with pink ribbons, and softly drew the curtain one side and looked out. The moon was shining brightly, and by its light she saw two men standing near the back door.

Then there was an ominous snapping of wood. Oh, it was the tramp! He had returned with a friend. They were burglars, trying to effect an entrance. She flew on noiseless steps—or, more correctly speaking, in silken hose—to the door of Mr. Jepstone's room.

"Wake up, cousin! There are burglars at the kitchen door!"

"All right," cried a voice from within. "Don't be alarmed. Go back to your room; I'll attend to them."

She ran shivering back to her room, and lay down in her wrap and tried to sleep.

The tramp had used his eyes well. The new house seemed to be worth entering. So he took to himself a companion spirit, and arrived at the house at eleven o'clock—an early hour for their profession, but the fact was they had an engagement at one with some friends at the savings-bank.

The rear door of the house had easily yielded to their persuasions, when, without a moment's warning, it seemed to be moving away. The modest moon disappeared behind the roof. In fact, she appeared to avert her face from the sight of the criminals below. Then the shadow of the house began to move over the grass and to envelop them like a pall. The entire house seemed ready to fly away. It moved, it turned around—already the door had disappeared round the corner!

Paralyzed with terror, the men dropped their tools and fled in two directions in mingled fear, amazement and guilty remorse. They could enter an ordinary house cheerfully; but this one had peculiarities beyond their experiences.

Mr. Jepstone looked out the rear door of his house, and seeing the excellent tools left by the burglars on the grass, he quietly gathered them up, took them to his own innocent tool-chest, locked up the house, and slept the sleep of the just.

As for Mary Ames, she was quickly lost in slumber in her blue wrap with pink ribbons. The moon calmly resumed business, and soon reached the noon of night. About this hour there seemed to be a faint suggestion of music in the air. Mrs. Jepstone heard it, and awoke with a start.

"Edward! Edward! the burglars have returned! I hear them breaking the door!"

"Nonsense! It's a serenade. The fellow plays with great feeling. I did not know so much could be gotten out of a trombone."

"It's very nice in the neighbors to welcome us to the village in this way."

"It's not for us. It's for Cousin Mary Ames. It's a shame to disturb the poor girl. I'll drive the wretched Timmins away."

"Don't do anything rash."

"Do not be alarmed. I'll send him off as I did the burglars."

The young person outside, in spite of the fact that he was master of the trombone, had nerves of iron. He had been brought up from his youth on a severe railroad diet. He knew an embankment when he stood on it. He was a good observer, and he had remarked the circular coping of the cellar-wall of the house, and had smiled in a professional way as he began his serenade. Suddenly the music quivered slightly. It did not actually stop, but bore a burden of surprise upon its liquid notes. Just as before, the dark and silent house turned calmly round on its vertical axis, which seemed to be the chimney. Still the music went on, and one there was who felt glad. Then she wondered why the music seemed to be passing away, and she said to herself:

"He did manage that diminuendo beautifully. It sounded exactly as if I was being carried slowly away from him. Ah! now it is coming back. What a lovely crescendo!"

Then the music stopped and the serenader burst into a peal of laughter. Suddenly a tall figure in black and white stood before him.

"What do you mean, sir, by making such a din at this hour of the night? It's not very becoming in a man of your mature years."

The young man only laughed and, waving his trombone toward the house, said:

"How do you work the thing? It's a very happy thought and shows the true engineering spirit."

"Oh, I beg pardon! I thought it was the venerable Timmins come to disturb our cousin's peace."

Just then there appeared a vision of feminine loveliness in a ravishing costume of blue with pink ribbons, and a fichu tied over her head.

"It's Mr. Clawson, Mr. Jepstone. I've been engaged to him a week or more."

"Delighted to see you. Won't you come in and have a bit of supper? My wife will be delighted to see you."

"I'll come in on one condition. You must tell me how you work the machine. It's no wonder I could not find the straw-colored house with pearl-colored blinds. It was turned the other way this afternoon."

"I'll tell you all about it. Scientific idea, isn't it? Come in."

The trombone was laid tenderly on the sofa in the parlor, and the two gentlemen sat down while Cousin Mary Ames went to the pantry in search of such good things as she could find.

Suddenly the door opened, and a distracting object in a pink wrap with blue ribbons appeared before them.

"Oh, Edward! Edward! Husband! Help me! Call the doctor! My mind is reeling from it—Oh! Beg pardon, sir."

"Mr. Clawson, my dear. Mr. Clawson is engaged to Cousin Mary Ames."

"Delighted to see you, sir. Excuse my agitation. The fact is I was nearly frantic at the awful sight I just witnessed in the heavens. Are you quite sure, dear, that the solar system is safe? I was leaning out my window listening to the music and gazing at the moon when it—I mean the moon—and all the stars swam round the sky. The moon actually fled behind the house, and then I think I must have fainted. Ah, it was terrible!"

The only reply to this was a laugh from both the gentlemen. Just here the door opened and Cousin Mary appeared bearing a tray, on which was a quart of oysters in a yellow bowl, a plate of seed cakes and a piece of cheese. She paused in surprise on seeing Mrs. Jepstone, and said with just a shade of vexation:

"What a coincidence! How could you put on that wrap? I told you we should look like two peas in a pod."

Under the soothing influence of the midnight lunch serenity was soon restored, and then Mr. Clawson asked for an explanation of the singular behavior of the house.

"It's very simple," said Mr. Jepstone. "My wife insisted that the sun must shine in every room of our new house. I felt sure it would be difficult to adjust the solar system to the house, or to induce the sun to shine in the north windows. So I built the house on the platform of an abandoned railroad turn-table. A few dollars set the old machinery in order, and now, when I wish the sun to shine in any particular room, I have only to go to the kitchen and turn the crank till the house is properly adjusted to the meridian. As the sun moves away I give the crank a turn or two and the house follows the sun."

"My love," said Mrs. Jepstone, "I'm deeply grateful for your thoughtful regard for my wishes, but what will folks say? We shall never hear the last of it. People will ask if we enjoy riding, and if great circle sailing is as pleasant on land as on sea, and that sort of thing. Can't the thing be locked up somehow?"

"Certainly, my love. We'll select a good position for the house to-morrow and throw the crank into the well."

After that Mr. Clawson played "Sweet By-and-By" on his trombone with great feeling, and returned to his hotel for the night.

Mrs. Jepstone tried the next day to decide which way the house should permanently face, and, though her husband kindly turned the house round several times, she could not come to any conclusion, and so they let it remain as it was. And now, whenever Mrs. Jepstone wishes to save the parlor carpets from the sun, she rings the bell and says:

"Kate, just turn the house a trifle to the east!"

THE WHAT-TO-DO CLUB.

BY HELEN CAMPBELL.

CHAPTER I.

"SHE? Pretty girl? Wal, I never thought whether she was good-lookin' or not. Maybe she is. It's only old Waite's Sybil."

Sybil looked up as the words reached her with a sudden interest, half angry, half amused. Anger was strongest. Why must it always be "old Waite's Sybil," as if she had no personality of her own; above all, when she was conscious of owning a much more definite and individual one than that of most of the girls about her? And what right had Hopkins, the express-driver, to point her out in such fashion? Her cheeks flamed, and she looked steadily and defiantly at the speaker, who chuckled slightly, and then touched up the old gray horse, known to all the village, and the only public means of conveyance to or from the little station by the river, a mile from the village proper. The long, light wagon served for freight or passengers, though the latter were seldom to be had, the lonely station giving no indication of the village which, though on a hill, was still shut in by other higher hills, piling up to the north and ending in the dim line of the Green Mountains.

To-day Hopkins had taken unusual pains, for a buffalo-robe was folded over the shaky seat which, as they climbed the steep pitch, gave every indication of forsaking its place altogether, the solitary passenger holding on resolutely and looking about with interest. At the top the old horse stopped for a moment with a long sigh and a prolonged and tremulous shake—the first, his protest against all hills; the second, an attempt to rid himself of several persistent flies,—and then planted himself firmly, as if need for farther progress ended there. A narrow stream, rushing down between steep banks to the broader river below, still lay between them and the village, crossed by a dilapidated bridge, with one central pier out of all proportion to any apparent need. Between the crest of the hill and the bridge stood a low, unpainted house, its steep roof sloping almost to the ground behind, and its dreary and hopelessly-forlorn expression seeming to form part of the place itself. At one side was a plowed field, the corn with which it had been planted growing close to the house. On the other a pasture stretched away to the stream, ledges here and there, and heavy pines, the remnant of a former forest, shutting off the village. One great elm rose at the back of the house, its wide-spread branches the only suggestion of shade or comfort, and two stumps in front indicated that others had once stood by the roadside. No fence shut them from the highway. A narrow path wound up to the door, and near it, on a flat rock, slightly above the ground and set thick with sweet fern, sat the girl who had come out hastily from the house and thrown herself down for a moment's rest.

Through the open door of a shed at the side came the sound of a plane, and looking in one saw a carpenter's table and smelled the fresh shavings falling from the pine board on which "old Waite" was at work. Sybil, as she looked up resentfully, met a pair of very steady yet soft brown eyes that held her for a moment. There was interest in them, even sympathy, and then a smile as the old horse gave a sudden start and jogged on. Sybil looked after her eagerly. This was some one quite unlike the occasional city visitor, who came back for a look at the shut-in life from which escape had been made; the sons or daughters who had gone out to factories or stores, and married in the new homes, with no desire for return to the old. This was a stranger, dressed in sober brown, with neither flying ribbons nor any glimmer of the heavy chains and locketts dear to the heart of most summer visitors. There was no hint of brightness in this costume, which still in its skillfully combined shades seemed to hold warmth and color, and which harmonized so exactly with the eyes and hair, that Sybil looked down despairingly at her own muddy-looking calico, once brown and white, but reduced by many washings to a tint of even dejectedness.

There was no time for consideration of all its objectionable features. The plane was silent, and she turned slowly toward the little shed, and then, with an energetic shake of the head, in which two tears that had formed with the intention of rolling quietly down in their natural and proper course, suddenly flew off on either side, falling on some scattered tufts of camomile growing between the door and the rock where she first found her.

"Anything that does better for being trodden on," Sybil said, half aloud, "ought to prosper still more if watered by tears. All the same, these two are all I shall give you to-day;" and she laughed, as she went toward the shed, a rather forlorn little laugh, but it answered its purpose as well as a more substantial one; for her father, who had settled back on the bench and leaned his head against the wall, straightened himself and looked at her, at first blankly, then with an answering smile. So long as the blank look lasted it was very easy to see how he might be known as "old Waite," for the face was thin and wrinkled, and the hair snow-white, while the dark eyes were both sombre and dreary, with a puzzled look that left them as the smile came, but returned as it passed. Sybil put both hands on his temples, moving them softly over the high, narrow forehead, and then pressed her cheek suddenly against his wrinkled one.

"What is it, father?" she said. "Can't you go on?" and then, as no answer came, "Let me see what the trouble is?"

"Something comes next," he said slowly; "and it seemed to go from me, just what. I put the board for Mrs. Woodruff's wash-bench up in the corner, because it came to me that I'd promised Widow Hinchman she should have that light stand to-day that Tommy broke. I've fitted the leg, but it don't stay, and there's a piece off the top, too."

"You forgot the glue," Sybil said, after a moment's look. "Never mind. I'll get it and we'll do it together."

"Yes, we'll do it together," her father repeated contentedly; and Sybil, after a moment's search, found the missing glue-pot behind the bench, and went with it into the little kitchen, where her mother stood ironing near the open window, through which one looked over the pasture to the river and the hills beyond. Sybil set the glue-pot on the stove, and stood looking at it, her hands clasped and her dark eyes as sombre as her father's, till roused by a quick sigh from her mother.

"He's worse to-day," she said softly; "almost too bad to work at all. And there are a good many jobs waiting. You will have to finish the ironing alone, mother, for I must help father through."

"Poor child! it isn't fit work for you," her mother answered. "If you had been a boy you'd have taken to it naturally, for you were always so handy; but it's all got to go, and I don't suppose it will make much difference when. We've got to end in the poorhouse, any way, and when we are once there you'll have a good deal better chance to make something of yourself, and perhaps some time take us out again. There, Sybil; don't cry. We've just got to bear it and be quiet."

Tears had sprung again, but once more Sybil shook them away and tried to smile.

"I won't bear it, and I won't be quiet," she said with an energetic stir of the glue-pot. "I've made up my mind, and I'm going to work in a new way. What is the sense in half starving when I know the business as well as father? I can't handle beams and planks, perhaps, but I know every twist and turn of the light work. We've always covered it up, and behaved as if it were a disgrace for me to help him; but you know I do most of it now, and why shouldn't people understand and know that there is a regular place, just as there used to be?"

"If it were only teaching or sewing, or anything respectable—even going into a milliner's shop—but carpentering! We shall be the town talk, Sybil;" and Mrs. Waite set down her iron despairingly. "I don't mind your helping your father quietly, but folks do talk so, and anything out of the common way is always wrong."

"I've waited because of that long enough," Sybil said resolutely; "and I've been thinking, mother, more and more. Father can't remember now an hour at a time, and we know there is no hope that things will be better. I shall finish all there is in the shop and then take a new start. How much money is there in the house?"

"The tax money, you know—we mustn't touch that—and three dollars beside, but half of that must go for groceries. Why?"

"I wanted a dollar of it, but I will wait. It's too late for this week anyway, and if people will pay, there will be enough next. But I shall take home the stand and the wash-bench, for the last time father went he said he didn't care about the money, and Aleck Gibbs was just mean enough to take him at his word and keep back the price he had agreed upon. And, mother, be just as cheerful as you can. I shall do something dreadful if you are not, for I'm in one of my twisty states this morning, and everything feels crooked."

Sybil caught back a little sob as she spoke, then laughed again, this time genuinely, and ran into the shed. Her father watched her steadily as she glued the pieces carefully, and then tied them so that there could be no chance of slipping till they had dried. Then she turned to the bench, and proceeded to bore the holes for the legs, using the great auger with a skill that showed how long the practice must have been. Her pale cheeks flushed, and the soft light hair about her forehead broke away from the tight knot into which she had twisted it, and lay in little rings above the delicate ears and wherever it could get its way. Hopkins, could he have seen her then, would have had no doubt that she was a pretty girl, and his passenger would have said more than pretty. Abel Hinchman thought so, and showed his thoughts very plainly as Sybil, who had rushed away when steps were heard outside, returned as she heard her father's hesitating voice.

"The light stand? Oh, yes; it isn't dry, but your mother shall have it to-morrow morning."

"You know more about the business now than old—than your father does," said Abel, thrusting his hands into his pockets and eyeing her with an admiration he did not try to conceal. Sybil's eyes were shining with excitement; her dimples came and went.

"I vow," Abel began again, thrusting his hands deeper into his pockets and standing before Sybil as if to bar her way out. "You hain't any business in that shop, Sybil, an' if I had my way you wouldn't be there a day longer. I say, Sybil—"

"Come out to the barn," said Sybil, who, in her absorption, had not noticed Abel's peculiar manner. "I want you to see the red calf, and to tell you something," she added, as they passed on out of earshot. "Abel, I know you are always in the store in the evening. I want you to do something for me there. Come over here on the hay and I'll tell you."

Abel followed, a dim suspicion in his mind that, after all, Sybil was much like other girls, and meant to be a little coquettish, perhaps even give him a better opportunity for the words he had half made up his mind to say. The desire lessened as this thought came. After all, he had better wait; but as Sybil turned to him he thought again that he had never seen her so pretty, and listened at first with an exceedingly divided mind, till roused to sudden interest by the end of her hurried statement. Then his look changed, and he rose up suddenly.

"Tain't fit. I won't hear to it," he said.

"Yes, you will," Sybil said coaxingly, going on with her argument—Abel protesting at intervals, but weakening visibly.

"Well," he said at last, "you put it pretty strong, and I shan't say no; but I've got to think awhile. I'll come back and tell how it settles itself, an' don't you go to buildin' up too much on it or anything else. If you'd been cut out for that kind o' thing you'd been made a boy and done with it. Not but what I'm powerful glad to think you're not," he added under his breath, turning away and walking slowly down the hill, adding only, as he heard the swish of the plane again:

"Well, I vow and declare!"

Probabilities for 1884—Republican.

IN pursuance of the purpose indicated in our last, we shall now consider the names of those Republicans whose eminence makes it necessary to regard as possible or probable aspirants for the Republican nominations for President and Vice-President in 1884. The successful candidates of that party for the Presidency have hitherto been from the West, and an examination of the following list will show that the probabilities are decidedly in favor of the continuance of that rule. If New York could present a man of commanding eminence and ability, in whose support all factions of the Republican party of that state could unite, he would undoubtedly be selected almost without opposition. In default of such a man in New York, it is probable that the Presidential nominee of that party will not be found east of Ohio, and will probably come from some state still farther to the westward. As we have before stated, strength at the polls and popularity with the masses bid fair to control this nomination, rather than political maneuvering and factional alliances. We give these views rather to call our readers' attention to the entire situation, than with the idea of throwing any light upon the result. So far as conclusions are given, they are based upon candid judgment rather than on preference or prejudice. In our next we shall consider in like manner the Democratic probabilities. The careful study of this question has more than ever impressed us with the belief that the nominees of both parties next year will be taken from among their less prominent supporters.

ARTHUR.

It does not seem probable that President Arthur will make any serious effort, or indeed cherishes any real expectation of a nomination for the Presidency. While his administration has been in most respects creditable, and in some respects remarkable, he was the heir of misfortune, and as yet has performed no act of such brilliancy as to furnish the basis for a successful candidacy. He has not seemed especially to court popularity. His veto of the infamous River and Harbor bill was an act which, if done by a man of greater aptitude for acquiring popular favor, would have covered his administration with glory. As a rule, the important appointments he has made have been singularly good; but he has not the faculty of taking the country into his confidence and directing public approval beforehand to the good things he intends to do. He not only holds his peace but manifests an inclination to act upon his own judgment to the confusion always and sometimes to the exasperation of numerous advisers. The country took a sort of pride in the reticence of Grant, because everybody recognized it as one of the elements of his military success. He was the man who "less had said and more had done" in the field than any other. But Grant had the peculiar power of compressing a volume into a single sentence, that made some amends to a public more greedy than the Athenians for some new thing. His apothegms were like his methods of attack—direct and pitiless. Probably no man in our history—not even excepting Lincoln—ever uttered so many phrases that tickled the fancy, convinced the reason and captivated the hearts of the people. This power President Arthur seems not to possess in any degree. With all of Grant's reticence he has no capacity for dazzling with a phrase that tells everything and reveals nothing. While his recommendations to Congress have been marked with peculiar wisdom, frankness and patriotic conservatism, he has as yet developed no startling novelty of policy or administration which has served to attach to him a popular following of any great power. Owing to his position and the fact that he will have a hostile majority opposed to him in Congress next winter, there is ample opportunity, however, for him to change all this and put himself on the very crest of the tide of public and party favor. Except by thus forcing the hand of his party opponents or by some unforeseen contingency arising to popularize his administration, President Arthur is not likely to become a prominent competitor for the nomination. If he should aspire to the nomination, his relations to his party in the State of New York will be a very important element in his candidature. In the city of New York he is probably stronger than any other Republican can expect to be. In the state, he would meet two elements of opposition which seem to be equally implacable. First, that element who cannot forget the insult, as they feel it to be, to their opinions and preferences contained in the simple fact that "Chet" Arthur became President of the United States. It is a queer, intangible feeling that they have somehow been injured thereby. It is not that they object so much to what he has done, or would have any especial distrust of a second term, but they are aggrieved that the country should have selected a silent party-worker rather than a noisy party-leader for the second place, on whom fell afterward the honors of the first. Secondly, Mr. Arthur would encounter an apparently insuperable obstacle in that element in his party which he had the misfortune to antagonize last autumn. At the head of this opposition is the late Governor of the state, who, if not able himself to secure the support of the state delegation, would probably, at least, be able to prevent its giving a hearty support to President Arthur.

BLAINE.

The publication of Mr. Blaine's book will no doubt be deferred until after the Convention. He is not a man to be willingly retired to private life, nor of a temper to omit any opportunity to settle old scores in whole or in part. His following is intense and loyal, and even those who oppose admire his audacity, shrewdness and energy. He served a notice after the last congressional election that he was not in the field, and the brief "boom" resulting from the formation of Blaine clubs among the foot-sore Republicans whom that race had enraged rather than discouraged, was soon suppressed. There are those who believe that he recognizes the fact that he has twice been "clubbed" to death, and that while he will avoid a drum-and-banner canvass, he will yet maintain a "literary bureau," and conduct a "still hunt" for the office he still yearns to fill. His reputation for running "second best," and the fact that he is thought likely to make a trade somewhere about the fifty-ninth minute of the eleventh hour, will make against him. While he may command a following sufficiently strong to enable him, in effect, to name the candidate, there is little prospect that he will ever receive any electoral votes. The campaign is not likely to be one especially suited to his peculiar style of work. It is not to be one in which any man's success depends in any degree on another man's failure. The power to kill does not presuppose the power to make alive, and the favorite in this contest will be selected solely on his own merits, and not on the defects of his opponents.

CONKLING,

the late Senator from New York, can no longer be regarded as an important political factor. He is not of a temper that retrieves mistakes, and those whom he once offends he seems fated to drive into unquenchable hostility.

EDMUNDS.

Unquestionably the most popular of the eastern Republicans throughout the whole country is Senator Edmunds of Vermont. Were he twenty years younger, and of robust health, it is more than probable that his nomination would be assured, despite the fact that he comes from a state that is never doubtful and has but an insignificant number of electoral votes. He is trusted by both factions, and has an unimpeachable record which is in entire harmony with the traditions of his party. He would command the full support of his party and a large probable following among the business men of all political beliefs. His age and impaired physical powers make it almost certain that his candidacy could not be successful. In order to succeed, the Republican party must appeal to and maintain its hold upon the young voters of the country. Its candidate for the Presidency must be a man who has a future as well as a past.

GRANT.

It is one of the most striking examples of the fickleness of public favor that even to speak kindly of this greatest of our military chieftains is now an almost certain method of awakening public suspicion. Unlike almost all unfortunate candidates, he met with little sympathy in defeat, and his efforts to secure the election of his successful rival seem only to have stimulated the animosity of his enemies. Every act and utterance of his since that time has been the signal for a new attack. The war against him has been unrelenting, and will no doubt end only with his life. There is no reasonable prospect that he will be mentioned as a candidate before the Convention.

HAWLEY.

Perhaps the most popular of eastern Republicans of long service, who is affected with no serious disability of age or record, is General Hawley. Of southern birth, eastern life, and western characteristics, General Hawley is one of the widest-known, best-liked and least-antagonized men in his party. At the same time, his chances for the Presidential nomination cannot be considered good. Should he be put forward for the second place, with General Sherman, Foster or Lincoln in the lead, his nomination would be almost assured. His record upon all the questions of the past and present is remarkably good. His military career was brilliant, and his personal character and following are of the very best.

CORNELL.

There is little doubt that the late Republican Governor of New York will be in the race for the nomination. It is hardly possible that his name should not be presented by a part, at least, of the delegation from that state. Mr. Cornell is a practical politician, and if the chances of success for his party were brighter than they are, his prospects could not be considered bad. With the chances so evenly balanced as they are, however, the nomination will be controlled rather by available strength before the people than by the manipulations of political workers. Mr. Cornell has a good record in every position he has occupied. He has a large following of zealous friends and a like array of implacable enemies. Outside of the State of New York, he has no standing among the masses, and his personality is not one that seems calculated to awaken great enthusiasm. If he should be able to secure a strong preponderance of the New York delegation, he would be more than likely to obtain the second place upon the ticket, just as one who could receive the hearty, enthusiastic and undivided support of the party in that state would be morally certain to obtain the first.

SHERMAN, JOHN.

Senator Sherman is hardly likely to receive any consideration as a Presidential candidate, not so much from his defeat in 1880 as from the incongruous character of his following in that Convention. Correctly or incorrectly, it is generally believed that he allowed the influence of his office to be exercised to secure delegations in his favor. This impression was strengthened by the fact that a large proportion of his strength came from the South, where the vast majority of his party is not of a character likely to have any very enthusiastic admiration for a mere financier or a statesman so generally accounted "cold-blooded" and unsympathetic. The Civil Service reformers could hardly be very enthusiastic in his favor, while the Stalwarts are not likely to forget that but for him they would probably have carried the Convention. His following even then was the least enthusiastic and reliable of any of the prominent aspirants, and the fact that he is no longer Secretary of the Treasury would, no doubt, seriously affect its numerical strength.

SHERMAN, WILLIAM T.

Among the possible Republican candidates General Sherman is one of the strongest. The first great element of his strength is, of course, his brilliant military record, and his almost universal popularity with the military element. Despite his conservative political views and the entire absence of partisanship in his administration of the army, his nomination would perhaps awaken more of the old animosity at the South than almost any that could be made. Along the line of his "march to the sea" he is remembered with peculiar bitterness, and his controversies with Generals Joe Johnston and Wade Hampton would make the opposition to him at the South so malignant as unquestionably to react in his favor at the North, and draw party lines sharper and closer upon the issues of the war, or growing out of it, than the selection of almost any other man. His chances would perhaps be impaired rather than strengthened by his kinship with the distinguished Senator, while the advantages and disadvantages of his relations to the Roman Catholic Church would probably about counterbalance each other. The condition of the Republican party in Missouri, and its inclination toward his candidacy, would constitute a very powerful element in his chances for nomination which cannot now be determined, while the fact that he will then, of his own motion, as it were, have laid down the highest military office and retired to private life, will create a feeling in his favor that can hardly be over-estimated. Such a thing always carries the public heart, and, united with his great personal magnetism and happy faculty for saying something apt and fresh and racy at any time, makes General Sherman one of the most available possibilities of his party. Situated as he is, he is unlikely to do anything to improve or impair his chances during the time intervening before the nomination.

FOSTER.

Governor Foster—Charlie Foster, as the Ohio Republicans delight to call him—is a somewhat remarkable product of that state renowned for political anomalies. He is one of the very few men who have risen to commanding eminence in the Republican party since the war without any aid from a military record. A man of irrepressible energy, great wealth, inexhaustible good temper and amazing luck, he has managed to hit the public heart without posing as a hero. He never fought, bled or died to any appreciable extent, but has won more doubtful battles for himself and held the friendship of more oddly-matched political associates than almost any man living. A man who does not attempt to conceal that he is human; who makes mistakes and owns that he has made them; who stands by his friends and does not exasperate his enemies; who gets down to the popular level, appeals to the public heart, and if he is not given what he wants, takes whatever task is assigned him to perform—whoever shall leave this remarkable man out of consideration in estimating the chances of the Republican nomination, will assuredly make a great mistake. He is not popular with politicians, especially at the East. The political "dude," who worships with his face toward England, and believes only in good clothes and a starched gentility, has no use for him. He is not regarded as a profound political economist; his ideas upon the tariff are not too inflexible; he has dallied with some political heresies, but has always repented in due season, and has an unmistakable power of inducing the multitude to follow after him. In his own party he is fortunate in his alliances. The practical politicians, whether of the Blaine or Stalwart stripe, cannot object either to his principles or practice, while those who delight to call themselves "Garfield" Republicans are by that very fact estopped from objection to him. The Reformers cannot deny that he has a good record as an administrative officer, and the "Temperance" element cannot antagonize him in a national campaign in which no specific issue can be formulated. That Governor Foster would be willing to undertake the leadership of the Republican host there is no sort of doubt. That he will be the choice of the Ohio delegation seems to be morally certain. He is handicapped by the fact that the last four Presidential terms have been filled from that state, for though Grant was from Illinois when chosen, he was an Ohioan by birth, and his life is much more closely connected with this modern "Mother of Presidents" than with the state of his adoption. Besides that, the Ohio man has modestly absorbed a pretty large share of the leading places in the military, judicial and diplomatic services. These places have been well-earned, well-bestowed and well-filled. No one can question that; but that portion of the East who are yet unable to recognize the fact that the centre of life, as well as the centre of population of the country, has gone away westward, and is year by year creeping toward the Mississippi, do not relish the fact. The East thinks that her wealth should rule, even though it is largely made up from toll levied upon what the West grows and consumes. The Northwest is underestimated by the Northeast, and that faction of the Republican party which especially claims to represent its best element is not altogether pleased with the "Westernism" of western party-leaders. Ever since the first nomination of Mr. Lincoln there has been a sort of a protest current among men of the stamp of Mr. Hoar, for instance, against the predominance of the unpolished and unconventional western man in the party. There is something too pronounced and positive and startling about the ordinary leader of that section. They have been galled at the idea that the culture, erudition and fastidious propriety of the East should be required to serve under such leadership. The friends of Seward and Sumner and others of like characteristics have felt it keenly, and have not always concealed it. These men are not warmly disposed toward Foster, because he is peculiarly of the stamp of common man, whose success they regard as a sort of reflection on their own merit. It may be accepted, then, that he will get little support from the East, except by special alliance with some one as a candidate for the second place, or as the result of combinations arising after the Convention meets.

HARRISON.

Senator Ben Harrison, of Indiana, has for some years been a possible candidate for one of the places on the national ticket. One would hardly have been surprised if he had obtained the first place either in 1876 or 1880, while it was almost a matter of surprise that the second place did not fall to him on both these occasions. In either case the prompt action of his friends might have secured him the Presidency before this time. This was wanting, however, and it may be questioned if the opportunity has not now passed away. Had Mr. Blaine succeeded at Chicago, Mr. Harrison would no doubt have received the second place. That alliance is not likely to be of equal value at this time. Indeed, it is probable that Mr. Harrison's ambition—if he has any—has now grown beyond the Vice-Presidential chair. He is now a senator, with a long term before him and a fair prospect for being named his own successor. Should he be an aspirant, as he can hardly help being considered, it will be for the Presidential nomination. For this he has many elements of strength. He is of the younger race of politicians. Unlike Mr. Lincoln, his name would be of very little advantage to his candidacy. The hero of the "Log-Cabin" campaign is very dead to the present generation of voters. The issues and events which gave prominence to the Harrison of 1840 have become indistinct and trivial to-day. But the man himself is by no means weak. An orator of note, a thoroughly equipped statesman, a man of genial nature and wide personal popularity, he has very many of the elements befitting the position and favoring a successful candidacy. He is not, however, a man of strong will, and it is doubtful if he can bring his state to stand solidly behind him in the Convention. Should another name be presented from Indiana the chances are that neither would be successful, especially as the fact would probably indicate something more than mere preference for another by part of the Republicans of the state, being grounded somewhat in an animosity which it would be bad policy to reawaken. Indiana will be one of the most important states in this contest. There is little doubt that one of the Democratic candidates will come from that state, and this probability makes imperative the necessity that rests upon the Republicans to select a ticket that shall at least be acceptable to all the Republicans of Indiana. It is likely to be one of the most sharply-contested points along the whole line. This fact has given peculiar piquancy to the report that the present Postmaster-General is not unlikely to be an aspirant.

LOGAN.

Despite a public life of unusual variety and brilliancy, it can hardly be said that John A. Logan has any reasonable prospect of securing the nomination. His close alliance with the Stalwart faction of his party would make his candidacy very perilous in the State of New York, and he has no special strength in any other doubtful states to counteract the peril of defeat in the Empire State. Besides, it is very doubtful if, after the animosity developed by the struggle in the Convention of 1880, his candidacy would command the united and hearty support of his party in Illinois.

GRESHAM.

Mr. Gresham has as yet only a local repute as a man of strong will, vigorous intellect and a devoted following in Indiana. His relinquishment of a life position in the Federal judiciary is held to be an indication of his intention to take an active part in Indiana politics. The fact that he was succeeded in his judgeship by so popular and politic a man as Judge Woods, is also thought to indicate that he is forming alliances to extend and consolidate his strength. It has been the claim of many Indiana Republicans that the party in that state has had no head since the death of Morton. Despite her many men of marked ability it is said that the leadership still remains vacant. There are not wanting men among them who declare that Walter Gresham aspires to fill that place, and in other states—notably among a section of Pennsylvania Republicans—there are to be found those who regard him as the coming leader. His record as a soldier and as a judge are both creditable. As a political leader, he has hitherto been more distinguished for the antagonisms he has evoked than for the successes he has accomplished.

LINCOLN.

THE career of Robert T. Lincoln has been exceptional among the public men of our history. The son of the most popular and revered of our statesmen, he was not yet beyond the preparatory stage of life when the tempest burst about his father's head. Only the most urgent entreaty of that father served to keep the boy out of the turmoil that surged about him. Again and again it is said that he broke away from this paternal restraint and sought the camp. Despite his father's position he neither desired nor received rank or command, and when he finally took part in the great struggle it was only as a simple captain on the staff of one of our generals. He was not thrust forward, nor given any prominence or advantage because of his relation to the head of the nation, but served unostentatiously and creditably. With his father's death he dropped from the public gaze, and was only heard of now and then as a modest, unassuming, and only moderately successful lawyer of the great metropolis of the Northwest, until he was called to take the portfolio of war in General Garfield's cabinet. During the exciting events that followed he was one of the few men closely connected with the President who never seemed to take advantage of that fact to attract the attention of the public to himself. If he has taken any part in the factional struggles that have torn his party since that time, it is unknown. To "Stalwart" and "Liberal" he has been the same. Whatever has come to him in the way of duty he seems to have performed with a quiet disregard of consequences that reminds us of his illustrious father. Very many congressmen of all shades of political belief vowed vengeance against him for his report upon the River and Harbor enormity, but he neither retracted what he had said nor volunteered any explanation or defense of what he had done. The general sentiment of the outside public was that he had performed a disagreeable duty resolutely and well. Perhaps no man in our history has ever filled so important a position, at so critical a time, with so few words, so little fuss and a more general acceptability. As a politician merely—as the head of a clique or faction—he has no strength whatever. As the son of Abraham Lincoln, as a faithful, modest soldier, and as one who while at the head of a public department neither took part in factional bickering nor sought to create for himself a personal following within his party, Mr. Lincoln would offer exceptional advantages as a candidate for the office in which his father died while the term for which he was chosen was yet hardly begun. Mr. Lincoln's chances for securing the nomination are undoubtedly impaired by Mr. Logan's strength in Illinois. While he would no doubt command the hearty approval of his party in that state, it must be remembered that the Federal offices are supposed to be filled with the especial friends of Mr. Logan; and it is generally supposed that a considerable majority of the Illinois delegation may very probably favor his nomination. Should that be the case, Secretary Lincoln's chances for the nomination will depend almost entirely upon the course which affairs may take in the Convention. At the same time, it cannot be denied that he would have peculiar strength as a candidate. He is young, the son of one who commands more than any other the grateful memory of a whole people, is honorably linked with the great national struggle, has an unimpeachable record, and the confidence and good-will of all factions of his party.

WINDOM.

The late Secretary of the Treasury must be considered in this list, despite his recent defeat for the Senate in his own state, chiefly because he is held in higher esteem by the aggressive faction of his party in the East than almost any western man of prominence except Senator Sherman. The especial admirers of Senator Edmunds—the business men and reformers of the East—would probably prefer him to any other man west of New York. His financial views have not always been sound, but his position in President Garfield's Cabinet, and his very able administration of the Treasury, have probably condoned his previous economic errors. His relations to civil service reform are such as should be satisfactory, while he has not actively assailed the Stalwarts nor estranged those who differed with him in opinion. He is a possible "dark horse," whose extreme northwestern locus with his eastern affiliation renders not seriously improbable. He has not great personal popularity or magnetism. His strength would be that of a fair average representative of the best elements of his party without special antagonism from any faction.

Worth Having.

A FRIEND, writing from California, says:

"I wish to send a few lines expressing my gratitude for the pleasure which THE CONTINENT has given to me in common with so many others during the past year. I have been a subscriber from the first, and intended to renew promptly, but I had vowed to send you one more with my renewal, and being very closely occupied, failed to secure one until now. I send this with my own as an evidence of my interest in THE CONTINENT."

Such testimonials from our subscribers are very frequent. It is not always that the reader of a periodical knows how much he can do for its excellence and success. With one more number THE CONTINENT will close its first year in its present form. We appealed to our readers then to help us, promising to apply the proceeds faithfully to promote their pleasure and advantage, and to spare no effort to make each succeeding number better than the previous one. They responded nobly. In a very brief period our subscription list was doubled, and since that time has more than quadrupled. Whether we have redeemed our pledge it is for our readers to say. If we may judge from the letters we receive and the encomiums of the press, we have a right to believe that we have at least not failed. We know that we have spared no effort to deserve the confidence bestowed. Fully $50,000 have been expended in matter and illustration during that period, and we now feel fully justified in promising that if our readers will do for us what they did before—send us each one more subscriber—we will make the investment even a better one for them than we did before. To new subscribers we will send THE CONTINENT from the beginning of "Judith" to February 1st, 1884, for two dollars; or until January 1st, 1884, with back numbers from January, 1883, for $3.00; or the same, with the back numbers of Vol. III bound, for $3.50. Such opportunities as these for obtaining first-class magazine literature at a moderate rate are rare. Any renewing subscriber who sends one new yearly subscription with his own is entitled to have them sent for one year at $3.00 apiece.

THE CONTINENT NOVEL EXTRA, No. 1, "A Mississippi Martyr," by Mrs. J. H. Walworth, is now ready for delivery to dealers. Price 10 cents.

ATTENTION is called to the carefully-prepared index of THE CONTINENT, Volume III, published herewith. Nothing shows so comprehensively the wide range covered by a popular periodical as the completed indexes of its succeeding volumes. To Mr. W. Frank O'Brien, of THE CONTINENT staff, is due the credit of the work in hand.

THE following rules will govern correspondence designed for this department, and readers are cordially invited to contribute either questions or answers, always bearing in mind the fact that, while a score of communications may be received, only one can ordinarily be published :

- 1—Letters designed for it should be distinctly marked with an interrogation point above the address upon the envelope in which they are sent.
- 2—The full name and address of the writer must accompany each inquiry; not for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith.
- 3—Each inquiry must be written on a separate piece of paper.
- 4—In answering inquiries always refer to the number of the query, and not to the number or page of the magazine.
- 5—Answers may be by members of the editorial staff or from other sources, in which latter case the initials, name or nom de plume of the author will be affixed.
- 6—Under answers the bracketed figures refer to the number of the original question.

Kedewah (the second e being long) is the phonetic spelling given by good authorities.

31—CAN you refer me to some recent and trustworthy work on South America, describing in particular the climate and physical features of Brazil and the Amazon Valley ? A. S.

The following named are recent works on the subject : "Journey Across South America, from the Atlantic to the Pacific," by P. Macey, Scribners, N. Y. ; "Journey in Brazil," by Prof. Agassiz, Osgood, Boston ; "Life in Brazil," by T. Eubank, Harpers, N. Y. The large works of Wallace and Réclus are also standards on this subject.

32—WILL you be so kind as to give a description of the toy that was the theme of the poet, Tom Moore, about the year 1789 or 1790, called in French a "bandalore" and in English a "quiz?" Tom Moore, in speaking of it, says : "To such a ridiculous degree did the fancy for this toy pervade at that time all ranks and ages, that in the public gardens and in the streets numbers of persons of both sexes were playing it up and down as they walked along, or as my own very young doggerel described it :

"The ladies, 'oo, when in the streets or walking in the Green, Went quizzing on to show their shapes and graceful nien."

In what French dictionary is this word "bandalore" found, or in what English dictionary is this word "quiz" found as here used ? J. W. B.

33—METAL MONEY. Where is the line "God save the paper money" to be found ?

The exact words of the stanza about which you ask are—

"God save the paper money and the paper-money men !
God save them all from those who call to have their gold again ;
God send they may be always safe against a reckoning day ;
And then God send me plenty of their promises to pay."

They are to be found in the last stanza of one of the "paper-money lyrics," written by Thomas Love Peacock, in 1825. These satirical summaries on the evils of "paper money, unlimited in issue," are unique and unanswerable. G. M.

34—WHAT are the facts concerning the alleged robbery of Cardinal Richelieu's tomb ? J. L. R.

In the April number of the Gazette des Beaux Arts is a drawing of the real "mummied" face of the Cardinal Richelieu, which was separated from the head and stolen from the tomb at the church of the Sorbonne, Paris, in December, 1793. This face finally fell into the hands of M. Armez, a private citizen, who preserved the skin of the face by an embalming varnish ; the teeth, the hair, beard and mustaches and eyebrows still adhered to the mask, the eyes being closed and sunk deep in their sockets. Sixteen years ago, the son of M. Armez presented the relic to Napoleon III, and in December 1866, the face, enshrined in a box, was solemnly restored with great ceremony by the Archbishop of Paris (afterwards shot by the Communists) under the monument by Girardon, to the great minister in the Church of the Sorbonne. M. Bouaffé, in telling us of these striking details, moralizes well that this is all that remains of the proud Richelieu, the most powerful ruler France ever had ; his chateaux, his pictures, his collections of jewels and antiquities, his souvenirs, his bones even, all scattered to the winds. What a tragic image of human vanities, "et du peu que nous sommes !" E. M. H.

35—WHAT portrait or portraits of the Count Duke de Olivares were executed by Velasquez ? E. H. R.

It is now an ascertained fact by M. Paul Lefort that the unrivalled Spanish painter, Velasquez, both etched and engraved a portrait of the Count Duke de Olivares—a point long in dispute between critics and quidnuncs innumerable.

36—PLEASE give some account of the mosque of the Imam Esh-Shafi'y at Cairo, and oblige R. S.

Knowledge, eldest daughter of smiling Peace, does not ordinarily go almost hand in hand with savage War, as she has in the late appointment of a "Commission for the Preservation of Arab Monuments" at Cairo. One of the commissioners, Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole, a sedulous Egyptologist, reports graphically the official visit of the commission to the tomb mosque of the Imam Esh-Shafi'y, "the most sacred, perhaps, in Egypt, though the Hasa-neyn may rival it in sanctity." Christians rarely obtain admission, and the large majority of regular mosque students have never entered it. "There is a magnificent frieze of wood-carving beneath the spring of the dome which must be Ayubite. The dome itself is the finest I have yet seen. The stalactites at the corners are extremely bold and well-designed, and the coloring throughout is richer than that of any other existing mosque of Cairo. Inscriptions in the walls record that both Kait Bey (fifteenth century) and Kansuh El-Ghury (beginning of the sixteenth) renewed the decorations; but there is no doubt that the form of the dome as well as much of the ornament is original, and dates back to the thirteenth century." After taking coffee with the sheykh of the mosque, continues Mr. Lane-Poole—"an almost unprecedented event, I fancy, in the case of Christians"—the commissioners examined a curious tomb, older than the mosque itself, of an Amir who died in A. H. 613 (A. D. 1235), with an older Kufic slab over the door with the date A. H. 304 (A. D. 926). The reports of the Arab Art Commission appear in the Moniteur Egyptien, and Mr. Lane-Poole is a correspondent of the London Athenæum.

37—WHEN was flax first used in the arts?

H. M.

Mr. Edward M. Henry calls attention to the "Cantor Lectures" upon the art of lace-making as exact and ample, delivered before the London Society of Arts some twelve months ago, by Mr. Alan S. Cole, of the South Kensington Museum, and quotes for us a very interesting passage: "Upon the Egyptian sculptures of Beni Hassan, described by Sir G. Wilkinson, of the date of perhaps twenty-five hundred years before Christ, there are pictorial descriptions of how flax was beaten, the striking of flax after it is made into yarn, twisting the yarn into rope, weaving the yarn into a cloth by a loom, and hundreds of similar interesting details in the practice of arts by dexterous handicraftsmen. Perhaps the earliest ornamental work germane to lace are the fringed borders of robes sculptured upon Assyrian monoliths of the time of Assur-nazir-Pal, about eight hundred years before Christ. The lines forming a trellis pattern in the upper part of these borders appear to consist of round, plaited cords, very similar in their plaiting to that which is to be seen upon fringed borders of Persian carpets now in the market or to plaited leather whip-thongs. On the mantle of the king the trellis pattern is rather more elaborate than those on the dresses of the attendants, though the whole design is quite primitive. The word 'lace' in our English Bible is used to indicate a small cord, since lace for decoration would be more commonly known at the time of the translation in the seventeenth century as 'purls,' 'points,' or 'cut works.'"

38—WILL some historical student explain the meaning of the English Exchequer tallies?

A CAREFUL READER.

The "tallies" were one of the means by which the English Crown accounts were kept on small sticks of wood, in the mediæval times, from two to three inches in length and half an inch in width, each of which was notched, and bore an inscription of the money values the stick or "tally" represented. There were two kinds. The first was the tally of "sol," abridgement for solution (paid), given forth to a person making a payment into the Exchequer, whereon the word "sol" was written, to show that the money denoted by the inscription and notches of the tally had been actually paid into the Exchequer, and to serve as a legal acquittance for the same in the Exchequer of Account. The second kind was the "tally of pro" (for), which at first operated as a modern check on a banker, being given forth in payment from the Exchequer as a charge upon some public accountant, for him to pay the sum expressed thereon out of the revenues in his hands before they should reach the Exchequer. It afterward served as a voucher, for which he had credit upon his account in the "Exchequer of Account," in like manner as if for money actually paid by him into the Exchequer of Receipt. See Palgrave's "Merchant and Friar." Gradually these tallies grew into clumsy, long, cumbersome sticks, three feet or more in length. They were abolished in the reign of the present queen. The fire which consumed the Houses of Parliament above forty years ago was attributed to the burning up of waste tallies in the vaults.

39—CAN you give me the author of the couplet:

"Poets have wronged poor storms; such days are best;
They purge the air without, within the breast?"

Portland, Jay Co., Ind., June 1, 1883. KATE C. HAYNES.

40—EDGAR A. POE, in his "Poetical Principle," has the following: "In the compass of the English language I can call to mind no poem more profoundly, more weirdly imaginative in the best sense than the lines commencing, 'I would I were by that dim lake,' which are the composition of Thomas Moore. I regret that I am unable to remember them." And again, speaking of Thomas Hood, he says: "'The Haunted House,' by the same author (i. e., Hood), is one of the truest poems ever written—one of the truest—one of the most unexceptionable—one of the most thoroughly artistic, both in its theme and in its execution. It is, moreover, powerfully ideal—imaginative. I regret that its length renders it unsuitable for the purposes of this lecture." I have what purports to be a "complete edition" of Thomas Moore's poems, but cannot find the poem described by Poe, as above; nor can I find in my volume of "Thomas Hood's Poetical Works" any poem entitled "The Haunted House," or any that in my opinion such title would suit. Will you kindly give me a little information on the subject?

THOMAS.

41—IN the quotation from Macbeth, Act V, Scene 5:

"Hang out our banners on the outward walls;
The cry is still, They come!"

A. claims that the idea is that the cry of the besieging forces has ceased, and that they are coming. B. claims "the cry" is the cry of the besieged; that they (the besiegers) continue to come. Will you kindly solve the problem, and oblige a group of readers of THE CONTINENT?

F. M.

Here is an opportunity for ingenious Shakspeareans to exercise their wits.

42—I HAVE noticed in THE CONTINENT answers to questions similar to this, so venture to ask you what should be the complimentary address of a firm composed of first, a married woman and a man as B. & S., Mrs. B. and Mr. S.? Second, A. & B., Miss A. and Mr. B.? Dear Sirs or Gentlemen would hardly do, and we are at a loss to know what is proper. A SUBSCRIBER.

43—WILL you tell me where the best water filter for home use can be obtained, and what is the price of one?

MRS. J. M. EDWARDS.

We cannot venture to recommend special styles of goods in this column, but may say that animal charcoal makes the best filter, and that owing to existing conditions in the Schuylkill River, Philadelphia is a great emporium for effective filters of the best construction.

44—WILL some reader of THE CONTINENT kindly answer for me the following questions:

1. Ought we to say "Decoration Day" or "Memorial Day" when referring to the 30th of May?

2. What day is observed at the South for the purpose of commemorating the virtues of the Confederate dead; why was that day adopted, and what is it termed?

3. In how many states are these days, or either of them, legal holidays, and by what term are they designated as such?

EXLINE.

45—IN parliamentary practice no one is at liberty to move a reconsideration unless he voted with the prevailing party. Is it also required that the seconder to the motion should have voted with the majority? By answering the above you will greatly oblige,

"CAPE COD FOLKS" is nearing its twentieth thousand, and Miss McLean is naturally at work upon a new novel, which, it is to be hoped, will have all the charm of portions of her first, and none of the preposterous features of her second story.

THE many who have followed the sayings and doings of "Uncle Remus" will welcome the announcement made by The Century of a new series from Mr. Joel Chandler Harris, who is unrivaled in his reproduction of negro character and dialect.

"THE MANHATTAN" bids fair to occupy as prominent a place in the affections of New Yorkers as that long held by The Galaxy, still regretfully remembered. A new volume begins with the July number, and the announcements for it include short serials from Julian Hawthorne and Philip Bourke Marston.

AN almost unknown German writer, Moriz Carriere, has suddenly made himself a reputation by means of a poem entitled "The Last Night of the Girondists." Their last hours it is known were given to the discussion of the immortality of the soul, and it is their thoughts and reflections which form the substance of the poem.

MR. AINGER'S "Life of Lamb" was one of the most charming in the "English Men of Letters" series, and he has performed a hardly less substantial service in his introduction and notes to the compact but beautifully made edition of "The Essays of Elia," published recently by Macmillan & Co. Neither were absolutely necessary to the lovers of Elia, a yearly increasing company, but the notes are full of information and the volume a most desirable addition to even a crowded book-shelf. (12mo, pp. 424, $1.75).

THE Q. P. Index Annual for 1892 is at hand, bearing evidence of increased enterprise and pains-taking work. As a specimen of systematic indexing, with an ingenious plan of space-saving abbreviations, it is without an equal. An idea of the labor involved may be gained from the fact that no less than twenty-three of the leading publications, including THE CONTINENT, Harper, Century, Nation, Art Amateur, etc., etc., are carefully indexed by subjects in a pamphlet so compact in form that it can be kept within reach even on an over-crowded desk. As a supplement to Poole's invaluable general index this is indispensable to all literary workers. A novel feature is introduced in a "Necrology," or historical list of defunct publications. Only two are named, viz., The Penn Monthly and Potter's Monthly, both of Philadelphia. (Q. P. Index, Bangor, Me.).

If ante-mortem lives must be written at all, then we may desire such doers of the deed as Mr. William Sloane Kennedy, who, in his recent book, entitled "Oliver Wendell Holmes, Poet, Litterateur, Scientist," places his justification on a fly-leaf, quoting from Dr. Holmes himself; "It is an ungenerous silence which leaves all the fair words of honestly-earned praise to the writer of obituary notices and the marble-worker." Recognition is good, and no American author has better earned it, and there is so much valuable information and criticism in the volume that one is almost reconciled to its existence, though it is impossible to reconcile one's self to this style of production. Mr. Kennedy is a fearless critic, and gives full ground for his statement that Dr. Holmes is, in great part, responsible for the continuance and cultivation of a spirit which must, in spite of the fine side it includes, come under the head of snobbishness, cultured snobbishness being a degree more intolerable than any other form. (12mo, pp. 356, $1.50; S. E. Cassino & Co.).

"THE WAYSIDE" has fallen into unexpected hands, Mr. Daniel Lothrop, of the publishing firm of D. Lothrop & Co., having purchased it. It is hardly necessary to say that this was the home of Nathaniel Hawthorne at Concord, Massachusetts—"the only one he ever owned—where he lived and wrote, and from which his remains were borne to the grave. In 1852, when Hawthorne bought it, it was a quaint and picturesque old house, nearly a century old, with a gambrel roof and the big oak end beams characteristic of colonial architecture. Hawthorne made many alterations in it and built over the L a tower in which he fitted up a study. Still the house retains to this day a venerable aspect well befitting the historic ground on which it stands—a mile from Concord village on the Lexington road. Mr. Lothrop will make it his summer home."

"MASTERY," the new juvenile weekly, conducted by James Richardson, lately editor of the Scientific American, has now reached its fifth number. Leaving out of sight the somewhat infelicitous name, and the intimation—rather repellent to young folks—that it is devoted to "useful pastimes," the publication seems well calculated to occupy a field toward which the lighter-minded of the juvenile publications have been for some months reaching out. The best test of such an undertaking is the way in which it is received by its natural constituents. We know of one rather mechanically-inclined young person who votes in favor of Mastery. It is the intention of the publishers to furnish weekly, in a popular form, such suggestions for occupation and recreation as shall meet the views of young people whatever the natural bent of their minds. The world of science and industry is full of material available for such a publication as this, and it deserves success in all the departments which it has undertaken to develop. The notable success of industrial schools in Philadelphia, New York and Boston makes it certain that the ingenious girls and boys of the country are only waiting for a chance to hear just what Mastery offers to tell them. The last number contains, besides a marvelous serial story concerning a scientific wizard, the account of how a boy made a serviceable trunk, directions for using soldering tools, a paper on aquariums, "Home Handicraft for Young Women," "Screens and Their Decoration," and several other entertaining and suggestive papers. (Address Mastery, 842 Broadway, New York).

THE cry still goes up for the American novel, but it may be questioned if the critic who desires its existence would know it if he saw it. In fact, till it is settled what constitutes the American novel, we are likely to be blind to much that for a coming generation will count as ranking under this very head. To such class will certainly belong "The Led Horse Claim," which, having ended as a serial in the Century, now takes attractive shape as a book, Mrs. Foote's own illustrations being of peculiar excellence. The story is very simple. Cecil Conrath comes from the East to her brother in the mining regions of the Far West, and finds that the mine in which he is interested—the Shoshone—has a rival in the "Led Horse," which has suddenly struck ore. There is a suspicion that the former mine has been tapped, and that the vein is really the property of the Shoshone. The agent for the Led Horse, Hilgard, in the midst of all the anxieties and vicissitudes of mining-life, falls in love with Cecil. The quarrel goes on, however, the brother being surly and untrustworthy at best. He will not allow a survey and the equitable arrangement that Hilgard wishes, and the end is a barricade in the mine, an exchange of shots, the death of Conrath, and the despair of Cecil, who counts herself as forever separated from her lover. How the tangle ends the reader must discover. In the meantime, a singularly faithful picture has been made of an equally singular phase of life. Mrs. Foote's work is sympathetic, delicate and charming, and a most delightful contrast to the analytical fiction of the day, while the making up of the book is quite in harmony with the contents. (16mo, pp. 279, $1.25; James R. Osgood & Co., Boston).

REFERENCE CALENDAR.

(THIS COLUMN IS INTENDED AS A RECORD FOR REFERENCE, NOT AS A SUMMARY OF CURRENT NEWS.)

May 5—A rather important incident occurred in the history of American monopolies. Mr. W. H. Vanderbilt retired from the presidency of the New York Central Railroad, and his sons from the presidencies of the other Vanderbilt roads. New offices known as directorships in the boards of managers are created, however, and these are filled by the millionaire's sons, so that the family may retain a comfortable hold on the business. This is manifestly a move in the direction of entailment.

(Concerning monopolies see H. D. Lloyd, Atlantic, Vol. XLVII, p. 317; C. C. Nott, International Review, Vol. I, p. 370, and Chambers' Journal, Vol. XVII, p. 362; A. S. Bolles, North American Review, Vol. CXVII, p. 319; D. C. Cloud, "Monopolies and the People," Egbert, Fidler & Chambers, Davenport, Iowa.)

May 6—The Rev. George Williamson Smith, D. D., of Brooklyn, N. Y., was elected to the presidency of Trinity College, Hartford, Conn. He is a graduate of Hobart College, and was for some time chaplain at the Naval Academy, Annapolis. Afterward he was rector of a church in Jamaica, Long Island, and since 1881 has been rector of the Church of the Redeemer, Brooklyn. Trinity College is recognized as the Episcopalian College of the United States.

(See Scribner, Vol. II, p. 301. "Sketch of Trinity College.")

Josiah Henson, the recognized original of Mrs. Stowe's "Uncle Tom," died in Dresden, Ohio. He was born a slave, and made a daring escape to Canada. Incidents in his life were used with fine effect by Mrs. Stowe, but the novel is by no means a history of Mr. Henson's life.

(See "Life of Josiah Henson" and "Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin.")

May 9—The Supreme Court has rendered a highly-important decision in regard to the right of states to fix rates of freight and fare within their own borders. The decision affirms that of the Illinois Court, saying, in substance, that the enactment of laws to prevent extortion by those having charge of the public highways, is an inalienable, legitimate exercise of power on the part of the state. The suits were brought by the great railways as test cases, and this adverse finding of the highest court has an important bearing on measures now under consideration in Connecticut and other states.

(See Railway Gazette for 1875; essays by C. F. Adams, Jr., and others; Pierce, E. L., "Treatise on American Railroad Law," Baker, Vorhies & Co., N. Y.; also "Poor's Manual.")

Official information was received that hostilities had taken place between the French and the Chinese before the capital of Tonquin. The avowed purpose of the French is to establish a protectorate.

May 10—The New York World newspaper was purchased by Joseph Pulitzer, of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, nominally for the sum of $400,000. The politics of the paper remain unchanged—Democratic, that is.—One of the largest oil fires on record was caused by lightning at Communipaw, N. J. A tank was struck and exploded, and four more tanks followed. Six lives were lost, and some $800,000 worth of property destroyed.

May 11—Mr. Amasa Stone, the Cleveland millionaire, committed suicide. He began life as a carpenter, and died worth some six millions, much of which he gave to benevolent and philanthropic objects. Business losses are supposed to have unsettled his reason.

(See articles on "Suicide" in Popular Science Monthly, Vol. VIII, p. 38, and Vol. L.IV, p. 491, and Vol. CLXVIII, p. 376; Nation, Vol. XXXIII, p. 517.)

Mrs. Jessie R. Grant, mother of General Grant, died in Jersey City, aged eighty-four years.

May 12—A notable decree of divorce was granted in Nevada in the case of Mrs. Fair, wife of James Fair, the "bonanza" Senator. The divorced wife receives the comfortable sum of $4,250,000 in money and United States bonds, the family residence in San Francisco and the custody of three minor children. Divorce is also a prominent subject of discussion elsewhere, especially in Pennsylvania, where leading judges have united in suggesting important changes in the existing practices of the courts.

(See "History and Doctrine of Divorce," by T. D. Woolsey, New Englander, Vol. XXVI, pp. 88, 212, 462, and Vol. XXVII, pp. 12, 517, 784.)

Ex-Governor Israel Washburne, of Maine, died in Philadelphia, aged seventy-one years.

May 13—Joe Brady, convicted of participation in the Cavendish murder, was hanged in Dublin.—The International Fisheries Exhibition was opened in London with great ceremony by the Prince of Wales.

(See J. G. Bartram in Macmillan's Magazine, Vol. XVI, p. 406; Report of U. S. Centennial Commission.)

May 15—Church and State in their Irish relations were thrown into violent agitation by the announcement that the Pope has addressed an imperative letter to the Irish bishops, warning them against encouraging the existing agitations, and recommending respectful language toward the government.—The signing of a treaty of peace between Chili and Peru is announced. It grants a ten years' cession of certain disputed territory to Chili, at the end of which time the question of title will be amicably settled by vote.

May 17—The city of Denison, Texas, and the eastern part of Nebraska were visited by tornadoes, which left nothing standing in their track.—The Right Rev. Jesse T. Peck, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, died, aged seventy-two years. He was formerly President of Dickinson College, and was a founder of Syracuse University.

May 18—On Friday evening a tornado struck Racine, Wisconsin, demolishing one hundred and fifty houses and barns and killing a score of persons.—Daniel Curly, the second of the convicted Cavendish murderers, was hanged in Dublin.

May 19—The Irish-American mystery regarding the existence of one Tynan, the founder of the murderous society of "Invincibles," and known as "No. 1," has been settled by Roger A. Pryor, Esq., who came forward as his counsel, and offered to produce him if wanted.

May 21—A heavy snowstorm occurred in Ohio and Indiana, the snow breaking down trees and covering the ground to the depth of a foot in the vicinity of Lima.—It is announced semi-officially that the Marquis of Lansdowne will succeed the Marquis of Lorne as Governor-General of Canada.

May 24—The wire suspension-bridge over the East River between New York and Brooklyn was opened with brilliant and appropriate ceremonies, and, notwithstanding the tremendous crowds, no serious accident occurred.

(See Electric Engineering, Vol. XXIII, p. 111; Knight's "Mechanical Dictionary," J. A. Roebbling on "Long and Short-Span Railway Bridges," Van Nostrand, New York.)

May 25—Edouard Laboulaye, the well known French jurist, died, aged seventy-two years. A powerful friend of the United States during the civil war.

(See his "History of the Law Relative to Landed Property in Europe;" also, articles in the Debate favoring the Northern States in the War of the Rebellion.)

The Dominion of Canada Parliament was prorogued by the Governor-General. Regarding the settlement of disputes between the Dominion Government and the Province of British Columbia, the Dominion Government have agreed to give a money grant to the province amounting to $1,000,000, of which $750,000 is to indemnify the province for the loss sustained in carrying out the terms of the confederation and for the delay in building the Canadian Pacific Railway.

May 26—Despatches received in Paris brought news of farther active hostilities in Tonquin, and of the departure of strong detachments of Chinese troops for the seat of war.

May 27—The coronation ceremonies were concluded at Moscow, having been begun on the 23d, and carried out with unprecedented magnificence. The most extraordinary precautions were taken against nihilistic plots, and the rites were performed without provoking any overt act.

(See "Life of Peter the Great," by Eugene Schuyler, Scribner's Monthly, Vols. XIX, XX, XXI and XXII.)

May 28—Six persons were killed and twelve injured by a tornado in Clay City, Indiana.
